the 29th of March, to form a closer union for their mutual defence. The landgrave of Hesse took great pains to have the Swiss included in the confederacy. But the elector of Saxony, who was guided by Luther, absolutely refused to admit them. And in general, Luther had great scruples in regard to the whole transaction, and the jurists had much debate with him respecting the lawfulness of such a confederacy; for according to his monkish principles, he held all human means for preserving peace in religious matters to be unlawful, and supposed that men should repose themselves wholly on the providence of God, without venturing upon any measures suggested by policy in such cases. But the jurists informed him that the constitution of the empire allowed the states to combine together, and probably also to declare war against the emperor; for, by virtue of the compact between the emperor and the states, the emperor engaged not to infringe upon the laws of the empire and the rights and liberties of the Germanic church. This compact the emperor had violated, and therefore the states had a right to combine together against him. Luther replied that he had not been aware of this, and that if it was so, he had no objections to make; for the gospel was not opposed to civil government. Yet he could not approve of an offensive war.—Schl. [The fullest and most authentic information respecting these negotiations, accessible to the English reader, is to be found in Ranke's History of the Reformation, vol. iii. book vi. chap. 1 and 5.—R.]

¹ In their meeting at Smalcald, A.D. 1531, after forming a league for mutual defence for six years, they drew up an apology for their conduct; in which they gave a concise history of the Reformation, the necessity there was for it, and the sufferings and dangers to which they were exposed on account of it. Copies of this apology they sent both to Francis I. the king of France, and to Henry VIII. of England. Both those kings returned very civil answers; but nothing was said on either side about an alliance for mutual defence. See Seckendorf's Historia Lutheranismi, lib. iii. sec. 1.; Gerdes, Historia Evang. Reformati, tom. iv. p. 222, &c. In 1535, the Protestants had another meeting at Smalcald, in which they extended their league of 1531 for 10 years longer. About this time, Dr. Barnes, an English clergyman, arrived in Saxony, as envoy from the king of England; and he was soon followed by Edward Fox, bishop of Hereford, and Nicholas Heath, an English archdeacon. They attended the convention at Smalcald, and a negotiation was held for forming a coalition of some sort between the German confederates and the king of England. See Seckendorf, ubi supra, lib. iii. sec. 39. In 1538, the German confederates sent an embassy to the king of France (which however effected very little), and also three ambassadors to the king of England. They proposed to king Henry to adopt the Augsburg Confession, and consent to be the head and patron of the Protestant confederacy; they also stated what aid each should afford to the other in case of attack from the enemy. But Henry was not yet prepared to go so far in the Reformation, nor did he wish to enroll himself with the emperor. See Seckendorf, ubi supra, lib. iii. sec. 166, p. 197, &c.; Gerdes, ubi supra, p. 287, &c.; Burnet's History of the Reformation, book iii. vol. 1. p. 329, &c. ed. London, 1825.—Jur.

in the diet of Cologne, A.D. 1531, had been elected contrary to the laws of the empire.

7. After various consultations, therefore, in the year 1532 a peace was concluded at Nuremberg between the emperor and the Protestants on the following terms.—that the latter should contribute money for the Turkish war, and should acknowledge Ferdinand as king of the Romans; and that Charles should annul the edicts of Worms and Augsburg, and should allow the followers of Luther full liberty to regulate their religious matters as they pleased, until either a council (which was to be held within six months) or a diet of the empire should determine what religious principles were to be adopted and obeyed. Scarcely was the apprehension of war removed by this convention, when John, the elector of Saxony, died and was succeeded by his son, John Frederick, an unfortunate prince though possessed of invincible fortitude and magnanimity.

8. The truce of Nuremberg with the emperor, gave so much courage and fortitude to the concealed and feebler enemies of the pontiff, that they would no longer obey his mandates. This is attested by various regions and towns of Germany, which year after year from this time onward fearlessly made profession of the religion which Luther had restored. Moreover, as the only hope of removing the disagreement about religion now depended on the promised council, the emperor did not cease to urge the sovereign pontiff Clement VII. to hasten its meeting. But Clement, whom the recollection of former councils filled with apprehensions, contrived to put it off, and wished the cause of his see might be decided rather by arms than by arguments.² He promised indeed by his legate in 1533, that a council should be called in Italy either at Mantua, Placentia, or Bologna. But the Protestants declared themselves not satisfied with an Italian council, and maintained that a controversy arising in Germany ought to be decided within the limits of Germany.

² Besides the causes which, since the councils of Constance and Basle, had divested the popes of all relish for such clerical parliaments, pope Clement had his own peculiar reasons. It was his misfortune to be the illegitimate son of Julius de Medici, and he was afraid his enemies in the council might avail themselves of this circumstance, to pronounce him unworthy of the papal dignity. For it was a disputed point, which had never been decided, whether a bastard could be a legitimate pope. That a profligate might be, had been decided by usage long since, especially by the example of Alexander VI. see Paul Sarpi, tom. I. page 84, &c.; and Ziegler's Historia Clementis VII. in Schehorn's Anecdotal. Hist. Eccles. et Literar. vol. i. p. 210, &c.—Schl.

And the pontiff himself managed so artfully as to get rid of his own promise, and soon after died in the year 1534.¹

9. His successor, Paul III. seemed more tractable, when the emperor addressed him on the subject of a council. For he first made a promise in 1535, that he would assemble a council at Mantua; and afterwards, A.D. 1536, he actually proclaimed one by letters despatched through all the Catholic countries. The Protestants, on the other hand, foreseeing that in such a council everything would go according to the opinion and pleasure of the pontiff, declared in a convention held at Smalcald in 1537, their entire dissatisfaction with such a servile council; yet they procured a new summary of their religious faith to be drawn up by Luther, which they might present to the assembled bishops if occasion should call for it. This production of Luther is called the Articles of Smalcald; and it was admitted among the books from which the religious sentiments of those called Lutherans are to be learned.²

¹ Everything pertaining to this council is fully and intelligently set forth, pre-eminently by Paul Sarpi, Historia Concilii Tridentini, lib. i.—[The Protestants met at Smalcald to consider the proposed plan of an Italian council, and remonstrated against it, as being to be held in Italy. They also insisted that the pope, as one of the parties whose cause was to be tried, should have no authority over the council; and that the decision should be founded solely on the Holy Scriptures.—Mur.]

² The Articles of Smalcald were drawn up in German by Luther, in his own acrimonious style. The Augsburg Confession was intended to soften prejudice against the Lutherans, and to conciliate the good will of the Catholics. Of course the gentle Melancthon was employed to write it. The Articles of Smalcald, on the contrary, were a preparation for a campaign against an enemy with whom no compromise was deemed possible, and in which victory or death was the only alternative. Of course all delicacy towards the Catholics was dispensed with, and Luther's fiery style was chosen and was allowed full scope. In words, the Articles flatly contradict the Confession in some instances; though in sense they are the same. Thus the Confession (Article xxiv.) says: "We are unjustly charged with having abolished the mass. For it is manifest that without boasting we may say, the mass is observed by us with greater devotion and earnestness than by our opposers." But in the Articles of Smalcald, (Part II. Art. II.) it is said: "That the popish mass is the greatest and most horrid abomination, as militating directly and violently against these articles; and yet it has become the chief and most splendour of all the popish idolatries." In the Confession, they applied the name of the mass to the Lutheran form of the eucharist. But in these Articles, they confine that term to its proper import, the ordinary public service among the Catholics.—The Articles of Smalcald cover 28 folio pages, and are preceded by a preface and followed by a treatise on the power and supremacy of the pope. The first part contains four concise articles, respecting God, the Trinity, and the Incarnation, passion, and ascension of Christ, in accordance with the Apostles' and the Athanasian Creeds. On these Articles the Protestants professed to agree altogether with the papists. The second part also contains four articles of fundamental importance, but in which the Protestants and papists are declared to be totally and irreconcilably at variance. They relate to the nature and the grounds of justification, the mass and saint worship, ecclesiastical and monkish

10. During these consultations two most important events occurred, the one very injurious to the general interests of religion and especially to the cause of the Reformation, the other no less so to the papal dominion. The former was, a new sedition of the furious and fanatical tribe of the Anabaptists; the latter was, a revolt of Henry VIII. the king of England from the Roman pontiff. In the year 1533, certain persons of the class of Anabaptists, who were more insane and distracted than the rest, came to Munster, a city of Westphalia, and gave out that they were divinely commissioned to set up a sort of holy empire on the ruins of all human institutions. The whole city being excited and thrown into great commotion, they proceeded to erect the new commonwealth conformably to their crude opinions and fancies; and placed John Bockholt, a tailor of Leyden, at the head of it. But the city being taken in the year 1535, by the bishop of Münster who was aided by other German princes, this delirious king and his associates were executed without mercy; and the new republic was thus overthrown soon after its establishment. This seditious procedure of certain Anabaptists induced most of the princes of Europe to enact severe laws against the entire sect; in consequence of which, in subsequent years vast numbers of them, both the innocent and the guilty, were miserably put to death.³

11. Henry VIII. king of England, who had before warmly opposed Luther, a prince falling behind none of that age either in vice or in talents, being smitten with the charms of Anne Boleyn, an English virgin establishments, and the claims of the pope. The third part contains 15 articles, which the Protestants considered as relating to very important subjects, but on which the papists laid little stress. The subjects are, sin, the law, repentance, the gospel, baptism, the sacrament of the altar, the keys (or spiritual power), confession, excommunication, ordination, celibacy of the clergy, churches, good works, monastic vows, and human satisfactions for sin. When the Protestants subscribed these Articles, Melancthon annexed a reservation to his signature, purporting that he could admit of a pope, provided he would allow the gospel to be preached in its purity, and would give up his pretensions to a divine right to rule, and would found his claims wholly on expediency and human compact. In consequence of this dissent from Luther, Melancthon was requested to draw up an article on the power and supremacy of the pope. He did so; and the Protestants were well pleased with it and subscribed to it. It is annexed to the Articles of Smalcald. See Walch's Introductio in Librum Symbol. lib. i. cap. v.—Mur.

³ Hanelmann's Historia Ecclesiast. renovati Evangelii, per Inferiorem Saxoniam et Westphalian, par. ii. p. 1196, &c. In his collected works; Von Printz, Succinea Historia Anabaptist. cap. x. xl. xii. p. 94. [Sleidan, Commentarii de Statu Religi. et Reipublice, sub Carolo V. lib. x.; Gerdes, Sermonum Antiquarium, tom. ii. p. 377, &c. 569, &c.; Robertson's History of the Reign of Charles V. book v. p. 245—259.—Mur.]

of high birth, in order to marry her wished to be divorced from his queen, Catharine of Aragon aunt to Charles V. and he applied to the sovereign pontiff Clement VII. to sanction such a measure.¹ He declared however that his conscience would not allow him to cohabit with his queen Catharine, because she had been married to his deceased brother Arthur, and a marriage with a brother's widow was contrary to the law of God. Clement through fear of offending Charles V. contrived various evasions, and endeavoured to delude and disappoint Henry. He therefore became impatient, and at the suggestion of Thomas Cranmer, who was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury and a secret friend to the Reformation by Luther, consulted nearly all the universities of Europe on the question; and as most of them pronounced marriage with a brother's widow to be unlawful, the king divorced Catharine without the consent of the pontiff, and married Anne Boleyn. Henry's defection from the pontiff soon followed. For the king being declared by the lords and commons of England, supreme head of the British church, he in the year 1533 ejected the monks, disposed of all their property, and abolished altogether the authority of the Roman pontiff in England.²

12. This downfall of the popish power in England, however, was of little advantage to the lovers of a purer religion. For the king, though he destroyed the empire of the pontiff, yet retained for the most part the old religion; and he persecuted and sometimes punished capitally those who thought differently from himself on religious subjects. Besides, he understood the title he had assumed of supreme head of the British church, to invest him with the powers of the Roman pontiff; so that he had a right to make decrees respecting religion, and to prescribe to the citizens what they must believe and practise. During his life therefore religion in England was coincident with the king's character, that is, uncertain and changeable. Yet the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, who had the king's confidence and was a patron of the reformed religion, exerted himself by his writings and his actions, as much as he prudently could and as the instability of the king and other difficulties would allow, to diminish gradually the old superstition and ignorance, and to increase the number of the friends of Luther.³

13. After the pontiff's first proposed council was set aside, various negotiations for restoring peace and harmony were held between the emperor and the Protestants, but without any determinate and solid benefit; because the pontiff, by his legates and others, generally disconcerted all their measures. In the year 1541 the emperor, much to the displeasure of the pontiff, ordered select individuals of both parties to confer together respecting religion at Worms. Accordingly, Philip Melancthon and John Eck held a discussion during three days.⁴ The discussion was then

¹ Besides Burnet, see Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. chap. i. p. 11, &c. [In the year 1536, king Henry, with the sanction of the convocation, prescribed what doctrines should be taught in the churches; the substance of which may be seen in Burnet, Hist. Reform. vol. i. p. 280, &c. ed. London, 1825, and in Neal, ubi supra, p. 69, &c. Mr. Neal remarks upon these instructions: "One sees here the dawn of the Reformation; the Scriptures and the ancient creeds are made the standards of faith, without the tradition of the church or decrees of the pope; the doctrine of justification by faith is well stated; four of the seven sacraments are passed over, and purgatory is left doubtful. But transubstantiation, auricular confession, the worshipping of images and saints are still retained." In the year 1539, the king and the opposers of the Reformation procured a statute to be passed in both houses of parliament, making it penal to speak or write at all against any one of the six following articles:—"First, that in the sacrament of the altar, after the consecration, there remained no substance of bread and wine, but under these forms the natural body and blood of Christ were present. Secondly, that communion in both kinds was not necessary to salvation to all persons, by the law of God; but that both the flesh and blood of Christ were together in each of the kinds. Thirdly, that priests, after the order of priests (after admission to orders), might not marry, by the law of God. Fourthly, that vows of chastity ought to be observed, by the law of God. Fifthly, that the use of private masses ought to be continued; which, as it was agreeable to God's law, so man received great benefit by them. Sixthly, that auricular confession was expedient and necessary, and ought to be retained in the church." This, which was called "the bloody statute," was enforced during the residue of Henry's reign or till the year 1547. It brought many to the stake and to prison, and caused the Reformation to go back rather than advance during these eight years. See Burnet, ubi supra, p. 334, &c. and Neal, ubi supra, p. 75, &c.—Mur.

⁴ See Roder's Tract, De Colloquio Wormatiensi, Nu-

¹ Moshelm errs in representing Henry's passion for Anne Boleyn as the first and grand cause of the king's wish to be divorced from his queen. His father had scrupled the legitimacy of the marriage; a foreign court had made it an objection to intermarriage with his children by this wife; and his subjects very generally entertained apprehensions respecting the succession to his crown from the same cause. It was state policy which first led to the marriage, but it appears never to have given entire satisfaction to any one. Doubtless Henry was sincere in professing to have scruples of conscience on the subject. But there were also other causes. The queen's beauty had faded, and some diseases had rendered her person less agreeable. Political considerations or apprehensions respecting his successor had influence. And after these causes had operated some time, Anne Boleyn came to court and the king was charmed with her. This, though the last, was henceforth probably not the least reason for his final resolution to divorce his queen. See Hume's History of England, ch. xxx. vol. iii. p. 288, &c. Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i. book ii. at the beginning.—Mur.

² Besides Burnet and others who have composed Histories of the Reformation in England, the Acts of this memorable event as collected by David Wilkins, in his Concilia Magnæ Britannię et Hibernię, tom. iii. p. 424, &c. should be consulted. See also Raynal's Ancient Histories, Politiques, Militaires, tome i. par. II. p. 50, &c. and the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique et Crit. tome ii. p. 388, article Bokna.

transferred for certain reasons to the diet of Ratisbon of the same year; in which the project of a nameless writer who proposed conditions for a peace, was especially subjected to examination.¹ But the protracted deliberation had no other effect than to bring the parties to agree, that this very difficult subject should be more fully examined in the future council, or if a council should not be called, then in the next diet of Germany.

14. After this a very disturbed state of things ensued, which required the deliberations for settling religious controversies to be deferred. In the diet of Spire in 1542, the pontiff by his legate renewed his promise of a council, and signified that it should be held at Trent, if that place was agreeable. The king of the Romans, Ferdinand, and the Catholic princes gave their assent; but the Protestants rejected both the place and the council proposed by the pontiff, and demanded a legitimate and free council, that is, one which should be exempt from the laws and the authority of the pontiff. Nevertheless, the pope with the consent of the emperor, proceeded to appoint the council; and at the diet of Worms, A.D. 1545, the emperor negotiated with the Protestants to bring them to approve of the council at Trent. But these negotiations failing, and the emperor seeing no prospect that the Protestants would ever subject themselves to the council, listened to the advice of Paul III. who urged a resort to arms, and in conjunction with that pontiff he secretly prepared for war. The leaders of the Protestants, the landgrave of Hesse and the elector of Saxony, took measures not to be overwhelmed in a defenceless state, and raised forces on their side.² While this storm was gathering, Luther, who was disposed to contend with prayers and patience rather than with arms, met a peaceful death at Eisleben his native town, on the 18th of February, 1546.³

remb. 1744, 4to. [and Sleidan's Comment. de Statu Relig. et Reipubl. lib. xiii. sub finem.—Mur.

¹ See Bleck's Dreyfaches Interim, Leip. 1721, 8vo, ch. i. p. 1, &c. [This conference was held in April, 1541. The emperor selected the disputants; on the part of the Catholics, John Eck, Julius Pflug, George Gropper; on the part of the Protestants, Ph. Melancthon, Martin Bucer, and John Pistorius. The author of the written project (called the first Interim), here read and discussed, was supposed to be Gropper. See Sleidan, ubi supra; Robertson's Charles V. book vi. p. 254, &c.—Mur.

² See Robertson's Hist. of Charles V. book vii. p. 322, &c.—Mur.

³ See Bower's Life of Luther, chap. xi.—Mur. [On the latter days of Luther, besides this meagre compilation by Bower, the English reader should refer to Waddington's Hist. of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 341, &c.; Scott's Continuation of Milner, &c. 3d edition, vol. i. p. 464, &c.—R.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION, FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE WAR OF SMALCALD [A.D. 1546], TO THE CONCLUSION OF THE RELIGIOUS PEACE [A.D. 1555].

1. The destruction of those who should oppose the council of Trent had been agreed on between the emperor and the pontiff, and the opening of the council was to be the signal for taking up arms. Accordingly, that council had scarcely commenced its deliberations at the beginning of the year 1546, when it was manifest from various indications that an imperial papal war impended over the Protestants. At the diet of Ratisbon indeed of this year, a new conference or dispute between the principal theologians of the two parties had been instituted; but its progress and issue clearly showed, that the cause was to be decided not by arguments but by arms. The fathers at Trent passed their first decrees, which the Protestants again firmly rejected at the diet of Ratisbon; and soon after the emperor proscribed the Protestant leaders, and began to assemble an army against them.

2. The Saxon and Hessian princes led their forces into Bavaria to meet the emperor, and they cannonaded his camp at Ingolstadt. A battle was expected to ensue. But as Maurice duke of Saxony (who coveted the riches and the high rank of his uncle John Frederic, and was seduced by the promises of the emperor) now invaded the Saxon territories, and as the confederates of Smalcald were not harmonious in their views, and as the money promised them from France did not arrive, the Protestant army was broken up and the elector of Saxony returned home. The emperor pursued him by forced marches, and fell upon him unawares near Mühlberg on the Elbe, the 24th of April, 1547, where after an unsuccessful battle, and betrayed probably by his friends, he was taken prisoner. The other Protestant prince, Philip of Hesse, by advice of his son-in-law Maurice and of the elector of Brandenburg, threw himself upon the mercy of the emperor, expecting according to the emperor's promise to be forgiven and to be set at liberty. But he was nevertheless kept a prisoner; and it is reported that the emperor violated his promise in this instance and deluded the Hessian prince by the ambiguity of some German words. But this part of the history has not yet been so investigated as to make the imprisonment of the land-grave and the grounds of it altogether clear.¹

3. After this victory, the cause of the Protestants appeared irrecoverably ruined, and that of the Roman pontiff triumphant. In the diet held soon after at Augsburg and which was surrounded by troops, the emperor demanded of the Protestants to submit the decision of the religious controversy to the council of Trent. The greater part consented, and in particular Maurice of Saxony who had received from Charles the electoral dignity, of which together with a part of his territories John Frederic had been deprived, and who also was extremely solicitous for the liberation of his father-in-law, the landgrave of Hesse. But the emperor lost the benefit of this assent to the council of Trent. For upon a rumour that the pestilence had appeared at Trent, a great part of the fathers retired to Bologna; and thus the council was broken up.² Nor could the emperor prevail upon the pope to re-assemble the council without delay. As the prospect of a council was now more distant, the emperor deemed it necessary in the interim to adopt some project, which might preserve the peace in regard to religion until the council should assemble. Hence he caused a paper to be drawn up by Julius Pflug, bishop of Naumburg, Michael Sidonius a papist, and John Agricola of Eisleben, which should serve as a rule of faith and worship to the professors of both the old religion and the new, until the meeting of the council; and this paper, because it had not the force of a permanent law, was commonly called the Interim.³

¹ Besides the accounts of the common historians, Grosch has well described all those transactions in his Vertheidigung der Evangelischen Kirche gegen Goltfr. Arnold, p. 29, &c. [See Meidan's Comment. de Statu Relig. et Reipubl. lib. xviii. and the very full history of this war in Robertson's Hist. of Charles V. book viii. p. 338, &c. and book ix. p. 360, &c.—Mur. [See also Ranke's Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter d. Reform. vol. iv. not yet translated into English. This valuable work terminates at the death of Charles V.—R.

² The report of a pestilence was a mere pretence. The pope, Paul III. was equally jealous of the council, which had not been disposed in all respects to govern itself by his orders, as he was of the growing power of the emperor, which he did not wish to see farther increased by the council. He indeed hated the Protestants; but he did not wish to see the emperor, under colour of enforcing the decrees of the council, acquire a more absolute authority over Germany. He had already withdrawn his troops from the imperial army, and he now wished to see the council dispersed. The Spanish members opposed him, but he found means to prevail.—Schl.

³ See Beck's Dreyfaches Interim, Oslander's Historia Ecclesiastica, cent. xvi. lib. ii. c. lxviii. p. 425, and others. Respecting the authors and the editions of the Interim, see a disquisition in the Dänische Bibliothek, part v. p. 1, &c. and part vi. p. 185, &c. [The Interim may be seen at large in Goldast's Constitutiones Imperiales, tom. i. p. 518, &c.; also in J. C. Fabre's continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History,

4. This paper called the Interim, though very favourable to the papal cause, was equally displeasing to the pontiff and to the professors of the true or Lutheran religion. When the emperor communicated it to the diet of Augsburg, the elector of Mentz without taking the sense of the members rose and, in the name of the diet, assented to it. Most of the princes, therefore, though with reluctance, acquiesced. Those who opposed it were for the most part compelled by the power and arms of the emperor to submit, and the calamities and oppressions which followed in Germany are almost indescribable. Maurice, elector of Saxony, who occupied middle ground between those who approved and those who rejected the Interim, held several consultations at Leipsic and other places, in the year 1548, with his theologians and principal men, of whom Philip Melancthon was most distinguished, that he might determine what course to pursue. The result of the protracted deliberation was, that Melancthon (whom the other theologians followed) partly from fear of the emperor and partly from condescension to his sovereign, decided that the whole instrument called the Interim could by no means be admitted, but that there was no impediment to receiving and approving it, so far as it concerned things not essential in religion or things indifferent (adiaphoræ). This decision gave rise to the Adiaphoristic controversy among the Lutherans, which will be described in the history of the Lutheran church. In this state of things the cause of the reformed religion of Luther was in imminent peril; and had the pontiff and the emperor known how to take advantage of their good fortune, lib. cxlv. sec. 21—23, Latin, by R. P. Alexander, vol. xxxix. p. 540—586. See also Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. i. p. 674, &c.; Robertson's Hist. of Charles V. book ix. p. 377, &c. The Interim consisted of twenty-six articles drawn up with great care, and in a very conciliatory spirit. On most doctrinal points, such as man's primitive rectitude, apostasy, original sin, redemption by Christ, necessity of divine grace, human merit, &c. it adopted, very much, scriptural views and language; and might have been assented to by the Protestants, without sacrificing perhaps any fundamental truths. But it retained the mass, all the seven sacraments, the hierarchy, the traditions, the ceremonies, in short the whole exterior of the Catholic establishment and worship, with the sole exceptions of tolerating the marriage of the clergy and communion in both kinds. Yet it limited the authority of the pontiff, and so explained the grounds and uses of the Romish rites, as to make them the least offensive possible.—Mur. [On this perplexing passage of Lutheran church-history to which reference will afterwards be made, see Geseler, Lehrbuch neuem Kirchenges. Bonn, 1840, vol. i. p. 342, &c. This work has not yet been translated into English, though fully as valuable as his other one. The section (sec. 9) in particular which treats of the Interim is marked by all the characteristic excellencies of this accurate and judicious compiler. See also Scott's Continuation of Milner, &c. vol. ii. p. 24, &c.—R.

they might doubtless have either totally crushed the Lutheran church, or depressed it greatly and brought it into embarrassment.

5. In the midst of these contests Julius III. who succeeded Paul III. in the government of the Romish church A.D. 1550, being overcome by the entreaties of the emperor, consented to revive the council of Trent. The emperor therefore at the diet of Augsburg, which he again surrounded with his troops, conferred with the princes on the prosecution of the council. The major part agreed that the council ought to go on, and Maurice, elector of Saxony, consented yet only on certain conditions.¹ At the close of the diet therefore, A.D. 1551, the emperor directed all to prepare themselves for the council, and promised to use his endeavours that everything should there be done in a religious and Christian manner, and without passion. Hence confessions of faith to be exhibited to the council were drawn up, one in Saxony by Melancthon, and another at Würtemberg by John Brentius. Besides the ambassadors of the duke, some of the theologians of Würtemberg also repaired to Trent. But the Saxons, at the head of whom was Melancthon, though they set out, advanced no farther than Nuremberg; for their sovereign [the elector Maurice] only made a show of obedience to the will of the emperor, while he was really designing to subject Charles to his own pleasure.

6. What plans and purposes Charles V. was pursuing amid these commotions in Germany will appear if we consider the circumstances of the times, and compare the different parts of his conduct. The emperor, relying more than prudence would dictate upon his own powers and good fortune, wished to make these disquietudes arising out of religion subservient to the enlargement and establishment of his power in Germany, and to the diminution of the resources and the rights of the princes. Moreover, as he had in like manner long wished to see the authority and dominion of the Roman pontiffs diminished and confined within some definite limits, so that they might no longer interrupt the progress of his designs, so he hoped by means of the council this wish might be realized, since by means of the councils formerly held at Constance and Basil, a check was laid upon the exorbitant lust of power in the Romish bishops. For he had no doubt that by means of his ambassadors and bishops, those of Spain and Germany and others, he should be able so to control the deliberations of the council that all its decrees and acts would be conformable to his plans and wishes.² But all these expectations and designs were frustrated by that very Maurice, by whose as-istance principally Charles had been able to break down the power of the Protestants.

7. Long had Maurice in vain solicited for the liberation of his father-in-law, Philip of Hesse; and long had the greatest princes of Germany and Europe importunately petitioned the emperor to set at liberty both the landgrave of Hesse and the late elector of Saxony. When therefore Maurice perceived that he had been duped, and that Charles had hostile designs upon the liberties of Germany, he entered into an alliance with the king of France and with certain German princes, for asserting the rights of the Germanic nation; and in the year 1552 he led forth a well-appointed army against the emperor. And he conducted the business with such celerity and vigour, that he was very near falling upon Charles unawares and in a state of security at Innspruck. This sudden storm so terrified Charles, that he appeared quite ready to agree to any terms of peace; and soon after at Passau, he not only gave present tranquillity to the Protestants, but promised to assemble a diet within six months, at which the long-protracted religious contests should be wholly terminated. Thus the very man who had given a severer blow perhaps than any other to the Protestant cause, was the man to establish and give triumph to that cause, when it was nearly given up and abandoned. Yet Maurice did not live to see the result of his undertaking; for the next year he fell in a battle against Albert of Brandenburg, at Sievershausen.³

¹ This is clearly and satisfactorily shown in Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. iii. p. 58, 207.—Schl.

² Maurice was all his life a Protestant at heart. But he was selfish, ambitious, and ungrateful. His base attack upon the dominions of his uncle John Frederick during the war of Smalcald was the chief cause of the unhappy termination of that war, and of all the calamities endured by the Protestants from the year 1548 to 1552. During this period he sided with the emperor, for the sake of acquiring an increase of territory and the rank of an elector. Yet he did not abandon the Protestant religion, nor so enforce the Interim as to restrain the exercise of that religion among his subjects. He probably had been deceived by the emperor's hollow promises not to injure the cause of Protestantism. When he perceived this, and also discovered the emperor's designs to overthrow the liberties of Germany, he was mortified, stung by his conscience, and roused to indignation. He therefore

¹ These conditions were, that the council should rescind all its past acts and begin anew; that the divines of the Augsburg Confession should not only be heard, but have the right of voting; that the pontiff should place himself under the jurisdiction of the council, and should not have the presidency of it; and that he should release the bishops from their oath of allegiance to him, so that they might give their opinions freely. The assent under these conditions was read before the diet, and request made that it might be entered entire upon the journals, but this request was refused. See Sleidan's Comment. &c. lib. xxii. fol. 576, ed. 1556.—Mur.

8. The Diet which the emperor promised at the pacification of Passau could not be assembled on account of commotions that arose in Germany and other impediments, until the year 1555. But in this year at Augsburg, and in presence of Ferdinand the emperor's brother, that memorable convention was held which gave to the Protestants, after so much slaughter and so many calamities and conflicts, that firm and stable religious peace which they still enjoy. For on the 25th of September, after various discussions, all those who had embraced the Augsburg Confession were pronounced free and exempt from all jurisdiction of the pontiff and the bishops, and were bidden to live securely under their own laws and regulations; and liberty was given to all Germans to follow which of the two religions they pleased; and lastly, all those were declared to be public enemies of Germany who should presume to make war upon others or to molest them on the ground of their religion.¹ Nothing scarcely determined to bring down the power of the emperor, and to rescue both the Protestant religion and the liberties of his country from oppression. See Robertson's History of Charles V. book x. p. 285, &c. The treaty of Passau between the emperor and Maurice, August 24, 1552, laid the foundation of the liberties of the German Protestant church. "Its chief articles were.—That before the 12th of August the confederates shall lay down their arms and disband their forces; That on or before that day the landgrave shall be set at liberty, and be conveyed in safety to his castle of Rheinfels; That a Diet shall be held within six months, in order to deliberate concerning the most proper and effectual method of preventing for the future all disputes and dissensions about religion; That in the mean time, neither the emperor nor any other prince shall, upon any pretext whatever, offer any injury or violence to those who adhere to the confession of Augsburg, but shall allow them to enjoy the free and undisturbed exercise of their religion; That, in return, the Protestants shall not molest the Catholics, either in the exercise of their ecclesiastical jurisdiction or in performing their religious ceremonies; That the imperial chamber shall administer justice impartially to persons of both parties, and Protestants be admitted indiscriminately with the Catholics to sit as judges in that court; That if the next Diet should not be able to terminate the disputes with regard to religion, the stipulations in the present treaty in behalf of the Protestants shall continue for ever in full power and vigour; That none of the confederates shall be liable to any action on account of what had happened during the course of the war; That the consideration of those encroachments which had been made, as Maurice pretended, upon the constitution and liberties of the empire, shall be remitted to the approaching Diet; That Albert of Brandenburg shall be comprehended in the treaty, provided he shall accede to it, and disband his forces before the 12th of August." Robertson's Charles V. ubi supra, p. 414, &c. See also Sleidan's Comment. &c. lib. xxiv. folio 661.—Mur.

¹ See Schilter's tract, De Pace Religiosa, published in 1700, 4to; Lehmann's Acta Publica et Originaria de Pace Religiosa, Frankfurt, 1707, fol. [The compact entitled the religious peace, as extracted from the acts of the Diet of Augsburg of Sept. 25, 1555, may be seen at large in Struve's Corpus Juris Publici Academicum, ed. 2d, Jena, 1734, p. 169—214. It embraces twenty-two articles, and is founded on the treaty of Passau described in the preceding note. It places the believers in the Augsburg Confession and the Catholics on the same ground, as citizens and as members of the

could more clearly demonstrate the superstition, ignorance, and wretchedness of that age, and consequently the necessity which existed for a reformation in the prevalent views of religion and things sacred, than the fact that most of the Germans needed to be instructed by so many writings, controversies, and wars, before they could assent to regulations so equitable, and so consonant to reason and the holy Scriptures.

9. While these events were taking place in Germany, the English were deploring the very near extinction of the light of pure religion; and witnessing the continual persecution of their countrymen, they esteemed those Germans happy who had escaped from the Romish tyranny. Henry VIII. whose vices obstructed the progress of the Reformation, died in the year 1547. His son and successor Edward VI. a child in years but mature in wisdom, intelligence, and virtue, having collected around him learned men from every quarter, and particularly some from Germany of the mildest character, as Martin Bucer and Paul Fagius, ordered the kingdom to be purged entirely of the popish fictions, and a better religion to be publicly taught. But he was removed by death in 1553, to the immense grief of his subjects.² His sister Mary, daughter empire, and forbids all molestation of the one class by the other; prohibits proselytizing, but allows voluntary transition from one religion to the other. Yet benefited Catholics, if they turned Protestants, were to lose their benefices. All other denominations of Christians, except Catholics and Lutherans, are expressly excluded from the privileges of this compact. (Art. IV. "Attamen ceteri omnes, qui alteri prænominatarum harum binarum Religionum non sint adherentes, sub hac pace, non comprehensi, sed plane exclusi esse debent.") The Zwinglians, Calvinists, or Reformed, were therefore left in the same state as before. The treaty still contemplated a more full adjustment of all points of controversy in a general or national council or in a future diet; yet it contained an express stipulation that the principles here settled should remain inviolate for ever. In the imperial cities, and wherever the professors of both religions had hitherto enjoyed equal religious liberty, they were to continue to enjoy the same. The pope was exceedingly displeased with this peace; and he tried to persuade the emperor to renounce it, promising to absolve him from his oath. But the emperor would not consent. Yet the Catholics were never satisfied with it. And some ambiguities in the language of it and some of its odious provisions, such as excluding all but Lutherans and Catholics from a participation in it, and subjecting benefited Catholics to the loss of their livings if they became Lutherans, led on to contention, and at last produced in the next century the Thirty Years' War, which nearly ruined Germany.—Mur. [Scott's Continuation of Milner, &c. vol. ii. p. 85, &c.—R.]

² By the act of supremacy, the sole right of reforming the church was in the crown. This right the regents claimed and exercised during the king's minority, notwithstanding the objections of the opponents of reform. Henry had assigned to his son sixteen regents of the kingdom, besides twelve privy counselors; and a majority of these were friendly to the Reformation. The leading reformers at that time were, king Edward himself, the duke of Somerset lord protector, the archbishops Crannier and Holgate, Sir W.

of that Catherine whom Henry VIII. had divorced, was heiress of the kingdom; and being a woman bigotedly devoted to the religion of her ancestors and governed by her passions, she again obtruded the Catholic religion upon the English; nor did she hesitate to put to the most cruel death great numbers of those who resisted, and even persons of the highest rank, among whom Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury and author of the recent prostration of the papal power in England, stood conspicuous. But the death of the queen, who died without issue in 1558, put an end to this scene of rage.¹ For her successor on the British throne, Elizabeth, a woman of masculine resolution and sagacity, rescued her country entirely from the power of the pontiff, and established that form of religion and worship which still prevails in England. This is different from that form which the counsellors of Edward had devised, and approaches nearer to the usages and institutions of the previous times; yet it is very far removed from that which is held sacred at Rome.²

Pagot, secretary of state, lord viscount Lisle high admiral, and the bishops Holbeach, Goodrick, Latimer, and Ridley. The leaders in opposition to reform were—the princess Mary, earl Wriothesley, and bishops Toustal, Gardiner, and Bonner. The obstacles to reformation were, the profound ignorance and superstition of the people at large, the resistance of the bishops, the incompetence and selfishness of the inferior clergy, the want of ecclesiastical funds, and the deficiency of preachers who could spread the light of truth. The court ordered a visitation of all the churches, and forbade any to preach out of their parishes without a license during the visitation. The first book of Homilies was set forth, to be read in the churches where the incumbents were incompetent to preach; and thirty-six royal injunctions, regulating worship and religious order, were issued. Bishops Bonner and Gardiner refused obedience to the injunctions, and were sent to prison. The parliament which met in November, 1547, repealed the laws which sanctioned persecution, and also the statute of the Six Articles which had been a bar to reformation, ordered the communion to be given in both kinds, empowered the king to appoint all bishops, and sequestered what remained of chantry lands and other pious legacies of former days. This year, Peter Martyr of Florence was made divinity professor at Oxford, and Martin Bucer at Cambridge. Oehnius and Fagius, also foreigners, were employed in the English church. Religious controversy grew warm, and was introduced into the pulpits. In September the king forbade all preaching, till he should decree what might be preached. Some bishops were appointed to reform the offices of the church or the formulas of worship. This was the first liturgy of king Edward. In January, 1549, parliament ratified the new liturgy, and made it penal to use any other. A new visitation was appointed by the court to see that the new liturgy was introduced. Some tumults and insurrections ensued, but they were soon quieted. The Anabaptists were persecuted, and likewise all opposers of the new liturgy. In November, 1550, parliament authorised the king to revise the canon law of England. A new digest in fifty-one titull was formed, but never sanctioned, not being completed till just before the king's death. The new ritual was pressed. The recusants were either papists who were attached to the old ritual, or Nonconformists who (like Hooper) objected to the sacerdotal garments and wished for a more simple worship. Both were persecuted. In 1551 Cranmer and Ridley drew up new articles of faith, forty-two in number, which the council published. In 1552 the Common Prayer-Book was again revised, and made nearly the same as it now is. In January, 1553, it was sanctioned by parliament. This year king Edward died, and the Reformation was arrested before it had obtained a firm establishment or that degree of perfection which its authors designed. See Burnet's History of the Reformat. vol. II. par. I. book I.; and Neal's Hist. of the Parliaments, vol. I. chap. II.—Mur. [To these authorities might have been added Collier's Ecclesiastical History, 2 vols. fol. lately reprinted in 8 vols. 8vo. The more recent works on the English Reformation are Soames' History of the Reformation of the Church of England, Lond. 1826-28, 4 vols. 8vo, terminating at the year 1563; Carwithen's History of the Church of England to the Revolution, Lond. 1829-33, 3 vols. 8vo. If the reader wishes for a succinct outline of this important revolution in England, he will find a very striking one in Blunt's spirited Sketch of the Reformation in England (Murray's Family Library), Lond. 1832. All these writers are prejudiced, though in different degrees, against the Puritan party.—H.

¹ Queen Mary disguised her intentions till fully established on the throne, and then proceeded to release from prison and restore to their sees the popish bishops Bonner, Gardiner, Toustal, &c. and to imprison the reformers, Cranmer, Hooper, Coverdale, Rogers, Holgate, and others. Eight hundred friends to reformation fled to the Continent, and settled chiefly along the Rhine. Among these were five bishops, five deans, four archdeacons, and above fifty doctors in divinity, besides noblemen, merchants, &c. The foreigners, Peter Martyr, and John à Lasco with his congregation, were expelled the country. A compliant parliament in October, 1553, repealed the laws of king Edward in favour of a reformation, restored things to the state in which Henry VIII. left them, and made it penal to practise the reformed religion. The convocation fully agreed with the parliament. In 1554 the queen appointed a visitation of the churches to restore the former state of things. Six bishops were turned out, the mass was set up, and the popish rites everywhere restored. All the married and recusant clergy, to the number of some thousands, were deprived. This year the queen married Philip king of Spain. In November an obsequious parliament was assembled, cardinal Pole was recalled, and as papal legate he fully restored popery, and reunited England to the papal throne. The parliament proceeded in 1555 to repeal all laws in favour of a reformation passed since the time Henry VIII. first began his contest with the pope, and to revive the old laws against heretics. The fires of persecution were now kindled. John Rogers was the first martyr, and bishops Ridley, Latimer, and Cranmer were among the victims. Of these executions, bishop Bonner was the chief agent. The whole number put to death during the remainder of this reign was about 288, besides those who died in prison and great numbers who fled the country. Popery was now completely triumphant, and the Reformation seemed entirely suppressed. See Burnet, ubi supra, book II. and Neal, ubi supra, chap. III.—Mur.

² Queen Mary died November 17th, 1558, and her sister Elizabeth was immediately proclaimed. She had a vigorous, resolute mind, and was friendly to the Reformation. Claiming supreme power both in church and state, she determined to restore forthwith the Reformed religion. In December 1558, she inhibited all preaching for the present. The exiles hastened home, and were somewhat divided among themselves in respect to their views of discipline and rites of worship, in consequence of what they had witnessed while abroad. The English bishops were all opposed to reformation. The court secured a compliant parliament, which met in January, 1559, repealed the persecuting laws of queen Mary, invested the sovereign with power to regulate the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the church, to appoint all bishops, and to establish High Commission Courts, with powers nearly equal to the Inquisition. The queen appointed doctors Parker, Grindal, Cox, and others, to revise king Edward's liturgy; which being slightly altered, was ratified by parliament in April, and enjoined upon the whole nation by law. On the rise of parliament, the bishops were called upon to take the oath of supremacy. All except one [of this one, some very curious particulars

10. Into the neighbouring kingdom of Scotland the elements of a purer religion were early introduced, by certain young noblemen who had resided in Germany. But the papal power, supported by inhuman laws and penalties, for many years prevented it from taking firm root. The principal author of the entire abolition of the Romish dominion over Scotland was John Knox, a disciple of Calvin, a man of eloquence and of a bold and fearless character. Proceeding from Geneva to Scotland in the year 1559, he in a short time so roused up the people by his discourses, that the majority of them abandoned the institutions of their fathers and destroyed every vestige of the Romish religion.¹ From that time onward the Scots have pertinaciously adhered to that form of religion and discipline, which was established at Geneva under the auspices of John Calvin, Knox's preceptor; nor could any considerations afterwards induce them to adopt the ecclesiastical institutions and forms of worship of the English.

11. In Ireland, the Reformation was exposed to the same fluctuations and fortunes as in England. When Henry VIII. upon the abrogation of the pontifical power, was declared supreme head of the English church, George Brown, an English Augustinian monk whom the king in 1535 had created archbishop of Dublin, proceeded to purge the churches of his province of their images, relics, and superstitious rites; and he exerted such influence, that the king's supremacy (by which was meant the royal power over the church) was acknowledged in Ireland. Accordingly the king soon after expelled the monks from Ireland, and destroyed their houses. Under Edward VI. the Reformation in Ireland continued to be urged forward by the same archbishop. But Mary the sister of Edward persecuted with fire and sword those who embraced the reformed religion, in Ireland as well as in England; and Brown and the other bishops who favoured the Reformation have been lately brought to light in Lamb's Historical Account of the Thirty-nine Articles, 4to, p. 11.—R.] refused, and were turned out to the number of fourteen. New bishops favourable to the Reformation were appointed by the queen, and consecrated by the ex-bishops of king Edward's reign. The queen now ordered a general visitation of the churches; and issued fifty-two injunctions regulating worship and discipline, the lives and duties of clergymen, rites, ceremonies, holy days, &c. with penalties against recusants. Of the clergy, only about 200 refused obedience and lost their livings. In 1562, the parliament confirmed the Reformation effected by the queen. The convocation revised the forty-two articles of faith of king Edward, made some not very important alterations, and reduced the number to thirty-nine; yet they were not ratified by parliament till 1571. Respecting the forms of worship, the convocation was nearly equally divided; and they debated with great warmth, the minority urging a greater simplicity of worship. Here the Puritan party began to show itself. But the queen was fond of a splendid worship; and claiming supreme dominion in religious matters, she rigorously enforced uniformity. Thus the Reformation was arrested, and the established church in England has ever since remained substantially the same as in the year 1562. See Burnet, ubi supra, vol. II. part I. book III.; Neal, ubi supra, vol. I. chap. IV.—Mur. [See the works referred to in a previous note; with Strype's valuable Memorials; and more recently Todd's Life of Cranmer, Lond. 1831, 2 vols. The Romanist view of these transactions may be seen in Dodd's Church History of England, from 1500 to 1638, 3 vols. fol. newly reprinted in 8vo, and edited by Tierney, five volumes of which have already appeared. I need scarcely add that all the civil histories of England by Rapin, Hume, Lingard, Mackintosh, &c. embrace this period; and a rapid sketch may be found in Hallam's Constitutional Hist. of Eng. vol. I. chap. II. &c.—R.

¹ Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. I. p. 165, &c. 232, 234, 569, and others; Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, Lond. 1680, fol.; Buchanan's Recurum Scotticarum Historia, lib. xvi. sec. xxi. &c. p. 361, &c. ed. Ruddimann; Melvil's Memoirs, tome I. p. 73, &c.; McCre's Life of John Knox; Robertson's Hist. of Scotland; Scott's Lines of the Protestant Reformers in Scotland, Edinb. 1810, 8vo. The martyrdom of Patrick Hamilton in 1528 at St. Andrews made a deep impression on many of his countrymen. It produced inquiry on religious subjects; and from that time there were always more or fewer Scots who preached against the prevailing religion; e.g. friar Saxton, one Forest, and above, the priests frequently brought the reformers to the stake. Two were burned in 1534, while others fled into England. In 1539, five were burned at Edinburgh and two at Glasgow. In the same year the famous George Buchanan went into exile. In 1542, several Scottish noblemen were carried prisoners of war into England, where some of them imbibed a favourable opinion of the reformed religion. In 1543, Hamilton, earl of Arran and lord protector, was friendly to the reformed; but he was so vigorously opposed by cardinal Beaton that he dared not openly protect them. In 1545 George Wishart was burned by cardinal Beaton, to the general disgust of the nobility. A number of young men of spirit and birth associated together, and assassinated the cardinal in his palace of St. Andrews, and then taking possession of the castle, held it for some years and thus afforded a rendezvous for the reformed. In 1547 John Knox retired thither with his pupils, and was soon made a preacher. St. Andrews was afterwards besieged and taken; and Knox with the other prisoners was sent to France, and there kept in the galleys. In 1552 the queen-mother found it necessary to purchase the support of the reformed, now a powerful party, by affording them protection; and for six years they suffered little molestation. In 1558, the queen was obliged by her allies to withdraw her protection, and the reformed, now very numerous especially in the large towns and among the nobles, were again persecuted. The burning of Walter Mill induced them to combine and to assert their right to believe and to worship according to the dictates of their consciences. A civil war ensued, and queen Elizabeth of England aided the Scottish reformed. In 1559 John Knox returned to Scotland, and by his eloquence and activity carried forward the Reformation triumphantly. The queen regent died in June, and peace was concluded in August, 1560. The parliament assembled soon after, and in this year and the following fully established the Protestant religion according to the views of John Knox, and passed laws for the suppression of the Catholic religion throughout the country. Thus was the Scottish Reformation at last achieved.—See the authors above cited.—Mur. [In addition to them, and to the works mentioned in note I, page 586, above, the student should also consult Spotswood's History of the church and state of Scotland from 203 to 1625, fol. Edin. 1677; and Keith's History of the affairs of the church and state of Scotland from the beginning of the Reformation to the retreat of Q. Mary into England in 1568, fol. Edin. 1734; both of whom are ardent Episcopalians; and Tytler's History of Scotland, volumes five and six, who, like all other Episcopalian writers, has not treated the Scottish reformers with ordinary candour or justice.—R.

were deprived of their offices. Under Elizabeth everything was restored, and the Irish adopted the form of religion and discipline which was established in England.¹

12. Soon after the Scots, the inhabitants of the provinces now called the United

¹ See the life of George Brown, late archbishop of Dublin, London, 1681, 4to, and which is reprinted in the collection called the Harleian Miscellany, vol. v. Lond. 1745, 4to, No. lxxxi. [The Reformed religion never has had the assent of the Irish people at large. Henry VIII. attempted little more than to establish his supremacy over the Church of Ireland. And though he succeeded in procuring the vote of a majority in the Irish parliament for it, the people and the clergy very generally would never admit it. He suppressed the monasteries and confiscated their funds, but this did not suppress popery. Queen Mary easily and at once restored everything in that country, except the confiscated property. She deprived archbishop Brown in 1554, but did not attempt to persecute "with fire and sword" the handful of Protestants in that country until near the close of her reign, when she sent over Dr. Cole with a commission for that purpose. His commission however was stolen from him on the way, and he had to return to England for another; but before he reached Ireland a second time the queen died, and he could not proceed to his bloody work. Queen Elizabeth caused herself to be proclaimed head of the church in Ireland, and undertook to enforce everywhere the Protestant doctrines and worship. But without success. The recusant clergy indeed lost their livings, and some Protestant clergymen were introduced into the country. But the people at large would not attend the Protestant worship. Thus, while Protestantism was the only established religion and the only one legally tolerated, it was followed by few except the officers of government, and such English families as removed to Ireland to enjoy the estates they acquired there. In the reign of James I. many Presbyterians from Scotland settled in the north of Ireland, and some English Puritans also took refuge there. Thus the Protestant population became considerably increased. But still the pure Irish, as well as the descendants of those English who settled in Ireland prior to the Reformation, constituting together the majority of the population of the country, continued to adhere to the Catholic religion. During the two last centuries the Protestant population, and particularly the dissenting portion of it, has been considerably increased; yet the Catholic population has also increased; and it is said that there have been more conversions from the Protestant to the Catholic faith in Ireland during the period, than conversions from the Catholic faith to the Protestant. Thus Ireland is still a Catholic country, if we regard the population; though Protestant and of the church of England, if we regard only the religious establishments of the country.—Mur. [The life of Brown, archbishop of Dublin, referred to in the beginning of this note, was first of all reprinted in the Phoenix, vol. i. p. 120, &c. Lond. 1707, under the pompous title of The Reformation of the Church in Ireland. From this work, it was translated into Latin and published by Gerdes in the fourth volume of his very curious and valuable compilation, entitled Scrinium Antiquarium, sine Miscellanea Groningana, &c. 1762. He retained the inappropriate title of Historia Reformationis Hibernice, of which this meagre tract is altogether unworthy. A full and impartial History of the Reformation in Ireland is still a desideratum in our literature. Several years ago the editor of this work attempted to give for the first time a very brief sketch of that portion of Irish history, together with an outline of the causes which retarded the progress of the truth there, in the Introduction to his History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, Edin. 1834, vol. i. Some years afterwards Dr. Mant, bishop of Down and Connor, in his bulky History of the Church of Ireland, Lond. 1840, surveyed the same period; but with the exception of a few facts furnished by the Rev. Dr. Todd of Trinity College, Dublin, he has supplied no new information, and his work has not met with general acceptance. Much valuable matter may be found in Phelan's Policy of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, Lond. 1827.—R.

Netherlands [or the Dutch] revolted entirely from the Roman pontiff. Philip II. king of Spain, very anxious for the safety of the Romish religion among a people so attached to liberty, determined to restrain the Belgians and secure their allegiance to the pontiff by creating an additional number of bishops, by establishing among them the iniquitous tribunal of the Inquisition, and by other harsh and intolerable laws. But this excessive care to preserve the old religion, instead of securing it from the dangers to which it was exposed, occasioned its total overthrow. In the year 1566 the nobility combined together, and remonstrated strongly against these new edicts; and meeting with repulse and contempt, they in conjunction with the people openly trampled upon the things held sacred by the Romanists.² As the duke of Alva, who was sent from Spain with forces for that purpose, endeavoured to suppress these commotions with unparalleled cruelty and with innumerable slaughters, that furious civil war was produced to which the very powerful republic of the seven United Provinces of Belgium owes its origin. This republic, rescued from the dominion of the Spaniards by its leader, William of Nassau, prince of Orange, with the aid of Elizabeth, queen of England, and of the king of France, adopted in the year 1573 the doctrines, the ecclesiastical organisation, and the worship of the Swiss, yet gave to all the citizens entire liberty of opinion on religious subjects, provided they attempted nothing against the peace and prosperity of the community.³

13. In Spain and Italy, the reformed religion made great progress, soon after the

² MacLaine justly remarks that Moshelm here seems to distinguish too little between the spirit of the nobility and that of the multitude. Nothing was more temperate and decent than the conduct of the former, and nothing could be more tumultuous and irregular than the behaviour of the latter.—Mur.

³ The noble work of Gerard Brandt, entitled A History of the Reformation in the Netherlands, written in Dutch and printed at Amsterdam, 1677, &c. in 4 vols. 4to, is especially to be consulted. [The first volume is properly the history of the Reformation, coming down to the year 1600; the other volumes contain a history of the Arminian controversy, and the events of the seventeenth century. There is a translated abridgment of Brandt both in French and English, which gives a good condensed account. See also Gerdes' Historia Reformationis, tom. iii. pag. 1, &c. and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ii. p. 348—434. Philip II. king of Spain, determined to purge the Netherlands of heretics; and for this purpose increased the number of bishops from four to fourteen, enacted severe laws against heretics, and determined to introduce the Inquisition into the country. These measures were generally offensive, and to the Catholics nearly as much so as to the Protestants. In 1566 most of the nobles, though generally Catholics, entered into an association to protect and defend the liberties of the country. The Protestants, now 100,000 in number, petitioned the king for toleration; and though treated with contempt, they ventured to hold their meetings for worship openly, instead of meeting in private. They first conflicts between Luther and the pontiffs. Very many in all the provinces of Italy, but especially among the Venetians, the Tuscans, and the Neapolitans, avowed their alienation from the Romish religion. And in the kingdom of Naples in particular, very great and dangerous commotions arose from this source in the year 1536, which were excited chiefly by the celebrated Bernardino Ochino, Peter Martyr, and others who preached against the superstitions, and which Charles V. and his viceroy for Naples had great difficulty to suppress.¹ The principal instruments used by the Roman pontiffs for repelling this danger were the Inquisitors, whom they sent into most parts of Italy, and who tortured and slew so many people, that very many of the friends of the new religion fled into exile, and others returned ostensibly at least to the old religion. But the pontiff found it utterly impossible to bring the Neapolitans to tolerate the tribunal of the Inquisition, or even to admit Inquisitors into their country. Spain became infected with the Lutheran doctrines by different ways, and among others by those very theologians whom Charles V. took with him to Germany to confute the heretics; for those theologians returned to their country tainted with the heresy. But the Spanish Inquisition, by its accustomed severities, and especially by condemning to the flames, easily extinguished in the citizens all disposition to substitute a better religion in place of the old one.²

14. It is unnecessary to enter into a controversy with those who say, that some of the persons who took a leading part in these great revolutions were now and then guilty of grievous faults. For the best informed do not deny that several transactions might have been conducted more discreetly, and that some of the men in power were more solicitous to promote their own interests than to advance pure religion. But on the other hand, it is beyond all question that many things which appear faulty to us of the present age should be classed among noble achievements, if we regard their respective times and places, and compare them with the frauds and enormities both of the Roman pontiffs and their supporters. However, when we inquire into the justice of the controversy which Luther first waged with the Roman pontiff, it is not a question that relates to the personal acts and virtues of individual men. Let some of these be supposed even worse men than they are generally esteemed, provided the cause for which they contended be allowed to have been just and good.³

had now fifty or sixty places of meeting in Flanders, attended by 60,000 persons. Similar meetings were opened in Antwerp, Utrecht, Seeland, Geldres, Friesland, &c. Attempts being made by the government to disperse their assemblies by force, they went armed to their places of worship. The same year the rabble, first in Flanders and afterwards in the other provinces, broke into the churches and destroyed the images, pictures, crosses, &c. Philip subsidized 13,000 German troops to support the government. Many of the rebellious Catholics voluntarily submitted, and the Protestants were reduced to great straits. Many were put to death, and many fled the country. The association of the nobles melted away. In 1567 the Netherlands were truly a conquered country. But Philip, not yet satisfied, determined to punish his subjects still more; and therefore sent the duke of Alva with an army of Spaniards and Italians to chastise the country. But severity only increased the number of Protestants, and drove the people to desperation. In 1568 William, prince of Orange, assembled an army of refugees, and invaded the country without success. In 1572, he attacked the northern provinces by sea, and presently made himself master of Holland and several of the other provinces. The Hollanders now proclaimed him their stadtholder; and in 1573 he was able to attack some of the more southern provinces. The war lasted many years, and the United Provinces fully set up the Protestant religion; while those who remained subject to a foreign jurisdiction were obliged to acquiesce in popery as the established religion. Respecting the toleration of other sects in the United Netherlands, MacLaine (who lived long in that country, and therefore may be considered good authority) observes that "It is necessary to distinguish between the toleration which was granted to the Roman Catholics and that which the Anabaptists, Lutherans, and other Protestant sects enjoyed. They were all, indiscriminately, excluded from the civil employments of the state; but though they were equally allowed the exercise of their religion, the latter were permitted to enjoy their religious worship in a more open and public manner than the former, from whom their churches were taken and whose religious assemblies were confined to private conventicles, which had no external resemblance of the edifices usually set apart for divine worship."—Mur. [There is also an English translation of the work of Brandt, in four vols. folio, published at London in 1720—23.—R.]

¹ See Giannone, Hist. Civile du Royaume de Naples [lib. xxxii. cap. v. sec. 1.], tome iv. p. 108, &c. The Life of Galeacius, in the Museum Helveticum, tom. ii. p. 524. [See Gerdes, Specimen Italiae Reformatæ—una cum Syllogis Reformatorum Italorum, Leyden, 1765, 4to, and De Porta, Hist. Reformatæ. Eccles. Reticarum, Chur, 1771, vol. i. lib. ii. ch. ii. &c.—Mur.] These foreign works are now superseded by that admirable History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy which was first published by the late Rev. Dr. M'Crie, of Edinburgh, in 1827. A second and enlarged edition appeared in 1833. It has been translated into Dutch, French, and German; and it had the honour of being placed in the Roman Index of prohibited books by the late pope, Gregory XVI. See also a valuable sketch by Gieseler in his Lehrbuch d. neuern Kircheng. vol. I. p. 494—513, with important extracts and references in the notes.—R.

² Geddes, Spanish Protestant Martyrology, in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 445. [See also note 1, p. 585, above.—Mur.] [It is remarkable that all the Spanish theologians who accompanied Charles V. to Germany, and were associated with him afterwards in his retirement, fell after his death into the hands of the Inquisition and were condemned, some to the flames and others to various kinds of death. These were Augustine Casal, his court preacher, Constantine Pontius, his confessor, the Dominican Bartholomew Caranza, confessor to king Philip and queen Mary, together with many others.—Schl.] [See another valuable work by M'Crie, The History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Spain, Edin. 1829, 8vo, which has been likewise translated into German with a preface by Baur, Stuttgart, 1835; and also into Dutch. See also Gieseler, ubi supra, p. 512—523.—R.]

³ See MacLaine's Appendix No. 1, concerning the spirit and conduct of the first reformers, subjoined to his translation of this section.—Mur.

SECTION II.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. In extending the empire of Christ, the Spaniards and Portuguese were, if we may believe their own historians, equally active and successful.¹ They carried indeed a sort of knowledge of Christianity to both North and South America, to a part of Africa, and to the maritime parts and islands of Asia which had been subjugated by their fleets. And a large number of the inhabitants of these regions, who had before been destitute of all religion or were sunk in the grossest superstitions, ostensibly assumed the name of Christians. But these accessions to the Christian church will not be highly appreciated, or rather will be deplored by those who consider, that these nations were coerced by barbarous and abominable laws and punishments to abandon the religion of their ancestors, and that all were enrolled as Christians who had learned to venerate immoderately their stupid instructors, and to exhibit by gestures and in words certain useless rites and forms. Such a judgment has been pronounced not merely by those whom the Romish church calls heretics, but also by several of the best and most influential members of the Romish community, French, Germans, Italians, Spaniards, and others.

2. The Roman pontiffs, after losing a great part of Europe, manifested much more solicitude than before to propagate Christianity in other parts of the world. For no better method occurred to them, both for repairing the loss they had sustained in Europe, and for vindicating their claims to the title of common fathers of the Christian church. Therefore, soon after the institution of the celebrated society of Jesuits in the year 1540, that order was especially charged constantly to train up suitable men, to be commissioned and sent by the pontiffs into the remotest regions as preachers of the religion of Christ. With what fidelity and zeal the order obeyed this injunction, may be learned from the long list of histories which describe the labours and perils encountered by vast numbers of the fraternity, while propagating Christianity among the pagan nations.² Immortal praise would undoubtedly belong to them, were it not manifest from unequivocal testimony, that many of them laboured rather to promote the glory of the Roman pontiff and the interests of their own sects than the glory and interests of Jesus Christ.³ It appears also from authors of high credit and authority, that the [Hindoo] Indians were induced to profess Christianity by the Inquisition established by the Jesuits at Goa in Asia, and by their arms and penal laws rather than by their exhortations and reasonings.⁴ This zeal of the Jesuits excited the emulation not only of the Franciscans and Dominicans but likewise of other religious associations, and led them to renew this almost neglected work of missions.

3. Among the Jesuits who took the lead in the arduous work of missions, no one acquired greater fame than Francis Xavier, commonly called the apostle of the Indies.⁵ Possessing no ordinary genius and the

¹ See Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbi exoriens, cap. xxxii. p. 550, &c.

² See Weismann's Oratio de Virtutibus et Vitis Missionar. Roman. in his Orat. Academ. p. 286, &c. [Compare also his Introduct. in Memorabiles Eccles. Histor. tom. ii. p. 684, &c.—Schl.]

³ See the Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome ii. p. 171, 207, &c.

⁴ Pope Benedict XIV. at the request of the king of Portugal, in the year 1747 conferred on Xavier the dignity and title of Protector of the Indies. See Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses des Missions Étrangères, tome xliii. Pref. p. xxxvi. &c. The body of Xavier was interred at Goa, and is there worshipped with the greatest devotion, he being enrolled among the saints. A magnificent church is erected to him at Cotata in Portuguese India, where he is likewise devoutly invoked by the people. See the Lettres Édifiantes des Missions, tome iii. p. 85, 89, 203; tome v. p. 88-48; tome vi. p. 78. [Francis Xavier was a younger son of a respectable family in the south of France, and born about A.D. 1506. He was educated at Paris, where Ignatius Loyola found him teaching with reputation, and persuaded him to join his new society of Jesuits. In 1540 the king of Portugal requested some members of that society to be sent to his capital. Xavier and Simon Rodriguez were sent the next year; and from Lisbon Xavier shipped in 1541 for the East Indies with the commission of papal legate and missionary. He arrived at Goa in 1542, and laboured with success in converting the natives and reforming the lives of the Portuguese, for about seven years. During this period he travelled extensively in Hindostan, twice visited the pearl fishery on the coast of Ceylon, and made repeated greatest activity of mind, he proceeded to the Portuguese East Indies in the year 1542, and in a few years filled no small part both of the continent and the islands with a knowledge of the Christian or rather the Romish religion. Thence he proceeded in the year 1549 to Japan, and with great celerity laid the foundation of that very numerous body of Christians which flourished for many years in that extensive empire.¹ Afterwards, when attempting a mission to China and already in sight of that powerful kingdom, he closed his life at the island of Sancian in the year 1552.² After his death, other missionaries of the order of Jesuits entered China, among whom the most distinguished was Matthew Ricci, an Italian, who so conciliated the favour of some of the chief men and even of the emperor by his great skill in mathematics, that he obtained for himself and companions liberty to explain the doctrines of Christianity to the people.³ He therefore may justly be considered as the founder and chief author of the numerous body in China which still worship Christ, though harassed and disquieted by various calamities.⁴ and extensive voyages among the islands to the east of the Bay of Bengal. At length in 1549 he went to Japan, and there spent two years and a half with no great success as a missionary. He then returned to Goa, and immediately prepared for a mission to China. He arrived on the Chinese coast in the autumn of 1552, fell sick of a fever, and there expired. His remains were afterwards removed to Goa and there interred. His life was written by the Jesuit Tursellinus in six books, Rome, 1594, 12mo. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 552, &c.—Mur. [The life of Xavier by Tursellinus is in four books. It was republished by Possinus who added a fifth book. Prag. 1750. The titles of various works on the Jesuit missions in the East, the progress of Christianity in India, and on the life and labours of Xavier, may be seen in Walch, Biblia. Theol. vol. iii. p. 355-358, and p. 508. See also Hough's History of Christianity in India, 2 vols. Lond. 1839, vol. i. book II. chap. iii. &c.—R.

⁵ See, among many others, Laftau, Histoire des Découvertes et Conquêtes des Portugais dans le Nouveau Monde, tome iii. p. 420. He derives his accounts from the Portuguese writers. The other writers on this subject are enumerated by Fabricius, Lux Salutaris Evangelii toti orbi exoriens, cap. xlii. xliii. xlviii. xlix. [A copious list of authors, who treat of both the civil and religious state of Spanish America in particular, may be seen prefixed to Robertson's History of the Discovery and Settlement of America. Much fuller, and extending to the whole American continent, is Rich's Bibliotheca Americana Nova, part i. A.D. 1701-1800, Lond. 1854, 8vo, p. 423.—Mur.]

¹ On the history of the church in this remote country, the student will see a long list of works in Walch, ubi supra, p. 361-365.—R.

² See the writers referred to by Fabricius, in his Lux Evangelii toti orbis exorientis, cap. xxxix. p. 677, &c. Add Laflau's Histoire des Découvertes et Conquêtes des Portugais dans le Nouveau Monde, tome iii. p. 419, 424; tome iv. p. 63, 102, &c.; Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome i. p. 92, &c.

³ Du Halde's Description de l'Empire de la Chine, tome iii. p. 84, &c.

⁴ That certain Dominicans had gone into China before Ricci is certain. See Le Quien's Orisus Christianus, tom. iii. p. 1354. But these had effected nothing of importance. [Three Italian Jesuits, Matthew Ricci of Macerata in Ancona, Passio of Bologna, and Roger, a Neapolitan, after devoting some years to the acquisition of the Chinese language in India, were by Vignana, superintendent of the Jesuits' mission at Macao, in the year 1582 attached to an embassy sent to a governor in China. Ricci was acute, learned, modest, of winning address, persevering, and active. His knowledge of mathematics recommended him to the Chinese. He exhibited a map of the world, with which they were much taken. Connecting himself with the Heizes or idolatrous priests, he assumed their dress and manners, and studied under their guidance seven years. He then assumed the garb of a Chinese man of

4. Those who had withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the pontiffs, possessing no territories beyond the bounds of Europe, could attempt almost nothing for the extension of the empire of Christ. Yet we are informed, that in the year 1556, fourteen missionaries were sent from Geneva to convert the Americans to Christ.⁵ But by whom they were sent and what success attended them, is uncertain. The English moreover who near the close of the century sent out colonies to North America, planted there the religion which they themselves professed; and as these English colonies afterwards increased and gathered strength, they propagated their religion among the fierce and savage tribes of those regions. I pass over the efforts of the Swedes for the conversion of the Finns and Laplanders, no small part of whom were still addicted to the absurd and impious rites of their progenitors.

5. There was no public persecution of Christianity in this century. For those mistake the views and policy of the Mohammedans, who suppose that the Turks waged war upon the Christians in this age, for the sake of promoting their religion in opposition to that of Christ. But private enemies to all religion and especially to the Christian (as many have represented), were lurking here and there in different parts of Europe, and they instilled their nefarious dogmas both orally and by books into the minds of the credulous. Among this miserable class are letters, and wrote tracts on the Christian religion, and particularly a catechism. Many persons of rank put themselves under his instruction, and he at length gathered a congregation of Christians. After twenty years' labour he gained access to the emperor, to whom he presented pictures of Christ and the Virgin Mary and a clock, and obtained liberty to visit the palace with his associates at pleasure. He now made converts very fast and from all ranks of the people. Siu, one of the principal mandarins, and his grand-daughter Candida with her husband, became converts, who built thirty churches in the provinces where they lived, and assisted the missionaries to procure the erection of ninety more, besides forty chapels for prayer in another province. They also caused numerous religious tracts to be printed, with translations of comments on the Scripture, and even the great Summa of Thomas Aquinas. They gathered the foundlings with which China abounded, and brought them up Christians. Ricci's two companions Passio and Roger were early recalled; but when he began to be successful, assistants were sent to him, who continued to labour after his decease, which took place in the year 1610. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 677, &c.—Mur. [On the introduction of the gospel into this almost inaccessible empire, see the works referred to by Walch, ubi supra, p. 358, &c.—R.

⁵ Pictet's Oratio de Trophæis Christi, in his Orat. p. 570. I have no doubt that the celebrated admiral Coligni was the man who sent for these Genevan teachers to come to him into France. For that excellent man in the year 1555 projected sending a colony of Protestants to Brazil and America. See Charlevoix's Histoire de la Nouvelle France, tome i. p. 22, &c. [and Thuanus, Historia Generalis, lib. xvi.—Mur.

reckoned several of the peripatetic philosophers who illumined Italy, and in particular Peter Pomponatius; and besides these, among the French were John Bodin, Francis Rabelais, Michael de Montaigne, Bonaventure des Perieres, Stephen Dolet, and Peter Charron; among the Italians, the sovereign pontiff Leo X. [Cardinal] Bembo, Angelo Politiano, Jordano Bruno, and Bernardino Ochino; among the Germans, Theophrastus Paracelsus, Nicholas Taurellus, and others.¹ Nay, some tell us

¹ The reader may consult Reimann's Historia Atheismi et Atheorum, Hildesh. 1733, 8vo; Buddeus, Theses de Atheismo et Superstitione, cap. i.; Bayle's Dictionnaire, in various articles, and others. [Pomponatius was born at Mantua in 1462, taught philosophy at Padua and Bologna, and died about A.D. 1526. In a treatise on the immortality of the soul, he denied that reason could decide the question, and maintained that it was purely a doctrine of faith, resting on the authority of revelation. In a treatise on incantations, he denied the agency of demons in producing strange occurrences; and explained the efficacy of relics, &c. by the influence of the imagination. In a tract on fate, free will, and predestination, he declared himself utterly unable satisfactorily to solve the difficulties of the subject, commented on the usual explanations, showed their insufficiency, and wished others to investigate the subject more fully. At the same time he pronounced the stoic and the Christian exposition of the subject the most plausible, and submitted himself to the authority of the church. Many account him an atheist, and the Inquisition condemned his principles. See Bayle's Dictionnaire, art. Pomponatius; and Stäudlin's Gesch. der Moral philosoph., p. 584.—Bodin was a French jurist, civilian, and man of letters, and died A.D. 1596, aged 67. His works were numerous, consisting of translations of the Latin classics, law, and political writings; and an unprinted dialogue between a Catholic, a Lutheran, an indifferentist, a naturalist, a Reformed, a Jew, and a Turk, on the subject of religion. Here he appears a freethinker. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Bodin.—Rabelais was a great wit and a distinguished burlesque writer. Born about A.D. 1500 he became a Cordelier, led a scandalous life, became a Benedictine, forsook the monastic life in 1530, and studied physic; was employed as a physician and librarian, by cardinal Du Bellay; went to Rome, returned, and was curate of Meulan from the year 1545 to his death in 1553. His works, consisting of his Pantagruel and Gargantua, are comic satires, full of the burlesque; and were printed in five vols. 8vo, Amsterd. 1715, and three vols. 4to, ibid. 1741. His satire of the monks excited their enmity, and caused him trouble. But he does not appear to have been in speculation a deist or a heretic, though his piety may be justly questioned.—Montaigne was a French nobleman, born in 1533, well educated in the classics at Bourdeaux, succeeded to the lordship of Montaigne in Perigord and to the majority of Bourdeaux, where he ended his life, A.D. 1592. His great work is his Essays, often printed in 3 vols. 4to, and 6 vols. 12mo. He there appears to be sceptical in regard to scientific or philosophical morals, but he was a firm believer in revelation, which he regarded as man's only safe guide. See Stäudlin, ubi supra, p. 606, &c.—Des Perieres was a valet-de-chambre to Margaret, queen of Navarre, and was a wit and a poet. A volume of his French poems was published after his death, which was in 1544. Previous to his death, he published in French a pretended translation of a Latin work, entitled Cymbalum Mundi, which consists of four dialogues not very chaste, ridiculing the pagan superstitions in the manner of Lucian. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Perieres.—Dolet was a man of learning, though indiscreet and much involved in controversies. After various changes he became a printer and bookseller at Lyons; and having avowed lax sentiments in religion, he was seized by the Inquisition and burned, upon the charge of atheism, A.D. 1546, at the age of 37. What his religious opinions were it is not easy to state. He professed to that in certain parts of France and Italy there were schools opened, from which issued swarms of such monsters. And no be a Lutheran. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Dolet; and Rees' Cyclopaedia.—Peter Charron was born at Paris in 1541, studied and practised law several years, and then became a Catholic preacher in very high estimation for his pulpit talents. He died at Paris, A.D. 1603. He was a philosophical divine, bold and sceptical. He did not discard revelation, yet relied more upon natural religion. His most noted work was De la Sagesse in three books, first printed at Bourdeaux, 1601. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Charron; and Stäudlin, ubi supra, p. 612, &c.—Leo X. was a man of pleasure, and gave no evidence of genuine piety. Du Plessis and other Protestants have reported remarks said to have been made by him in his unguarded moments, implying that he considered the Christian religion a fable, though a profitable one; that he doubted the immortality of the soul, &c. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Leo X., note 1, p. 83.—Cardinal Bembo was secretary to Leo X. a man of letters, a facetious companion, a poet and historian. He also is reported to have spoken equivocally of a future state, and to have despised Paul's epistles on account of their unpolished style. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Bembo, and art. Melancthon, note (P).—Politian was a learned classic scholar in the preceding century, and is reported to have said that he never read the Bible but once, and he considered that a loss of time. He was also reported to have given the preference to Pindar's poems before those of David. On these rumours he has been classed among freethinkers. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Politian.—Jordano Bruno was a Neapolitan freethinker. He attacked the Aristotelian philosophy, and denied many of the plain truths of revelation. Driven from Italy for his impieties, he travelled and resided in Germany, France, and England; and returning to Italy, he was committed to the flames in the year 1600. See Bayle, ubi supra, article Bruno.—Bernardino Ochino was an Italian, born in 1487 at Sienna. He early became a Franciscan, first of the class called Cordeliers and then a Capuchin, of which last order he was the general from A.D. 1537 to 1542. He was then a very austere monk and a distinguished preacher. But in the year 1541, meeting with John Valdes, a Spanish civilist, who had accompanied Charles V. to Germany and there imbibed Lutheran sentiments, Ochino was converted to the same faith. The change in his views soon became known, and he was summoned to Rome to give account of himself. On his way thither he met with Peter Martyr, a man of kindred views, and they both agreed to flee beyond the reach of the papal power. They went first to Geneva and thence to Augsburg, where Ochino published a volume of sermons, married, and lived from 1542 till 1547. From Augsburg, both Ochino and Martyr were invited into England by archbishop Cranmer, and were employed in reforming that country. But on the accession of queen Mary in 1553, they were obliged to quit England. Ochino returned to Strasburg, and in 1555 went to Basil and thence to Zurich, where he became pastor to a congregation of Italian Protestants till 1563. He then published a volume of dialogues, in one of which he represented polygamy as lawful in certain cases, and advanced some other opinions which gave offence. The magistrates of Zurich banished him from the canton. He retired to Basil in mid-winter, and being refused an asylum there he travelled with his family to Poland, where he met the like reception, and set out for Moravia; on his way, he and family were taken sick, two sons and a daughter died; he recovered so far as to pursue his journey, but died three weeks after, at Slawkau, A.D. 1564, aged 77. He is said to have impugned the doctrine of the Trinity, and the Antitrinitarians claim him as one of their sect. His works were all written in Italian, and consisted of six volumes of sermons, commentaries on the epistles to the Romans and the Galatians, a treatise on the Lord's supper, another on predestination and free-will, &c. See Bayle, ubi supra, art. Ochin.—Theophrastus, or, as he called himself, Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombastus von Hohenheim, was a vain, unlearned, but ingenious alchemist, physician, and philosopher of Switzerland, born in 1493. He travelled much, was a short time one who is well acquainted with the state of those times will reject these statements in the gross; for all the persons who are expressly charged with so great a crime cannot be acquitted altogether. Yet if the subject be examined by impartial and competent judges, it will appear that many individuals were unjustly impeached, and others merited slighter reprobation.

6. That all the arts and sciences were in this age advanced to a higher degree of perfection by the ingenuity and zeal of eminent men, no one needs to be informed. From this happy revival of general learning, the whole Christian population of Europe derived very great advantages to themselves, and afterwards imparted advantages to other nations, even to the remotest parts of the world. Princes and states, perceiving the vast utility of this progress of knowledge, were everywhere at much expense and pains to found and protect learned associations and institutions, to foster and encourage genius and talent, and to provide honours and rewards for literary and scientific men. From this time onward that salutary rule took effect, which still prevails among the larger and better part of the Christian community, of excluding all ignorant and illiterate persons from the sacred office and its functions. Yet the old contest between piety and learning did not cease; for everywhere, both among the adherents to the Roman pontiff and among his foes, there were persons,—good men perhaps, but not duly considerate,—who contended more zealously than ever, that religion and piety could not possibly live and be vigorous, unless all human learning and philosophy were separated from it, and the holy simplicity of the early ages restored.

7. In the first rank among the learned of that age, were those who devoted themselves to editing, correcting, and explaining the ancient Greek and Latin authors, to the study of antiquities, to the cultivation of both those languages, and to elegant composition both in prose and verse. Numerous works still exist, the admiration of the learned, from which it appears that the finest geniuses in all parts of Europe prosecuted these branches of learning with the greatest ardour, and even considered the preservation of religion and civil institutions, and the very life of all solid learning, to depend on these studies. And though some of them might go too far in this view, yet no candid man will deny that the prosecution of these studies first opened the way for mental cultivation, and rescued both reason and religion from bondage.

8. Those who devoted themselves principally to the study and improvement of philosophy were indeed less numerous than the prosecutors of elegant literature, yet they formed a body neither small nor contemptible. They were divided into two classes. The one laboured to discover the nature and truth of things solely by contemplation or speculation, the other resorted also to experiments. The former either followed their chosen guides and masters, or they struck out new paths by their own ingenuity and efforts. Those who followed masters either fixed their eye on Plato (to whom many in Italy especially gave the preference), or they followed Aristotle. The professed followers of Aristotle were, moreover, greatly divided among themselves. For while many of them wished to preserve the old method of philosophising, which by the doctors who still reigned in the schools was falsely called the peripatetic, others wished to see Aristotle taught pure and uncontaminated; that is, they wished to have his works themselves brought forward and explained to the youth. Different from both were those who thought, that the marrow only should be extracted from the lucubrations of Aristotle, and when illumined by the light of elegant literature and corrected by the dictates of reason and sound theology, should thus be exhibited in appropriate treatises. At the head of this last class of peripatetics was our Philip Melancthon. Among those discarding the dogmas of the ancients and philosophising freely were Jerome Cardanus, Bernard Telesius, and Thomas Campanella; men of great and splendid genius, yet too much devoted to the fictions and visions of their own fancies. To these may be added Peter Ramus, an ingenious and acute Frenchman, who excited great commotion and clamour by publishing a new art of reasoning opposed to that of Aristotle, and better ac-professor of physio at Basil, and died at Salzburg in 1541. He was the father of the sect of Theosophists, a sort of mystics who pretended to derive all their knowledge of nature immediately from God. See Rees' Cyclopædia, and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 145, &c.—Taurillus (Echstein), a philosopher and physician of Mompelgard, who taught at Basil and Altorf, lived at a time when Aristotle reigned with boundless sway in all the universities; and wishing to free himself from the tyranny of the Stagyrte, he ventured as a man of independence to correct some of Aristotle's opinions concerning God, providence, the human soul, &c. He thus became embroiled with the friends of Aristotle as his opposers, and was suspected of atheism. But Dr. Feurlin has defended him, in a Dissert. Apologetica. See Schlegel's note.—Mur. [See also Tennemann's Manual of the Hist. of Philosophy, translated by Johnson, Oxf. 1832, for further particulars respecting the tenets of several of these writers: on Pomponatius, p. 273; Bodin, p. 280; Montaigne, p. 289; Charron, p. 290; Bruno, p. 283; Paracelsus, p. 271; and Taurillus, p. 276 and 280.—R.] commodated to the use of orators. From nature itself, by experiment, by inspection, and by the aid of fire, penetrating into the primary elements of things, Theophrastus, Paracelsus endeavoured to discover and demonstrate latent truths. And his example was so approved by many that a new sect of philosophers soon rose up, who assumed the names of Fire Philosophers and Theosophists, and who, attributing very little to human reason and reflection, ascribed everything to experience and divine illumination.¹

9. These efforts and competitions among men of genius, besides being highly beneficial in many other respects, corrected in several places, though they did not entirely cure, that barbarous, uncouth, and vile method of treating religious subjects which had prevailed among Christians in the preceding centuries. The holy Scriptures, which had been either wholly neglected, or interpreted very unsuitably, now held a far more conspicuous place in the discussions and writings of theologians; both words and things were more critically examined, subjects were more justly and lucidly analyzed, and the dry and insipid style which the old schools admired was exploded by all the better informed. These improvements were not indeed carried so far that nothing was left for succeeding ages to correct and amend; much remained which was imperfect. Yet he must be ungrateful to the men of this age or a very incompetent judge, who shall deny that they laid the foundation of all those excellences by which the theologians of subsequent times are distinguished from those of the former ages.

10. Hence the true nature and genius of the Christian religion, which even the best and most learned had not before sufficiently understood, were placed in a clearer light, being drawn up as it were from a deep pit. There is indeed error enough still existing everywhere; yet even those Christian communities at this day, whose errors are the greatest and most numerous, have not such crude and inconsistent views of the nature and design of Christianity and of the duties and obligations of Christians, as were formerly entertained even by those who claimed to be rulers of the church and chief among its teachers. This improved state of religion, moreover, had great influence in correcting and softening the manners of many nations, who before were coarse, unpolished, and rude. For though it is not to be denied that other causes also contributed gradually to introduce and establish that milder and more cultivated state of society which has prevailed in most countries of Europe since the time of Luther, yet it is very clear that the religious discussions and the better knowledge of many doctrines and duties to which they gave rise have contributed very much to eradicate from the minds of men their former ferocity of character. Nor shall we go wide of the truth when we add, that since that time genuine piety likewise has had more friends and cultivators, though they have always and everywhere been overwhelmed by the multitude of the ungodly.

SECTION III.

THE PARTICULAR HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

PART I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ROMISH OR LATIN CHURCH.

1. THE Romish or Latin church is a community extending very widely over the world, the whole of which is subject to the single bishop of Rome, who claims to be hereditary successor to the office and to all the prerogatives of St. Peter, the prince of the apostles or the supreme bishop of the Christian church universal, and the legate and vicegerent of Jesus Christ. This mighty prelate is chosen at this day by a select number of the Romish clergy; namely, by six bishops in the vicinage of Rome, fifty rectors or presbyters of churches in Rome, and fourteen overseers or deacons of Romish hospitals or deaneries; all of whom are called by the ancient appellation of cardinals. These cardinals, when deliberating respecting the choice of a new pontiff, are shut up in a kind of prison which is called the conclave, that they may the more expeditiously bring the difficult business to a close. No one who is not a member of the college of cardinals, and also a native Italian, can be made head of the church; nor can all those who are Italian cardinals.¹ Some are excluded on account of their birthplace, others on account of their course of life, and others for other causes. Moreover, the Roman emperors² and the kings of France and Spain have acquired either legally or by custom the right of excluding those they disapprove from the list of candidates for this high office. Hence there are very few in the great body of cardinals who are papable, as the common phrase is; that is, who are so born and possess such qualifications that the august functions of a pope can fall to their lot.

¹ For the elucidation of these matters, Brucker's Historia Philosophica Critica will be found very useful. We here only summarily touch upon the subject. [The English reader may consult Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. i. especially chap. vii. and Tennemann's Manual of the History of Philosophy; respecting Cardanus, p. 272; Telesius, p. 281; Campanella, p. 297; Ramus, p. 277; and Paracelsus, p. 271, with the references to authorities in the notes.—R.]

2. The Roman pontiff does not enjoy a power which has no limitations or restraints; for whatever he decrees in the sacred republic, he must decree in accordance with the advice of the brethren, that is, of the cardinals, who are his counsellors and ministers of state. In questions of a religious nature likewise, and in theological controversies, he must take the opinion and judgment of theologians. The minor matters of business moreover are distributed into several species, and committed to the management and trust of certain boards of commissioners called congregations, over which one or more cardinals preside.³ What these boards deem salutary or right is ordinarily approved by the pontiff, and must be approved unless there are very cogent reasons for the contrary. From

¹ The reader may consult Mayer's Comment. de Electione Pontific. Roman. Hanib. 1691, 4to. The Ceremoniale Electionis et Coronationis Pontificis Romani was not long since published by Meuschen, Frankf. 1732, 4to. [To be eligible, 1st. A man must be of mature age, for the electors then hope that their turn may come to be elected. Besides, a pope fifty or more years old will be more likely to rule discreetly and sagaciously. 2dly. He must be an Italian, for a foreigner might remove the papal residence out of the country. 3dly. He must not be the subject of any distinguished prince, but must be a native subject of the holy see; for otherwise he might promote the interests of his hereditary prince to the injury of the holy see. 4thly. Monks are not readily preferred, lest they should confer too many privileges on their own order. 5thly. Nor are those who have been ministers of state, ambassadors, or pensioners of distinguished princes. 6thly. Nor those who have been much engaged in political affairs. 7thly. No one who has numerous relatives, especially poor ones, on whom he might exhaust the apostolical treasury. From these causes the choice generally falls at the present day upon either learned or devout persons. There are four methods of choosing a pope. 1. By scrutiny, that is by ballot. A golden cup is placed on the altar, into which each cardinal casts a sealed vote; and to make out a regular choice, one man must have the suffrages of two-thirds of the cardinals. II. By access. This method is resorted to when a candidate has many votes, but not enough to constitute a choice, and a trial is made to bring some of the other cardinals to accede to his election. It is properly a new scrutiny, though the ballots are of a different form. III. By compromise; that is, when the conclave continues long and the cardinals cannot agree, they transfer the election to two or three cardinals, and agree to abide by their choice. IV. By inspiration. When the cardinals have become weary of their long confinement, sometimes one or more of them will clamorously announce an individual as pope, and the party in his favour, being previously apprized of the measure, join in the outcry till the cardinals in opposition, through fear, join in the general clamour. A pope thus chosen by inspiration is particularly revered by the Italians, notwithstanding their belief that there can be no election by inspiration, unless the cardinals have previously acted foolishly.—Schl. [See also Rees' Cyclopædia, article Conclave, and the Ceremonial of the election of a pontiff ratified by Gregory XV. A.D. 1622, in the Bullarium Magnum, tom. iii. p. 454.—Mur.]

² The emperor of Austria is now the representative of the Roman emperors of the West, as the emperor of Russia claims to be the successor of the Roman emperors of the East. Hence, according to some, his title of Czar or Cæsar.—R.

³ The court of Rome is minutely described by Aymon, in a book entitled, Tableau de la Cour de Rome, Haguer, 1707, 8vo; and by Limadoro, Relation de la Cour de Rome, et des Cérémonies qui s'y observent, which (translated from the Italian into French) Labat has subjoined to his Travels in Spain and Italy, Voyages en Espagne et Italie, tome viii. p. 105, &c. On the Romish congregations or colleges, besides Ascanius (De Montibus Pictatis Romanis, p. 510, &c.), Plettenburg has a particular treatise, Notitia Tribunalium et Congregationum Curie Romanæ, Hildesh 1693, 8vo. [The congregations are properly boards of commissioners meeting at stated times, with full and definitive powers within certain limits to decide summarily all controversies, and to control and manage all business which falls within their respective provinces. They have their own secretaries, keep records of their proceedings, may send for persons and papers, call on professional and learned men for their opinions, and are bound in certain cases to consult the pontiff before they come to a decision. The number and the specific duties of the several congregations vary from time to time, as the pope and his council see fit to ordain. Besides these permanent congregations, others are created for special occasions and expire when their business is closed. Sixtus V. in the year 1587 established fifteen permanent congregations, composed most of them of five cardinals each, and none of them of less than three. They were, I. The congregation of the holy Inquisition, the supreme inquisitorial tribunal for all Christendom. In this the pope presided in person. II. The congregation on letters of grace, dispensations, &c. III. The congregation on the erection, union, and dismemberment of churches, bishoprics, &c. IV. The congregation for supplying the ecclesiastical states with corn and preventing scarcity. V. The congregation on sacred rites and ceremonies. VI. The congregation for providing and regulating a papal fleet, to consist of ten ships. VII. The congregation on the Index of prohibited books. VIII. The congregation for interpreting and executing the decrees of the council of Trent, except as to the articles of faith. IX. The congregation for relief in cases of oppression in the ecclesiastical states. X. The congregation on the university of Rome, with a general inspection of all Catholic seminaries. XI. The congregation on the different orders of monks. XII. The congregation to attend to the applications of bishops and other prelates. XIII. The congregation on the roads, bridges, and aqueducts of the Romish territory. XIV. The congregation for superintending the Vatican printing establishment. XV. The congregation on the applications of all citizens of the ecclesiastical states in civil and criminal matters. See the ordinance establishing these several congregations in the Bullarium Magnum, tom. ii. p. 677, &c. Considerable alterations were afterwards made, as to the number, duties, and powers of the Romish congregations.—Mur.

such a constitution of the sacred republic, many things must often take place far otherwise than would meet the wishes of the pontiff; nor are those well informed as to the management of affairs at Rome, who suppose that he who presides there is the cause of all the evils, contests, and commotions which occur there.¹

3. Respecting, however, the powers and prerogatives of this spiritual monarchy, its own citizens disagree very much. And hence the authority of the Romish prelate and of his legates is not the same in all countries; but in some it is more circumscribed and limited, in others more extensive and uncontrolled. The pontiff himself indeed, and also his courtiers and friends, claim for him the highest supremacy; for he contends not only that all spiritual power and majesty reside primarily in him alone, and are transmitted in certain portions from him to the inferior prelates, but also that his decisions made from the chair are correct beyond even the suspicion of error. On the contrary, very many, of whom the French are the most distinguished, maintain that a portion of spiritual jurisdiction, emanating immediately from Jesus Christ, is possessed by each individual bishop, and that the whole resides in the pastors collectively, or in ecclesiastical councils duly called; while the pontiff, separately from the body of the church, is liable to err. This long controversy may be reduced to this simple question—Is the Romish prelate the lawgiver of the church, or only the guardian and executor of the laws enacted by Christ and by the church? Yet there is no prospect that this controversy will ever terminate, unless there should be a great revolution; because the parties are not agreed respecting the judge who is to decide it.²

¹ Hence originated that important distinction which the French, and others who have had contests with the Roman pontiffs, very frequently make between the Roman pontiff and the Romish court. The court is often severely censured while the pontiff is spared, and that justly. For the fathers and the congregations, who possess rights which the pontiff must not infringe, plot and effect many things without the knowledge and against the will of the pontiff. [It may be worthy of remark, that although the Romish church is a political body which is governed like other kingdoms and states, yet in this commonwealth everything is called by a different name. The ghostly king is called the pope or father, his ministers of state are called cardinals, his envoys of the highest rank are called legates à latere, and those of a lower order, apostolical nuncios. His chancery is called dataria, his boards of commissioners and judicatures are congregations, his supreme court of justice is named the rota, and his counsellors of state are called auditors of the rota.—Schl. [The present pope, Pius IX. has now (1848) entirely reformed the political constitution of the Papal States, and brought it into closer conformity with that of other secular kingdoms.—R.

² The arguments used by the friends of the pontifical claims may be seen in Bellarmin and numerous others, who have written in accordance with the views of the

4. The Romish church lost much of its ancient splendour and glory, from the time that the native aspect of the Christian religion and church was portrayed and exhibited before the nations of Europe, by the efforts of Luther. For many opulent countries of Europe withdrew themselves, some of them entirely and others in part, from adherence to its laws and institutions; and this defection greatly diminished the resources of the Roman pontiffs.³ Moreover the kings and princes who chose not to abandon the old form of religion learned from the writings and discussions of the Protestants, much more clearly and correctly than before, that the pontiffs had set up numberless claims without any right; and that if the pontifical power should remain such as it was before Luther's time, the civil governments could not possibly retain their dignity and majesty. And hence, partly by secret and artful measures and partly by open opposition, they everywhere set bounds to the immoderate ambition of the pontiffs, who wished to control all things secular as well as sacred according to their own pleasure; nor did the pontiffs deem it prudent to avenge these daring attempts as pontiffs, and whose works form a huge collection made by Thomas Roccaberti. Even among the French, Matthew Petitdidier lately defended the pontifical power, in his book Sur l'Autorité et l'Infaillibilité des Papes, Luxembourg, 1724, 8vo. The arguments commonly employed to support the opinion adopted by the French clergy and by those who accord with them may be best learned from various writings of Edmund Richer and John Launo.

³ Yet the popes still have very considerable revenues, notwithstanding there is no country in the world where more beggars are to be met with than in the ecclesiastical states, and while the apostolical treasury is always very poor; for, 1st. The pope has many clerical livings at his disposal, none of which are readily given away. In particular, he disposes of all the livings whose incumbents happen to die at his court, and also the livings of those who die in what are called the pontifical months. 2dly. He confirms the election to cathedral chapters by the spiritual founders with his bulls of confirmation, which always cost large sums. 3dly. He draws the annuity or the incomes of the first year of incumbency, in bishoprics and archbishoprics. 4thly. He exacts a certain sum for the badge of spiritual knighthood in the Romish church, or for the spallium of archbishops and bishops. This is properly a neck-cloth which answers to the riband or garter of secular knighthood, and is worn by distinguished prelates when they say mass and on the other solemn occasions. 5thly. There are certain cases reserved for the popes (causæ reservatæ), in which no father confessor can give absolution or a dispensation, and in which the granting dispensations brings a large revenue to the popes; for example, in matrimonial cases, in the relinquishment of the clerical office, monastic vows, &c. And finally, the pope has power to impose extraordinary payments and contributions on his clerical subjects, which are called subsidies. The monks also must pay an annual sum to the pope for his protection, which is called the collects. Thus the pope is in reality an opulent lord, even since the Reformation; and he does not lack means for enriching himself, notwithstanding his public treasury is always poor. For the disposal of all these sums is in his hands; and he can let a portion of them flow into his treasury, or he can bestow them on his relations and dependants, or apply them to establishments which will make his name immortal.—Schl.

formerly, by means of interdicts and crusades. Even the countries which still acknowledge the pontiff as the supreme lawgiver of the church and as incapable of erring (and which are called countries of obedience, terre obediencia), nevertheless confine his legislative powers within narrower limits.

5. To repair in some measure this very great loss, the pontiffs laboured much more earnestly than their predecessors had done to extend the bounds of their kingdom out of Europe, both among the non-Christian nations and among the Christian sects. In this very important business, first the Jesuits and afterwards persons of the other monastic orders were employed. Yet if we except the achievements of Francis Xavier and his associates in India, China, and Japan, which have been already noticed, very little that was great and splendid was accomplished in this century, the arrangements for this business being not yet perfected. The Portuguese having opened a passage to the Abyssinians, who followed the dogmas and the rites of the Monophysites, there was a fine opportunity for attempts to bring that nation under subjection to the Romish see. Hence first, John Bermudes was sent to them decorated with the title of patriarch of the Abyssinians; and afterwards this mission was committed to Ignatius Loyola and his associates.¹ Various circumstances and especially the wars of the nation, which the Abyssinian emperor hoped to terminate favourably by the aid of the Portuguese, seemed at first to promise success to the enterprise. But in process of time it appeared, that the attachment of the Abyssinians to the principles of their progenitors was too strong to be eradicated; and with the close of this century, the Jesuits nearly lost all hope of success among them.²

6. To the Copts or Egyptians, who were closely connected with the Abyssinians in religion and ecclesiastical customs, Christopher Roderic, a famous Jesuit, was sent by authority of Pius IV. in the year 1562. He returned to Rome with nothing but fair words, although he had laboured to overcome Gabriel, then the patriarch of Alexandria, with very rich presents and with subtle arguments.³ But near the close of the century, in the year 1594, when Clement VIII. was head of the Romish church, the envoys of an Alexandrian patriarch, whose name was likewise Gabriel, appeared as suitors at Rome, which caused very great exultation at the time among the friends of the Romish court.⁴ But this embassy is justly suspected by ingenious men even of the Romish community, and it was probably contrived by the Jesuits for the purpose of persuading the Abyssinians, who generally followed the example of the Alexandrians, to embrace more readily the communion of the Roman pontiff.⁵ Nothing certainly occurred afterwards in Egypt to indicate any partiality of the Copts towards the Romans. A part of the Armenians had long manifested a veneration for the Roman pontiff, without however quitting the institutions and rites of their fathers, of which more will be said when we come to the history of the Oriental church. A larger

¹ Friendly intercourse between the emperor of Abyssinia and the king of Portugal commenced as early as the year 1514, when the former sent an ambassador to the latter. In 1521 the same emperor, David, sent an envoy to the pope at Rome, who returned a very kind answer. In 1545 Claudius the son of David applied to John III. king of Portugal, to send him several priests and artists. The king applied to Loyola, to designate some of his followers for the enterprise. Loyola did so; and the pope ordained John Nonius Barretus of Portugal, patriarch of Abyssinia, Andrew Ovedus a Neapolitan, bishop of Nice, and Melchior Cornerius of Portugal, bishop of Hierapolis; the two last to be coadjutors and successors to Barretus. Ten other Jesuits of inferior rank were joined with them. They all sailed from Portugal in the year 1555; but on their arrival at Goa, they found that the Abyssinian emperor Claudius was not disposed to subject his kingdom to the pontiff. Barretus therefore stayed in India, where he was a successful missionary till his death. Ovedus went to Abyssinia with a few companions, and was there imprisoned. Claudius had been slain in battle in 1559, and his brother and successor Adamus was a violent persecutor of the Christians. After twenty years' labour in Abyssinia, Ovedus died A.D. 1577. His companions died one after another, till in the year 1597 Francis Lupus the last of them expired, and left the handful of Catholics without a priest. See Godignus, De Abassinorum Rebus deque Ethiopia Patriarchis, Jo. Non. Barreto et Andr. Ovedo, Lugd. 1615. 8vo, and Reynald's Annales Eccles. on the years specified.—Mur.

² See Ludolf's Historia Ethiopica, and the notes on that history, passim; Mich. Geddes, Church History of Ethiopia, p. 120, &c.; Henry le Grand's Diss. de la Conversion des Abyssins, p. 25, which is the ninth of the Dissertations subjoined to Lobo's Voyage Historique d'Abyssinie; La Croze, Histoire du Christianisme en Ethiopie, liv. II. p. 90, &c.

³ Sachinus, Historia Societat. Jesu, par. II. lib. v.; Renaudot, Historia Patriarchar. Alexandrin. p. 611; and especially the Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome II. p. 314, &c.

⁴ The documents of this embassy, emblazoned with a splendid exordium, are subjoined by Baronius to the sixth volume of his Annales Eccles. p. 707, &c. [p. 691—700], ed. Antwerp.

⁵ Renaudot, in his Historia Patriarchar. Alexandrinor. p. 611, 612, has endeavoured to re-establish the credit of this embassy which Baronius so exultingly extols. But he errs very much when he supposes that only Simon, relying on the fallacious testimony of Pousa, has opposed it. For Thomas à Jesu, a Carmelite, did so, lib. vi. De Conversione Omnium Gentium Procuranda, and others have done so. See Geddes, Church History of Ethiopia, p. 231, 232. (Whoever reads the documents must be sensible that they all bear the marks of being the composition of one person, though they profess to be the letters of several different persons. The reader will also be surprised to find how perfectly at home the writer seems to be when trumpeting the claims of the pontiff to universal lordship, and when detailing the affairs of the Romish church.—Mur.

accession was anticipated from Serapion, a man of wealth and devoted to the Romans, who, though the Armenians had two patriarchs already, was created a third patriarch in the year 1593, in order to free his nation from oppressive debt. But he was soon after sent into exile by the Persian monarch, at the instigation of the other Armenians, and with him all the delightful anticipations of the Romans came to nothing.¹

7. In the year 1551, a great contest arose among the Nestorians, or Chaldeans as they are called, respecting the election of a new patriarch; one party demanding Simeon Barmamas, and another Sulaka. The latter made a journey to Rome, and was there consecrated in the year 1553 by Julius III. to whom he swore allegiance. Julius gave to this new patriarch of the Chaldeans the name of Jolin, and sent with him on his return to his country several persons well skilled in the Syrian language, for the purpose of establishing the Romish dominion among the Nestorians. From that time onward the Nestorians became split into two factions, and were often brought into the most imminent peril by the opposing interests and contests of their patriarchs.² The Nestorians on the sea-coast of India, who are commonly called the Christians of St. Thomas, were cruelly harassed by the Portuguese, to induce them to exchange the religion of their fathers, which was much more simple than the Roman, for the Romish worship. The consummation of this business was reserved for Alexio de Menezes, archbishop of Goa, who near the close of the century with the aid of the Jesuits compelled those miserable, reluctant, and unwilling people, by means of amazing severities, to come under the power of the Roman pontiff. These violent proceedings of Menezes and his associates have met the disapprobation of persons distinguished for wisdom and equity in the Romish community.³

8. Most of these missionaries of the Roman pontiff treated the Christians whom they wished to overcome unkindly and unreasonably. For they not only required them to give up the opinions in which they differed from both the Greek and the Latin churches, and to recognise the bishop of Rome as a lawgiver and vicegerent of Christ on the earth, but they also opposed sentiments which deserved toleration, nay, such as were sound and consonant to the Scriptures; insisted on the abrogation of customs, rites, and institutions which had come down from former times and were not prejudicial to the truth; and, in short, required their entire worship to be conducted after the Romish fashion. The Romish court indeed found at length by experience that such a mode of proceeding was indiscreet, and that it was not suited to the successful extension of the empire of the pontiff. Accordingly the great business of missions came gradually to be conducted in a more wise and temperate manner; and the missionaries were directed to make it their sole object to bring these Christians to become subjects of the pontiff, and to renounce, professedly at least, such opinions as had been condemned by the ecclesiastical councils; while all other things, doctrines as well as the practices of their fathers, were to remain inviolate. And this plan was supported by certain learned divines, who endeavoured to prove, though not always successfully and fairly, that there was but little difference between the doctrines of the Greek and other Oriental Christians and those of the Romish church, provided they were estimated correctly and truly, and not according to the artificial definitions and subtleties of the scholastic doctors. This plan of using moderation was more serviceable to the Romish interests than the old plan of severity; yet it did not produce all the effects its authors anticipated.

9. In guarding the church's territories and fortifying her internal constitution against the power and subtlety of her adversaries, no little pains were taken at Rome from the age of Luther onward. For that most effectual method of subduing heretics by crusades being laid aside, on account of the altered state not only of the Romish authority but of all Europe, recourse to other means and other policy for preserving the church became necessary. Hence the terrible tribunals of the Inquisition, in the countries where they were admitted, were fortified and regulated by new provisions. Colleges were erected here and there, in which young men were trained by continual practice to the best methods of disputing with the adversaries of the pope. The ingress into the church of books which might corrupt the minds of its members was prevented or rendered extremely difficult by means of what were called expurgatory and prohibitory indices, drawn up by the most sagacious men. The cultivation of literature was earnestly recommended to the clergy, and high rewards were held out to those who aspired to pre-eminence in learning. The young were much more solidly instructed in the precepts and first principles of religion than before, and many other means for the safety of the church were adopted. Thus the greatest evils often produce the greatest benefits. And the Romish church would perhaps have even yet been destitute of the advantages resulting from these and other regulations, if the heretics had not boldly invaded and laid waste her territories.

¹ See the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus dans le Levant, tome III. p. 132, 133.

² Asseman's Bibliotheca Orientalis Clementina-Vaticana, tom. III. par. II. p. 161. See below, in the history of the Oriental church.

³ La Croze, Histoire du Christianisme des Indes, livr. II. p. 88, &c. (Buchanan's Christian Researches in Asia, p. 85, &c.; Geddes, Hist. of the Malabar Church, Lond. 1694, 8vo.—Mur. (See also Hough's Hist. of Christianity in India, vol. I. book II. chap. VIII. and book III. where the proceedings of Menezes are fully related.—R.

10. As the Roman pontiffs were accustomed to control, defend, and enlarge their empire principally by means of the religious orders [or monks], who from various causes are more closely connected with the pontiffs than the other clergy and the bishops, it became very necessary, after the unsuccessful contest with Luther, that some new order should be established wholly devoted to the pontifical interests, and making it their great business to recover if possible what was lost, to repair what was injured, and to fortify and guard what remained entire. For the two orders of Mendicants [the Dominicans and Franciscans], by whom especially the pontiffs had governed the church for some centuries with the best effects, had from several causes lost no small part of their reputation and influence, and could not therefore subserve the interests of the church as efficiently and successfully as heretofore. Such a new society as the necessities of the church demanded was found in that noted and most powerful order which assumed a name from Jesus, and was commonly called the society of the Jesuits; but by his enemies it was named the society of Loyolites, or (from the Spanish name of its founder) the Inghists.¹

¹ The principal writers concerning the order of Jesuits are enumerated by Salig, Historia Augustane Confessionis, tom. ii. p. 73, &c. [Of these, the most valuable as general works are the following: Historia Societatis Jesu, to the year 1625, in 6 vols. fol. by members of the society, viz. par. i. by Nic. Orlandinus, Ant. 1620; par. ii. by Fr. Sachinus, ibid.; par. iii. and iv. by the same, Rome, 1649, 1652; par. v. by Pet. Posinus and Jos. Juvenicus, Rome, 1661 and 1710; par. vi. by Jul. Cordaro, Rome, 1750. Also Histoire des Religieux de la Compagnie de Jésus, &c. (by Pierre Queane, surnommé Bénard, to A.D. 1572), ed. 2d, Utrecht, 1741, 3 vols. 12mo; Histoire Générale de la Naissance et des Progrès de la Comp. de Jésus (by Christoph. Coudrette and Louis Adr. le Paige), 6 vols. 12mo, Amsterd. 1761, 1767; Essay of a New History of the Order of Jesuits (in German, to 1565), Berlin and Halle, 1769, 1770, 2 vols. 8vo; General Hist. of the Jesuits from the Rise of the Order to the Present Time (in German), by Pet. Phil. Wolf, ed. 2d, Lips. 1803, 4 vols. 8vo; Pragmatic Hist. of the Order of Jesuits from their Origin to the Present Time (in German), by Jo. Chr. Hardenberg, Halle, 1760, 2 vols. 4to. The last two are considered the best summaries.—Mur. [For an account of that important work, the Hist. Soc. Jesu and of its first two compilers, see Ranke's Papet of Rome, Mrs. Austin's transl. vol. iii. App. p. 195, &c. with remarks on some of the other Jesuit historians of their own order. Wolf's work is entitled Allgemeine Gesch. der Jesuiten von dem Ursprung ihres Ordens bis auf die gegenw. Zeit; and Hardenberg's Pragmat. Gesch. des Ordens der Jesuiten. The anonymous essay above mentioned is attributed to Adeling, and its German title is Versuch einer neuen Gesch. des Jesuitenordens. The older works on this prolific topic may be seen in Walch's Biblio. Theol. vol. iii. p. 604, &c. The English reader may consult Loynder's History of the Jesuits, Lond. 1816, 2 vols. 8vo, written in reply to a partial account of the order, which had been published the previous year by Mr. Dallas, a barrister; but especially Ranke's History of the Pope, &c. passim.—R.

The founder of it, Ignatius Loyola, was a Spanish knight, first a soldier and then a fanatic, an illiterate man but of an exuberant imagination.² After various changes

² Many biographies of Loyola have been composed by his followers, most of which are rather eulogies of the man than simple correct statements of facts. They transmit common events into prodigies. (Of this class is Maffei, De Vita et Moribus B. P. Ignatii Loyola, Douay, 1661, 12mo.—Schl.) Recently a Frenchman, who calls himself Hercules Rascl de Selve (an anagram of his real name, Charles le Vier, a bookseller at the Hague.—Mur.), has composed a history of Loyola with a good degree of ingenuousness, if we except his own witty remarks. It is divided into two parts and entitled, Histoire de l'Admirable Dom Inigo de Guipuscoa (which is the Spanish name of Ignatius), Chenueur de la Vierge et Fondateur de la Monarchie d'Inghistes, printed at the Hague, 1736, and again 1739, 8vo. Ignatius Loyola was born at the castle of Loyola, in the district of Guipuscoa in Biscay, Spain, A.D. 1491. Trained up in ignorance and in vice at the court of Ferdinand and Isabella, he early became a soldier, and bravely commanded Pampluna when besieged by the French in 1521. Here he had his leg broken, and during a long confinement amused himself with reading romances. A Spanish legend of certain saints being put into his hands, led him, to renounce the world and become a saint. He first visited the shrine of the Holy Virgin at Montserrat in Catalonia, hung his arms on her altar, and devoted himself to her as her knight, March 24th, 1522. He next went in the garb of a pilgrim to Mauresa, and spent a year among the poor in the hospital. Here he wrote his Spiritual Exercises, a book which was not printed till many years after. He next set out for the Holy Land. From Barcelona he sailed to Italy, obtained the blessing of the pope, proceeded to Venice and embarked for Joppa, where he arrived in August and reached Jerusalem in September, 1523. After satisfying his curiosity he returned by Venice and Genoa to Barcelona, where he commenced the study of Latin, and at the end of two years or A.D. 1526, removed to Alcalá (Complutum), and commenced reading philosophy. His strange appearance and manner of life rendered him suspected, and caused him to be apprehended by the Inquisitors. They released him however, on condition that he should not attempt to give religious instruction till after four years' study. Unwilling to submit to this restraint he went to Salamanca, and pursuing the same course there, he was again apprehended and laid under the same restriction. He therefore went to Paris, where he arrived February, 1528. Here he lived by begging, spent much time in giving religious exhortations, and prosecuted a course of philosophy and theology. Several young men of a kindred spirit (among whom was the celebrated Francis Xavier, the apostle of the Indies) united with him in a kind of monastic association in 1534. At first they were but seven in number, but they increased to ten. At length they agreed to leave Paris, and to meet in January, 1537, at Venice. Loyola went to Spain to settle some affairs, preached there with great effect, and at the time appointed joined his associates at Venice. As they purposed to perform a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, they went to Rome to obtain the papal benediction, and returned to Venice. But the war with the Turks now suspended all intercourse with Palestine, and they could not obtain a passage. Not to be idle, he went to Rome, and it is said was there trained by the instructions and counsels of certain wise and acute men, so that he was enabled to found such a society as the state of the church then required.¹

11. The Jesuits hold an intermediate place between the monks and the secular clergy, and approach near to the order of regular canons. For while they live secluded from the multitude and are under vows like monks, yet they are exempted from the most onerous duties of monks, the canonical hours and the like, in order that they may have more time for the instruction of youth, for writing books, guiding the minds of the religious, and other services useful to the church. The whole society is divided into three classes—namely, the professors who live in houses of the professors, the scholastics who teach youth in their colleges, and the novices who reside in the houses erected especially for them. The professors, in addition to the three common vows of monks, are bound by a fourth, by which they engage before God that they will instantly go wherever the Roman pontiff they dispersed themselves over the country and preached everywhere. Rome now became their place of rendezvous. While thus employed, Ignatius conceived the idea of forming a new and peculiar order of monks. His companions came into the plan; and in 1540 they applied to Paul III. who confirmed their institution with some limitations, and afterwards in 1543 without those limitations. Loyola was chosen general of the order in 1541. He resided constantly at Rome, while his companions spread themselves everywhere, labouring to convert Jews and heretics, to reform the vicious, and inspire men with a religious spirit. His sect increased rapidly, and among the new members were three females. But they gave Loyola so much trouble, that he applied to the pope for a decree releasing them from their vow, and ordaining that the society should never be cumbered with female members any more. After obtaining a confirmation of his order in 1550 from Julius III. he wished to resign his generalship over it; but his associates would not consent, and he remained their general till his death, July 31st, 1556. He was beatified by Paul V. A. D. 1609, and enrolled among the saints by Gregory XV. A. D. 1622. When Loyola died his society consisted of above 1,000 persons, who possessed about 100 houses, and were divided into 12 provinces; Italy, Sicily, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Aragon, Castile, the south of Spain, Portugal and Brazil, Ethiopia, and the East Indies. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Loyola, and Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 515, &c.—Mur.

¹ Not only Protestants but also many Roman Catholics, and these men of learning and discrimination, deny that Loyola had learning enough to compose the writings ascribed to him, or genius enough to form such a society as originated from him. On the contrary, they say that some very wise and superior men guided and controlled his mind, and that better educated men than he composed the works which bear his name. See Geddes, Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. iii. p. 429. Most of his writings are supposed to have been produced by Jo. de Palanco, his secretary. See La Croze, Histoire du Christ, d'Ethiopie, p. 55, 271. His Spiritual Exercises (Exercitia Spiritualia), the Benedictines say, were transcribed from the work of a Spanish Benedictine whose name was Cisneros. See Jordan, Vie de M. La Croze, p. 83, &c. The constitutions of the society, it is said, were drawn up by Lainez and Salmeron, two learned men who were among his first associates. See Hist. de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome i. p. 115, &c.

shall at any time bid them; and they have no revenues, or are mendicants and live on the bounties of the pious. The others and especially the residents in the colleges have very ample possessions, and must afford assistance when necessary to the professors. If compared with the other classes, the professors are few in number, and are generally men of prudence, skilful in business, of much experience, learned—in a word, true and perfect Jesuits. The others are Jesuits only in a looser sense of the term, and are rather associates of the Jesuits than real Jesuits. The mysteries of the society are imparted only to a few of the professors, aged men, of long experience, and of the most tried characters; the rest are entirely ignorant of them.²

12. The Romish church, since the time it lost dominion over so many nations, owes more to this single society than to all its other ministers and resources. Being spread in a short time over the greater part of the world, it everywhere confirmed the wavering nations and restrained the progress of sectarians; it gathered into the Romish church a great multitude of worshippers among the barbarous and most distant nations; it boldly took the field against the heretics, and sustained for a long time almost alone the brunt of the war, and by its dexterity and acuteness in reasoning entirely eclipsed the glory of the old disputants; by personal address, by skill in the sagacious management of worldly business, by the knowledge of various arts and sciences, and by other means, it conciliated the good-will of kings and princes; by an ingenious accommodation of the principles of morals to the propensities of men, it obtained almost the sole direction of the minds of kings and magistrates, to the exclusion of the Dominicans and other more rigid divines;¹ and everywhere it most studiously guarded the authority of the Romish prelate from sustaining farther loss. All these things procured for the society immense resources and wealth, and the highest reputation; but at the same time they excited vast envy, very numerous enemies, and frequently exposed the society to the most imminent perils. All the religious orders, the leading men, the public schools, and the magistrates, united to bear down the Jesuits; and they demonstrated by innumerable books that nothing could be more ruinous both to religion and to the state than such a society as this. In some countries, as France, Poland, and others, they were pronounced to be public enemies of the country, traitors, and parricides, and were banished with ignominy.² Yet the prudence, or if you choose the cunning, of the association quieted all these movements, and even turned them dexterously to the enlargement of their power, and to the strengthening of it against all future machinations.³

² The general of the order held his office for life under certain limitations, was to reside constantly at Rome, and had a select council to advise him and to execute his orders. His authority over the whole order and over every person, business, and thing connected with it was absolute; nor was he accountable to any earthly superior except the pope. Over each province was a provincial, whose power was equally despotic over his portion of the society. He visited and inspected all the houses of his province, required regular monthly returns to be made to him from every section of the provinces of all that was transacted, learned, or contemplated, and then made returns every three months to the general. Every person belonging to the order was continually inspected and trained to implicit obedience, secrecy, and fidelity to the order. The whole society was like a regular army, completely officered, trained to service, and governed by the will of one man who stood at the pope's right hand. See the constitution of the society as published by Hospiusian, Historia Jesuitica, lib. i. cap. iv. &c. The secret instructions to the provincials and to subordinate organs and members of the society were totally unknown, for the most part, to any persons except those to whom they were addressed. The general rules and artifices by which individuals were to insinuate themselves everywhere, and obtain for the society dominion and control over all persons and transactions, were also among the mysteries of the society. Two copies of them however, the one larger and more minute than the other, entitled Privata Monita Societatis Jesu, and Secreta Monita, &c. were said to have been obtained, the first from a ship bound to the East Indies and captured by the Dutch, and the other found in the Jesuits' college at Paderborn. But the Jesuits have always and constantly denied their genuineness; nor have the world the means of substantiating their authenticity, except by their coincidence with the visible conduct of the Jesuits. According to these writings, which have been repeatedly published during the last two centuries, nothing could be more crafty and void of all fixed moral principle than the general policy of the Jesuits. See Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 647, &c.—Mur.

13. The pontiffs who governed the Latin or Romish church in this century, after

Alexander VI. [1492-1503], Pius III. [1503], Julius II. [1503], Leo X. [1503-1521], and Adrian VI. [1521-1523], who have been already mentioned, were Clement VII. [1523-1534], of the Medicean family;⁴ Paul III. [1534-1549], of the illustrious family of Farnese;⁵ Julius III. [1550-1555], who was previously called John Maria del Monte;⁶ Marcellus II. [1555], whose name before his pontificate was Marcellus Servin;⁷ Paul IV. [1555-1559], whose name was John Peter Caraffa;⁸ Pius IV. [1560-1566], who claimed to be a descendant of the Medicean family, and bore the name of John Angelo de Medicis;⁹ Pius V.

⁴ Clement VII. was a bastard, but Leo X. removed this stain by an act of legitimization. His political sagacity was such as would better have adorned the character of a minister of state than a minister of Christ. Civil history informs us on what principles he acted with the emperor Charles V. See concerning him, Ziegler's Historia Clementis VII. in Schelhorn's Amanitatis, Hist. Eccles. et Liter. vol. i. p. 210, &c. and Sarpi's Hist. du Concile de Trente, tome i. p. 61, &c.—Schl.

⁵ Respecting Paul III. there has in our age been much learned discussion between cardinal Quirini and several distinguished men, as Kiesling, Schelhorn, and others; the former maintaining that he was a good and eminent man, and the latter, that he was a crafty and perfidious character. See Quirinus de Gestis Pauli III. Farnesii, Brixen, 1745, 4to. [And Schelhorn's Epistola de Consilio de Emendanda Ecclesia, Zurich, 1748, 4to; Quirini, Ad Catholicum aequumque Lectorem Animadversiones in Epistolam Schelhornii, Brescia, 1747; Schelhorn's second Epistola, &c. 1748, 4to; Kiesling's Epistola de Gestis Pauli III. Lips. 1747. Concerning this pope in general, and respecting his views in regard to a general council, see Sarpi's Hist. du Concile de Trente, tome i. p. 131, &c. Thus much is clear from the discussions of those learned men, that Paul III. was an adept in the art of dissimulation, and therefore better fitted to be a statesman than the head of the church. His whole conduct in regard to the council forced upon him by the cardinals proves this. That in his youth he was a great debauchee, appears from his two grandsons, Farnese and Sforza, whom he created cardinals, and of whom the father of the first and the mother of the last were his illegitimate children.—Schl.

⁶ This was the worthy pontiff who was scarcely seated in the papal chair when he bestowed the cardinal's hat on the keeper of his monkeys, a boy chosen from among the lowest of the populace, and who was also the infamous object of his unnatural pleasures. See Thuanus, lib. vi. and xv.; Hottinger, Hist. Eccles. tom. v. p. 572, &c. and more especially Seldan, Historia, lib. xxi. folio m. 609.—When Julius was reproached by the cardinals for introducing such an unworthy member into the sacred college, a person who had neither learning, nor virtue, nor merit of any kind, he impudently replied by asking them, What merit or virtue they had found in him that could induce them to place him (Julius) in the papal chair?—Macl.

⁷ He reigned only twenty-two days. See Sarpi, rel. supra, tom. ii. p. 139.—Schl.

⁸ Nothing could exceed the arrogance and ambition of this violent and impetuous pontiff, as appears from his treatment of queen Elizabeth. See Burnet's History of the Reformation. It was he who, by a bull, pretended to raise Ireland to the privilege and quality of an independent kingdom; and it was he also who first instituted the Index of prohibited books, mentioned above, sec. 9.—Macl.

⁹ His family was very remotely, if at all, descended from the Medicean family of Florence. His character seemed to be totally changed by his elevation to the papal dignity. The affable, obliging, disinterested, and abstemious cardinal, became an unsocial, selfish, and ¹ Before the Jesuits arose, the Dominicans alone had the control of the consciences of the European kings and princes. But they were superseded in all the courts by the Jesuits. See Du Peyrat, Antiquités de la Chapelle de France, livr. i. p. 322, &c.

² Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome iii. p. 48, &c.; Bulgus, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. vi. p. 559-648, and in many other places; and a great number of writers, especially those among the Jansenists. [The Jesuits were expelled from France A.D. 1594, but permitted to return again at the commencement of the next century. They were expelled from Venice in 1606, from Poland in 1607, and from Bohemia in 1618; to the last-named place however they were allowed to return two years after.—Mvr.

³ It was under Lainez, the general of the order next after Loyola, that the spirit of intrigue entered freely into the society. Lainez possessed a peculiar craftiness and dexterity in managing affairs, and was frequently led by it into low and unworthy tricks. His ruling passion was ambition, which however he knew how to conceal from the inexperienced most artfully, under a veil of humility and piety. Under him the society assumed a graver and more manly character than under his enthusiastic and often ludicrous predecessor; and its constitution was a master-piece of artful policy, rendering it a terrible army, which dared to undermine states, to rend the church, and even to menace the pope. See the Versuch einer Neuen Gesch. des Jesuitenordens, vol. ii.—Schl.

[1566-1572], a Dominican monk whose name was Michael Ghislieri, a man of a sour temper and excessive austerity, who is now accounted by the Romanists a saint;¹ Gregory XIII. [1572-1585], previously cardinal Hugo Buon Compagno;² Sixtus V. [1585-1590], a Franciscan called Montaltus, [Peretti, R.] before he ascended the papal throne, who excelled all the rest in vigour of mind, pride, magnificence, and other virtues and vices; Urban VIII. [1590], Gregory XIV. [1590-1591], Innocent IX. [1591]; (these three reigned too short a time to distinguish themselves); [Clement VIII. 1592-1605]. Some of these were more and others less meritorious;³ yet if compared with most of those voluptuous pope. So long as the council of Trent continued, which he controlled more by craft and cunning than by direct authority, he was very reserved; but after its termination, he showed himself without disguise in his true character. This also may deserve notice, that this pope in the year 1564 allowed the communion in both kinds in the diocese of Mentz, which allowance also the Austrians and Bavarians had obtained of the pope. (Gudenus, Codex Diplom. Mogunt. tom. iv. p. 709). See Sarpi, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 183, &c.—Schl.

¹ Pius V. was of low birth, but had risen as a Dominican to the office of general commissary to the Inquisition at Rome. And as pope, he practised the cruel principles which he had learned in that school of cruelty. For he caused many eminent men of learning, and among others the noted Palacrus, to be burned at the stake; and he showed so little moderation and prudence in his persecuting zeal, that he not only approved of all kinds of violence and let loose his warriors on France, but also employed the baser methods for the destruction of heretics—insurrections and treason. Yet this method of proceeding had the contrary effect from what was intended, in France, in England, in Scotland, and in the Netherlands. That he also laboured to prostrate entirely the civil power before the spiritual, and by unreasonably exempting the clergy from all civil taxation greatly injured Spain, France, and Venice, may be learned from civil history. By his command, the Tridentine Catechism was composed and published. Clement X. gave him beatification, and Clement XI. canonization, which has occasioned many partial biographies to be composed of this pope.—Schl.

² See Maffei, Annales Gregorii XIII. Rome, 1742, 4to. [He was elected by means of the Spanish vicerey of Naples, cardinal de Granville, and was of a milder character than Pius V. Yet he openly approved the bloody massacre at Paris on St. Bartholomew's eve, and participated in a treasonable plot against queen Elizabeth. His idea of introducing his reformed calendar as pope drew on him obloquy from the Protestants; and his attempt to free the clergy from all civil jurisdiction, also from the French. He published the Canon Law improved and enlarged.—Schl.

³ Pius V. and Sixtus V. distinguished themselves above the rest; the former by his extreme severity against heretics, and by publishing the celebrated bull called In Cena Domini, which is [was, till the reign of Clement XIV.] annually read at Rome on the festival of the Holy Sacrament; and the latter by his many vigorous, splendid, and resolute acts for advancing the glory and honour of the church. The life of Pius V. has been written by many persons in our age, since Clement XI. enrolled him among the saints. On the bull, In Cena Domini, and the connexions it occasioned, Giannone has treated, in his Histoire Civile de Naples, livr. xxlii. chap. iv. tome iv. p. 248, &c. [and still more fully and circumstantially, the author of the Pragmatic History of this bull.—Schl.] The life of Sixtus V. by Gregory Leti has been often published, and in different languages; but it is in many parts who ruled the church before the reformation by Luther, they were all wise and good men.⁴ For since the rise of so many opponents of the Romish power, both within and without, the cardinals have deemed it necessary to be exceedingly cautious, and not commit the arduous government of the church to a person openly vicious, or to a rash and indiscreet young man. And since that period the pontiffs do not and cannot assume such despotic power of deciding on the greatest matters according to their own mere pleasure, as their predecessors did; but they must pronounce sentence ordinarily according to the decision of their senate, that is, of the cardinals and of the congregations, to which certain parts of the government are entrusted. Moreover, neither prudence nor the silently increasing power of emperors and kings, and the continual decrease of ignorance and superstition, will permit them to excite wars among nations, to issue bulls of excommunication and deposition against kings, and to arm the citizens as they formerly did against their lawful sovereigns. In short, stern necessity has been the mother of prudence and moderation, at Rome as often elsewhere.

14. The condition of the clergy subject to the Roman pontiff remained unchanged. Some of the bishops at times, and especially at the council of Trent, very earnestly sought to recover their ancient rights, of which the pontiffs had deprived them; and they supposed that the pontiff might be compelled to acknowledge that bishops were of divine origin, and derived their authority from Christ himself.⁵ But all deficient in fidelity. [Sixtus V. was a complete statesman, and possessing a high degree of dissimulation he could play any part; and instead of the fruitless attempt of his predecessors to reduce the heretics again to obedience, he endeavoured to increase his power by conquering the kingdom of Naples, by retaining the princes who were still in his interests, and by encroachments upon their power. The Jesuits for whom he had no partiality, hated him. The splendour of the city of Rome, the papal treasury, and the Vatican library, owe much to him. He likewise promoted the Romish edition of the Septuagint in 1587, and the edition of the Latin Vulgate, Rome, 1590, in 3 vols. fol. While a cardinal in 1580, he published at Rome the collected works of Ambrose, in 5 vols. See Walch's History of the Popes, p. 399.—Schl. [And especially Ranke, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 448, &c. See also the appendix to the third vol. p. 115, &c. where Ranke gives a full account of Leti's biography of Sixtus, of that by Tenpesti, and of certain manuscript lives and other materials for illustrating the policy of that famous pontiff.—R.

⁴ For further information on these popes of the sixteenth century, see Ranke's Popes of Rome, vols. i. and ii.—R.

⁵ Here may be consulted, Paul Sarpi's Historia Concilii Tridentini. [This celebrated history was first published in Italian at London, in 1619, under the assumed name of Pietro Soave Polano, an anagram of his real name, Paolo Sarpi Veneto, i.e. Paul Sarpi of Venice. An English translation appeared in 1629 but the best edition is that of 1676. It has also been trans-these attempts were frustrated by the vigilance of the Romish court, which did not cease to repeat the odious maxim, that bishops are only the ministers and legates of the vicar of Jesus Christ resident at Rome, and that they are indebted for all the power and authority they possess to the generosity and grace of the apostolic see. Yet there were some, particularly among the French, who little regarded that principle. And what the Romish jurists call reservations, provisions, exemptions, and expectatives, which had drawn forth complaints from all the nations before the Reformation, and which were the most manifest proofs of the Romish tyranny, now almost entirely ceased.

15. Respecting the lives and morals of the clergy and the reformation of inveterate evils, there was deliberation in the Council of Trent; and on this subject some decrees were passed which no wise man can disapprove. But good men complain that those decrees have to this day found no executor, and that they are neglected with impunity by all, and especially by those of more elevated rank and station. The lated into Latin, French, and German. It was epitomized by Jurieu in his Abrégé de l'Histoire du Concile de Trente, Gen. 1682, also translated into English, Lond. 1684. The papal party were compelled in self-defence to produce a counter-history in order to obviate the effects which this unsparing exposure of their corrupt intrigues at Trent had produced throughout Europe. A Jesuit of the name of Sforza Pallavicini was employed for this purpose; every facility was afforded him, and his Istoria del Concilio di Trento at length appeared in Italian at Rome, in 1656-57. It has not yet been translated into English, but French and Latin translations have appeared at different times. The student will see a most valuable critique upon these two rival histories, in the Appendix (section II.) to Ranke's Popes of Rome, Mrs. Austin's translation, vol. iii. p. 56, &c. A careful digest of the history of the council, taken from Father Paul and Pallavicini, may be seen in Du Pin's Noun. Biblio. des Auteurs Eccles. tome xv. Many public documents, state-papers, official letters, &c. connected with the council have been collected from various sources, and published by Le Plat, under the title of Monumentorum ad Historicum Concil. Trident. illustrandam, amplissima Collectio, Lov. 1781-87, 7 tom. 4to, but it does not contain the decrees or canons of the council. In addition to Fra Paolo or Father Paul's history above mentioned, the English reader may consult Geddes's Council of Trent no Free Assembly, Lond. 1714, 8vo, being a translation of the Lettres et Mémoires de Fr. de Vargas, &c. Amst. 1699, 8vo; Scott's Continuation of Milner's Church History, vol. II. chap. xlii.; Cramp's Text-book of Popery, second edit. Lond. 1839, which contains an exposition of the doctrinal decrees of the Council of Trent, mingled with historical matter. The student will find some additional information from unpublished documents, in Mendham's Memoirs of the Council of Trent, Lond. 1834, with Supplement, 1836; and still more valuable matter in Ranke's Popes of Rome, vols. I. and II. This careful and impartial historian thus speaks of Le Plat and Mendham: "Le Plat follows Rainaldus or Sarpi frequently word for word, and takes out of the Latin translations of their works what he cannot find otherwise authenticated. He has also used fewer MSS. than we could have expected. There is much which is new and good in Mendham, but he has not devoted sufficient study to his subject," vol. III. appendix, p. 81.—R.

German bishops, as every one knows, have almost nothing except their dress, their titles, and certain ceremonies, from which the nature of their office could be inferred. In the other countries very many of the prelates, with the tacit consent of the pope, are more devoted to courts, to voluptuousness, to wealth and ambition, than to Jesus Christ, to whom they profess to be consecrated; and only a very small number care for the interests of the Christian community, or of piety and religion. Moreover, those who are most attentive to these things can scarcely escape invidious remarks, criminations, and vexations of various kinds. Many perhaps would be better and more devout, were they not corrupted by the example of Rome, or did they not see the very heads of the church and their servants wholly devoted to luxury, avarice, pride, revenge, voluptuousness, and vain pomp. The canons as they are called almost everywhere continue to adhere to their pristine mode of life, and consume, often not very piously or honestly, the wealth which the piety of former ages had consecrated to the poor. The rest of the clergy however cannot at their pleasure everywhere copy after these preposterous moral guides. For it must be admitted, that since the reformation by Luther much more pains is taken than formerly to prevent the lower orders of the clergy from disregarding the rules of sobriety and external decency, lest their open profligacy should give offence to the people.

16. Nearly the same praise belongs to the monks. In most of the governors of monasteries there are things which deserve the severest reprehension; nor are idleness, gluttony, ignorance, knavery, quarrels, lasciviousness, and the other once prevalent vices of the monasteries, entirely expelled and banished from them. Yet it would be uncandid to deny that in many countries the morals of the monks are subjected to stricter rules, and that the remaining vestiges of the ancient profligacy are at least more carefully concealed. There have also arisen some who have laboured to restore the almost extinct austerity of the ancient rules, and others who have attempted to establish new fraternities for the public benefit of the church. Matthew de Baschi, an Italian, an honest but simple man, of that society of Franciscans who supposed they obeyed the precepts of their founder more religiously than the others, and who are commonly called Observant Friars (Fratres de Observantia), thought himself called by God to restore the institutes of St. Francis to their original and genuine integrity.

His design being approved by Clement VII. in the year 1525, gave rise to the fraternity of Capuchins, which experienced the bitter indignation of the other Franciscans, and exhibited a great appearance of gravity, modesty, and disregard for worldly things.¹ The fraternity derived its name from the cowl (caputium), a covering for the head sewed to the Franciscan coat, which St. Francis himself is said to have worn.² Another progeny of the Franciscan order were those called Recollets in France, Reformati in Italy, and Barefooted (Discalceati) in Spain; and who likewise obtained the privileges of a separate association distinct from the others in the year 1532, by authority of Clement VII. They differ from the other Franciscans by endeavouring to live more exactly according to the rules of their common lawgiver.³ St. Theresia, a Spanish lady of noble birth, aided in the arduous work by John de Matthia, who was afterwards called John de St. Cruce, endeavoured to restore the too luxurious and almost dissolute lives of the Carmelites to their pristine gravity. Nor were these efforts without effect, although the greatest part of the Carmelites opposed them. Hence the order was divided during ten years into two parties, the one observing severer and the other laxer rules. But as this difference as to their mode of life among members of the same family occasioned much animosity and discord Gregory XIII. in the year 1580, at the request of Philip II. king of Spain, directed the more rigid Carmelites, who were called Barefooted from their going with naked feet, to separate themselves from the more lax. Sixtus V. confirmed and extended this separation in 1587, and Clement VIII. completed it in 1593, by giving to the new association an appropriate chief or general. A few years after, when new contests arose between these brethren, the same pontiff in the year 1600 again separated them into two societies governed by their respective generals.⁴

17. Of the new orders which arose in this century, the most distinguished was that which proudly assumed the name of Jesus, and which has been already noticed among the props of the Romish power. Compared with this, the others appeared ignoble and obscure. The Reformation afforded occasion for various societies of what are called Regular Clerks. As all these professed to aim at imitating and restoring the ancient virtue and sanctity of the clerical order, they tacitly bear witness to the laxity of discipline among the clergy, and the necessity of a reformation. The first which arose were the Theatins, so named from the town Theate or Chieti [in the kingdom of Naples], whose bishop at that time was John Peter Caraffa, afterwards pope Paul IV. who, with the aid of Cajetan de Thienæis and some others, founded this society in the year 1524. Destitute of all possessions and all revenue, they were to live upon the voluntary bounties of the pious, and were required to succour decaying piety, to improve the style of preaching, to attend upon the sick and dying, and to oppose manfully and vigorously all heretics.⁵ There were also some convents of sacred virgins connected with this order. Next in point of time to them were those which assumed the name of Regular Clerks of St. Paul, whom they chose for their patron, but who were commonly called Barnabites, from the temple of St. Barnabas at Milan which was given to them in the year 1535. This fraternity was approved by Clement VII. in 1532, and confirmed by Paul III. in 1535. It honoured as its founders Antony Mavia Zacharias, a knight of Cremona, and Bartholomew Ferrarius, a knight of Milan, also James Antony Morigia of Milan. At first they renounced all possessions and property like the Theatins, living solely upon the gratuitous gifts of the pious; but afterwards they deemed it expedient to hold property and have certain revenues. Their principal business was to labour as preachers in reclaiming sinners to their duty.⁶ The Regular Clerks of St. Majoli, also called the Fathers of Somasquo from the town Somasquo where their first general resided, had for their founder Jerome Æmilianus,

¹ See Wadding's Annalis Ordinis Minorum, tom. xvi. p. 207, 257, &c. ed. Rome; Helyot's Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, tome vii. chap. xxiv. p. 264. And especially Boverius, Annales Capucinarum. [The founder of the order of Capuchins is not well known. Some give this honour to Matthew Baschi, and others to the famous Lewis de Fossembrun. Boverius supposes that Baschi devised the cowl, but that Fossembrun was the author of the reform; and he thence infers that his order was not the work of men, but, like Melchizedek, without father and without mother. The order had the misfortune that its first vicar-general Bernardo Ochino, and afterwards the third also, turned Protestants, which well nigh worked its ruin. Yet it afterwards spread itself over Italy, France, Spain, and Germany, with extraordinary success.—Schl.]

² See Du Fresnoy's Glossarium Latinitatis. Medii Ævi, tom. ii. p. 238, ed. Bened. art. Caputium.

³ Wadding's Annalis, tom. xvi. p. 167; Helyot's Histoire des Ordres Monast. tome vii. chap. xviii. &c. p. 129, &c.

⁴ Helyot, Histoire des Ordres Monast. tome i. chap. xlvii. p. 340, &c.

⁵ Helyot, ubi supra, tome iv. chap. xii. p. 71, &c.

⁶ Helyot, ubi supra, tome iv. chap. xv. p. 100. In this part of his noted and excellent work, Helyot with great industry and accuracy prosecutes the history of the other sects [of monks] which we have here mentioned.

and were approved by Paul III. in the year 1540, and then by Pius IV. in 1543.¹ These assumed the office of carefully instructing the ignorant, and especially the young, in the precepts of Christianity.—The same office was assigned to the Fathers of the Christian doctrine both in France and in Italy. A distinguished society of this name was collected in France by Cæsar de Bus, and it was enrolled among the legitimate fraternities by Clement VIII. in the year 1597. The Italian society owed its birth to Marcus Cusanus, a knight of Milan, and was approved by the authority of Pius V. and Gregory XIII.

18. It would occupy us too long and would not be very profitable, to enumerate the minor fraternities which originated from the perturbation excited in the Romish church by the [alleged] heretics of Germany and other countries. For no age produced more associations of this kind than that in which Luther with the Bible opposed ignorance, superstition, and papal domination. Some of them have since become extinct, because they had no solid basis; and others have been suppressed by the will of the pontiffs, who considered the interests of the church as retarded rather than advanced by the multitude of such societies. We also omit the societies of nuns, among whom the Ursulines were distinguished for their numbers and reputation.² But we must not pass over the Fathers of the Oratory, founded in Italy by Philip Neri, and publicly approved by Gregory XIII. in 1577, because they have had not a few men distinguished for their erudition and talents (among whom were Cæsar Baronius, and afterwards Odoric Raynald, and in our age James de Laderchi, the celebrated authors of the Annals of the Church), and because they have not yet ceased to flourish. The name of the sect is derived from the chapel or oratory which Neri built for himself at Florence, and occupied for many years.³

19. That both sacred and secular learning were held in much higher estimation among the Romish Christians after the time of Luther than before, is very generally known. In particular, the Jesuits boast, and not altogether without reason, that the languages and the arts and sciences were more cultivated and advanced by their society during this century than by the schools and by the other religious fraternities. The schools and universities (whether designedly or from negligence I will not say) were not disposed to abandon the old method of teaching, though rude and tedious, nor to enlarge the field of their knowledge. Nor would the monks allow a more solid and elegant culture to be given to their minds. Hence there is a great diversity in the Romish writers of this century; some express themselves happily, systematically, and properly; others barbarously, immethodically, and coarsely. Ecclesiastical history was a subject which Cæsar Baronius undertook to elucidate or to obscure; and his example prompted many others to attempt the same thing. This labour was rendered necessary by the temerity of the heretics; for they, with Matthias Flacius and Martin Chemnitz at their head,⁴ having demonstrated that not

¹ See the Acta Sanctorum, Februar. tom. ii. p. 217, &c.

² The foundress of this order was Angela de Brescia, an Italian lady of Lombardy, who belonged to the third order of St. Francis. In the year 1537, she thought herself guided by a revelation to form a new order of nuns for relieving the sufferings of mankind, and with a special view to confute the vulgar charge against nunneries, that they are mere houses of impurity. The name of Ursulines she borrowed from St. Ursula, a legendary British saint of the fourth or fifth century, who with her companions suffered death at Cologne, rather than allow their chastity to be violated. (See Baillet, Vies des Saints, tome iii. Octob. 21, p. 330, &c.) At first she proposed that her nuns should not be cloistered, but should reside in the private families to which they belonged, so that their devout and virtuous lives might be open to the inspection of all; but she afterwards allowed them to live in communities or nunneries. Their monastic rule was that of St. Augustine. They were to search out the afflicted and unfortunate, to administer to them instruction and consolation, to relieve the poor, to visit hospitals, and to wait on the sick, and everywhere afford their personal services to such as needed them. The foundress died in 1540. Cardinal Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, was a great patron of this order, which was first legalized by Paul III. in 1544, and afterwards by Gregory XIII. in 1571. It flourished much in the north of Italy, and was introduced into France in 1611, where it acquired a high reputation, and could soon number more than 300 cloisters distributed into several congregations. The kind offices of these sisters to all who needed their services, and their attention to the education of females, caused them to be held in high estimation. From France the order was extended to Canada and also to the United States, in both which it still exists and is in reputation. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit d. Reform. vol. iii. p. 503, &c. who refers us to Helyot, Hist. des Ordres, tome iv. p. 150-223, and to the Gesch. der Vornehmsten Mönchsorden, book vi. sec. 203, &c.—Mur.

³ Helyot, Histoire des Ordres, tome viii. chap. iv. p. 12. [Raynald's Annales Eccles. ad ann. 1564, sec. 5. The exercises in the Oratory were these:—When the associates were collected, a short time was spent in prayer, ordinarily silent prayer. Then Neri addressed the company. Next a portion of some religious book was read, on which Neri made remarks. After an hour occupied in these exercises, three of the associates successively mounted a little rostrum, and gave each a discourse about half an hour long on some point in theology, or on church history or practical religion; and the meeting closed for the day. See Baronius, Annales Eccles. tom. i. p. 555. Baronius was himself an early pupil of Neri, and succeeded him as head of the order.—Mur.

⁴ The former in the Centuria Magdeburgensis, and the latter in his Examen Concilii Tridentini.—[Matthias Flacius, after his removal from Wittenberg to Magdeburg, with the aid of the two Magdeburg preachers, John Wigand and Matthew Juxer, the jurist Basil Faber, and Andrew Corvinus, Thomas Holthuter, and others, published their History between the years 1559 and 1574, in thirteen volumes folio, each volume containing one century. Its proper title only the sacred Scriptures but also the voice of ancient history were opposed to the doctrines and decrees of the Romish church, prompt resistance became necessary, lest the ancient fables on which a great part of the claims of the pontiffs rested should lose all their credit.

20. The improvement of philosophy was attempted by several men of fine talents, both among the French and Italians, whose names have already been given. But their efforts were rendered ineffectual by the excessive attachment of the scholastic doctors to the old Aristotelian philosophy, and by the cautious timidity of many who were apprehensive that such freedom of thought and discussion might subvert the tottering interests of the church, and open the way for other and new dissensions. The empire of Aristotle, therefore, whose very obscurity rendered him the more acceptable, continued unshaken in all the schools and monasteries. It even became more firmly established after the Jesuits saw fit to subject their schools to it, and showed by their discussions and their books that the Aristotelian scholastic subtleties, equivocations, and intricacies were better suited to confound the heretics and to carry on controversy with some appearance of success, than the simple and lucid mode of arguing and debating which sound reason, left to herself, would dictate.

21. Of the theological writers in the Romish church during this century, a very large catalogue might be made out. The most famous and most competent among them were Thomas de Vio or Cajetan, John Eck, John Cochleus, Jerome Emser, Laurence Surius, Stanislaus Hosius, John Faber, James Sadolet, Albert Pighi, Francis Vatablus, Melchior Canus, Claud Espenceus, Bartholomew Caranza, John Maldonat, Francis Turrianus, Benedict Arias Montanus, Ambrose Catharinus, Reginald Pole, Sixtus Senensis, George Cassander, James Paya Andradius, Michael Baius, James Pamelius, and others.¹

22. The religion which Rome would have

¹ Concerning these and others designedly omitted, the reader may consult Louis Elies du Pin, a doctor of the Sorbonne, in his Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiast. tome xiv. and xvi. and the other writers of biography. [The following brief notices of the writers mentioned by Moshelm may not be unacceptable.

Of Cajetan, see above, p. 568, notes 3 and 4.
John Eckius or Mayer was born at Eck, a village in Swabia, A.D. 1483; was professor of theology at Ingolstadt, vice-chancellor, inquisitor, and canon of Eichstadt, and died 1543. He disputed and wrote much against Luther and the Protestants.

The real name of Cochleus was John Dobeneck, surnamed Cochleus from the Latinized name of his birthplace, Wendelstein in Nuremberg. He was a dean at Frankfurt, and a canon at Mentz and Breslau, and died in 1552; a most rancorous and uncandid opposer of the Reformation.

Emser was of Ulm in Swabia, and died in 1527. He was a licentiate of canon law, criticised Luther's version of the New Testament, and undertook to make a better.

Surius was a laborious Carthusian monk of Lubec, and died at Cologne in 1578. Besides his translations, he published four volumes of the Councils, and seven volumes of lives of the saints, and wrote a concise general history from A.D. 1500 to 1574, in opposition to Sleidan's Commentaries.

Hosius was of Cracow, and at his death in 1579, was bishop of Ermeland, cardinal, and grand penitentiary to pope Gregory XIII. He acted a conspicuous part in the council of Trent, was a manly opposer of the Reformation, and left works in 2 vols. fol.

Faber was a Swabian named Heigerlin, but was called Faber from his father's occupation. He was a Dominican, and opposed the sale of indulgences in Switzerland; yet aided the pope against the Protestants, and became bishop of Vienna. None of his writings are now read.

Sadolet was a mild, liberal divine, secretary to Leo X. bishop of Carpentras, and a cardinal. His works were printed at Verona, 1577, 4 vols. fol.

Pighi was a Dutchman, archdeacon at Utrecht, a mathematician, and a man of more reading than judgment, and died in 1542.

Vatablus of Picardy was a learned professor of Hebrew at Paris in the reign of Francis I.

Canus, a Spanish Dominican, professor of theology at Salamanca, bishop of the Canary Islands, provincial of his order in Castile, and died in 1560. His chief work was his Loci Communes, in twelve books.

Espenceus was a famous Parisian divine of great erudition, who died in 1571.

Caranza was a Dominican, confessor to Philip II. of Spain, to queen Mary of England, and to Charles V. also archbishop of Toledo; yet he was charged with heresy, suffered ten years in the Inquisition, and is, Historia Ecclesiastica per aliquot Studiosos et Pios Viros in urbe Magdeburgica, Centuria xlii. [and its compilers are usually known by the name of the Magdeburg Centuriators.—R.] A new edition was commenced in 1757, at Nuremberg; [but was carried only to the sixth volume in 4to. An edition with some abridgment was published by Lucius, Basil, 1624, 13 vols. in 3, large folio. This edition is most current among the Reformed, though disapproved by the Lutherans.—Mur.] Cesar Baronius, a father of the oratory [at the instigation of Philip Neri, founder of the society of the oratory], undertook to confute this work, which contained strong historical proofs against popery, in a work of twelve volumes folio, each volume likewise embracing one century. His work is entitled Annales Ecclesiastici, and was published at Rome between the years 1588 and 1607, and afterwards at Mentz with the approbation of the author. The latest, most splendid, and most complete edition was published with the corrections of Antony Pagl, a French Franciscan (entitled, Critica Historico-Chronologica in Annales Baronii, 4 vols. fol.), and the continuation of Odoor Raynald (in 10 vols. fol.), at Lucca, 1738-1756, in 38 vols. fol. These ecclesiastical annals are by no means impartial; yet they contain numerous documents which cast light on both ecclesiastical and civil history. Raynald's continuation reaches to the year 1565. James de Ladoch, likewise a father of the oratory, extended the Annals to the year 1572. The apostate Reformed, Henry de Sponde or Spondanus, bishop of Bamia, likewise composed a continuation of Baronius to the year 1640, in three volumes fol. So also the Polish Dominican, Abraham Bzovius, continued Baronius to the year 1572, in eight vols. folto; but he is the most faulty of all who have been named, both in respect to the matter and the spirit of his performance.—Schl. [On these works, their authors, and their various editions, the English reader may consult Dowling's Introduction to the Study of Eccles. Hist. p. 103, &c. though he is somewhat prejudiced against the Reformed compilers. See also Schroeckh's Kirchen-gesch. on the Centuriators, vol. i. p. 162, &c. and on Baronius, ib. p. 225, &c.; Sagittarius, Introductio in Hist. Eccles. sive Notitia Scriptorum qui Hist. illustrant. Jena, 1718, vol. i.; on the Centuriators, chap. xlii. p. 240, &c.; and on Baronius, chap. xiv. p. 282, &c.—R.]

men regard as the only true religion, and which she enjoins on all Christians universally, is derived, as all their writers tell us from two sources—the written Word of God and the unwritten, or the holy Scriptures and tradition. But as there are warm contests among the leading divines of that church respecting the legitimate interpreter of this twofold Word of God, it may be justly said that it is not yet clear whence a knowledge of the Romish doctrines is to be learned, or by what authority controversies on sacred subjects are to be decided. The Romish court indeed, and all who favour the absolute dominion of the pontiff, maintain that no one can interpret and explain the import of either divine word in matters relating to salvation, except the person who governs the church as Christ's viceregent; and of course, that his decisions must be religiously obeyed. To give weight to this opinion, first Pius IV. and afterwards Sixtus V. established at Rome the congregation styled the Congregation for Interpreting the Council of Trent (De Interpretando Tridentino Concilio), which decides, in the name of the pontiff, the smaller questions respecting points of discipline; but the weightier questions touching any point of doctrine it refers to the pontiff himself as the oracle.¹ But a very different opinion is entertained both by the greatest part of the French and by other men of great learning, who maintain that individual doctors and bishops may go directly to both sources, and from them obtain for themselves and for the people rules of faith and practice; and that the greater and more difficult questions of controversy are to be submitted to the examination and decision of councils. There is no judge who can terminate this controversy; and hence there is no prospect that the Romish religion will ever obtain a stable and determinate form.

23. The council of Trent, which is said to have been summoned to explain, arrange, and reform both the doctrine and the discipline of the church, is thought by wise men to have rather produced new enormities than to have removed those which existed. They complain that many opinions of the scholastic doctors, concerning which in former times men thought and spoke as they pleased, were improperly sanctioned and placed among the doctrines necessary to be believed, and even guarded by anathemas;² they complain of the ambiguity of the decrees and decisions of the council, in consequence of which controverted points are not so much explained and settled as perplexed and made more difficult;³ they died almost as soon as released, A.D. 1576. He wrote Summa Conciliorum et Decret. Pontificum.

Maldonate was a Spanish Jesuit, a distinguished theologian, and Scriptural expositor; born 1534, died 1582.

Turrianus was also a Spanish Jesuit, but of less talents. He died in 1584.

Montanus was a Spanish Orientalist, and editor of the Antwerp Polyglot Biblio. He also wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, and died in 1598.

Catharinus of Sienna in Italy was first a Jurist, then a Dominican, bishop of Minorca, and lastly archbishop of Conza in the kingdom of Naples. He wrote against the Protestants, commented on Paul's epistles, and died in 1563.

Cardinal Pole was of royal English blood, opposed king Henry VIII. in the matter of his divorce, and left England; but returned as papal legate on the accession of Queen Mary, was made archbishop of Canterbury, and died on the very day his sovereign died, A.D. 1558. He was learned, discreet, and inclined to moderation. His letters were published by cardinal Quirini at Brescia, in 1744.

Sixtus of Sienna was born a Jew, became a Franciscan, was accused of heresy, joined the Dominicans, and died in 1569. His Bibliotheca Sancta, or Introduction to Biblical Literature, is the chief foundation of his reputation.

Cassander was born on the island of Cassand near Bruges, and was a modest, ingenuous divine, who studied to bring the Catholics and Protestants to a better agreement, and incurred the ill-will of both. He died in 1566, and his works were printed at Paris in 1616, fol.

Andradus was a Portuguese theologian who attended the council of Trent, and attempted to vindicate its proceedings against Chemnitz's attack.

Baius was doctor and professor of theology at Louvain, chancellor of the university, general inquisitor for the Netherlands, and a strong adherent of the doctrines of Augustine, which brought him into difficulty, as we shall see presently in section 38 of this chapter. He died in 1589.

Pamelius was a modest and honest theologian of the Netherlands, whose father, Adolphus, baron of Pamele, was counsellor of state to Charles V. He died on his way to take possession of his new office of bishop of St. Omer, A.D. 1587. He edited the works of Tertullian and of Cyprian.—Mur.

¹ Aymon, Tableau de la Cour de Rome, part v. chap. iv. p. 282, &c. [This congregation affords the pope a fine opportunity to obtrude his court decisions on the Catholic world, under the pretence of the council of Trent. It is the duty of the cardinals to explain the language of the council only in doubtful cases; but they often extend the import of the words so far that the pope finds the way open to introduce new laws into the church. See Fabronius, De Statu Ecclesie, cap. v. sec. iii. no. 7.—Schl.] [The canonists long debated whether the decisions of this congregation formed a part of the ecclesiastical law of the Catholic church. Those who maintained that they were not law urged unanswerably that those decisions were not published; and that rules of conduct not made known could never be considered as laws by which men were to be judged. To remove this objection, in the year 1739 formal reports of the decisions of the congregation began to be published, reaching back to the year 1718; and the publication of these reports was continued to the year 1769, when thirty-eight volumes 4to had been issued, embracing all the decisions of importance from the year 1718 to the year 1769 inclusive.—Mur.]

² Such as, for example, Peter Lombard's doctrine of the seven sacraments, the necessity of auricular confession, the canonical authority of the apocryphal books, &c.; and by the anathema pronounced against the opposite doctrines, the reintroduction of these supposed heresies into the church and all attempts at a religious union in future are rendered impossible.—Schl.

³ The reader need only consult the second article concerning justification and free-will. The council here frequently expresses itself according to the views of Luther; but presently it takes back with one hand what it had given with the other. This arose from the disputes of the fathers in the council among themselves. The only way to quiet their contentions was to publish articles of faith so ambiguous that each party could construe them to agree with their own opinions. Hence it is that to this day the council is so differently inter-

complain that everything was decided in the council, not according to truth and the holy Scriptures but according to the directions of the Roman pontiff, and that the Romish legates took from the fathers of the council almost all liberty of correcting existing evils in the church;¹ they complain that the few decisions which were wise and correct were left naked and unsupported, and are neglected and disregarded with impunity; in short, they think the council of Trent was more careful to subserve the interests of the papal dominion than the general interests of the Christian preted in the Romish church. Hence the Spanish Dominican, Dominic Soto, wrote three books to prove that the council was of his opinion on the subject of grace and justification; while the Franciscan, Andrew Vega, whose opinions were very different, wrote fifteen to prove directly the contrary. So is it also in regard to the doctrine respecting the penitence necessary to repentance. The Jesuits say this penitence consists in an internal fear of God and a dread of divine punishments which they call attrition. Their opposers maintain that this is not sufficient, but that true penitence must arise from love to God and regret for having sinned against him. This dispute is not decided by the council, for one passage appears to deny what another asserts. And hence Launoi wrote a book, De Mente Concilii Tridentini circa Contritionem, Attritionem, et Satisfactionem, in Sacramento Penitentiae; and he there shows that the words of the council may be fairly construed as every one pleases. The doctrines concerning the church, and concerning the power of the pope and its limits, are for good reasons left undecided. So also the contested doctrines concerning the conception and birth of the Virgin Mary, and the real nature of the worship to be paid to images and to the saints. The doctrine respecting tradition is likewise made very equivocal and obscure.—Schl.

¹ No pope indeed was personally present in the council, but they still governed it by their legates. Nothing was permitted to be discussed without the consent of the legates; and no conclusion was made which had not been previously prepared and shaped in the particular congregations [or committees] in which the legates always presided. Hence the satirists said that the Holy Ghost (by whom, according to the court language of the church, such councils are always guided) was brought from Rome in a portmanteau in order to enlighten the fathers. There were in fact several intelligent and thinking men among the fathers of the council, but they were outvoted by the multitude of Italians and dependants of the pope.—Schl. (The person who made use of the profane metaphor alluded to in this note was Andrew Dudycz, at one time bishop of Tinja in Hungary and a member of the council of Trent, but who afterwards married and joined the Reformed church. He died in 1589. See more of him in Sec. iii. part ii. chap. iv. p. 705 below. In his oration to the emperor, Maximilian II. explaining his reasons for resigning his bishopric, he thus expressed himself respecting the management of that council: "Erant episcopi illi conducti perique, ut utres, rusticorum musicum instrumentum, quos, ut vocem mittant, infundere necesse est. Nil habuit cum illo conventu S. Spiritus commercii; omnia erant humana concilia, quæ in immodica, et sane quam pudenda Pontificum tuenda dominatione consumebantur. Cursabant Roman nocte dieque veredarii, omnia quæ dicta consultiue essent, quam celerissime ad Papam deferabantur. Illinc responsa tanquam Delphis aut Dodona, expectabantur; illinc nitrum Spiritus ille S. quem suis conciliis præesse jactant, tabellarum mantioles inclusus, mittebatur: qui, quod admodum ridiculum est, cum aliquando, ut fit, aque pluvialis excrebescant, non ante advolare poterat, quam inundationes desedissent. Ita fiebat, ut Spiritus non super aquas, ut est in Genesi, sed secus aquas ferretur." See Router's Orationes Dudithii in Concilio Tridentino habite, &c. Offenb. 1710, 4to, p. 40.—R.

church. And hence it is not strange that there should be some among the sons of the Romish church who choose to expound the decrees of the Tridentine council itself according to the sense of the sacred volume and tradition, and that the authority of those decrees should be differently estimated in the different Catholic countries.²

24. Recourse must be had to the decrees of the council of Trent, together with the brief confession of faith which Pius IV. caused to be drawn up, by all those who would gain a tolerable knowledge of the Romish religion. A full and perfect knowledge of it is not in this way to be expected. For in the decrees of the council and in the confession of faith above mentioned, many articles are so devoid of joints and nerves that they bend hither and thither; and they were designedly left in this flexible state, on account of the intestine dissensions of the church. Moreover, not a few things were passed by in both those works, which yet must not be denied nor even called in question without giving offence; and some things are there expressed better and more decently than daily practice and public usage authorise. Hence reliance must not always be placed on the language used by the council, but rather the import of that language must be qualified and measured by the practices and the institutions which generally prevail.¹ Add to these considerations that since the time of the council of Trent some of the pontiffs have explained more clearly and unequivocally, in their particular constitutions or bulls, certain doctrines which were stated less clearly by the council; wherein no one appears to have acted more audaciously and unsuccessfully than Clement XI. in his famous bull called Unigenitus.

² Some provinces of the Romish church, as Germany, Poland, Italy [and Portugal], have received the council of Trent and its decrees entire and without exceptions or conditions. But others only under certain limitations and conditions, would subject themselves to it. Of these the principal were the countries subject to the king of Spain, which were long in controversy with the Roman pontiff respecting the council of Trent, and at last embraced it with a salvo of the rights of the Spanish kings (Salvo Pægun Hispanie Juribus). See (Glanville, Histoire Civile du Royaume de Naples [livr. lxxiii. chap. iii. sec. i.], tome iv. p. 235, &c. Others again could never be induced to adopt it. Among these was France. See Masius, Dis. de Contemptu Concilii Tridentini in Gallia, which is one among his collected Dissertations; and Le Courayer's Discours sur la Réception du Concile de Trente, particulièrement en France, which is subjoined to the second volume of his French translation of Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, p. 775–789. Yet that part of the council which embraces the doctrines of religion was tacitly and by practice admitted as a rule of faith among the French. But the other part, which relates to discipline and ecclesiastical law, has been constantly rejected both publicly and privately, because it is deemed hostile to the authority and power of kings, no less than to the rights and liberties of the French church. See Du Pin, Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, tome xv. p. 390, &c. Hungary also is said to have never publicly received this council. See Samuelof, Vita Andr. Dudithii, p. 56. As for the literary history of the council of Trent, the writers of its history, editions of its decrees, &c. see Saig's History of the Council of Trent (in German), vol. iii. p. 190–320, and Köcher's Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolica, p. 325, 377, &c. [As to the reception of the council of Trent in Germany, it did not take place at once. The pope, Pius IV. sent Visconti, the bishop of Vintimiglia, to the emperor Ferdinand I. to persuade him to receive it. But the emperor consented only on two conditions:—that the pope should allow his subjects the use of the cup in the sacred supper, and should not debar the clergy from marriage. The same indulgence was craved by the Bavarians. Pius allowed the first but denied the second; and Ferdinand acquiesced, and received the council for himself and his hereditary dominions. The whole German nation has never received it; and the popes have never dared to submit its decrees to the consideration of the diet and to ask their sanction of them. This probably will have been the last general council of Christendom; for it is not probable that the opposing interests of the great, with good policy, will ever again allow of a general council, since the weakness and intrigues of such bodies have been so clearly exhibited by this. The popes would also show themselves not very favourable to another general council, since the right of summoning such a council to meet, and that of presiding in it, would be contested with them, and as so many appeals would be likely to be made to the proposed general council from their own decisions.—Schl.

25. To the correct interpretation and the knowledge of the holy Scriptures the Roman pontiff opposed all the obstacles in his power, from the time that he learned what very great damage and loss accrued to him from this source. In the first place disputants are allowed the shocking license of treating the Scriptures with contumely, and of publicly declaring their authority to be inferior to that of the pontiff and tradition. Next, the old Latin version called the Vulgate, though it abounds with innumerable faults and in very many places is quite barbarous and obscure, was by a decision of the assembly at Trent recommended as authentic—that is, as faithful, exact, and accurate, and therefore not liable to be impugned. How much this contributed to conceal from the people the true meaning of the Scriptures must be manifest. In the same assembly this hard law was imposed on interpreters, that in matters of faith and morals they must not venture to construe the Scriptures differently from the common opinion of the church and the consent of the ancient doctors; nay, it was asserted that the church alone, or its head and governor the sovereign pontiff, has the right of determining the true sense of the Scriptures. Finally, the Romish church has persevered in strenuously maintaining, sometimes more explicitly and sometimes more covertly, that the sacred Scriptures were written for none but the teachers; and in all places where it had the power² it has ordered the people to be restrained from reading the Bible.

26. For these reasons, the multitude of expositors who were excited by the example of Luther and his followers to engage eagerly in the work of biblical interpretation are for the most part dry, timid, and obsequious to the will of the Romish court. Nearly all of them are extremely cautious lest they should drop a single word at variance with the received opinions; they always quote the authority and the names of the holy fathers as they call them, and do not so much inquire what the inspired writers actually taught as what the church would have them teach. Some of them tax their ingenuity to the utmost to force out of each passage of Scripture that fourfold sense which ignorance and superstition devised—namely, the literal, allegorical, tropological, and anagogical. And with good reason; for this mode of interpretation is most convenient for artfully eliciting from the divine oracles whatever the church wishes to have regarded as truth. Yet we can name some who had wisdom enough to discard these vain mysteries, and to labour solely to ascertain the literal import of the Scriptures. In this class the most eminent were the following—Erasmus of Rotterdam, who is well known to have translated the books of the New Testament into neat and perspicuous Latin, and to have explained them in a pleasing manner; Thomas de Vio, or Cajetan, the cardinal who disputed with Luther at Augsburg, and whose brief notes on nearly all the sacred books are better than many longer commentaries; Francis Titelmann, Isidore Clarius, John Maldonate, Benedict Justiniani (who was no contemptible interpreter of St. Paul's epistles), John Gagneus, Claud Espenceus, and some others.³ But these laudable examples

² This could not be done in all countries. The French and some other nations read the Scriptures in their native language, notwithstanding the warm supporters of the Romish supremacy are bitterly opposed to the practice.

³ Concerning these, the reader may consult Simon's Histoire Critique du Vieux et du Nouveau Testament. [Titelmann was of Hasselt in the bishopric of Liege, a Capuchin monk, skilful in oriental literature, and died provincial of his order in 1553. He left many commentaries on the books of Scripture, particularly one on the Psalms which is not entirely useless. See Simon, Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test. livr. iii. chap. ix. p. 422.—Isidore Clarius (De Chiara) was bishop of Fuligno in Umbria, attended the council of Trent, and belonged to the Dominican order. He published notes on the Holy Scriptures, in which he attempts to correct the Vulgate. Simon, ubi supra, p. 320, expresses an unfavourable ceased to have influence sooner than might be expected. For at the close of the century there was only one in the university of Paris—namely, Edmund Richer, the celebrated defender of the Gallic liberties against the pontiffs, who investigated the literal meaning of the Scriptures; all the other doctors despised the literal sense, and in the manner of the ancients searched after recondite and concealed meanings.¹

¹ This is true, in a more especial manner, with respect to the canons of the council of Trent relating to the doctrine of purgatory, the invocation of saints, the worship of images and relics. The terms employed in these canons are artfully chosen so as to avoid the imputation of idolatry in the philosophical sense of that word; for in the Scripture sense they cannot avoid it, as all use of images in religious worship is expressly forbidden in the sacred writings in many places. But this circumspection does not appear in the worship of the Roman Catholics, which is notoriously idolatrous in both the senses of that word.—Macl.

27. Before Luther's time, nearly all the schools were occupied by the philosophical theologians, or what are called the Scholastics; so that even at Paris, which was considered as the seat of all sacred knowledge, persons could not be found competent to encounter our divines in reasoning from the Scriptures and the writings of the ancient doctors. And even in the council of Trent this extreme penury of dogmatic and biblical theologians often produced singular difficulties, as the Scholastics were accustomed to measure and define all doctrines according to the precepts of their lean and meagre philosophy. Pressing necessity therefore urged the restoration and cultivation of that mode of treating religious doctrines, which makes more use of the holy Scriptures and of the decisions of the fathers than of metaphysical reasoning.² Yet the Scholastics could not be divested of that ascendancy which they had long maintained in the schools; nay, they seemed to have acquired new strength after the Jesuits joined them and had decided that dialectics was more efficacious for confronting heretics than the holy Scriptures and the authority of the fathers. The Mystics, as they were not very offensive to the enemies of the church and were not much inclined to engage in controversy, lost nearly all their influence after the era of the Reformation. Yet they were allowed to philosophise in their own way, provided they did it cautiously, and neither attacked too freely the decrees and the vices of the Romish church, nor inveighed too vehemently against either the futility of external devotion or the metaphysical and polemic divines.

28. No one among the Catholics of this century improved practical theology successfully, nor could any one improve it without incurring the greatest opposition; for the safety of the church was supposed to forbid such attempts. And in reality many doctrines and regulations on which the prosperity of the Romish church depends would be brought into the greatest danger if Christian piety in its true nature were uniformly held up to the view of the people. On the other hand, many honest men and cultivators of piety, even in the Romish church, complain (how truly and justly in all cases I will not here inquire) that the Jesuits, as soon as they arose and began to have the ascendancy in courts and in the schools, first sapped the foundations of all correct practical theology by their subtle distinctions, and then opened the door for all ungodliness and vice by the lax and dissolute morality which they inculcated. This infection indeed spread unobserved in this century, but in the next it appeared more manifest and gave rise to the greatest commotions. The moral writers of the Romish church moreover may all be distributed into three classes—the Scholastic, the Dogmatic, and the Mystic. The first expounded the virtues and duties of the Christian life by knotty distinctions and phraseology, and obscured them by multifarious discussions; the second elucidated them by the language of the Bible and the sentiments of the ancient doctors; the third recommended exclusively withdrawing the thoughts from all outward objects, composing the mind, and elevating it to the contemplation of the divine nature.

29. Of the vast multitude of papal polemic theologians and of their capital faults no one is ignorant. Most of them were abundantly fraught with all that is accounted opinion of him, and pronounces him a plagiarist.—Benedict Justinianus (Justinian) was a Jesuit of Genoa, and died at Rome in the year 1622. He left expositions of Paul's and the Catholic Epistles.—John Gagnicus, a Parisian chancellor, published notes on the New Testament and a paraphrase on the Epistle to the Romans, of no great value. He died in the year 1549.—Schl.

¹ Baillet, Vie de Edmund Richer, p. 9, 10, &c. [Richer was an eminent theological writer, well acquainted with the antiquities of the church, and a bold defender of the rights of bishops against the pope. But he suffered persecution which ruined his health, and he died in the year 1631.—Mur.

² See Buleus, Reformatio Facultatis Theol. Paris. anno 1587, in his Historia Acad. Paris. tom. vi. p. 790, &c. In this reformation, the Baccalaurei Sententiarum are distinguished from the Baccalaurei Biblici; and what deserves particular notice, the Augustinian monks (Luther's fraternity) were required (p. 794) annually to present to the theological college a Biblical Bachelor; from which it may be inferred that the Augustinian family (to which Luther once belonged) gave more attention to the study of sacred literature than the other orders of monks. But as the above mentioned work of Buleus is in the hands of but few, it may be proper to quote the statute entire: Augustinenses quolibet anno Biblicum presentabant, secundum statutum fol. xxi. quod sequitur: Quilibet Ordo Mendicantium et Collegium S. Bernardi habeat quolibet anno Biblicum, qui legat ordinari, aliqui priventur pro illo anno Baccalaureo Sententiarum." It appears from this statute that all the Mendicant orders were bound, according to a decree of the college of theologians, to present annually a Biblical Bachelor (such as Luther was). Yet in this reformation of the college, the duty was required of none but the Augustinians. Who then will not make the inference that the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the other Mendicant orders wholly neglected biblical studies, and therefore had no Biblical Bachelors; and that the Augustinians alone were able to fulfil this statute of the Sorbonne?

criminal in those whose sole object is victory and plunder. The numerous Jesuits who took the field against the enemies of the Roman church excelled all the others in subtlety, impudence, and invective. But the chief and corypheus of the whole was Robert Bellarmine, a Jesuit, and a cardinal or one of the pontifical cabinet. He embraced all the controversies of his church in several large volumes, and united copiousness of argument with much perspicuity of style. As soon therefore as he entered the arena, which was towards the close of the century, he drew upon himself alone the onsets and the strength of the greatest men among the Protestants. Yet he displeased many of his own party, and chiefly because he carefully collected all the arguments of his antagonists, and generally stated them correctly and fairly. He would have been accounted a greater and better man, had he possessed less fidelity and industry, and had he stated only the feebler arguments of his opposers and given them mutilated and perverted.¹

30. The Romish community, though it proudly boasts of its peaceful and harmonious state, is full of broils and contentions of every kind. The Franciscans and Dominicans contend vehemently respecting various subjects. The Scotists and Thomists wage eternal war. The bishops never cease to wrangle with the pontiff and his congregations respecting the origin and limits of their power. The French, the Flemings, and others, openly oppose the Roman pontiff himself and his supremacy; and he inveighs against them as often as he deems it safe and necessary with energy and spirit, and at other times cautiously and circumspectly. As the Jesuits from the beginning laboured successfully to depress all the other religious fraternities, and also to strip the Benedictines and others who were opulent of a part of their wealth, so they inflamed and armed all the fraternities against themselves. Among these, the Benedictines and the Dominicans are their most virulent enemies; the former fight for their possessions, the latter for their reputation, their privileges, and their opinions. The contentions of the schools respecting various doctrines of faith are without number and without end. All these contests the sovereign pontiff moderates and controls by dexterous management and by authority, so that they may not too much endanger the church; to adjust and terminate them—which would perhaps be the duty of a vicegerent of our Saviour—he has neither power nor inclination.

31. Besides these minor controversies which have slightly disturbed the peace of the church, other and greater ones since the time of the council of Trent have arisen, chiefly through the influence of the Jesuits; which, being gradually increased and continued down to our times, violently agitate the whole Romish community and rend it into numerous factions. These indeed the Roman pontiffs labour most earnestly, if not to extinguish, yet to quiet in a degree, so that they may not produce excessive mischief; but minds, warmed not so much by zeal for the truth as by the heat of controversy and the love of party, will not coalesce and become united.

32. Whoever considers these controversies with attention and impartiality will readily perceive that the Jesuits—that is, the greater part of them or the fraternity in general, for in so very extensive a society there are those of different views—guard and defend that ancient and rude, but to the pontiffs and the church very useful, system of faith and practice which prevailed and was inculcated everywhere in the Romish church before the time of Luther. For those very sagacious men, whose office it is to watch for the safety of the Romish see, perceive clearly that the authority of the pontiffs, and the emoluments, prerogatives, and honours of the clergy, depend entirely on this ancient system of religion, and that if this was subverted or changed, the church must unavoidably suffer immense injury and gradually crumble to the dust. But in the Romish church and especially since the reformation by Luther, there are not a few wise and good men, who having learned very clearly, from the sacred Scriptures and the writings of the ancient doctors, the deformities and faults of this ancient and vulgar system of religion, wish to see it corrected and amended though in a different way, and who urge the extirpation of that mischievous darnel from the field of the church which has armed the heretics against her. And hence those eternal contests and collisions with the Jesuits on various subjects. All these contests however may be reduced to the six following heads.

There is a debate (I.) respecting the extent and magnitude of the power of a Roman pontiff. The Jesuits and their numerous friends contend that a pontiff cannot possibly err, that he is the fountain and source of all the power which Jesus Christ has imparted to the church, that all bishops and religious teachers are indebted to him for whatever authority and jurisdiction they may possess, that he is not bound by any enactments of the church and its councils, and that he is the sovereign lawgiver of the church, whose decrees no one can resist without incurring the greatest guilt. But others hold that he may err, that he is inferior to councils, that he is bound to obey the church and its laws as enacted by councils, and that if he offends he may be deprived of his rank and dignity by a council; from which it follows that inferior prelates and teachers receive the authority which they possess from Jesus Christ himself, and not from the Romish prelate.

¹ See Mayer's Elogia de Fide Baronis et Bellarmini apud Pontificia dubia, Amsterd. 1698, 8vo.

33. There is a debate (II.) respecting the extent and the prerogatives of the church. For the Jesuits and those who follow them extend wide the bounds of the church. They contend that many among those who have no connexion with the Romish worship¹—nay, among the nations which are wholly ignorant of Christ and the Christian religion—may be saved and actually are saved; they also hold that sinners living within the church are nevertheless its real members. But their adversaries circumscribe the kingdom of Christ within much narrower limits, and not only cut off from all hope of salvation those who live out of the Romish communion, but separate from the church all the vicious and profligate, though they live in it. The Jesuits, moreover, not to mention other differences of less moment, hold that the church never can pronounce an erroneous or unjust decision, either as to matters of fact or matters of doctrine and right (sive de facto, sive de jure); but their opposers believe that the church is not secured from all danger of erring in deciding on matters of fact.

34. There is a very warm debate (III.) respecting the nature, operation, and necessity of that divine grace without which, as all agree, no one attains to eternal salvation; respecting what is called original sin, the natural power of man to obey the divine law, and the nature of God's eternal decrees in regard to the salvation of men. For the Dominicans, the Augustinians, the followers of Jansenius, and likewise many others, deny that divine grace can possibly be resisted, that there is anything sound and uncorrupted in man, that there is any condition annexed to the eternal decrees of God respecting the salvation of men, that God wills the salvation of all men, and other kindred doctrines. On the other hand, the Jesuits and with them many others would have it believed, that the extent and influence of the sin which lies concealed in man's nature are not so great; that not a little power to do good is left in man; that so much divine grace is proffered to all men as is necessary for the attainment of eternal salvation, and that by it no violence is offered to the mind; that God has from eternity allotted eternal rewards and punishments, not according to his arbitrary pleasure, but according to the foreseen conduct and merits of individuals.

35. There is a debate (IV.) respecting various points of morality and rules of conduct, of all of which, as it would be difficult to enumerate particularly, and would besides be out of place here, we shall only state the commencement of the long controversy.² Those who side with the Jesuits maintain, that it is of no consequence by what motives a person is actuated, provided he in fact performs the deeds which the law of God requires; and that the man who abstains from criminal actions through fear of punishment is no less acceptable to God than the man who obeys the divine law through the influence of love to it. But this doctrine appears horrible to very many, who deny that any services are acceptable to God unless they proceed from love to him. The former assert that no one can properly be said to sin, unless he violates some known law of God, which is present to his mind and correctly understood by him; and therefore that no one can be justly charged with criminality and sin who is either ignorant of the law or doubtful as to its import, or who does not think of it at the time he transgresses. From these principles originated the celebrated doctrines of probabilism³ and of philosophical sin,¹ which have brought so much ill-fame upon the schools of the Jesuits. The adversaries of the Jesuits detest all these principles strongly, and contend that neither ignorance, nor doubts, nor forgetfulness, will afford any protection to the sinner at the bar of God. This controversy respecting the fundamental principles of morals has given rise to innumerable disputes concerning the duties we owe to God, to our fellow-men, and to ourselves; and has produced two sects of moralists, which have greatly disturbed and distracted the whole Romish church.

¹ They were accused at Spoleto in the year 1653 of having maintained, in their public instructions there, the probability of the salvation of many heretics. See Le Clerc, Biblioth. Univers. et Historique, tome xiv. p. 320.—Mack.

² No one has treated of all the points objected against in the Jesuits' moral doctrines with more clearness, neatness, and dexterity, and no one has pleaded the cause of the Jesuits with more ingenuity, than the eloquent and well-known Jesuit, Gabriel Daniel, in his Entretiens de Cécilia et d'Eudore, which is among his collected essays, tome i. p. 351, &c. and was composed in answer to that great man and powerful adversary of the moral doctrines of the Jesuits, Blaise Pascal, whose Lettres Provinciales inflicted so great a wound on the Jesuits. Daniel treats very acutely on probabilism, p. 351; on the method of directing the intention, p. 556; on equivocations and mental reservations allowed of by the Jesuits, p. 562; on sins of ignorance and forgetfulness, p. 719, &c. and on some other subjects. If the cause of the Jesuits can be defended and rendered plausible, it certainly is so by this writer.

³ Moral probabilism is properly the doctrine of the Jesuits, that no action is sinful when there is the slightest probability that it may be lawful, and even when it has the approbation of any single respectable teacher; because it may be supposed that he saw reasons for his opinions, though we know not what

36. There is a debate (V.) respecting the administration of the sacraments, especially those of penance and the Lord's supper. The Jesuits, with whom very many agree, maintain that the sacraments produce their salutary effects by virtue of the mere external act (ex opere operato) as the schools express it, and hence, that no great preparation is necessary to the profitable reception of them; that God does not require purity of heart and a soul filled with heavenly love in such as would derive benefit from them; and they infer of course that the priests should at once absolve those who confess their sins to them, and then admit them immediately to the use of the sacraments. Far different were the views of all those who had at heart the advancement of true piety. They thought that the priests should long and carefully try those who applied for absolution and admission to the sacraments, before they complied with their wishes; because these divine institutions profit none but persons who are purified, and filled with that divine love which casteth out fear. And thus originated that noted controversy in the Romish church respecting frequent communion, which in the last century Anthony Arnaud (Arnaldus), author of the celebrated book on frequent communion [De la Fréquente Communion], and the Jansenists waged with the Jesuits, and which in our times has been renewed by the French Jesuit Pichon, to the great dissatisfaction of the French bishops.² For the Jesuits are very careful to urge upon all who intrust the guidance of their minds to them the frequent use of the Lord's supper, as a sure and safe method of appeasing God and obtaining from him remission of their sins. But for this conduct they are strongly censured, not only by the Jansenists but by many other grave and pious men, who inculcate that the sacred supper profits no one, unless his soul is united to God by faith, repentance, and love; and thus they condemn the famous opus operatum [or efficacy of the mere external act of communion].

37. There is a debate (VI.) respecting the right method of training Christians. While those who are anxious to advance religion wish to have people imbued with a correct knowledge of it from their very childhood, they who look rather to the interests of the church recommend a holy ignorance, and think a person knows enough if he only knows that he ought to obey the commands of the church. The former think nothing is more profitable than reading the inspired books, and therefore wish to see them translated into the popular or vulgar language; the latter prohibit the reading of the Bible, and esteem it pernicious if published in any other than a learned language unknown by the people. The former compose various books to nourish a spirit of devotion and to dispel errors from the minds of men; they express and explain the public prayers and the solemn formulas of religion in a language understood by the community, and they exhort all to learn from these books how to be wise and to worship God rationally and properly; but the latter are displeased with all this, for they are apprehensive the more light and knowledge people have, the less obedience and submission will be found in them.³

² What we have said on the greater controversies in the Romish church may be illustrated and confirmed from numerous books published in the last and the present centuries, especially in France and the Netherlands. by the Jansenists, the Dominicans, the Jesuits, and others. Nearly all those who attack the doctrines of the Jesuits and other partisans of the Roman pontiff are enumerated by the celebrated French Jesuit Dominic Colonia; for it is ascertained that he composed the book published, without naming the place where, in the year 1735, 8vo, under the title, Bibliothèque Janséniste, ou Catalogue Alphabétique des Principaux Livres Jansénistes, ou suspects de Jansénisme, avec des Notes Critiques. His excessive zeal for the Roman pontiffs and for the opinions of the Jesuits impaired his discretion; yet his book is very serviceable for acquainting us with these controversies which so greatly disturb and afflict the Romish church. The book was condemned by the Roman pontiff Benedict XIV. yet it was republished not long ago in a new form and one-fifth larger, with this title: Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes, ou qui favorisent le Jansénisme, in four vols. Antwerp, 1752, 8vo. Undoubtedly the book is very useful for acquainting us with the intestine divisions of the Romish church, the religious tenets of the Jesuits, and the numerous books published on the controversies I have mentioned; at the same time, it is they were, and can see so many reasons for a contrary opinion.—Schl.

¹ Philosophical sins in opposition to theological, according to the Jesuits, are those in which a man at the time of committing them has not God and his law before his mind; and therefore, without thinking of God, transgresses natural or revealed law. These sins the Jesuits held to be venial; that is, such as do not draw after them a loss of divine grace, and do not deserve eternal, but only temporal punishment.—Schl.

² See the Journal Universel, tome xiii. p. 148; tome xv. p. 363; tome xvi. p. 124. &c.

38. Those of the preceding controversies which we have placed under the third head, namely, concerning divine grace, the natural power of men to do good, original sin, and predestination, actually exploded in this [sixteenth] century; the others were agitated more in private, and did not excite public notice till the next century. Nor will this surprise us, if we consider that the controversies moved by Luther respecting grace and free-will were not explicitly decided in the Romish church, but were in a manner hushed and concealed. Luther's doctrines indeed were condemned, but no definite and fixed form of doctrine, in regard to these subjects, was set up in opposition to them. Augustine's sentiments were also approved; but what the difference was between his sentiments and those of Luther was never stated and explained. The commencement of this sad controversy may be traced to Michael Baius, a doctor in the university of Louvain, no less eminent for his piety than for his learning.¹ As he, like the Augustinians, could not endure that contentious and thorny method of teaching which had long prevailed in the schools, and as he in following Augustine, who was his favourite author, openly condemned the common sentiments in the Romish church respecting man's natural ability to do good and the merit of good works, he fell under great odium with some of his colleagues and with the Franciscans. Whether the Jesuits were among his first accusers or not is uncertain; but it is certain that they were then violently opposed to those doctrines of Augustine which Baius had made his own. Being accused at Rome, Pius V. in the year 1567 in a special letter, condemned seventy-six propositions extracted from his books; but in a very insidious manner and without mentioning the name of Baius; for a recollection of the evils which resulted from the rash condemnation of

Luther was a dissuasive from all violent proceedings. By the instigation of Francis Tolet, a Jesuit, Gregory XIII. in the year 1580 renewed the sentence of Pius V.; and Baius subscribed to that sentence, induced either by the fear of a greater evil, or by the ambiguity of the pontifical rescript as well as of the propositions condemned in it. But others who embraced the sentiments of Augustine would not do so.² For to the present time great numbers in the Romish community, in particular the Jansenists, strenuously maintain that Baius was unjustly treated, and that the decrees of both Pius and Gregory are destitute of all authority, and were never received by the church.³

39. It is at least certain that the doctrines of Augustine in regard to grace were as much esteemed and defended in the Low Countries, and especially in the universities of Louvain and Douay, after this controversy with Baius as they were before. This appeared at once when the two Jesuits, Leonard Less and Hamel at Louvain, were found teaching differently from Augustine on the subject of predestination. For the theologians of Louvain and of Douay forthwith publicly disapproved of their sentiments, the former in 1587 and the latter in 1588. And as the Belgian bishops were about to follow their example and consulted about calling councils on the subject, the pontiff Sixtus V. interposed, asserting that the cognizance of religious controversies belonged exclusively to the vicar of Jesus Christ resident at Rome. Yet this crafty and sagacious pontiff prudently declined exercising the prerogative which he claimed, lest he should provoke a worse controversy. Hence his legate in the year 1588 terminated the disputes at Louvain by allowing each party to retain its own opinions, but absolutely prohibited all discussion respecting them either in public or in private. And the Romish church would have been more tranquil at the present day, if the succeeding pontiffs had imitated this prudence of Sixtus in silencing the disputants on the subject of grace, and had not assumed the office of judges in this dubious controversy.⁴ full of gall and unjust aspersions on many learned and excellent men.

¹ Michael de Bay or Baius, D.D. was born at Melin in the territory of Aeth in the year 1513, and educated in the university of Louvain, where he was elected in 1541 principal of a college, and in 1544 lecturer in philosophy. In 1550 he took his doctor's degree, and was appointed professor of the Scriptures. In 1563 he was sent by the king of Spain to the council of Trent, where he acted a conspicuous part. Soon after, charges of heresy were brought against him, which were renewed from time to time, notwithstanding his patient submission and silence, and must have given him much inquietude. Yet he retained his office through life and was even promoted, for he became dean of St. Peter's at Louvain and chancellor of the university. He died in 1589, aged seventy-six. Tolet, a Jesuit and his enemy, said of him, "Michaelis Baius nihil doctus, nihil humilis." His works, chiefly relating to the doctrines of grace, free-will, &c. were reprinted at Cologne, 1694, 4to. See Bayle's Dictionnaire, article Baius.—Mur.

² Here should be consulted especially, the Baiana seu Scripta quæ Controversias spectant Occasionis Sententiarum Baii exortus, subjoined to the works of Baius as a second part of them, in the edition of Cologne, 1696, 4to. Add also Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Baius, tome i. p. 457; Du Pin, Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, tome xvi. p. 144, &c.; Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome iii. p. 161, &c.

³ To demonstrate this is the professed object of the anonymous author of the Dissertation sur les Bulles contre Baius, où l'on montre qu'elles ne sont pas reçues par l'Eglise, Utrecht, 1737, 2 vols. 8vo.

⁴ See the Apologie Historique des deux Censures de

40. The Romish community had scarcely tasted of this repose, when new and far more terrible commotions of a similar nature broke out. Lewis Molina,¹ a Spanish Jesuit who taught in the Portuguese university of Evora, in a book which he published in 1588 on the union of grace and free-will,² endeavoured to clear up in a new manner the difficulties in the doctrines concerning grace, predestination, and free-will, and in some sort to reconcile the discordant sentiments of Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, the Semipelagians, and others.³ The attempt of this subtle author gave so much offence to the Dominicans who followed implicitly the teachings of St. Thomas, that they roused up all Spain, where their influence was exceedingly great, and charged the Jesuits with a design to recall and give currency to the Pelagian errors. As a general tempest was evidently gathering, the pontiff Clement VIII. in the year 1594 enjoined silence on both the contending parties, and promised that after examining carefully the whole subject, he would judge and decide the controversy.

41. The pontiff doubtless expected that the evil would yield to these milder remedies, and that time would calm the feelings of the excited parties. But his hopes were entirely disappointed. The exasperated Dominicans, who had long indulged great hatred of the Jesuits, did not cease to harass the king of Spain, Philip II. and the pontiff Clement VIII. until the latter, wearied with their importunate clamours, assembled a sort of council at Rome to take cognizance of the dispute. Thus in the beginning of the year 1598 commenced those celebrated consultations on the contests between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, which from the principal topic of controversy were called Congregations on the Aids, that is, of grace (Congregationes de Auxiliis, i.e. gratiæ). The president of them was Lewis Madrusius [Madrucci], a cardinal of the Romish court and bishop of Trent, with whom there were ten assessors or judges—namely, three bishops and seven theologians of different fraternities. These occupied the remainder of this century in hearing the arguments of the parties.⁴ The Louvain et de Douay, par M. Gery, 1683, 8vo. That the celebrated Paschasius Quesnellus (Pasquier Quesnel) was the author of this book, has been shown by the author of the Catéchisme Historique et Dogmatique sur les Controverses de l'Eglise, tome I. p. 104. Le Clerc, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Controverses dans l'Eglise Romaine, sur la Prédestination et sur la Grâce; in his Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, tome xiv. p. 211, &c.

¹ From him the name of Molinists down to our times has been given to all such as seem inclined to sentiments opposed to those of Augustine, respecting grace and free-will in man. Many however bear this name unjustly, as they differ much from the opinions of Molina.

² The true title of this celebrated book is, Liberi Arbitrii Concordia cum Gratia donis, Divina Pre-scientia, Providentia, Predestinatione, et Reprobatione, Lewis Molina. It was first printed at Lisbon, 1588, folio. Then, with enlargement, Antwerp, 1595, 4to, and at Lyons, Venice, and elsewhere. The third edition farther enlarged was printed at Antwerp, 1609, 4to.

³ The first congregation at Rome for examining the sentiments in Molina's book, in their third session, Jan. 16, 1598, thus state the fundamental principles of his work:—I. A reason or ground of God's predestination, is to be found in man's right use of his free-will. II. That the GRACE which God bestows to enable men to persevere in religion may become the GIFT of perseverance, it is necessary that they be foreseen as consenting and co-operating with the divine assistance offered them, which is a thing within their power. III. There is a mediate prescience which is neither the free nor the natural knowledge of God, and by which he knows future contingent events before he forms his decree. (Molina divided God's knowledge into natural, free, and mediate, according to the objects of it. What he himself effects or brings to pass by his own immediate power or by means of second causes, he knows naturally or has natural knowledge of; what depends on his own free-will or what he himself shall freely choose or purpose, he has a free knowledge of; but what depends on the voluntary actions of his creatures, that is, future contingencies, he does not know in either of the above ways, but only mediately by knowing all the circumstances in which these free agents will be placed, what motives will be present to their minds, and thus foreseeing and knowing how they will act. This is God's scientia media, on which he founds his decrees of election and reprobation.) IV. Predestination may be considered as either general (relating to whole classes of persons), or particular (relating to individual persons.) In general predestination there is no reason or ground of it beyond the mere good pleasure of God, or none on the part of the persons predestinated; but in particular predestination (or that of individuals) there is a cause or ground of it in the foreseen good use of free-will. From this statement of the fundamental errors of Molina, it would appear that he embraced substantially the leading principles of the Semipelagians and of the Remonstrants at Dort. His scientia media was a new name for a thing well known before. See Fleury's Histoire Ecclesiastique Continué, livr. clxxxiii. sec. v. vol. III. p. 273, ed. Augsb. and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iv. p. 296, &c.—Mur.

⁴ The history of these Congregations has been repeatedly written, both by Jesuits and by Dominicans and Jansenists. Among the Dominicans, Jac. Hyacinth Serris, under the fictitious name of Augustinus le Blanc, published his Historia Congregationum de Auxiliis Gratiæ Divinæ, Louvain, 1700, folio. In reply to him, the Jesuit Livinus de Meyer, assuming the name of Theodorus Eleutherius, published his Historia Controversiarum de Divina Gratiæ Auxiliis, Antwerp, 1705, folio. The Dominicans also published the work of Thomas de Lemos (a subtle theologian of their order, who defended in these congregations the reputation of St. Thomas [Aquinas] against the Jesuits), entitled: Acta Congregationum et Disputationum, quæ coram Clemente VIII. et Paulo V. de Auxiliis Divinæ Gratiæ sunt celebratæ, Louvain, 1702, folio. From these historians, a man who possesses the power of divination may perhaps learn the facts which occurred. For here are arrayed records against records, testimonies against testimonies, narrations against narrations. It is therefore still uncertain whether the Romish court favoured most the Jesuits or the Dominicans; nor is it more clear which of them most wisely and successfully managed their cause. There is also a French history of these congregations, written with ability; Histoire des Congrégations de Auxiliis, par un Docteur de la Faculté de Théologie de Paris, Louvain, 1702, 8vo. But being written by a Jansenist and a bitter enemy of the Jesuits, this work states everything just as the Dominicans would wish to have it stated. (Two of the continuators of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, namely, John Claude Fabre (a father of the oratory) and R. P. Alexander, a Barefooted Carmelite, have also given a tolerably full Dominicans most strenuously defended the opinion of their Thomas as being the only true opinion. The Jesuits, although they refused to adopt the sentiments of Molina as their own, yet felt that the reputation and the honour of their order required that Molina should be pronounced free from any gross error and untainted with Pelagianism. For it is common with all the monastic orders to regard any disgrace which threatens or befalls a member of the fraternity, as bringing a stigma upon the whole order, and they will therefore exert themselves to the utmost to screen him from it.¹

42. Of the multitude of vain and useless ceremonies with which the Romish public worship abounded, the wisdom of the pontiffs would suffer no diminution; notwithstanding the best men wished to see the primitive simplicity of the church restored. On the other regulations and customs of the people and the priests, some of which were superstitious and others absurd, the bishops assembled at Trent seem to have wished to impose some restrictions; but the state of things, or rather I might say either the policy or the negligence of the Romish court and clergy, opposed their designs. Hence in those countries where nothing is to be feared from the heretics, as in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, such a mass of corrupt superstitions and customs, and of silly regulations, obscures the few and feeble rays of Christian truth yet remaining, that those who pass into them from the more improved countries feel as if they had got into midnight darkness.² Nor are the other countries, which from the proximity of the heretics or their own good sense are somewhat more enlightened, free from a considerable share of corruptions and follies. If to these things we add the pious or rather the impious frauds by which the people in many places are deluded with impunity, the extreme ignorance of the mass of the people, the devout farces which are acted, and the insipidity and the puerilities of their public discourses, we must be sensible it is sheer impudence to affirm, that the Romish religion and ecclesiastical discipline have been altogether corrected and reformed since the time of the council of Trent.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE GREEK AND ORIENTAL CHURCH.

1. WHAT is commonly called the Oriental church is dispersed over Europe, Asia, and Africa, and may be distributed into three parts: (I.) That which is in communion with the Greek patriarch of Constantinople, and refuses the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff: (II.) That which differs in opinions and in customs, both from the Latin and the Greek patriarchs, and has its own peculiar patriarchs: (III.) That which is subject to the authority of the Roman pontiff.

2. The church which is in communion with the Constantinopolitan patriarch is properly called the Greek church, though it calls itself the Oriental church. It is moreover divided into two parts; one of which bows to the sovereign power and jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople, while the other, though it is in communion with him, yet will not admit his legates nor obey his decrees and commands, but is free and independent and has its own rulers who are subject to no foreign jurisdiction.

3. The church of which the Constantinopolitan patriarch is the head is divided, as it was anciently, into four great provinces, those of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; over each of which is a prelate of the first rank called a patriarch, whom all the inferior bishops as well as the monks honour as a father. Yet the chief of all the patriarchs and the supreme pontiff of the whole church is the patriarch of Constantinople, by whom the other patriarchs at the present day, though still elected, are designated or nominated for election and approved; nor dare they project or attempt anything of great importance without his sanction and permission. These well-disposed men however, though bearing the splendid title of patriarchs, are not able to attempt anything great as things are now situated, on account of the feeble state and the slender revenues of the churches they govern.

4. The jurisdiction of the patriarch of Constantinople extends widely over European and Asiatic Greece, the Grecian Islands, Wallachia, Moldavia, and many other provinces in Asia and Europe now subject to the Turks. The patriarch of Alexandria at present generally resides at Cairo or Misra, and governs the Christian and apparently a candid account of the proceedings in these congregations.—Mur.

¹ On this Molinist controversy see Ranke's Popes of Rome, vol. II. p. 303, &c.; Hallam's Introduction to the Liter. of Europe, vol. II. p. 105.—R.

² The French who travel in Italy often laugh heartily at the monstrous superstition of the Italians. And on the other hand, the Italians look upon the French who come among them as destitute of all religion. This may be clearly perceived, among others, from the French Dominican Labat's Travels in Spain and Italy; who neglects no opportunity of satirizing the religion of the Spaniards and Italians, nor does he conceal the fact that he and his countrymen were considered by them as very irreligious.

church in Egypt, Nubia, Libya, and a part of Arabia.¹ The patriarch of Antioch resides for the most part at Damascus, and governs Mesopotamia, Syria, Cilicia, and other provinces.² The patriarch of Jerusalem styles himself patriarch of Palestine, Syria, Arabia, the region beyond Jordan, Cana in Galilee, and Mount Sion.³ But these three patriarchs have very slender and poor dominions. For the Monophysites have long occupied the sees of Alexandria and Antioch, and have left very few members of the Greek church in the countries where they have dominion. And Jerusalem is the resort of Christians of every sect and doctrine, who have their respective prelates and priests, so that the dominion of the Greek patriarch there is confined within moderate limits.

5. The right of electing the patriarch of

¹ Of the patriarchate and the patriarchs of Alexandria, the Jesuit Sollerius treats professedly in his Commentarius de Patriarchis Alexandrinis, prefixed to the fifth vol. of the Acta Sanctorum. Mensis Junii, and Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 329, &c. Respecting their office, authority, and election, see Renaudot, Diss. de Patriarcha Alexandrino, in the 1st vol. of his Liturgie Orientales, p. 365. The Greek patriarch [of Alexandria] at the present day has no bishops subject to him, but only chorépiscope. All the bishops are obedient to the Monophysite patriarch who is the real patriarch of Alexandria. [A history of this Patriarchate from the Evangelist Mark to the present time has been recently published by the Rev. J. M. Neale, forming the first portion of a more extended work which he entitles, A History of the Holy Eastern Church, Lond. 1847, 2 vols. 8vo. This is a useful work, carefully compiled from the best sources, but sadly disfigured by the Romanizing tendencies of its author, apparently a minister of the English church.—R.]

² Concerning the patriarchs of Antioch the Jesuits have inserted a particular treatise in the 4th vol. of the Acta Sanctorum. Mensis Julii, which however is very defective. On the territory of this patriarch and other things pertaining to him, see Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 670, &c.; and Blasius Tertius, Siria Sacra o Descriptione Historico-Geographica delle due Chiese Patriarchali, Antiochia et Gerusalemme, Rome, 1695, fol. There are three prelates in Syria who claim the title and the rank of patriarchs of Antioch. The first is of the Greeks or Melchites (for thus those Syrian Christians are called who follow the institutions and the religion of the Greeks); the second is of the Syrian Monophysites; the third is of the Maronites. For this last also claims to be the true and legitimate patriarch of Antioch, and the Roman pontiff addresses him with this title. And yet the Roman pontiff creates a sort of patriarch of Antioch at Rome; so that the see of Antioch has at this day four prelates—one Greek, two Syrian, and one Latin or Roman in partibus as the term at Rome is. [This phrase is elliptical; entire, it is in partibus infidelium. Patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops in partibus infidelium, are those who are created for places which are at present under the power of unbelievers.—Schl.]

³ See Blasius Tertius, Siria Sacra, lib. ii. p. 165. There is also a tract of Papebroch, De Patriarchis Hierosolymitanis, in the third vol. of the Acta Sanctorum. Mensis Maii. Add Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 102, &c. [It is well known from other accounts that these patriarchs contend with each other about the limits of their respective dominions. Hence it should not be regarded as a historical contradiction, that the patriarch of Jerusalem should include Syria in his title while that province stands under the authority of the patriarch of Antioch.—Schl.] [This is a sufficient answer to Maclaine's criticism on this passage of Mosheim.—Mur.]

Constantinople belongs at this day to the twelve bishops nearest to that city; the right of approving the election and of imparting to the prelate authority to use his powers belongs to the Turkish emperor.⁴ But the corrupted morals of the Greeks and the avarice of the ministers who under the emperor manage their public affairs, if they do not entirely subvert, greatly impair the effects of these regulations. For the lust of pre-eminence leads many of the bishops to endeavour to obtain that patriarchal dignity by bribery which they could never attain by the suffrages of their brethren. Thus not unfrequently men regularly elevated to the office are deprived of it; and by the emperor's viziers that candidate is generally esteemed most worthy of the office who exceeds his competitors in the magnitude of his presents. Yet of late, things are said to be changing for the better, and the patriarchs are represented as living more securely than formerly, since the manners of the Turks have gradually assumed a milder tone. Moreover this patriarch possesses great authority among a people oppressed, and in consequence of their extreme ignorance sunk in superstition. For he not only summons councils, and by them regulates and decides ecclesiastical affairs and controversies; but by permission of the emperor he holds courts and tries civil causes. His power is maintained, partly by the authority of the emperor and partly by his prerogative of excluding the contumacious from the communion, which is a punishment immensely dreaded by the Greeks. His support is derived principally from contributions imposed on the churches subject to his jurisdiction, which are sometimes greater and sometimes less, according to the varying state of things and the necessity for them.⁵

6. The Greeks acknowledge as the basis of their religion the holy Scriptures, together with the first six general or œcumenical councils. Yet it is a received principle established by long usage, that no private person may presume to expound and interpret those sources of knowledge for himself, but all must regard as divine and unalterable whatever the patriarch and his assistants sanction. The substance of the religion professed by the modern Greeks is contained in the Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Oriental Church, which was first composed by Peter Mogilius, bishop of Kiow, in a council held at Kiow, and was afterwards translated from Russian into Greek, and then publicly approved and adopted by Parthenius the patriarch of Constantinople, and by all the patriarchs in the year 1643; and subsequently Panagioti, an opulent man and interpreter to the emperor of Turkey, caused it to be printed at his own expense in Greek and Latin, with a long recommendation by Nectarius patriarch of Jerusalem, and gratuitously distributed among the Greeks.¹ From this book it is manifest that the Greeks differ as much from the adherents to the Roman pontiff, whose tenets they often reject and condemn, as from other Christians; so that those are greatly deceived who think there are only slight impediments to a union of the Greeks with either the Romish or other Christians.²

⁴ See Eisner's Beschreibung der Griechischen Christen in der Türkei, chap. iii. sec. vi. p. 54, &c.; Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 145, &c.

⁵ William Cuper, a Jesuit, not long since composed Historia Patriarchatum Constantinopolitanorum, which is printed in the Acta Sanctorum. Mensis Augusti, tom. i. p. 1—257. Le Quen also in the whole first volume of his Oriens Christianus, treats very fully of the patriarchate and the patriarchs of Constantinople; and in vol. iii. p. 786, &c. he gives an account of the Latin patriarchs of Constantinople. [In the Turco-Grævia of Crusius, vol. ii. p. 105, &c. there is a history of the Constantinopolitan patriarchs from the year 1454 to 1578, written in modern Greek by Manuel Malaxi, with a translation and notes by Crusius.—Schl.] [See also a brief account of the power and revenues of the present patriarch, and of the names of the several sees under his spiritual jurisdiction, in Smith, De Ecclesia Græca Hodierno Statu, p. 48—59.—Mack.]

¹ Lawrence Normann caused this confession, accompanied with a Latin translation, to be printed at Lelpsic, 1695, 8vo. In the preface, Nectarius is represented as its author. But this is refuted by Nectarius himself in his epistle subjoined to the preface. Equally false is the statement, both on the title-page and in the preface, that the book was now printed for the first time. For it had been previously printed in Holland in the year 1662, at the expense of Panagioti. A German translation of it was published by Frisch, Frankf. and Lelpsic, 1727, 4to. Köcher treats directly and learnedly of this Confession in his Biblioth. Theologia Symbol. p. 45, &c. and also speaks with his usual accuracy of the other Confessions of the Greeks, ibid. p. 53. A new edition of the Orthodox Confession, with its history prefixed, was published by Hoffmann, primary professor of theology at Wittenberg, Breslaw, 1751, 8vo. Of Panagioti, to whom this confession is indebted for much of its credit, and who was a man of eminence and a great benefactor to the Greeks, Cantimiri treats largely in his Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, tome iii. p. 149, &c. [This Confession may also be found in Greek and Latin, in Kilmel's Libri Symbolici Ecclesie Orientalis, Jena, 1813, p. 45—324. This compilation contains four pieces—namely, the Confession of Gennadius, that of Cyril Lucar, the Confession referred to in the text, and that of the Greek Synod at Jerusalem under Dositheus in 1672; not one of which can be truly called a symbolical book, that is, one approved and sanctioned by the Greek church. The editor acknowledges this fact in the very first sentence of his Prolegomena:—"Non quidem ignoro, in Græca ecclesia libros symbolicos fuisse nullos, si eorum naturam et rationem ita circumscribamus ac definimus, quoadmodum ex nostre potestatum ecclesie consuetudine soliti sumus."—Yet though not strictly authoritative, these confessions are generally appealed to as satisfactory exponents of the faith of the Greek church.—R.]

² A full and accurate catalogue of the writers from whom may be derived a knowledge both of the state and the doctrines of the Greek church is given by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, vol. x. p. 441, &c. [To this list may now be added archbishop Platon's Present State of the Greek Church in Russia, or a Summary of Christian Divinity, &c. translated by Robt. Pinkerton,

7. This the Catholics have often experienced; and the Lutherans also found it so in this century, when they invited the Greeks to a religious union with them. First, Philip Melancthon sent a copy of the Augsburg Confession in a Greek translation by Paul Dolsci, accompanied with a letter to the Constantinopolitan patriarch, hoping that the naked and simple truth would find access to his heart. But he did not even obtain an answer.³ After this, between the years 1576 and 1581, the divines of Tübingen laboured to make impressions on the Greek patriarch Jeremiah II. both by letters and by sending him a second copy of the Augsburg Confession, together with Heerbrand's Compendium of Theology, translated from Latin into Greek by Martin Crusius. This attempt drew from Jeremiah some letters, written indeed in a kind and gentlemanly style, yet of such a tenor as clearly indicated that to induce the Greeks to abandon the opinions and practices of their ancestors would be a very difficult thing, and could not be effected by human efforts in the present state of that people.⁴

with a preliminary memoir on the ecclesiastical establishment in Russia, and an Appendix on Russian dissenters, Edin. 1814.—Mur. [Later intelligence, particularly on the state of the church in Greece, may be seen in Dean Waddington's Present Condition and Prospects of the Greek or Oriental Church, Lond. 1829.—R.]

³ See Loo Allatius, De Perpetua Consensione Ecclesie Orient. et Occident. lib. iii. cap. viii. sec. ii. p. 1005, &c. [Joseph, the patriarch of Constantinople, sent a deacon of his church named Demetrius to Wittenberg, to procure correct information respecting the Reformation of which he had heard reports. Demetrius, after half a year's residence at Wittenberg, returned to Constantinople in the year 1559; and by him it was that Melancthon sent the confession and letter to the patriarch. The letter may be seen in Hottinger's Historia Eccles. [Paris v. seu] secul. xvi. sec. ii. p. 51; and in Crusius, Turco-Græcia, p. 557. See also Salig's Gesch. der Augsb. Confess. vol. i. p. 721, 723.—Schl.]

⁴ All the Acts and papers relating to this celebrated correspondence were published in one volume, fol. Wittenb. 1584. See Pfaff's tract, De Actis et Scriptis Publicis Ecclesie Wittenberg. p. 50, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vol. x. p. 517, &c. and others; Schelstrate, Acta Eccles. Orientalis contra Lutheri Hæresin, Rome, 1739, fol. Lami also has much to say on this subject while treating of the Greek patriarch Jeremiah II. in his Deliciae Eruditorum, tom. viii. p. 176, &c.—[This correspondence with the patriarch was much facilitated by Stephen Gerlach, chaplain to David Unghad, the imperial German ambassador at Constantinople. Its commencement however was not in 1576, but two years earlier. Indeed some private letters were sent as early as the year 1573; for in that year Crusius wrote to Jeremiah by Gerlach, who also carried a letter of introduction to the patriarch, dated April, 1573. The public or official correspondence was commenced by Ja. Andreas, chancellor of the university of Tübingen, in a letter to the patriarch, dated Sept. 15th, 1574. The patriarch expressly declared his agreement with many articles in the Augsburg Confession, but he also declared his dissent from many others; for example, in regard to the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, justification, the worship of images, the number of the sacraments, &c. and he broke off the correspondence when the divines of Tübingen began to adduce Scriptural proofs respecting the disputed articles. See Schlegel's note here, and Schroeck's Kirchengeschichte seit der Reform. vol. v. p. 386, &c.—Mur.]

8. Ever since the greatest part of the Greeks fell under the hard bondage of the Turks, nearly all learning human and divino has become extinct among them. They are destitute of schools, and of all the means by which their minds might be improved and enlightened with scientific and religious knowledge. That moderate degree of learning which some of their teachers possess is either brought home with them from Sicily and Italy, to which they frequently resort and where some love of learning still exists, or it is drawn from the writings of the ancients and from the Summa Theologie of St. Thomas [Aquinas] which they have in a Greek translation.¹ Hence not only the people, but also those called their watchmen, for the most part lead licentious and irreligious lives; and what is much to be deplored, they increase their wretchedness by their own contentions and quarrels. Nearly the whole of their religion consists in ceremonies, which are in general useless and irrational. Yet in guarding and maintaining these they are far more zealous than in defending the doctrines which they profess. Their condition however would be still more wretched, if individuals of their nation, who are employed in the emperor's court either as interpreters or as physicians, did not check their contentions and still the impending storms by their wealth and their influence.

¹ Such is the opinion of all European Christians, both Catholics and others, respecting the knowledge and learning of the modern Greeks; and they support their opinion by the evidence of numerous facts and testimonies. But a number of the Greeks most strenuously repel the charge of ignorance and barbarism brought against their nation, and maintain that all branches of literature and learning are equally flourishing in modern as they were in ancient Greece. The most distinguished of these vindicators of the modern Greeks is Demetrius Cantimir, in his Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, tome ii. p. 38, &c. To prove that it is a gross mistake to represent modern Greece as the seat of barbarism, he gives a catalogue of learned Greeks in the preceding century; and states that an academy had been founded at Constantinople by a Greek named Monolax, in which persons very learned in the ancient Greek teach with success and applause all branches of philosophy, as well as the other arts and sciences. These things are undoubtedly true; but they only show that in this very widely-extended nation, and which embraces many ancient, noble, and opulent families, there is not an entire destitution of literary and scientific men. And this fact was never called in question; but it does not prove that the nation at large is rich in the liberal arts, and in secular and religious learning. For a people generally barbarous may still contain a small number of learned men. Moreover, this academy at Constantinople is unquestionably a recent institution, and therefore it confirms rather than confutes the opinion of the other Christians respecting the learning of the Greeks. (What is said above of the want of schools among the Greeks must undoubtedly be understood of colleges and higher schools, and not of the inferior and monastic schools. For that the Greeks of the sixteenth century had schools of the latter description, is clearly to be seen from Crusius Turco-Græcia.—Schl.)

9. The Russians, the Georgians or Iberians, and the Colchians or Mingrelians, all embrace the doctrines and rites of the Greeks, yet are independent or not subject to the authority of the patriarch of Constantinople. The Russians indeed formerly received their chief prelate at the hand of the Constantinopolitan patriarch. But towards the close of this century, when the Constantinopolitan patriarch Jeremiah II. made a journey to Muscovy, in order to raise money there with which he might drive Metrophanes, his rival, from the see of Constantinople, the Muscovite monks, by direction undoubtedly of the grand-duke Theodore, son of John Basilides, beset him with entreaties and menaces to place over the whole Russian nation a patriarch, who should be independent or αυτοκράτορας as the Greeks express it. Jeremiah was obliged to consent; and in a council assembled at Moscow in the year 1589, he proclaimed Job, the archbishop of Rostow, first patriarch of the Russians; yet under these conditions, that in future every new patriarch should apply to the patriarch of Constantinople for his consent and suffrage, and at stated periods should pay to him five hundred Russian ducats. The transactions of the council of Moscow were afterwards, in the year 1593, confirmed in a council at Constantinople called by the same Jeremiah with the consent of the Turkish emperor.² And a little past the middle of the next century, Dionysius being patriarch of Constantinople, all the four Oriental patriarchs again conceded to the grand-duke of Muscovy, that the patriarch of Moscow should be exonerated from the tribute, and from applying for the confirmation of his election and consecration.³

10. The Georgians and Mingrelians, or as they were anciently called, the Iberians and Colchians, are so fallen since the Mohammedans obtained dominion over those countries, that they can scarcely be numbered among the Christian nations. This is more true however of the Colchians,

² See Possevin's Moscovia, near the beginning; Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 1292; and the Narrative of this transaction by the patriarch Jeremiah II. himself, published in the Catalogus Codic. MSS. Biblioth. Turinensis, p. 433-469.

³ Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 155, &c.; Bergius, De Ecclesia Moscovitica, par. i. sec. i. cap. xviii. p. 164, &c. (For an account of the Russian Greek Church, see Mouravieff's History of the Church of Russia, translated from the Russian by the Rev. R. W. Blackmore, Oxford, 1842. This work contains an account of the introduction of the gospel into this vast empire, and brings the history down to the institution of the Synod as the supreme governing body of the church in lieu of the Patriarch, which took place in the year 1721.—R.)

who inhabit the woods and the mountains almost in the manner of wild beasts, than it is of the Iberians, among whom there are some slight remains of civilization and piety. These nations have a patriarch whom they style a Catholicus, and also bishops and priests; but these are extremely ignorant, vicious, sordid, and worse almost than the common people, and as they know not themselves what is to be believed, they never think of instructing others. Hence it is rather to be conjectured than positively known, that the Colchians and Iberians at the present day do not embrace either the sentiments of the Monophysites or of the Nestorians, but rather hold the same doctrines with the Greeks. What little religion remains among them consists wholly in their feasts and their ceremonies; and even these are destitute of all gravity and decorum, so that it is hard to say whether their priests appear most solemn when eating and drinking and sleeping, or when administering baptism and the Lord's supper.¹

11. The Christians of the East, who have renounced the communion of the Greeks and who differ from them both in doctrine and in rites, are of two kinds. The one contend that in our most holy Saviour there is but one nature, the other conceive that there are two persons in him. The former are called Monophysites and also Jacobites from Jacobus Baradaeus, who resuscitated and regulated this sect in the sixth century when it was nearly extinct.² The latter are called Nestorians, because they agree in sentiment with Nestorius, and also Chaldeans, from the country in which they principally reside. The Monophysites are again divided into those of Asia and those of Africa. The head of the Asiatic Monophysites is the patriarch of Antioch, who resides generally in the monastery of St. Ananias, now called the Zapharanensian monastery, not far from the city of Marde; but sometimes at Amida, Marde (which is properly his episcopal seat), Aleppo, or other cities in Syria.³ As he cannot alone govern conveniently this very extensive community over which he presides, he has an associate in the government to whose care are entrusted the eastern churches situated beyond the Tigris. This assistant is called the Maphrian or primate of the East; and he formerly resided at Tagrit on the borders of Armenia, but now resides in the monastery of St. Matthew, near Mosul in Mesopotamia.⁴ At this day all patriarchs of the Monophysites assume the name of Ignatius.

12. The African Monophysites are subject to the patriarch of Alexandria, who commonly resides at Cairo, and are divisible into the Copts and the Abyssinians. The Copts are those Christians who inhabit Egypt, Nubia, and the adjacent regions. Being oppressed by the power and the insatiable avarice of the Turks, they have to contend with extreme poverty, and have not the means of supporting their patriarch and bishops; yet these obtain a scanty living from such Copts as are taken into the families of the principal men among the Mohammedans, on account of their skill in domestic affairs and other useful arts, of which the Turks are ignorant.⁵ The Abyssinians, though far superior to the Copts in numbers, power, and worldly circumstances, since their emperor is himself a Christian, yet reverence the patriarch of Alexandria as their spiritual father, and do not create their own chief bishop, but always allow a primate, styled by them Abuna, to be placed over them by the Alexandrine patriarch.⁶

¹ See Galanus, Conciliatio Ecclesie Armenae cum Romana, tom. i. p. 156, &c.; Chardin, Voyages en Perse et autres lieux de l'Orient, tome i. p. 67, &c. containing Zampi's Relation de la Colchide et Mingrellie. Add Archangel Lambert's Relation de la Colchide ou Mingrellie, which is in the Recueil des Voyages au Nord, tome vii. p. 160; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 1333, 1339, &c. Yet consult also Simon's Histoire Critique des Dogmes et Cérémonies des Chrétiens Orientaux, chap. v. vi. p. 71, &c. who endeavours [and not unsuccessfully—Mur] to wipe off some of the infamy cast upon the Georgians and Mingrelians. The Catholic of Georgia and Mingrelia are at this day ἀντοκεφάλαι or independent; yet they pay tribute to the patriarch of Constantinople. [Their priests read the whole baptismal service through, and then apply the water without repeating the words requisite. They consecrate the eucharist in wooden chalices, care not if crumbs fall on the ground, put the host into leather bags and tie them to their girdles, send it by laymen to the sick, and do not accompany it with wax candles, processions, &c. Such are the indecorums complained of by the popish writers.—Mur.]

² We commonly use the name Jacobites in a broad sense as including all the Monophysites except the Armenians; but it properly belongs only to those Asiatic Monophysites of whom Jacobus Baradaeus was the head and father. See Simon's Histoire des Chrétiens Orientaux, chap. ix. p. 118, whose narrative however needs many corrections.

³ See Asseman's Dissertatio de Monophysitis, sec. viii. &c. In the second volume of his Bibliotheca Orientalis, Patriarcha Nalron's Enoplia Fidei Catholicae ex Syrorum Monumentis, par. i. p. 40, &c.; Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 1319, &c.

⁴ Asseman's Diss. de Monophysitis, sec. viii. &c.

⁵ Renaudot published at Paris, 1713, in 4to, his very learned Historia Alexandrinorum Patriarcharum Jacobitarum. He also published Officium Ordinationis hujus Patriarchae, with notes, in his Liturgie Oriental. tom. i. p. 467. The state and internal condition of the Alexandrine or Coptic church are described by Vansleb, in his Histoire de l'Eglise d'Alexandrie, que nous appelons celle des Jacobites-Coptes, Paris, 1667, 8vo. Add his Relation d'un Voyage en Egypte, p. 293, &c. where he treats expressly of the monks and monasteries of the Copts. Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus dans le Levant, tome ii. p. 9, &c. tome v. p. 122; Maillet's Description de l'Egypte, tome ii. p. 64, &c.

⁶ See Ludolf's Comment. in Historiam Aethiopicam, p. 451, 461, 466; Lobo's Voyage d'Abissinie, tome ii. p. 36; Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions dans le Levant.

13. The Monophysites differ in many points both of doctrine and of rites from the Greeks, the Latins, and other Christians; but the principal ground of their separation from other Christians lies in their opinion concerning Jesus Christ our Saviour. With Dioscorus, Barsumas, Xenaias, Fullo, and others whom they regard as the founders and lights of their sect, they believe that the divine and human natures in Christ so coalesce as to become one; and therefore they reject the decrees of the council of Chalcedon and the noted epistle of Leo the Great. Yet to avoid the appearance of following Eutyches, with whom they profess to have no connexion, they cautiously define their doctrine, and denying all confusion and intermixture of the two natures represent the nature of Christ as being indeed one, yet at the same time compound and double.¹ And this explanation shows us it is no rash opinion of some very learned men, that the Monophysites differ from the Greeks and Latins more in words than in substance.² The modern Jacobites both of Asia and Africa are in general so ignorant and illiterate, that they defend their distinguishing doctrine rather by blind pertinacity and the authority of their fathers than by rational arguments.³

14. The Armenians, though they maintain the same opinions with the other Monophysites respecting [the nature of] our Saviour, yet differ from them as to many practices, opinions, and rites; and hence there is no communion between them and those who are appropriately called Jacobites.⁴ The whole Armenian church is governed by three patriarchs. The chief of these who governs the whole of the greater Armenia and the neighbouring provinces has forty-two archbishops under him, and resides in a monastery at Echmiazin. He might, if he were disposed, live splendidly and luxuriously on the very ample revenues he receives;⁵ but he is frugal in his table and plain in his dress, nor is he distinguished from the monks among whom he resides except by his power. He is usually elected by the suffrages of the bishops assembled at Echmiazin, and is approved by the king of Persia. The second patriarch or catholicus of the Armenians resides at Sisi, a city of Cilicia, and governs the churches in Cappadocia, Cilicia, Cyprus, and Syria. He has twelve archbishops under him. This patriarch of Sisi at present acknowledges himself inferior to the patriarch at Echmiazin. The third and least of their patriarchs, who has only eight or nine bishops under him, resides on the island of Aghtamar in the middle of the great lake Varaspuracan, and is accounted by the other Armenians an enemy of the church. Besides these who are properly and truly called patriarchs, there are others among the Armenians who are patriarchs in name only, rather than in reality and in power. For the Armenian archbishop residing at Constantinople, whose authority is acknowledged by the churches in the neighbouring regions of Asia and Europe, is called a patriarch. So also the Armenian prelate at Jerusalem is saluted with the same title; and likewise the prelate who resides at Kaminnec in [Russian] Poland, and who governs the Armenian churches in Russia, Poland, and the neighbouring countries. And these claim the title and the rank of patriarchs, because they have received from the great patriarch of Echmiazin the power of ordaining bishops, and of consecrating and distributing every third year among their churches the sacred chrism or tome iv. p. 277; Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 641, &c.

¹ Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vaticana, tom. ii. p. 25, 26, 29, 34, 117, 133, 135, 277, 297, &c. See the acute defence of the doctrine of his sect by Abulpharajus, ibid. tom. ii. p. 288, &c. The System of religion embraced by the Abyssinians in particular may be best learned in all its parts from the Theologia Ethiopica of Gregory the Ethiopian, published by Fabricius in his Lux Evangelii toti orbi æthiopiæ, p. 715, where also the other writers concerning the Abyssinians are enumerated.

² La Croze, Histoire du Christianisme des Indes, p. 23; Asseman, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 291, 297; Simon, Histoire des Chrétiens Orientaux, p. 119; Schröder, Theaurus Lingue Armenicæ, p. 276.

³ The Liturgies of the Copts, the Syrian Jacobites, and the Abyssinians, have been published with learned notes by Eusebium Renaudot, in the first and second volumes of his Liturgia Orientales.

⁴ The chief writer concerning the Armenians, as well in regard to their religion as other matters, is Clemens Galenus, an Italian Theatine monk, whose Concilio Ecclésiæ Armenicæ cum Romana, was published at Rome, 1650, &c. in 3 vols. fol. The other writers are mentioned by Fabricius in his Lux Evangelii toti orbi æthiopiæ, cap. xxxviii. p. 640, &c. To his list must especially be added Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 1362, &c. The recent Histoire du Christianisme d'Arménie, by La Croze, subjoined to his Histoire du Christianisme d'Abissinie, Hague, 1739, 8vo, does not correspond with the magnitude and importance of the subject. A far better account would have been given by this gentleman who was so well informed on such subjects, if he had not been labouring under the infirmities of age. Respecting the singular customs and rites of the Armenians, see Gemellus Carreri, Voyage du Tour du Monde, tome ii. p. 146, &c.

⁵ A notice of all the churches subject to the chief patriarch of the Armenians, as communicated by Uschan, an Armenian bishop, is subjoined by Simon to his Histoire Critique des Chrétiens Orientaux, p. 217 [in the English translation, by A. Lovell, Lond. 1685, p. 184, &c.] But we have noticed many defects in it. Respecting the seat and the mode of life of the patriarch of Echmiazin, see Lucas, Voyage au Levant, tome ii. p. 347, and Carreri, Voyage du Tour du Monde, tome ii. p. 10, &c. See also the other travellers in Armenia and Persia.

ointment, which none but patriarchs among the Oriental Christians have a right to do.¹

15. The Nestorians, who are also called Chaldeans, reside principally in Mesopotamia and the adjacent countries. These Christians have many doctrines and customs peculiar to themselves; but they are chiefly distinguished from all other sects by maintaining that Nestorius was unjustly condemned in the council of Ephesus, and by holding with him that there were not only two natures, but also two persons in our Saviour. In ancient times this was regarded as a capital error; at this day it is considered by the most respectable men even among the Roman Catholics as an error in words rather than in thought. For these Chaldeans affirm indeed that Christ consists of two persons as well as two natures, but they add that these two persons and natures are so closely united as to constitute one aspect, or, as they express it, one barsopa; which is the same with the Greek πρόσωπον [person].² From which it appears clearly that by aspect they mean the same as we do by person, and that what we call natures they call persons. It is to the honour of this sect that, of all the Christians resident in the East, they have preserved themselves the most free from the innumerable superstitions which have found their way into the Greek and Latin churches.³

16. Formerly all the Nestorians were subject to one patriarch or catholicus, who resided first at Bagdat and then at Mosul. But in this [sixteenth] century they became divided into two parties. In the first place, as we have already noticed, in the year 1552 two patriarchs were elected by opposite factions, Simeon Barmama and John Sulaka or Siud. The latter of these, in order to obtain efficient support against his antagonist, repaired to Rome and swore allegiance to the Roman pontiff.⁴ To the party of this patriarch who stood connected with the Romish church, was added in the year 1555 Simeon Denha archbishop of Gelu; and when he afterwards succeeded to the patriarchate, he removed its seat to Ooromia in the mountainous parts of Persia, where his successors, all of whom assume the name of Simeon, have continued to reside till the present time. In the last [or seventeenth] century they remained still in communion with the Romish bishop; but in this [eighteenth] century, they seem to have renounced that communion.⁵ The greater patriarchs of the Nestorians who stood opposed to this lesser patriarch have since the year 1559 all borne the name of Elias, and had their residence at Mosul.⁶ Their dominion extends widely in Asia; and embraces the Nestorians in Arabia, and also those on the coast of Malabar who are called Christians of St. Thomas.⁷

17. Besides these sects of Christians, in which was something, or at least some appearance, of the religion taught by Christ, there were other far more corrupt sects scattered over a large part of Asia, which were undoubtedly descended from the Ebionites, the Manichæans, the Valentinians, the Basilidians, and other parties who in the early ages set up churches within the church, but who, through the common hatred against them of both Mohammedans and Christians, had sunk into such barbarism, ignorance, and superstition as to lose nearly altogether the reputation and the rights of Christians. The Sabians, as they are called by the Orientals, or the Mendai Ijahi, i. e. Disciples of St. John, as they call themselves, or the Christians of St. John as they are called by Europeans, though they perhaps have some imperfect knowledge of Christ, seem to be a Jewish sect and the descendants of the ancient Hemerobaptists mentioned by the early Christian writers. At least that John whom they call the founder of their sect was altogether unlike John the Baptist, and bore a far stronger resemblance to the John whom the ancients represented as the father of the Jewish Hemerobaptists.⁸ They live in Persia and

¹ See the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus dans le Levant, tome iii. where a long narrative is given (p. 1—218) respecting both the religious and the civil affairs of the Armenians; and which La Croze (than whom no man within our knowledge has bestowed more attention on these subjects) very highly commends for fidelity, accuracy, and research. See his Histoire du Christianisme d'Éthiopie, p. 345, &c.

² It is thus that the inscriptions which adorn the sepulchres of the Nestorian patriarchs in the city of Mosul express their sentiments. See Asseman's Biblioth. Oriental. Vaticana, tom. iii. par. ii. p. cmlxviii. See also ibid. p. 210, &c.; Simon's Histoire de la Créance des Chrétiens Orientaux, cap. vii. p. 94, &c.; Strozza, De Dogmatibus Chaldeorum, first published at Rome, 1617, 8vo.

³ Here should especially be consulted the very learned and copious dissertation of Asseman De Syris Nestorianis, which fills the whole of the fourth volume of his Bibliotheca Oriental. Vaticana. It was from this chiefly that Le Quen took what he says in his Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 1078, &c.

⁴ He planted himself at Caramit in Mesopotamia, and styled himself patriarch of the East. His successor Ebedjesu attended the council of Trent. The next successor was Abathalla; and after him was Simeon Denha who was obliged to quit Caramit.—Von Fin.

⁵ See Asseman's Bibliotheca Oriental. Vaticana, tom. i. p. 538, and tom. ii. p. 436.

⁶ A catalogue of the Nestorian patriarchs is given by Asseman, Bibliotheca Oriental. Vaticana, tom. iii. par. i. p. 611, &c. which he corrected, in tom. iii. par. ii. p. cml. Add Le Quen's Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 1078, &c.

⁷ Of these, La Croze treats expressly in his Histoire du Christianisme des Indes, with which should be compared Asseman, ubi supra, tom. iii. par. ii. cap. ix. p. ccccxi.

⁸ See what I have written on this subject in my Arabia, especially at Bassora, and regard religion as consisting principally in frequent solemn ablutions of the body, which their priests administer with certain ceremonies.¹

18. The Jasidiens, Jasideans, or Jezdeans, of whom many uncertain accounts are extant, are a vagrant branch or tribe of the fierce and uncultivated nation of the Kurds who inhabit the province of Persia called Kurdistan. They roam among the Gordian mountains and the desert parts of the country, and are divided into the black and the white Jezdeans. The former are the priests and the rulers of the sect and always dress in black; the latter are the common people whose dress is white. They have a singular religion and one not yet sufficiently explored; yet it is clear that it is a compound of Christian principles with numerous fictions originating from other sources. They are especially distinguished from other classes of corrupted Christians by their sentiments concerning the evil spirit, whom they call Karubin or Cherubin, that is, one of the greater ministers of God; and if they do not actually worship him, they at least treat him with respect, neither offering him any insult or contumely themselves nor suffering others to do it. In this matter they go so far that no tortures will induce them to express detestation of the evil spirit; and if they hear any other person curse him, they will kill him if they can.²

19. The Duruzi, Dursi, Druzi [or Druses], for their name is written variously, are a fierce and warlike people inhabiting a large part of the rugged mountains of Lebanon. They represent themselves (how justly is uncertain) to be descended from those Franks who waged war in the eleventh century with the Mohammedans.¹ As they cautiously conceal their religious creed, it is very dubious what their faith and worship are. Yet there are vestiges of Christianity sufficiently manifest in their customs and opinions. Learned men have suspected that the Druses, as well as the Kurds who inhabit Persia, formerly held and perhaps still hold the doctrines of the Manichæans.² The Chamsi or Solares inhabit a certain district of Mesopotamia, and are supposed by some to be descendants of the Samsacans mentioned by Epiphanius.³ There are many other semi-Christian sects in the East;⁴ and whoever will accurately trace them out and introduce their sacred books into Europe, will doubtless receive the grateful thanks of all who take an interest in Christian antiquities; for the various accounts we have of them at present are contradictory and cannot be depended on.

² See Hyde's Historia Relig. Veterum Persar. in the Appendix, p. 549; Otter, Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tome i. p. 121; tome ii. p. 249, &c. To impart a better knowledge of religion to this people, journeys were made with great peril in the seventeenth century by the celebrated and learned Jesuit, Michael Nau (D'Arvieux, Mémoires ou Voyages, tome vi. p. 362, 377); and after him by another Jesuit, Monierius (Mémoires des Missions des Jésuites, tome iii. p. 291); but how these travellers were received and what they accomplished does not appear. Rhenferd considered the Jezdeans as the offspring of the ancient Sethians (see Cuper's Epistles, published by Bayer, p. 130), but in my opinion as groundlessly as those who judge them to be Manicheans, a supposition which is sufficiently refuted by their opinion concerning the evil spirit. The name of this sect Beausobre among others derives from the name Jesus. See his Histoire du Manichéisme, tome ii. p. 613. I should conjecture that it is derived rather from the word Jazid or Jezdan, which in Persian signifies the good God, to whom is opposed Aliraman or the evil deity (see Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 484, &c.; Cherefeddin Aly, Histoire de Timourbec, tome iii. p. 81, &c.); so that Jazideans denotes worshippers of the good or true God. Yet they may have derived their appellation from the celebrated city Jезд, of which Otter treats, Voyage en Turquie et en Perse, tome i. p. 283, &c. [Jowett, in his Christian Researches in Syria, &c. ed. Boston, 1826, p. 55, &c. gives us from Niebuhr the following account of this people, whom he met with inhabiting a whole village near Mosul: "They are called Yesiens and also Dausani, but as the Turks do not allow the free exercise of any religion in their country, except to those who possess sacred books (as the Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews), the Yesiens are obliged to keep the principles of their religion extremely secret. They therefore pass themselves off for Mohammedans, Christians, or Jews, following the party of whatever person makes inquiry into their religion. They speak with veneration of the Koran, of the Gospel, of the Pontateuch, and the Psalms; and when convicted of being Yesiens, they will then maintain that they are of the same religion as the Sunnites. Hence it is almost an impossibility to learn anything certain on the subject. Some charge them with adoring the devil under the name of Tseilchib, that is to say, Lord. Others say that they exhibit a marked veneration for the sun and for fire, that they are downright pagans, and that they have horrible ceremonies. I have been assured that the Dausanis do not invoke the devil; but that they adore God only, as the creator and benefactor of all men. They cannot however bear to speak of Satan, nor even to hear his name mentioned. When the Yesiens come to Mosul, they are not apprehended by the magistrate, although known, but the people often endeavour to trick them; for when these poor Yesiens come to sell their eggs or butter, the purchasers contrive first to get their articles into their possession, and then begin uttering a thousand foolish expressions against Satan with a view to lower the price; upon which the Yesiens are content to leave their goods at a loss, rather than be witnesses of such contemptuous language about the devil. The Yesiens practise circumcision like the Mohammedans."—Niebuhr, Voyage en Arabie, vol. ii. p. 279, 280. From this account, it appears that the Jezdeans are not that roaming, savage race Mosheim supposed; but that they are a plain, frugal, conscientious people, who are afraid to avow their religious sentiments, because they have no sacred books which would entitle them to toleration under the Turkish government.—Mur.

Commentaries, De Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum Mag. p. 43, &c. [In Vidal's translation of Moshelm's Commentaries, &c. vol. i. p. 77, &c.—R.]

¹ See the treatise of Ignatius a Jesu, a Carmelite who resided long among these Mendæans, entitled: Narratio Originis, rituum et errorum Christianorum S. Johannis: cui adjungitur Diacorus per modum Dialogi, in quo confutatur xxvii. Erroris quædam Nationis, Rouen, 1652, 8vo; Knipfer's Amenitates Exoticæ, fascic. ii. relat. xi. p. 435, &c.; Sale's Introduction to his English version of the Koran, p. 15; Assmann's Biblioth. Oriental. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 609; Thevenot's Voyages, tome iv. p. 584, &c.; Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 725. Bayer composed a particular treatise concerning the Mendæans, filled with much excellent matter; but when he was about to commit it to me for publication, he was suddenly cut off by death. It was Bayer's opinion (as appears from the Thesaurus Epistolicus Crozianus, tom. i. p. 21), that they were a branch from the ancient Manicheans; which opinion was also approved by La Croze. See his Thesaurus Epistol. tom. iii. p. 31, 52. But there is nothing in their opinions or customs which savours of Manichæism. Hence other learned men, (to whose opinion the celebrated Fournmont a few years ago acceded, in a paper published in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des inscript. et des Belles Lettres, tome xviii. p. 23, &c.) suppose them descended from the ancient worshippers of a plurality of gods, and especially of the stars, whom the Arabs call Sabli or Sabi and Sablin. But, except the name which the Mohammedans are wont to give them, there is nothing at all to support this opinion. The Mendæans themselves say that they are Jews, and profess to have been removed from Palestine to the places which they now inhabit. This sect has some sacred books which are very ancient; among others, what they call The Book of Adam, and a book written by John the founder of their sect, and some others. As these books were introduced a few years since into the library of the king of France, it may be expected that from them in due time a better knowledge of this people will be obtained.—Mur.

20. Among most of these sects [of Oriental Christians], the missionaries of the Roman pontiff have with great labour and expense established societies, which acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Latin pontiff. Among the Greeks, both those who are subject to the Turks and those who are subject to the Venetians, to the Roman [German] emperor, and to other Christian princes, there are as is generally known here and there Greeks who belong to the Romish church, and whose bishops and priests are approved at Rome. For the sake of preserving and enlarging these societies, a college is established at Rome, in which Greek youth who appear to possess genius and a disposition to study are supported and instructed in the useful arts and sciences, and are especially taught to reverence the authority of the Roman pontiff. But the most respectable men, even among the friends of the Romish court, do not deny that these Greeks who are united with the Latins, if compared with those who hold the Latin name in abhorrence, are few and poor and in a wretched condition; and that among them are persons of Grecian faith, who whenever opportunity is presented repay to the Latins the greatest kindnesses with the greatest injuries. They also tell us that the Greeks who are educated with great care at Rome, by witnessing the faults of the Latins, often become the most ungrateful of all, and most strenuously oppose the advancement of the Latin interests among their countrymen.⁵

21. For uniting or rather subjecting to the Romish church the Russian, which is the noblest portion of the Greek church, there have been frequent deliberations at Rome, but without success. In this [sixteenth] century, John Basilides, grand-duke of the Russians, in the year 1580 sent an embassy to Gregory XIII. by which he seemed to exhort the pontiff to resume and to accomplish this business. The next year therefore, Anthony Possevin, a learned and sagacious Jesuit, was despatched to Muscovy. But although he spared no pains to accomplish the object of his embassy, yet he found himself unable to effect it; nor did the Russian ambassadors who a little after were sent to Rome present anything to the pontiff but vague and inefficient promises.⁶ Indeed the result showed that Basilides aimed only to secure by flatteries the favour of the pontiff, in order to succeed better in his unfortunate war with the Poles. But the arguments of Possevin and others had so much effect upon the Russians who inhabit Poland, that some of them in the convention of Bresty, A.D. 1596, entered into an alliance with the Latins. These were subsequently called the United Greeks, while the other party, who still adhered to the patriarch of Constantinople, were called the Ununited.⁷ Moreover at Kiow, ever since the fourteenth century, there has been a society of Russians subject to the Roman pontiff, and which has had its own metropolitans or bishops distinct from the Russian bishops of Kiow.⁸

¹ See the Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses, tome i. p. 228—333, Lyons, 1819, 8vo.—Mur.

² See Adrian's Narrative concerning the Druses, in Lucas' Pouage en Grèce et Asie Mineure, tome ii. p. 36. &c.; Hyde's Historia Religionis Veter. Persarum, p. 491, 551; Rycant's Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, tome i. p. 313, &c. [Modern researches, particularly by Chardin, De Sacy, and Burkhart, clearly show that the Druses are with no propriety reckoned among Christian sects. They are apostate Mohammedans, followers of the false prophet Hakem, who pretended to be an incarnate deity. He was born at Cairo A.D. 985, began to reign in Egypt A.D. 996, and was assassinated in 1020. His Charter or commands to his followers, together with their oath of allegiance to him, are published by De Sacy in his Chrestomathie Arabe, tome ii. p. 334, &c. See a full account of them in Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, p. 32, &c. 76.—Mur.]

³ Hyde, Historia Relig. Veter. Persarum, p. 555, &c.

⁴ The Jesuit Dusse (Lettres Edif. et Curieuses des Missions Etrangères, tome i. p. 63) relates that in the mountains which separate Persia from India, there resides a sect of Christians who brand themselves with the figure of a cross, impressed with a hot iron.

⁵ Here may be consulted, besides others, Corri's Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 82, &c. where, among other things, it is said—"They become the most violent enemies of the Catholics when they have been instructed in our sciences, and have obtained a knowledge of our imperfections." Other testimonies will be adduced hereafter. A catalogue, though an imperfect one, of the Greek bishops who follow the Latin rites, is given in Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 860.

⁶ See the Colloquia Possevin cum Moscorum Duce, and his other writings relating to this subject, which are annexed to his Moscoria, p. 31, &c. and Dorigny's Vie du Père Possevin, livr. v. p. 351, &c.

⁷ Regensvolcius, Historia Ecclesiarum Slavonicarum, lib. iv. cap. ii. p. 465, &c. [and 470, &c.—Mur.]

⁸ See Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 1274,

22. Among the Monophysites both Asiatic and African, the preachers of the Romish religion have effected little which deserves attention. Among the Chaldean or Nestorian Christians, a small society subject to the Roman pontiff was collected near the middle of the preceding century. Its patriarchs, all of whom take the name of Joseph, reside in the city Amida, which is also called Caramit and Diarbeker.¹ A part of the Armenians, as early as the fourteenth century in the pontificate of John XXII. embraced the Romish religion; and over them the pontiff placed an archbishop in 1318, who was a Dominican monk and resided at Soldania,² a city of Aderbeitzan. The archiepiscopal residence was afterwards removed to Naxivan, and to this day it is occupied exclusively by the Dominicans.³ The company of Armenians resident in Poland and embracing the Romish doctrines have also their bishop who resides at Lemberg.⁴ Some of the Theatin and Capuchin monks visited the Georgians and Mingrelians; but the ferocity and ignorance of those nations opposed such obstacles to the counsels and admonitions of the missionaries, that their labours were attended with almost no success.⁵

23. The pompous accounts of their success among these sects given by the Romish missionaries, want candour and truth. For it is unquestionable, that all they did in some countries was merely to baptize by stealth certain infants, whom their parents committed to their care because they professed to be physicians;⁶ and in other countries they only gathered a poor miserable company, who generally forsook them as soon as their money was gone, and returned to the religion of their fathers.⁷ Likewise here and there a prelate among the Greeks or the other nations would sometimes promise obedience to the Roman pontiff, and even repair to Rome to manifest his submission; but these were actuated only by avarice or ambition. And on a change in their circumstances, they would at once relapse or deceive the Romans with equivocal professions. Those who, like the Nestorian prelate at Amida, continue steadfast in their profession and its propagation, persevere from no other cause than the uninterrupted liberality of the Roman pontiff. The pontiffs moreover are astonishingly indulgent to those sons whom they adopt from among the Greeks and other Oriental Christians. For they not only suffer them to worship according to the rites of their fathers, rites the most diverse from those of the Romans, and to follow customs abhorred among the Latins, but they do not even require them to expunge from their public books those doctrines which are peculiar to them as a Christian sect.⁸ At Rome, if we are not greatly mistaken, a Greek, Armenian, or Copt, is esteemed a good member of the Romish church, provided he will acknowledge the sovereign authority of the Romish prelate over the whole Chaitian church.

24. The entire nation of the Maronites, who reside principally on the mountains of Lebanon and Antilebanon, came under the Roman pontiff from the period of the invasion of Palestine by the Latins.⁹ But as they did this on the condition that the ⁸ Asseman complains here and there in his Bibliotheca Orientalis Vaticana, that not even the books printed at Rome for the use of the Nestorians, Jacobites, and Armenians, are purged of the errors peculiar to those sects; and he contends that this is the reason why those people renounce the Romish religion after having adopted it. Add Simon's Lettres Choisies, tome ii. lettre xxiii. p. 156, &c. who excuses this negligence or imprudence of the Romans.

⁹ The Maronite doctors, and especially those who reside at Rome, take the utmost pains to prove that the Romish religion has always been held and preserved by their nation pure and uncontaminated with any error. Besides others, Nairon has done this very elaborately in his Dissertation de Origine, Nomine ac Religione Maronitarum, Rome, 1679, 8vo. From this book, and from other Maronite authors, De la Roque composed his long and well written essay, Sur l'Origine des Maronites et Abrégé de leur Histoire, which is printed in his Voyage de Syrie et du Mont Liban, tome ii. p. 28—128, ed. Amserd. 1723, 8vo. But the most learned men among the Catholics do not give credit to this statement, but maintain that the Maronites are the offspring of the Monophysites, and were addicted to the opinions of the Monothelites down to the twelfth century, when they united with the Latins. See Simon's Histoire Critique des Chrétiens Orientaux, chap. xiii. p. 146, &c.; Renaudot, Historia Patriarchar. Alexandrinorum, prefac. p. iii. z. and the history itself, p. 49, and many other writers. Asseman himself a Maronite, advances a sort of intermediate opinion, Bibliotheca Orient. Vaticana, tom. i. p. 496. Le Quien leaves the question dubious, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. i, &c. where he treats professedly of the Maronite church, and of its prelates. In my opinion, no one will readily put confidence in the Maronites, who like all Syrians are vainglorious, if he considers that all the Maronite nation have not yet subjected themselves to the Roman pontiff. For some and tom. iii. p. 1126; Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Februar. p. 639, &c.

¹ See Asseman's Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. i. p. 615, &c.; Le Quien, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 1084, &c.

² Raynald's Annal. Eccl. tom. xv. ad. ann. 1518, sec. iv.

³ Le Quien, ubi supra, tom. iii. p. 1362 and 1403, &c. Clemens Galanus, Conciliatio Ecclesie Armenice cum Romana, tom. i. p. 527, &c.

⁴ Mémoires des Missions de la Comp. de Jésus, tome iii. p. 54, &c.

⁵ Cerri, Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 162, &c.

⁶ Cerri, ubi supra, p. 164; De Chinon, Relations Nouvelles du Levant, part i. chap. vi. p. 174. This Capuchin monk speaks very ingenuously on many subjects.

⁷ See Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome i. p. 186; tome ii. p. 53, 75, 206, 271, 349; and especially tome iii. p. 433, &c. of the last edition in Holland, 4to. For in the previous editions everything dishonourable to the Romish missions among the Armenians, the Colchians, the Iberians, or the Persians, was omitted. De Chinon, Relations du Levant, part ii. p. 303, &c. where he treats of the Armenians; Maillet, Description d'Egypte, tome ii. p. 65, &c. who speaks of the Copts.

Latins should change nothing of their ancient rites, customs, and opinions, hence almost nothing Latin can be found among the Maronites except their attachment to the Romish prelate.¹ Moreover this friendship costs the pontiff dear. For as the Maronites live in extreme poverty under the tyranny of the Mohammedans, the pontiff has to relieve their poverty with his wealth, that their prelate and leading men may have the means of appeasing their cruel masters, supporting their priests, and defraying the expenses of public worship. Nor is the expense small of maintaining the college for Maronites established at Rome by Gregory XIII. in which Syrian youth are imbued with literature and with love to the Romish see. The Maronite church is governed by a patriarch residing at Cannobin on Mount Lebanon, which is a convent of monks of the rule of St. Anthony. He styles himself patriarch of Antioch and always takes the name of Peter, to whose see he claims to be the successor.²

PART II.

HISTORY OF MODERN CHURCHES.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

I. ACCORDING to our previous method, we have described the origin and progress of the church which assumes the name of evangelical, from having rescued from oblivion the Gospel, or the doctrine of salvation procured for men solely by the merits of Christ, when smothered in superstition; and which does not reject the appellation of Lutheran, from gratitude to the man who first dissipated the clouds which obscured the Gospel, and taught his followers to place no reliance on themselves or on glorified saints, but to give all their confidence to Christ. Its commencement is to be dated from the time when Leo X. expelled Luther and his adherents from the Romish church [A.D. 1520]. It acquired a stable form and consistency in the year 1530, when the public confession of its faith was presented to the diet at Augsburg. And it finally obtained the rank of a legitimate and independent community in Germany, and was entirely freed from the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff in the year 1552, when of this nation in Syria stand aloof from communion with the Latins, and in the last century not a few of them in Italy itself gave the court of Rome no little trouble. Some of them went over to the Waldenses inhabiting the valleys of Piedmont; others to the number of six hundred, with a bishop and many priests, went over to Corsica, and implored the aid of the republic of Genoa against the violence of the Inquisition. See Cerri, Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 121, 122. I know not what could have excited these Maronites to make such opposition to the Roman pontiff, if they did not dissent at all from his doctrines and decrees; for the Romish church allows them freely to follow the rites and customs and institutions of their fathers. See the Theaurus Epistol. Crozianus, tom. i. p. 11, &c. [and p. 258, above.—Mur.]

¹ Here consult especially the Notes which Simon has annexed to his French translation of the Voyage of Jerome Dandini, an Italian Jesuit, to Mount Lebanon, written in Italian, Paris, 1685, 12mo. See also Renaudot, Historia Patriarchar. Alexandrinor. p. 548.

Maurice of Saxony formed the religious pacification with Charles V. at Passau.

2. According to the opinion of this church, the entire rule for a sound faith and for a holy life is to be drawn exclusively from the inspired books; and it accordingly believes that these books are so plain and so easy to be understood in respect to the way of salvation, that every man who possesses common sense and understands their language can ascertain their meaning without an interpreter. This church has indeed certain books usually called symbolical, in which the principal truths of religion are collected together and perspicuously stated; but these books derive all their authority from the sacred volume, the meaning of which they exhibit; nor may theologians expound them differently from what the divine oracles will permit. The first of these [symbolical] books is the Augsburg Confession, with the Apology. Then follow what are called the Articles of Smalcald; and next the Catechisms of Luther, the larger for adults and persons more advanced in knowledge, and the shorter intended for children. To these, very many add the Formula of Concord, which however some do not receive, yet without any interruption of harmony; because the few things on account of which it is disapproved are of minor consequence, and neither add anything to the fundamentals of religion nor detract from them.¹

² See Petitqueux, Voyage à Cannobin dans le Mont Liban, in the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome iv. 222, and tome viii. p. 355; La Roque, Voyage de Syrie, tome ii. p. 10; D'Arvieux, Mémoires ou Voyages, tome ii. p. 418, &c. and others. [See Jowett's Christian Researches in Syria, &c. p. 15, &c.—Mur.] [On the past history and present condition of these Eastern churches and sects, the fullest and most recent information may be found in Wiggers' Kirchliche Statistik oder Darstellung d. Christ. Kirche nach ihrem gegenwärt. ausseren u. inneren Zustande, Hamb. 1842-43, 2 vols. with a continuation to 1846, in the Theolog. Studien und Kritiken, No. 1 for 1848, p. 195, &c. The English reader will find important information on the same topics in Wingham's Review of the Latest Events and Present State of the Church of Christ, Lond. 1845, 12mo, and more recently in the Appendix to the second volume of Wilson's Lands of the Bible, Edin. 1847, 2 vols. 8vo.—R.]

3. Concerning ceremonies and forms of public worship, there was at first some dissension in different places. For some wished to retain more and others fewer of the immense multitude of the ancient rites and usages. The latter after the example of the Swiss thought that everything should give way to the ancient Christian simplicity and gravity in religion; the former supposed that some allowance should be made for the weakness and inveterate habits of the people. But as all were agreed that ceremonies depend on human authority, and that there is no obstacle to the existence of diversity as to rites in the churches and countries professing the same religion, this controversy could not long continue. All usages and regulations both public and private, which bore manifest marks of error and superstition, were everywhere rejected; and it was wisely provided that the benefits of public worship should not be subverted by the multitude of ceremonies. In other respects every church was at liberty to retain so many of the ancient usages and rites as were not dangerous, as a regard to places, the laws, the character, and the circumstances of the people seemed to require. And hence down to our time, the Lutheran churches differ much in the number and nature of their public rites; which, so far from being a dishonour to them, is rather good evidence of their wisdom and moderation.²

4. In the Lutheran church the civil sovereigns possess the supreme power in ecclesiastical affairs. This power is secured to them in part by the very nature of the civil government; and in part, I conceive, it is surrendered to them by the tacit consent of the churches. Yet the ancient rights of Christian communities are not wholly subverted and destroyed; but in some places more, in others fewer, in all some traces of them remain. Besides, the civil sovereigns are prohibited by the fundamental principles of the religion they profess from violating or changing at their own pleasure the system of religion or anything essential to it, or from legislatively imposing such creeds and rules of life upon the citizens as they may see fit. The boards which in the name of the sovereigns watch over the interests of the church, and direct ecclesiastical affairs, are composed of civil and ecclesiastical jurists, and bear the ancient name of Consistories. The internal regulation of the church is in form intermediate between the Episcopal and the Presbyterian systems, except in Sweden and Denmark, where the ancient form of the church, with its offensive parts lopped off, is retained. For while the Lutherans are persuaded that by divine right there is no difference of rank and prerogatives among the ministers of the Gospel, yet they suppose it to be useful, and indeed necessary to the preservation of union, that some ministers should hold a rank and possess powers superior to others. But in establishing this difference among their ministers, some states are governed more and others less by a regard to the ancient polity of the church. For that which is determined by no divine law may be ordered variously, without any breach of harmony and fraternal intercourse.

5. Each country has its own liturgy or form of worship, in accordance with which everything pertaining to the public religious exercises and worship must be ordered and performed. These liturgies are frequently enlarged, amended, and explained, as circumstances and occasions demand, by the decrees and statutes of the sovereigns. Among them all, there is no diversity in regard to things of any considerable magnitude or importance; but in regard to things remote from the essentials of religion or from the rules of faith and practice prescribed in the sacred Scriptures, there is much diversity. Frequent meetings for the worship of God are everywhere held. The services in them consist of sermons, by which the ministers instruct the people and excite them to piety, the reading of the holy Scriptures, prayers and hymns addressed to the Deity, and the administration of the sacraments. The young are not only required to be taught carefully the first principles of religion in the schools, but are publicly trained and advanced in knowledge by the catechetical labours of the ministers. And hence in nearly all the provinces, little books commonly called Catechisms are drawn up by public authority, in which the chief points of religious faith and practice are explained by questions and answers. These the schoolmasters and the ministers follow as guides in their instructions. But as Luther left an excellent little book of this sort, in which the first elements of religion and morality are nervously and lucidly expressed, the instruction of young children throughout the church, very properly commences with this; and the provincial catechisms are merely expositions and amplifications of Luther's shorter catechism, which is one of our symbolical books.

¹ On the symbolical books of the Lutheran church and the exponents of them, Köcher treats expressly, in his Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolice, p. 114, &c. [See also Walch's Introductio Historica et Theologica in Libros Symbolicos Ecclesie Lutherane, Jena, 1732, 4to, p. 1008.—Mur.] There have been numerous editions of these books by Feuerlinn, Tittmann, and others. Among the fullest and latest may be mentioned Hase, Libri Symbolici Eccles. Evang. Lips. 1827, with ample Prolegomena. It contains the three ancient creeds, the Augsburg Confession, and the Apology for it; the Articles of Smalcald, the larger and smaller catechisms of Luther, the form of Concord, and the Articles of Visitation of 1502. The most recent edition is by Francke, entitled, Libri Symbolici Ecc. Luther. cum Appendice Quinquaginta, Leip. 1847.—R.

² See Meisner, De Legibus, lib. iv. art. iv. quæst. iv. p. 662—666; Scherzer's Breviarium Hülsemann Enucleatum, p. 1313—1321.

6. As to holy days, in addition to the weekly day sacred to the memory of the Saviour's resurrection, the Lutheran church celebrates all the days which the piety of former ages consecrated to those distinguished events on which depends the divine authority of the Christian religion. And that it might not offend the weak, it has retained some of those festivals which superstition rather than religion appears to have created. Some communities likewise observe religiously the days anciently devoted to the ambassadors of Jesus Christ or to the Apostles. The ancient regulation which has come down to us from the earliest age of the church, of excluding the ungodly from the communion, the Lutheran church at first endeavoured to purify from abuses and corruptions and to restore to its primitive purity. And in this [sixteenth] century no one opposed the wise and temperate use of this power by the ministers of our church. But in process of time it gradually became so little used, that at the present day scarcely a vestige of it in most places can be discovered. This change is to be ascribed in part to the fault of the ministers, some of whom have not unfrequently perverted an institution in itself most useful to the gratification of their own resentments, while others either from ignorance or indiscretion have erred in the application of it; in part also to the counsels of certain individuals, who conceived that for ministers to have the power of excluding offenders from church communion, was injurious to the interests of the state and to the authority of the magistrates; and lastly, in part to the innate propensity of mankind to unrestrained freedom. This restraint upon wickedness being removed, it is not strange that the morals of the Lutherans should have become corrupted, and that a multitude of persons living in open transgressions should everywhere lift up their heads.

7. The prosperous and adverse events in the progress of the Lutheran church, since the full establishment of its liberties and independence, may be stated in a few words. Its growth and increase have been already stated; nor could it easily, after what is called the religious peace, go on to enlarge its borders. Towards the close of the century, Gebhard, count of Truchsess and archbishop of Cologne, was disposed to unite with this [or rather with the Reformed] church; and having married, he attempted the religious reformation of his territories. But he failed in his great design, which was repugnant to the famous Ecclesiastical Reservation among the articles of the religious peace; and he was obliged to resign his electoral dignity and his archbishopric.² Neither on the other hand could its enemies greatly disturb the peace and prosperity of the church. Yet it was apparent from various indications, that a new war upon them was secretly plotted, and that the principal object aimed at was to annul the peace of Passau confirmed at Augsburg, and to cause the Protestants to be declared public enemies. Among others, Francis Burekhard sufficiently manifested such a disposition in his celebrated work De Autonomia, written

² See Köhler's Diss. de Gebhardo Truchsessio, and the authors he cites. Add Ludewig's Reliquie Manuscriptor, tom. v. p. 343, &c. Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1748, p. 481. [Gebhard was of Truchsess in Waldburg. After his change of faith he married, privately at first, Agnes, countess of Mansfeld; and he allowed the Protestants the free use of their religion, yet with the proviso that the rights of the archiepiscopal see should remain inviolate. But the chapter at the head of which was Frederick of Sachsenlaueburg, refused obedience to him in the year 1543; and they were supported in their disobedience by the Spaniards. On the other hand, Gebhard obtained the promise of assistance from the Protestants assembled at Heilbron and Worms; yet only the elector palatine, John Casimir, fulfilled the promise. For Gebhard was of the Reformed religion, and the contention between the Reformed and the Lutherans was then carried to a great height, otherwise probably this business would have had a very different termination. The chapter applied to pope Gregory XIII. and having obtained the deposition of their archbishop, made choice of prince Ernest of Bavaria, who was already bishop of Freysingen, Hildesheim, and Liege. The archbishop indeed sought to support himself. But Augustus, elector of Saxony, hated the Reformed too bitterly and needed the aid of the Imperial court in the affair of the Henneberg inheritance too much, to be disposed to aid the archbishop; and John Casimir, who was threatened with the ban of the empire, dared not lend out all his forces, for fear of being abandoned by the other Protestant princes and becoming a prey to the Spanish and Bavarian army. Gebhard was therefore compelled, as he would not accept the terms proposed in the congress at Frankfurt, to retire from the territory of the archbishopric, and he died in Holland, A.D. 1601.—Schl. [See also Ranke's Popes of Rome, vol. ii. p. 76, and 115, &c.—R.]

¹ Such, for example, are the nativity, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Son of God, the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost, &c.—Macl.

in 1586; and also John Pistorius in his *Reasons by which James marquis of Baden professed to be influenced in abandoning the Lutheran party.*¹ These writers and others of the like character commonly assail the religious peace as being an iniquitous and unjust thing, because extorted by force and arms, and made without the knowledge and against the pleasure of the Roman pontiff, and therefore null and void; they also attempted to demonstrate, from the falsification or change of the Augsburg Confession, of which they say Melancthon was the father, that the Protestants have forfeited the rights conferred on them by that peace. The latter of these charges gave occasion in this century and the following to many books and discussions, by which our theologians placed it beyond all doubt that this Confession had been kept inviolate and entire, and that the Lutherans had not swerved from it in the least.² But none felt more severely the implacable hatred of the papists against the new religion (as they call that of the Lutherans) than those followers of this system who lived in countries subject to princes adhering to the Romish religion; and especially the Lutherans in the Austrian dominions, who at the close of this century lost the greatest part of their religious liberties.³

8. While the adherents of the Roman pontiff were thus plotting the destruction of the Lutherans by force and stratagems, the latter omitted nothing which might contribute in any way to strengthen and establish their own church. Their recent calamities were fresh in their recollection, which led them to the greater solicitude to prevent their recurrence; and to confess the truth, there was at that day more zeal for religion among men of distinction and high rank than at the present day. Hence the confederacy for the defence of religion, which had been formed among the German princes and of which the elector of Saxony was the head, was peculiarly strong and efficient; and foreigners, especially the kings of Sweden and Denmark, were invited to afford it their support. And as all were sensible that the church could not exist and prosper, unless its teachers were educated men, nor unless literature and science everywhere flourished, hence nearly all the princes set themselves to oppose the strongest barriers against ignorance, the mother of superstition. Their zeal in this matter is evinced by the new universities founded at Jena, Helmstadt, and Altorf, and among the Reformed at Francker, Leyden, and other places; also by the reform and adaptation of the old universities to the state and necessities of a purer church, by the numerous inferior schools opened in nearly all the cities, and by the salaries, ample for those times, given to literary and scientific men, as well as the high honours and privileges conferred upon them. The expense of these salutary measures was defrayed for the most part out of the property which the piety of preceding ages had devoted to churches, to convents of monks and canons, and to other pious uses.

9. Hence almost every branch of human science and knowledge was cultivated and improved. All who aspired to the sacred office were required to study Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, and in these languages it is well known great men appeared among the Lutherans. History was greatly advanced by Melancthon, John Cario, David Chytræus, Reinerus Reineccius, and others. Of ecclesiastical history in particular Matthias Flacius may properly be called the father; for he and his associates by composing that immortal work, the Magdeburg Centuries, threw immense light on the history of the Christians, which before was involved in darkness and mixed up with innumerable fables. With him is to be joined Martin Chemnitz, to whose Examination of the Council of Trent the history of religious opinions is more indebted than many at this day are aware. The history of literature and philosophy, the art of criticism, antiquities, and other kindred studies, were indeed less attended to; yet beginnings were made in them, which excited those who came after to prosecute successfully these pleasing pursuits. Eloquence, especially in Latin, both prose and poetic, was pursued by great numbers, and by those worthy of comparison with the best Latin writers; which is proof that genius for erudition and literature was not wanting in this age, but that it was the circumstances and troubles of the times which prevented genius from attaining the highest excellence in every species of learning. Philip Melancthon, the common teacher of the whole Lutheran church, by his instructions, his example, and his influence, enkindled the ardour of all those who acquired fame in the pursuit of literature and the liberal arts; nor did scarcely an individual of those who prosecuted either divine or human knowledge venture to depart from the method of this great man. Next to him, Joachim Camerarius, a doctor of Leipsic, took great pains to perfect and to bring into repute all branches of learning, and especially the belles-lettres.

¹ See Salig's Geschichte der Augsbургischen Confession, vol. i. book iv. c. iii. p. 767.

² Here Salig especially may be consulted, ubi supra, vol. i. It must be admitted that Melancthon did alter the Augsburg Confession in some places. It is also certain that in the year 1555 he introduced into the Saxon churches, in which his influence at the time was very great, a form of the Confession very different from its original one. But the Lutheran church (in general) never approved this rashness or imprudence of Melancthon; nor was his altered Confession ever admitted to a place among the symbolical books. [Melancthon doubtless looked upon the Confession as his own production, which he had a right to correct and improve; and he altered in particular the tenth article which treats of the Lord's Supper, from a love of peace and an honest desire to bring the Protestants into a closer union with each other, so that they might oppose their common enemies with their united strength. But his good designs were followed by bad consequences.—Schl.]

³ See Raupach's Evangelisches Oesterreich, vol. i. p. 152, &c. vol. ii. p. 287, &c. [This was attributed especially to the influence of the Jesuits, who found ready access to the Austrian and Bavarian courts. At Vienna, Peter Canisius rendered himself very conspicuous; and on account of his great pains to hunt out heretics and drive them to the fold of the church, the Austrian Protestants called him the Austrian Hound; but those of his own community called him the Second Apostle of the Germans. See Versuch einer neuen Geschichte des Jesuitenordens, vol. i. p. 372, 407, 408, and vol. ii. in various places.—Schl.]

10. Philosophy met with various fortune among the Lutherans. At first, both Luther and Melancthon seemed to discard all philosophy.¹ And if this was a fault in them, it is chargeable upon the doctors of the schools, who had abused their barbarous method of philosophising as well as the precepts of Aristotle, to pervert and obscure exceedingly both human and divine knowledge. Soon however these reformers found that philosophy was indispensably necessary to restrain the licentiousness of the imagination, and to defend the territories of religion. Hence Melancthon explained nearly all the branches of philosophy in concise treatises written in a neat and perspicuous style; and these treatises were for many years read and expounded in the schools and universities. Melancthon may not improperly be called an eclectic philosopher. For while in many things he followed Aristotle, or did not utterly despise the old philosophy of the schools, he at the same time drew much from his own genius, and likewise borrowed some things from the doctrines of the Platonics and Stoics.

11. But this simple mode of philosophising devised by Melancthon did not long bear exclusive sway. For some acute and subtle men, perceiving that Melancthon assigned the first rank among philosophers to Aristotle, thought it best to go directly to the fountain and to expound the Stagyræ himself to the students in philosophy. Others, perceiving that the Jesuits and other advocates for the Roman pontiffs made use of the barbarous terms and the subtleties of the old scholastics in order to confound the Protestants, thought it would be advantageous to the church, for her young men also to be initiated in the mysteries of the Aristotelico-scholastic philosophy. Hence near the close of the century there had arisen three philosophical sects, the Melancthonian, the Aristotelian, and the Scholastic. The first gradually decayed, the other two insensibly became united, and at length got possession of all the professional chairs. But the followers of Peter Ramus sharply attacked them in several countries, and not always without success; and at last, after various contests, they were obliged to retire from the schools.²

12 The same fate was afterwards experienced by the Fire Philosophers (Philosophi ex igne), or the Paracelsists and the other men of like character, who wished to abolish altogether the peripatetic philosophy, and to introduce their own into the universities in place of it. At the close of the century, this sect had many eloquent patrons and friends in most of the countries of Europe, who endeavoured by their writings and their actions to procure glory and renown to this kind of wisdom. In England, Robert à Fluctibus or Fludd, a man of uncommon genius, adorned and illustrated this philosophy by extensive writings, which to this day find readers and admirers.³

¹ Ab Elswich, De Fatis Aristotelis in Scholis Protestantium, sec. xxi. p. 54, &c.; Walch's Historia Logica, lib. ii. cap. i. sec. iii. sec. 5. in his Parerga Academica, p. 613, 617, &c.; Schützius, De Vita Chytræi, lib. iv. sec. iv. p. 19, &c. [Ramus was professor of eloquence at Paris, and wished to combine eloquence with philosophy. But as it would not coalesce with the scholastic philosophy, he devised a new species of philosophy, one which might be used in common life, at courts, and in worldly business. He separated from philosophy all the idle speculations which are useless in common life, and rejected all metaphysics. This innovation produced great disturbance at Paris. The Aristotelians opposed it most violently. And the king appointed a commission to investigate the controversy, from which Aristotle obtained the victory. From France this philosophy spread into Switzerland and Germany. At Geneva, Beza would have nothing to do with it. At Basil it found more patrons. The most zealous adherents of Luther, who imitated him in hating Aristotle, nearly all took the side of Ramus. Hence in our universities there was often fierce war between the Aristotelians and the Ramists, and it frequently cost blood among the students. Indeed the Calistine contest originated from Ramism.—Schul.]

² See Wood's Athene Oxoniæ, vol. i. p. 610, and Hist. et Antiq. Acad. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 390; Gassendi's examination of Fludd's philosophy, an ingenious and learned performance, in his Opp. tom. iii. p. 250, &c. [Fludd's appropriate work is entitled, Historia Microcosmi et Macrocosmi, Oppenb. 1617, 1619, 2 vols. folio:

³ See Heumann's Acts of the Philosophers, written in German, art. ii. par. x. p. 579, &c.; Ab Elswich, Dissert. de Fatis Aristotelis in Scholis Protestantium, which he has prefixed to Launoi, De Fortuna Aristotelis in Acad. Parisiensi, sec. viii. p. 15, sec. xiii. p. 36, &c.

In France, one Riverius besides others propagated it at Paris, against opposition from the university there.¹ Through Germany and Denmark, Severinus spread it with uncommon zeal;² in Germany also after others, Henry Kunrath, a chemist of Dresden, who died in 1605;³ and in other countries, others established it and procured it adherents. As all these combined the precepts of their philosophy with a great show of piety towards God, and seemed to direct all their efforts to glorifying God and establishing harmony among disagreeing Christians, they of course readily found friends. Just at the close of the century, they drew over to their party some persons among the Lutherans who were very zealous for the promotion of true religion, as Valerius Weigel,⁴ John Arndt,⁵ and others, who feared lest too much disputing and reasoning should divert men from the true worship of God, to run after the noisy and perplexing trifles of the ancient schools.

and another, Philosophia Moralis, Gouda. 1638, folio. He was a doctor of physic at Oxford, and died in 1637. Fludd and those of his class assumed as a first principle, that men can never arrive at true wisdom until they learn the ways of God in his works of nature, and that nature can be learned only by the analysis of fire. Hence they were called Fire Philosophers, and they were all chemists. They combined their philosophical wisdom with theology. God who is unchangeable, said they, acts in the kingdom of grace just as he does in the kingdom of nature; so that whoever understands how natural bodies are changed, in particular the metals, understands also what passes in the soul in regeneration, sanctification, renovation, &c. Thus they erected a sort of theology upon the basis of their chemical knowledge; and of course no one can understand them unless he is a chemist, or at least has a chemical dictionary before him.—Schl.

¹ Bulæus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. vi. p. 327, and passim.

² Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 623, &c. [This Danish physician, who spent a great part of his life in travelling, was one of the strongest supporters of Paracelsus, and first reduced his ideas to a system in a work entitled, Idea Medicinæ Philosophicæ.—Schl.

³ Möller's Cimb. Liter. tom. ii. p. 440, &c. [His principal work is entitled, Amphitheatrum Sapientiæ Eternæ, solum Veræ Christianæ Kabbalisticum, Divinæ Magicum, Physico-Chymicum, &c. Hanau, 1609, fol. and Frankf. 1653.—Schl.

⁴ This singular man was pastor of Tschoppau in Meissen, and died in 1588. After his death he was, perhaps unjustly, pronounced a heretic, partly because his language was not understood, and partly because much that appeared in his writings was not his, but was added by his chanter who published his works after his death. He appears to have been an honest, conscientious man, without bad intentions, yet somewhat superstitious. See respecting his writings, Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, vol. ii. book vii. ch. xvii. and Hilliger's Disc. de Fata, Fata, et Scriptis Weigelii, Wittenb. 1721.—Schl.

⁵ Of the history and life of this divine, to whom our church and the cause of piety are so much indebted, nothing need here be said, since his writings are in every one's hands, and many editions of them contain a biography of him. It is well known that his writings gave occasion for violent contests; and for a long time public opinion was divided respecting his orthodoxy and his merits. The chancellor of Tübingen, Lucas Oslander, and many others, could find gross heresies in his writings; but the provost Bengel saw in him the Apocalyptic angel with the everlasting Gospel. Illa-

13. Towards the same party also leaned Daniel Hoffmann, a celebrated theologian in the university of Helmstadt, who in the year 1598 openly assailed all philosophy with great violence, and relying principally on certain passages and sentences in Luther's works, maintained that philosophy was the enemy of all religion and all piety; and moreover that there was a twofold truth, philosophical and theological, and that philosophical truth was falsehood in theology. Hence arose a fierce contest between him and the philosophers of the university in which he taught, namely, Owen Günther, John Caselius, Conrad Martini, and Duncan Liddel; and some out of the university likewise took part in it by their writings. Henry Julius, duke of Brunswick, to put an end to the commotion, took cognizance of the cause, called in the divines of Rostoc for counsel, and ordered Hoffmann in the year 1601 to retract what he had written and spoken disrespectfully of philosophy and the philosophers, and to acknowledge publicly that sound philosophy was in harmony with theology.⁶

14. The theology which is now taught in the Lutheran schools did not at once attain its present form, but was improved and perfected progressively. Of this fact those are aware who understand the history of the doctrines concerning the holy Scriptures, free-will, predestination, and other subjects, and who have compared the early systems of theology written by Lutherans with those of more recent date. For the vindicators of religious liberty did not discos intra muros peccator et extra. If a man will read Arndt's writings with the feelings of a dispassionate historian, he will hear one speaking in them who is full of the spirit of Christianity, who abhors scholastic theological wrangling, and who speaks for the most part more forcibly and more like the Bible on practical Christianity, than his contemporaries do; yet he often sinks into a mysticism which is not the mysticism of the Bible, but of Valerius Weigel and of Angela de Foligno, from whose writings he borrows largely. In proof of this, read only the third and fourth books of his True Christianity, where also many chemical terms occur, such as the Theosophists use, and to which Arndt had accustomed himself, having been a physician in early life, and retaining in after life a fondness for chemical writings. And for this reason, it is probably not so wise in our times, when we have so many ascetic works which are more easy of comprehension and better adapted to our age, to be always recommending to common Christians the writings of Arndt. For the people of his time his books were very valuable; but we should not therefore be ungrateful for those of our own age, which God has vouchsafed to us. Respecting him, see Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, vol. ii. book xvii. ch. vi. sec. 5, &c. and Weismann's Memorialia Hist. Sacr. tom. ii. p. 1174, &c.—Schl.

⁶ An accurate account of this controversy and a list of the writings published on both sides are given by Möller in his life of Owen Günther, Cimb. Liter. tom. i. p. 225, &c. See also Ab Elawich, De Fata Aristotelis in Scholis Protestant. sec. xxvii. p. 76, &c.; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, book xvii. ch. vi. sec. xv. p. 947, &c.

cover all truth in an instant; but like persons emerging from long darkness, their vision improved gradually. Our theologians were also greatly assisted in correcting and explaining their sentiments, by the controversies in which they were involved, by their external conflicts with the papists, with the disciples of Zwingli, Calvin, and others, and by their internal contests, of which we shall speak hereafter. Those who, like James Benigne Bossuet and others, make this a reproach against the Lutherans, do not consider that the founders of the evangelical church never wished to be regarded as inspired men, and that the first virtue of a wise man is to discover the errors of others, and the second is to find out the truth.

15. The first and principal care of the teachers of the reformed religion was to illustrate and explain the sacred Scriptures, which contain, in the opinion of the Lutheran church, all celestial wisdom. Hence there were almost as many expositors of the Bible among the Lutherans, as there were theologians eminent for learning and rank. At the head of them all stand Luther and Melancthon; the former of whom, besides other portions of the divine records, expounded particularly the book of Genesis with great copiousness and sagacity; the expositions of the latter on Paul's Epistles and his other labours of this kind are well known. Next to these, a high rank among the biblical expositors was attained by Matthias Flacius, whose Glosses and Key to the holy Scriptures were very useful for understanding the sacred writers; by John Bugenhagen, Justin Jonas, Andrew Osiander, and Martin Chemnitz, whose Harmonies of the Gospels were of great value; by Victorinus Strigelius, and by Joachim Camerarius, who in his Commentary on the New Testament acted the part merely of a grammarian, as he himself informs us, or in other words, calling in the aid of polite literature in which he was well versed, he investigated and explained simply the import of the words and phrases, neglecting all theological discussions and controversies.

16. All these interpreters of the holy volume abandoned the uncertain and fallacious method of the ancients, who neglected the literal sense, and laboured to extort from the holy oracles by the aid of the fancy a kind of recondite meaning, or in other words, to divert them without reason to inappropriate applications. On the contrary, it was their first and great aim to ascertain the import of the words, or what it is they express; adopting that golden rule of all sound interpretation which

Luther first introduced, namely, that all the sacred books contain but one single meaning. Yet it must be confessed that very many did not wholly lay aside the inveterate custom of extracting secret and concealed meanings from the language of the inspired writers, but were over-wise in applying the oracles of the Old Testament prophets to our Saviour, and in eliciting from ancient history prefigurations of future events. Moreover, all the expositors of this century may be divided, I conceive, into two classes. Some followed the example of Luther, who first explains in a free and familiar manner the import of the sacred text, and then makes application of it to theological controversies, to doctrines, and to practical duties. But others were better pleased with Melancthon's method, who first divides the discourses of the inspired writers into their constituent parts, or analyzes them according to rhetorical principles; and then closely and minutely surveys each part, rarely departing from the literal meaning, and but sparingly touching upon doctrines and controversies.

17. Philip Melancthon first reduced the theology of the Lutherans to a regular system, in his Loci Communes; and this work, afterwards enlarged and amended by the author, was in such estimation during this century and even longer, that it served as the common guide to all teachers of theology, both in their lectures and their written treatises.¹ The very title of the book shows that the doctrines of revealed religion are not here arranged artificially, or digested into a philosophical system, but are proposed in that free and artless manner which the genius of the author preferred. His mode of stating and explaining truth, especially in the earlier editions, is very simple and unencumbered with the terms, the definitions, and distinctions of the philosophers. For this first age of the Lutheran church, as well as Luther himself, wished to discard and to avoid altogether the subtleties and syllogisms of the dialectic and scholastic doctors. But the sophistry of their adversaries and the perpetual contests with them in process of time caused this artless mode of teaching to be almost wholly laid aside. Even Melancthon himself led the way, by introducing gradually into his Loci Communes many things taken from the armoury of the philosophers, with a view to meet the fallacies of opposers. And afterwards, when the founders of the church were no more, and when the Jesuits and others resolutely attacked the purified church with the old scholastic arms, this crafty mode of warfare had such influence upon our theologians, that they restored the thorny mode of explaining divine truth which Luther and his companions had discarded, and employed in the explication of religious doctrines all the intricacies and barbarism of the scholastic philosophy. Several very distinguished and excellent men near the close of the century were exceedingly dissatisfied with this change, and bitterly lamented the loss of the ancient simplicity; but they could not at all persuade the teachers in the universities to return to Luther's sober and inartificial method of teaching. For they said, Necessity must govern us, rather than examples and authorities.

¹ See Buddeus, Isagoge ad Theologiam, lib. II. cap. I. sec. xiii. vol. I. p. 381, and the authors named by him.

18. That practical theology should be restored to its purity by the same persons who exploded a corrupt doctrinal theology, might readily be supposed by such as understand the intimate natural connexion between them. And in fact more may be learned respecting real piety from the few writings of Luther, Melancthon, Weller,¹ and the two Riviers,²—not to mention others,—than from all the volumes of the casuists, and the moralisers (moralisantes) as they were barbarously called. And yet in this department also, all the truth did not at once show itself to those excellent men. It appears rather from the various controversies agitated in this century respecting the extent of Christian duties, and from the answers which even great men gave to questions proposed to them respecting the divine law, that all the first and fundamental principles of Christian duty were not fully settled; nor was it universally understood how far the law of nature and the precepts of Christianity coincide and wherein they differ, or what there is in revealed religion consonant to the dictates of reason, and what that lies beyond the province of reason. If the fury of their numerous enemies had allowed the Lutheran doctors more leisure and more opportunity to cultivate and diffuse religion, they would doubtless have been free from these faults, and would not have fallen below the more modern teachers. And the same answer may be given to those who think it strange that no one, among so many excellent men,—not even Melancthon, who seemed formed by nature for such an undertaking,—should have thought of collecting and arranging the first principles of morals and forming a system of practical religion, but should have included all his instructions under the heads of the law, sin, free-will, faith, hope, and charity.

19. To designate any one as a noted theologian of this age is the same as to say that he was an ardent and energetic polemic. For the misfortunes of the times and the multiplicity of contests both internal and external required all to take up arms. Among these defenders of the truth, all who were contemporary with Luther or who lived near his time studied simplicity; nor did they assail their adversaries except with the arguments afforded by the holy Scriptures, and with the authority of the early fathers of the church. Those who flourished in the latter part of the century came forth armed with the weapons of the Aristotelian philosophy, and therefore are less lucid. The cause of this change is to be sought for in their adversaries, especially the papists. For the latter, having learned by sad experience that the plain and explicit mode of reasoning was ruinous to their cause, involved themselves and their opinions in all the absurdities and artifices of the scholastic doctors. And this led our theologians to think, that they must fight with the same weapons with which they were attacked. Moreover all disputants of this age, if we except Melancthon, to whom Providence had given a mild and modest spirit, are thought at this day to have been much too bitter and acrimonious, and no one more so than Luther himself, who inveighed against his adversaries, as is manifest, in the coarsest manner and without regard to rank or dignity. Yet this fault will appear much alleviated, if it be estimated according to the customs of those times and if compared with the ferocity and cruelty of his opposers. Is it not allowable to designate malignant railers and ferocious tyrants, who labour to destroy, and actually do destroy with fire and sword, the holy souls whom they cannot vanquish in argument, by applying to them the epithets appropriate to their crimes?

20. The internal history of the Lutheran church and of the changes which took place in it, if we would render the subject easy of comprehension and make the causes of events intelligible, must be divided into three periods. The first extends from the commencement of the Reformation to the death of Luther in 1546. The second embraces what occurred between the death of Luther and that of Melancthon in 1560. The third period contains the remainder of the century. In the first period, everything among the Lutherans took place according to the will and pleasure of Luther, who, being a man of great energy of character, and possessing unbounded influence everywhere, suppressed without difficulty all commotions and disturbances which arose, and did not suffer nascent sects to attain maturity and acquire strength in his new community. Hence so long as Luther lived, the internal state of the church was tranquil and peaceful; and those who were disposed to foment divisions had to be quiet, or else retire beyond the bounds of the church and seek residence elsewhere.

¹ Jerome Weller was born at Freyberg in Meissen, was long familiar with Luther at Wittenberg, and died the superintendent and inspector of schools in his native place, A.D. 1572. He was a practical theologian, and left many edifying and enlightened writings, which prove him a man of great experience.—Schl.

² There were two Riviers, both called John; the one was of Westphalia and a famous schoolmaster of his times, who taught at Cologne, Zwickau, Annaberg, Schneoberg, and Freyberg, and was afterwards counsellor to Augustus, elector of Saxony, and at last inspector of schools at Meissen. He died in 1553, and left many moral writings in Latin. The other John Rivier was of Venice, and lived near the same time; but whether he wrote anything on morals I know not. See Teissler's Éloge des Hommes Sains, tome I. p. 153. &c. and Melchior Adamus, Vite Germanor. Philosophorum, p. 60, &c.—Schl.

21. The infancy of the new church was disturbed by a set of delirious fanatics who turned the world upside down, and who imagined that they were moved by a divine afflatus to set up a new kingdom of Christ free from all sin. The leaders of this turbulent and discordant tribe were Thomas Munzer, Nicholas Storch, Mark Stübner, and others, partly Germans and partly Swiss, who greatly disquieted some parts of Europe especially Germany, and raised tumults among the ignorant multitude, in some places very great, in others less, but everywhere formidable.¹ The history of these people is very obscure and perplexed, for it has not been methodically written, nor could it easily be so if one were disposed to narrate it; because men of this sort, of dubious sanctity, and differing variously from each other in opinions, everywhere roamed about; nor did the state of the times produce diligent recorders of such tumultuous proceedings. This however is certain, that the worst members of this motley company constituted that seditious band which produced the rustic war in Germany, and also that which afterwards disturbed Westphalia and settled itself at Munster; while the more respectable members, terrified by the miseries and slaughter of their companions, joined themselves at last to the sect called Mennonites. The vigilance, courage, and zeal of Luther prevented his community from being rent asunder by this sort of people, and kept the fickle and credulous populace from being deceived and led astray by them, as they would undoubtedly have been if he had possessed less energy of character.

22. Andrew Carlstadt, a Franconian and colleague of Luther, a man neither perverse nor unlearned though precipitate, was too ready to listen to this sort of men; and therefore in the year 1522, while Luther was absent, he raised no little commotion at Wittemberg, by casting the images out of the churches and by other hazardous innovations. But Luther suddenly returned, and his presence and discourses calmed the tumult. Returning now from Wittemberg to Orlamund, Carlstadt not only opposed Luther's opinions respecting the Lord's Supper, but in many other things also showed a mind not averse from fanatical sentiments.² He was therefore expelled from Saxony and went over to the Swiss, among whom he taught, first at Zurich and then at Basil; and as long as he lived he showed himself inclined to the side of the Anabaptists and of the men who made pretensions to divine visions.³ This second commotion therefore Luther happily terminated in a short time.

¹ See Löscher's Historia Motuum inter Lutheranos et Reformatos, p. 1, cap. i.; Gerdes, Vita Carolostadii, in his Miscell. Gröning. tom. i. p. 1, and most of the historians of the Reformation. [See above, p. 575, note 1.—Mur.]

² This affirmation of Mosheim needs much to be modified. In the original it stands thus: "Dum vixit vero Anabaptistarum, hominumque divina visa jactantium partibus amicis sese ostendit;" i.e. as long as he lived, he showed himself a friend to the Anabaptists, and other enthusiasts who pretended to divine inspiration. But how could our historian assert this without restriction, since it is well known that Carlstadt after his banishment from Saxony, composed a treatise against enthusiasm in general, and against the extravagant tenets and the violent proceedings of the Anabaptists in particular? Nay, more: this treatise was addressed to Luther, who was so affected by it that repenting of the unworthy treatment he had given to Carlstadt, he pleaded his cause, and obtained from the elector a permission for him to return into Saxony.—See Gerdes, Vita Carolostadii, in his Miscell. Gröning. After this reconciliation with Luther he composed a treatise on the eucharist, which breathes the most amiable spirit of moderation and humility; and having perused the writings of Zuingli, where he saw his own sentiments on that subject maintained with the greatest perspicuity and force of evidence, he repaired a second time to Zurich and from thence to Basil, where he was admitted to the offices of pastor and professor of divinity, and where, after having lived in the exemplary and constant practice of every Christian virtue, he died amidst the warmest effusions of piety and resignation, on the 25th of December, 1541. All this is testified solemnly in a letter of the learned and pious Gryneus of Basil to Pitiscus, chaplain to the elector Palatine, and shows how little credit ought to be given to the assertions of the ignorant Moveri, or to the insinuations of the insidious Bossuet.—Mur. [A full life of this extraordinary and eccentric reformer is much needed. That by Gerdes, referred to by Mosheim,

³ Jo. Baptist Ott has collected much relating to these events in his Annales Anabaptist. p. 8, &c. and with him may be joined nearly all the historians of the Reformation. [The War of the Peasants in 1525 was noticed in sec. i. chap. ii. sec. 21. p. 578, &c. above, and that of the Anabaptists in Westphalia, A.D. 1535, ibid. chap. iii. sec. 10. p. 591. The rise of the sect of Mennonites will be considered in the 3d chapter of this second part of the present section.—Mur.]

23. A man of similar turn of mind was Casper Schwenckfeld of Ossigk [or Ossig], a Silesian knight, counsellor to the duke of Liegnitz, who with Valentine Crautwald, a learned man living at the court of Liegnitz, saw many deficiencies in Luther's opinions and regulations; and undoubtedly, if Luther and others had not strenuously resisted him, he would have produced a schism and a sect of considerable magnitude. For he led a blameless and upright life, recommended and laboured to promote piety among the people with peculiar earnestness; and by these means so captivated very many even learned and discreet men, both among the Lutherans and the Zwinglians, that they thought it their duty to patronise him and to defend him against his opponents.¹ But in the year 1528 he was banished by the duke both from the court and the country, because Zwingli had declared that Schwenckfeld's sentiments respecting the Lord's Supper were not different from his own. From this time he wandered through various provinces and experienced various fortunes till his death in 1561.² He left a little community in his native Silesia, whom the papists in our own time ordered to quit the country, but whom the king of Prussia in the year 1742 permitted to return to their former habitations.³

24. Schwenckfeld merits the praise of good intentions, piety, and zeal for promoting religion; but not the praise of discretion, sound judgment, and intelligence. The good man inclined towards what is called fanaticism, and he supposed that he was taught by the Spirit of God. From Luther and the other professors of the Reformed religion he differed principally on three points; for I pass over inferences from his principles and minor points of doctrine. (I.) In regard to the Lord's Supper, he inverted the words of Christ, "This is my body," and would have them understood thus: "My body is this;" that is, is such as this bread which is broken and eaten; or, it is real food for the soul, nourishes, satisfies, delights it. And "my is not complete, as it extends only to 1523; and the fifty-one letters which he has inscribed in the fourth volume of his Miscellanea Groeningana or Serininian Antiq. (p. 291, &c.) from Carlstadt to Spalatin, end at the year 1521. I have not seen Füssly's Lebensges. And. Bodenstein oder Carlstadt, Erlang. 1776. Ranke, though he touches only incidentally on Carlstadt, supplies, as usual, additional information taken from his works now so rare, as to the extreme views which he promulgated at Wittenberg in 1522. Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation, vol. ii. p. 19, 20, and 24—27. See also respecting him, Welsmann, Memorialia Hist. Sacr. vol. i. p. 1416, &c.; and respecting his death and the Lutheran calumnies thereon, see the new and extended edition of Ruchat's Hist. de la Réformation de Suisse, Nyon, 7 vols. 8vo, vol. v. p. 168, &c.—R.

¹ See Fueslin's Centuria I. Epistolarum a Reformatore. Helvet. Scripturum, p. 169, 175, 225; Museum Helvet. tom. iv. p. 445, &c.

² Wigand's Schwenckfeldianismus, Lips. 1586, 4to; Schlißburg's whole tenth book of his Catalogus Hæreticorum, Frankf. 1599, 8vo. But the history of Schwenckfeld is most studiously investigated and accompanied with vindications of him, by Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, book xvi. chap. xx. p. 720, &c. [vol. i. p. 835—856, and p. 1246—1292, ed. Schaffhausen, 1740, fol.—Mur.] and by Salig, Geschichte der Augsburg. Confession, vol. iii. book xi. p. 961, &c. [Schwenckfeld was born in the year 1490, and was employed in the courts of Munsterberg and Liegnitz, and held a canonry at Liegnitz. He aided the Reformation in Silesia; but Luther's reformation in his view did not go far enough. He not only wished for a stricter church discipline, but he also found some fault with certain points of doctrine. As early as the year 1524, he commenced an attack upon the Evangelical church, by his essay on the abuse of the Gospel to carnal security; and the year following he brought forward his new opinion respecting the eucharist. According to the epistle of the superintendent of Liegnitz, Simon Gryneus, to Abraham Scultetus of Heidelberg (in the Supplement, ad Ind. i. Histor. No. 28 of Sockendorf's Historia Lutheranismi), it was not merely the duke who banished Schwenckfeld from Silesia, but also Ferdinand king of the Romans. He seems to have drawn on himself the hatred of this lord, chiefly by his opinion concerning the eucharist, which he defended in the year 1529 by a writing printed at Liegnitz with a preface by Capito. From Silesia he retired to Strasburg, where he was supported for some time by the preachers Matthew Zell and Capito. Afterwards he resided in several imperial cities of Swabia, and died at Ulm in 1561, after having obtained many followers in Alsace, the territory of Wurtemberg, and other places. His writings were at first printed separately, but after his death collectively at two different times, namely, in 1564, in two parts, or 4 vols. fol. and in 1592 in 4 large vols. 4to. The greater part of them were also published in 1566 fol. under the title of Epistolæ des edlen von Gott hochbegnadigten theueren Mannes Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossigk, &c. Besides these he left various manuscripts which are in the Wolfenbüttele library, and which Salig consulted. One tolerable and devotional tract is on the Love of God, and was printed at Amsterdam, 1594, 8vo.—Crautwald was a professor and a pastor at Liegnitz, a promoter of the Reformation, but who afterwards sided with Schwenckfeld, participated in his views of the eucharist, and published various writings under the name of Valentine Cratoald. Other adherents of Schwenckfeld were Werner, court preacher to the duke of Liegnitz, who was displaced in 1540, after being sent by the duke to Wittenberg to be better instructed by Luther and Melancthon. He now retired to the county of Glatz, where he established a school at Rengersdorf, and composed a Catechism and a Postille under the name of Sigm. Rengersdorfer. The catechism is still regarded by the Schwenckfelders as one of their best elementary books, and the postille is often used in their religious worship. Besides these, in the middle of the following century lived one Daniel Frederle, who in 1613 published the secret of self-examination. See concerning him Arnold, ubi supra, vol. iv. sec. ii. No. 24.—Schl.

³ On the confessions of the Schwenckfelders, see Köcher's Biblioth. Theol. Synodica, p. 457. [Most of the Schwenckfelders joined the body after the death of Schwenckfeld, when the concealed Protestants in Bohemia, the county of Glatz, and Silesia, obtained possession of his writings, which were spread abroad in great numbers; and they established congregations principally in the territories of Liegnitz, Hirschberg, and Goldberg. But as they were often severely persecuted under the Austrian government, especially since the year 1718, and were harassed by the Jesuit missionaries, hence the greater part of them retired to Pennsylvania, where they set up congregations and held communion with other fanatical parties. Others who remained in the vicinity being invited back, returned when the country fell under the Prussian government. See Baumgarten's Geschichte der Religions-Parteyen, p. 1059, &c.—Schl.]

blood is this," namely, like wine which refreshes and strengthens the soul. And this singular doctrine he said had been divinely communicated to him, which alone shows how weak his mind and discernment were.¹ (II.) In regard to the efficacy of the word of God, he denied that there is efficacy in the external word, as written down in the inspired books, to heal, illuminate, and regenerate the minds of men. This efficacy he ascribed to the internal word, which he said was Christ himself. But of this internal word he expresses himself in his usual manner, without uniformity and clearness; so that it is not easy to decide whether he held the same views with the Mystics and the Quakers, or differed from them. (III.) In regard to the human nature of Christ, it displeased him to hear the human nature of Christ denominated a creature or created existence, in what theologians call its state of exaltation; for this language he thought below the dignity and majesty of Christ's human nature, since it had become united with the divine nature in one person. This opinion appeared to resemble what is called the Eutychian doctrine. But Schwenckfeld would not be considered a Eutychian, and on the contrary accused those of Nestorianism who called the human nature of Christ a creature.

¹ He also discarded infant baptism, though he did not require those baptized in infancy to be rebaptized, and therefore differed in this from the Anabaptists. Hence Grynæus informs us (in Seckendorf's Hist. Lutheranismi, Suppl. ad Ind. i. No. 28), that in the year 1526 infant baptism was nearly done away among the Schwenckfelders.—Schl. [The Lutheran writers thus tax Schwenckfeld with discarding infant baptism. The fact was, he placed no reliance upon any outward rites for the salvation of the soul, and was strongly opposed to the prevailing idea that water baptism was necessary to the salvation of any one. Baptism in the blood of Christ, or spiritual baptism, was everything in his estimation. And he deemed it proper, though not essential, that this spiritual baptism should precede water baptism. See Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, book xvi. chap. xx. sec. xiii. xiv. vol. i. p. 842, &c. and p. 1271. Neither does Grynæus (in the passage in Seckendorf mentioned by Schlegel) intimate that Schwenckfeld treated infant baptism with any greater neglect or disrespect than he did the Lord's Supper and other external rites. His words are these: "Eo vero, anno 1526, progressi cœpit fanaticorum insaniam, ut administratio sacræ cœnæ aliquandiu plane intermiserit, paedobaptismus quoque penitus prope fuerit extinctus."—Mur.

² Likewise in respect to the church he held singular opinions. He regarded it as a visible community of believers only, and therefore held that no hypocrite should be tolerated in the Christian church; that an absolute purity, not only of the church generally or as a body, but also of the individual members of it, was possible, and he therefore wished to restore the ancient church discipline in all its vigour. He likewise taught that all the ministrations of unconverted preachers were inefficient, and that the whole efficacy of the sacred ministry depended on the gracious state of the preachers, or on the Spirit and internal word of God residing in them. On the whole, Schwenckfeld possessed too little true philosophy to state correctly and to substantiate his own views, and too little

25. As Luther taught that the gospel or the doctrine of a salvation procured for mankind by Jesus Christ should be inculcated on the people, and censured and chastised the papists for confounding the law and the gospel, and for promising men salvation by obedience to the law, John Agricola, a native of Eisleben and a celebrated divine of the Lutheran church, though an ostentatious and fickle man, thence took occasion in the year 1538 to teach that the law should be wholly excluded from the church, and never be taught to the people; and that the gospel alone should be taught, both in the schools and from the pulpit. Those who agreed in this with Agricola were called Antinomians or enemies of the law. But this sect also was suppressed in its very origin by the energy and the influence of Luther; and Agricola, through fear of so great a man, confessed and renounced his error. It is said however that Luther, the lion whom he dreaded, being dead, he returned to the opinion he had renounced, and drew some persons to embrace it.³

26. The opinions of the Antinomians were most pernicious, if we may believe their adversaries. For they are said to acquaintance with their original languages to expound the Scriptures correctly. He first learned Greek from Crautwald.—Schl.

³ See Sagittarius, Introductio ad Historiam Ecclesiast. tom. i. p. 838, &c.; Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Libériens, tome ii. p. 1567 [and art. Agricola, tome i. p. 100]; Schlüsselburg, Catalogus Hæreticor. lib. iv.; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, book xvi. chap. xxv. p. 813, &c. [By the writers of those times he is generally called Master Eisleben. He was a pupil of Luther; and in 1530, when the Augsburg Confession was presented, he aided Luther in defending it. His character was not the best. He was a restless, fiery, contentious man, negligent in duty, and more of a courtier than was becoming in a minister. He was a rector and preacher, and after his dismissal read lectures at Wittenberg. Perhaps rivalry between the two colleagues, Melancthon and Agricola, and the desire of the latter to obtain the pre-eminence, rather than honest zeal for rescuing the truth from perversion, occasioned this contest. Agricola thought that Melancthon, in the articles which he drew up for visitation of the churches, had deviated from the sentiments of Luther and other reformers; that he held the use of the law under the N. Test. to be indispensable for conversion; and he wrote some propositions in opposition, which are printed in Luther's Works (ed. Altenb. vol. vii. p. 310), and bear the title: Positiones inter fratres sparæ. Luther confuted them in six discussions, and Agricola was now bound to retract, which he did at Wittenberg. But on leaving Wittenberg in 1540 and retiring to Berlin, where he possessed the good-will of the electoral prince in a high degree and was employed in furthering the Reformation, he did not cease occasionally to advance his propositions. Upon occasion of the Interim, he fell into the opposite error of the meritorious nature of good works. Among his adherents, James Schenk, superintendent at Freyberg in Meissen, was the most famous. He was dismissed in 1539 on account of his Antinomian opinions, when, appearing to retract, he was called to Lelpitz, but again bringing them forward he was dismissed the second time. See also Walch's Einleitung in die Streitigkeiten der Evangelien. Luth. Kirche, chap. ii. sec. x. p. 115.—Schl.

have taught that a person may live as he lists, and break the law by sinning at his pleasure, provided he holds to Christ and has faith in his merits. But if we consider the whole subject with candour, we may readily believe that Agricola did not teach such impious and absurd doctrines; though he might sometimes utter harsh expressions which were liable to misrepresentation and perversion. By the law, Agricola understood the ten commandments of Moses, which he supposed were a law enacted especially for the Jews and not for Christians. The term gospel he used in a broad sense, as including not only the doctrine of Christ's merits and of salvation by faith, but likewise all that Christ and his apostles inculcated respecting holiness of life and the duties of men. Removing therefore the unsuitable modes of expression and the integuments of his doctrine, he seems to have held merely this—that the ten commandments of Moses were promulgated especially for the Jews, and of course might be neglected and laid aside among Christians; and that it would be sufficient to explain distinctly and to inculcate on the people what Christ and his disciples had taught us in the books of the New Testament, respecting both the way of salvation and repentance and a holy life. Most of the doctors of that age express their views with little precision and uniformity, and do not give us accurate definitions; and hence it often happens that they are understood by others differently from their real meaning.

27. On the death of Luther, in 1546, Philip Melancthon became the head and leader of the theologians of the Lutheran church. He was undoubtedly a great and excellent man, but much inferior to Luther in many respects,¹ especially in strength of mind, fortitude, and influence over others. For he was mild and gentle, excessively fond of peace and tranquillity, timid, and shrinking before the resentment or wrath of the powerful; in short, one who could secure the attachment and love of others, but who was not competent to terrify, to repress, and hold in awe the authors of disturbance and of new opinions. He also dissented from Luther on some subjects. For (I.) he thought that for the sake of peace many things may be given up and be borne with in the Romish church, which Luther thought could by no means be endured; indeed he did not hesitate to admit, that the ancient form of church government and even the supremacy of the Roman pontiff might be retained on certain conditions, and provided the truth as clearly taught in the holy Scriptures could be maintained. (II.) He supposed that certain opinions maintained by Luther against the papists,—for instance, concerning faith as the sole ground of justification, the necessity of good works in order to salvation, and the inability of man to convert himself to God,—might be softened down a little, so as not to give occasion to others to mistake. (III.) Though he believed with Luther in regard to the Lord's Supper, yet he thought the controversy with the Swiss on that subject was not of such moment that the parties could not maintain brotherly affection; that it would be a sufficient provision for peace and concord, if the doctrine in regard to the Lord's Supper were stated in ambiguous terms and phrases, on which each party could put his own construction. These opinions he did not indeed wholly dissemble and conceal during Luther's lifetime; but he proposed them with modesty, and always succumbed to Luther, whom he honoured and feared. But when Luther was dead, all that he had taught cautiously and timidly he now brought forward much more openly and explicitly. And all these things caused the Lutheran church, while he stood at the head of her theologians, to lose that peace which had been enjoyed under Luther, and to become in some measure the scene of many and fierce contests and commotions.

28. The commencement of these calamities was in the year 1548, when Maurice, the new elector of Saxony, directed Melancthon and the divines of Wittenberg and Leipsic to assemble at Leipsic, and to consider how far the noted Interim which Charles V. would obtrude upon Germany might be received. Melancthon, partly through fear of the emperor and partly from his native mildness and moderation, here decided with the concurrence of the other divines that in things indifferent (in rebus adiaphoris) the will of the emperor might be obeyed.* Among things indif-

¹ It would certainly be very difficult to point out the many respects in which Mosheim affirms that Luther was superior to Melancthon. For if the single article of courage and firmness be excepted, I know no other respect in which Melancthon is not superior, or at least equal, to Luther. He was certainly his equal in piety and virtue, and much his superior in learning, judgment, meekness, and humanity.—Macl.

* The paper containing the opinion of Melancthon and the other divines respecting things indifferent, or the result of their deliberations, is commonly called The Leipsic Interim (Das Leipsiger Interim), and was republished by Bleek, in his work entitled, Das Dreyfache Interim, Leipsic, 1721, 8vo. [This Interim is properly an appendage to the result of the diet of Leipsic, Dec. 22, 1548. In it the theologians define ferent or Adiaphora, Melancthon and his associates reckoned many things which Luther deemed of great importance, and which therefore his genuine followers could not account indifferent; for instance, the doctrine of justification before God by faith alone, the necessity of good works in order to salvation, the number of the sacraments, several ceremonies contaminated with superstition, extreme unction, the dominion of the Roman pontiff and of bishops, certain feast days long abrogated, and other things. Hence arose the violent contest called the Adiaphoristic controversy;¹ which was protracted many years, and in which the defenders and advocates of the old doctrines of Luther (at the head of whom was Matthias Flacius of Illyricum) opposed with immense fervour the Wittenberg and Leipsic divines, especially Melancthon, by whose counsel and influence the whole had been brought about, and accused them of apostacy from the true religion. On the other hand, Melancthon and his disciples and friends defended his conduct with all their strength.²

what they regard as indifferent liturgical matters which might be admitted, to please the emperor and at his command. Among them were the papal dresses for priests, the apparel used at mass, the surplice, and many customs evidently indicative of worship paid to the host, such as tolling and ringing bells at the elevation of the host. Besides Melancthon, there were present at this diet, Paul Eber, Bugenhagen, and George Major of the Wittenberg divines, and Pfeflinger of Leipsic; likewise the bishop of Merseburg, prince George of Anhalt, and Justus Menius. This Leipsic Interim must be distinguished from that of Augsburg, and from the still older one of Regensburg [Ratisbon] of both of which, notice has already been taken.—Schl.

¹ Adiaphoristic, from adiaphoros, indifferent. Melancthon and those who thought with him were called Adiaphorists.—Mur.

² Schlüsselburg, Catalogus Hæreticorum, lib. xiii.; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, book xvi. chap. xxvi. p. 816; Sallig's Historie der Augsbürgischen Confession, vol. i. p. 611, &c.; Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1702, p. 339, 393; Osiander, Epitome Historiæ Eccles. cent. xvi. p. 502, &c. [From the records of these contests (many of which are given by Schlüsselburg especially), it appears that besides the points already mentioned, they contended about the use of Latin formulas of worship, and about chanting them; whether the prayers in public worship, and particularly at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, should be read or sung; respecting the observance of various times of worship, as vespers, matins, the canonical hours, and the days devoted to St. Mary and the Apostles. The most of these, though previously abolished, had already been again introduced in electoral Saxony and Brandenburg, by prince Maurice in order to please Charles V. and likewise in most of the imperial cities; among which Nuremberg stood prominent, because there most of the preachers were Philippists.—Schl. [The representations of Mosheim in the text would seem to imply, what was by no means the fact, that Melancthon rejected the doctrine of justification by faith alone, maintained salvation by works, and admitted seven sacraments, &c. Schlegel's representations on the contrary would seem to imply that Melancthon only conceded the lawfulness of yielding to the imposition of certain ceremonies and forms of worship. According to Schroeckh (Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. iv. p. C90, &c.), the Augsburg Interim, which the emperor would force upon his subjects, con-

In this sad and perilous controversy there were two principal points at issue. First, whether the things which Melancthon deemed indifferent actually were so, which his adversaries denied. Secondly, whether it is lawful in things indifferent and not essential to religion to succumb to the enemies of truth.

29. This Adiaphoristic controversy was the fruitful parent of other and equally pernicious contests. In the first place, it produced the contest with George Major, a divine of Wittenberg, respecting the necessity of good works to salvation. Melancthon had long been accustomed to concede, and in the consultation at Leipsic in 1548 respecting the Interim, he with his associates confessed, that it might be said without prejudice to the truth that good works are necessary to salvation. But as the defenders of the old Lutheran theology censured this declaration, as being contrary to the doctrine of Luther and highly useful to the popish cause, Major in the year 1552 defended it against Nicholas Amsdorf, in a tract expressly on the subject of the necessity of good works. And now broke out again a fierce and bitter contest, such as all the religious controversies of that age were, between the more rigid Lutherans and the more lax. And in the course of it, Nicholas Amsdorf, a strenuous vindicator of Luther's doctrines, was carried so far by the heat of controversy as to maintain that good works are pernicious to salvation, tained nearly the whole system of the Romish theology, both as to faith and practice; yet expressed throughout in the most accommodating and unexceptionable language. Melancthon and the other divines endeavoured so to modify this Interim, that the Protestants might conscientiously yield to it under the existing circumstances. They therefore altered and interpolated the doctrinal articles, and sifted and modified those relating to worship and ceremonies. They allowed the pope to remain at the head of the church, but without conceding to him a divine right, and without allowing him to be the arbiter of faith. The seven sacraments were permitted to remain, as religious rites, but not under the denomination of sacraments, nor as efficacious to salvation in the popish sense. The mass was represented as merely a repetition of the Lord's supper. Good works were allowed to be necessary to salvation, yet not as the meritorious ground of justification, but only as an essential part of the Christian character. Salvation was wholly by grace, through faith in the merits of Christ. Thus they supposed that they secured to be saddled with a load of religion, and only consented to be saddled with a load of cumbersome and injudicious ceremonies, rather than incur the vengeance of the emperor and expose the whole Reformation to danger. Melancthon's actual belief is to be learned from his Loci Communes or System of Theology; no essential part of which, as he supposed, was given up in the Leipsic Interim.—Mur. [On this painful controversy see Ranke's Deutsche Gesch. im Zeitalter d. Reform. vol. v. p. 36, &c. and vol. vi. p. 435, &c.; Gieseler, Lehrbuch d. neueren Kirchengesch. vol. i. p. 346, &c.; Sitt's Paul Eber, ein Beitrag zur Gesch. des Reformationszeit. Heidel. 1843. The English reader may consult Scott's Continuation of Milner's Ch. Hist. vol. ii. p. 46, &c.—R.

which imprudent admission furnished fresh matter for controversy. Major bitterly complained that his opinion was misrepresented by his opponents; and at last, that he might not appear to continue the war and disturb the church unreasonably, he gave it up. Yet the dispute was continued and was terminated only by the Formula of Concord.¹

30. From the same source arose what is called the Synergistic² controversy. The Synergists were nearly the same as the Semipelagians; i.e. they were persons who supposed that God is not the sole author of our conversion to him, but that man co-operates with God in the renovation of his own mind. On this subject also Melancthon differed at least in words from Luther; and in the Leipzig conference he did not hesitate to say that God so draws and converts adults, that some agency of their wills accompanies his influences. The pupils and friends of Melancthon adopted his language. But the strenuous Lutherans conceived that this sentiment contravened and subverted Luther's doctrine of the servitude of the will, or of man's impotence to regenerate himself and to perform any good actions; and they therefore violently assailed the persons whom they denominated Synergists. In this contest, the principal champions were Victorin Strigel, who the most openly and ingeniously defended the Melancthonian doctrine, and Matthias Flacius, who defended the old opinion of Luther. Of these men we shall give an account shortly.³

¹ Schlüsselburg, Catalog. Hæreticor. lib. vii.; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzehistorie, book xvi. chap. xxvii. p. 822, &c.; Museum, Pælect. in Form. Concord. p. 181, &c.; Grevius, Memoria Joh. Westphali, p. 166, &c. [Schlegel here inserts a long note, showing that neither Melancthon nor Major maintained justification on the ground of merit or of good works, though they held good works to be necessary in some sense to a man's salvation. It seems the parties misunderstood each other; and that both used very unguarded language, which led them into furious conflicts, for which there was no sufficient cause.—Mur.]

² From συνεργεα, co-operation.—Mur.

³ See Schlüsselburg, Catalogus Hæreticor. lib. v.; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzehistorie, b. xvi. chap. xxviii. p. 826, &c.; Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Synergistes, tome iii. p. 2898; Salig, Histoire der Augsb. Confession, vol. iii. p. 474, 587, 880, &c.; Museum, Pælect. in Formulæ Concord. p. 88. [Melancthon in his early writings, as well as Luther at first, maintained with St. Augustine an irresistible operation of divine grace, according to God's unconditional decrees; and he so taught in the first edition of his Loci Communes. But afterwards, in the third and eighteenth articles of the altered Augsburg Confession, he taught that for our conversion we need only the assistance of God and his spirit; and that though weak and hard pressed, we can ourselves commence it and effect it. In his Examen Ordinandum he maintains, that there are three causes of conversion—God, the word of God, and free-will; and he seems to ascribe to free-will and to human ability an appropriate natural power, though feeble in its operation, to bring about conversion. Many of his pupils hereupon went still farther; and especially Victorin

31. In the midst of these tumults and commotions, the dukes of Saxe-Weimar (the sons of that John Frederick whose unsuccessful war with Charles V. brought on him so many evils and the loss of his electoral dignity) founded and opened a new university at Jena. And as the founders wished this school to be the seat of the true reformed religion of Luther, they called to it eminent teachers and theologians, who were distinguished for their attachment to the genuine theology of Luther, and for their hatred of all more moderate sentiments. And as none was more celebrated in this respect than Matthias Flacius, a most strenuous adversary of Philip Melancthon and of all the Philippists or moderate party, he was made professor of theology at Jena in the year 1557. But this turbulent man, whom nature had fitted to sow discord and to promote contention, not only cherished all the old controversies with vast zeal but likewise stirred up new ones, and so involved the divines of Weimar and those of electoral Saxony with each other, that the discerning were afraid of a permanent secession and schism among the Lutherans.⁴ And undoubtedly the Lutheran church would have been split into two communities, if his councils had had the effect intended; for in the year 1559, he advised his lords, the dukes of Weimar, to order a confutation of all the errors which had been broached among the Lutherans, and especially of those with which the Melancthonians were taxed, to be drawn up, published, and annexed to the formulas of faith in their territories. But this attempt to rend the Lutheran church into opposing parties proved abortive, because the other princes who were truly Lutheran disapproved of the book, and feared it would be the cause of greater evils.⁵ torin Strigel, one of his most able pupils, distinguished himself in this controversy.—Schl.

⁴ See the memorable epistle of Augustus, the prince elector, respecting Flacius and his attempts, published by Grevius, Memoria Joh. Westphali, p. 393, &c.

⁵ See Salig's Histoire der Augsb. Confession, vol. iii. p. 476, &c. [A confutation was actually drawn up by Strigel, Erhard Schnepf, and a preacher of Jena. When it was ready, the theologians of Jena and the superintendents of the whole land were called to Weimar to examine it. Flacius advised that the writers of it should not be admitted into the assembly, urging that the theologians would then express their opinions more freely, and that the presence of the writers, whose opinions might easily be known from the book itself, might occasion controversy and disunion. But the duke would not follow this advice, and the writers were called to the council. There was now a continued scene of altercation; for Flacius and others found much to censure in the confutation, and the writers of it would not allow it to be altered. The superintendents next collected together various confutations, out of which an abstract was afterwards made, which being amended by Flacius, Erasmus Sarcarius, 32. This extremely contentious man threw the Weimarian church and the university of Jena, of which he was a professor, into commotion, by his attacks upon Victorin Strigel, his colleague, who was a pupil and friend of Melancthon.¹ Strigel taught in many points according to the views of Melancthon, and especially he denied that the human mind is altogether inactive while God moves and draws it to repentance. Flacius therefore so successfully accused him of Synergism before the court of Weimar, that Strigel was put into close custody by order of the prince. From this calamity he delivered himself in 1562, by publishing an exposition of his views, and he was restored to liberty and to his office. Yet the contest did not subside here; because it was thought that he concealed his errors under ambiguous expressions, rather than renounced them. Therefore to escape being involved in new troubles, he retired from Jena first to Leipsic and then to Heidelberg where he died, leaving posterity in doubt whether he ought to be classed among the true followers of Luther or not.

33. But Flacius stirred up this controversy with Strigel greatly to his own injury, as well as to that of the whole Lutheran church. For while pursuing his adversary intemperately, he fell himself into a sentiment so monstrous and erroneous that his own friends regarded him as a heretic and a corrupter of true religion. In the year 1560 there was a formal dispute between him and Strigel at Weimar, respecting the natural power of man to regenerate himself and to do good, which Strigel seemed to exalt too much. In this conference, Strigel, who was well skilled in philosophy, with a view to cramp Flacius, asked him whether original sin or the corrupt tendency of the human soul was to be classed among substances or among accidents? Flacius most imprudently replied that it should be reckoned among substances; and thenceforth to the end of his life, he maintained the portentous sentiment that original sin is the very substance of a man, and with so much zeal and pertinacity that he would sooner part with all his honours and privileges than with this error. The greatest part of the Lutheran church condemned this Flacian doctrine, and judged it to be nearly allied to Manichæism. But the high rank of the man, his learning, and his reputation, induced many and even some very learned men, to embrace and eagerly defend his cause; among whom, Cyriac Spangenberg, Christopher Irenæus, and Cælestine, were the most celebrated.²

34. It is almost impossible to express how much this new contest afflicted those Lutheran countries in which it raged, and how much detriment it brought to the Lutheran cause among the papists. For it spread also to the churches which had a dubious toleration in papal lands, especially in the Austrian dominions; and it so excited the teachers who were surrounded by papists, that they were regardless of all prudence and danger.³ There are many who think that Flacius fell into this error through ignorance of philosophical distinctions and ideas, and that he failed more in propriety of language than in point of fact. But Flacius himself seems to refute this; for in numerous passages, he declares that he understood well the force of the word substance, and that he was not ignorant of the consequences of his doctrine.⁴ Be this as it may, it is beyond all doubt that unbridled obstinacy was in the man who would rather ruin his own fortune and disturb the peace of the church, than discard an unsuitable term and a sentiment made up of contradictions.

35. Finally, the well-known mildness of Melancthon, which Andrew Osiander condemned, gave rise to those contests which the latter in 1549 excited in the Lutheran church. For if Luther had been alive, Osiander would doubtless have not dared to bring forward and defend his new opinions. This arrogant and eccentric man, after removing from Nuremberg where he had been a pastor, to the university of Königsberg on account of the Interim, first publicly taught opinions very different from Luther's respecting penitence and the divine image, and afterwards from the year 1550,

¹ See Schlüssenburg's Catalogus Hereticorum, lib. II.; Ritter's Life of Flacius, in German, Frankf. 1725, 8vo; Sallig's Historia der Augsb. Confess. vol. III. p. 593; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, b. xvi. chap. xxix. p. 829; Musæus, Praelection. in Formulam Concord. p. 29, &c.; Leuckfeld's History of Spangenberg, in German, 1728, 4to. On the dispute at Weimar, see Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1740, p. 383, &c.

² Raupach's Zweifache Zugabe zu dem Evangelisch. Bisterrich, p. 25, 29, 32, 34, 43, 64, who treats of the Austrian Flacians, and particularly of Irenæus, Presbyterol. Austriaca, p. 69, &c. Respecting Cælestine, see Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1748, p. 314, &c.

³ See the Letters of Jo. Westphal (a friend of Flacius, and who endeavoured to persuade him to give up the term substance), addressed to Flacius, and the answers of Flacius, published by Grevius, in his Memoria Joh. Westphali, p. 186, &c.

Joachim Mürlin, and John Aurfaber, was printed in 1559 with an edict of the duke, and was afterwards admitted into the Corpus Doctrinae Thuringicæ, but Strigel from the first strenuously opposed this form of a confutation. See Narratio Action. et eorum. Matth. Flacii, in Schlüssenburg's Catal. Hereticorum, tom. xlii. p. 802, &c.—Schl.

⁴ See the biographers of Strigel; and, besides the others above mentioned, Bayle, in his Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 1262.

he did not hesitate to attempt to correct the public opinion of the Lutheran church respecting the mode of our obtaining justification before God. Yet it is easier to tell what he did not believe than what he did believe; for, according to the custom of the age, Osiander expressed his views neither with clearness nor in a uniform manner. Comparing all that he has said it seems to have been his opinion—That the man Christ Jesus could not, by his obedience to the divine law, have merited for us righteousness before God. And therefore it cannot be that we can become righteous before God, by apprehending with faith and applying to ourselves this righteousness of the man Christ Jesus. But a man obtains righteousness by that eternal and essential righteousness which resides in Christ as God, or in that divine nature which was united to the human. And of this divine righteousness, a man becomes partaker by faith. For by faith Christ dwells in the man, and together with Christ also his divine nature; and this righteousness being present in the regenerate, God on account of it regards them as righteous, although they are sinners. The same divine righteousness of Christ, moreover, excites believers to cultivate personal righteousness or holiness. The principal theologians of the Lutheran church, and among them Melancthon especially and his colleagues, impugned this doctrine. Yet Osiander had also great men to support his cause. But after his death [A.D. 1552], the controversy gradually subsided.¹

¹ See Schlüsselburg's Catalogus Hæreticor. lib. vi.; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhist. b. xvi. chap. xxiv. p. 804, &c.; Hartknoch's Preussische Kirchenhistorie, book II. chap. II. p. 309, &c.; Salig's Historie der Augsb. Confession, vol. II. p. 922. The opinion of the divines of Wittenberg respecting this controversy, may be seen in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1739, p. 141, &c. and that of the divines of Copenhagen, in the Dänischen Bibliothek, part VII. p. 150, &c. where there is a long catalogue of the writers on this controversy. Add part VIII. p. 313, &c. On the arrogance of Osiander, see Hirsch's Nürnberg. Interims-Historie, p. 44, 59, 60, &c. [Andrew Osiander, or Hosemann as his name was in German, was born at Sunzenhausen in Franconia, 1498, studied at Leipzig and Altenburg under great poverty, and then at Ingolstadt. He possessed superior native talents, and became very learned, particularly in Hebrew, mathematics, and theology. He was eloquent yet proud, self-sufficient, and contentious. In 1522, he became first preacher in a church at Nürnberg, and was there very active and highly respected, notwithstanding he advanced some singular opinions. He supposed the second person in the Trinity was that image of God after which man was fashioned; that the Son of God would have become incarnate if man had not sinned; and that repentance consisted in abhorrence of sin and forsaking it, without including faith in the Gospel. He also refused to pronounce the general absolution in public worship, which involved him in controversy. While at Nürnberg he wrote his famous Harmony of the Gospels. The margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg had been converted by his preaching, and therefore became strongly attached to him. Having founded the university of Königsberg in

36. His colleague Francis Stancarus, an Italian and professor of Hebrew at Königsberg, a turbulent and passionate man, in attempting to confute the error of Osiander respecting the mode of obtaining justification before God, fell into another opinion which appeared equally false and dangerous. Osiander maintained that the man Christ was under obligation to keep the divine law on his own account, and therefore that he could not, by obeying the law, procure righteousness for others; and of course it was not as man, but only as God, that Christ expiated the sins of mankind and procured us peace with God. Stancarus on the contrary excluded the divine nature of Christ from the work of redemption and atonement, and maintained that the office of a mediator between God and men, pertained exclusively to the human nature of Christ. Finding himself to be odious on account of this doctrine, he left Königsberg and retired first to Germany and then to Poland, where he died in 1574. He likewise excited considerable commotion in Poland.²

37. All good men friendly to the new church were the more desirous of a termination of so many bitter contests, because it was manifest that the papists turned them to their own advantage. But while Me-

1544. Albrecht placed Osiander at the head of the theological department in 1548. His colleagues disliked having a foreigner placed above them; and his bold avowal of singular opinions soon gave them occasion to break with him. He considered the justification spoken of in the New Testament to be equivalent to sanctification, or to be not a forensic act of God acquitting men from liability to punishment, but a gracious operation which conferred personal holiness. And in this sense he used the term in his theological writings. Legal justification through the imputed righteousness of Christ he would denominate redemption, and this he supposed always preceded what he called justification. The mode of justification, in his sense of the term, he supposed to be by the indwelling of Christ in the soul producing there a moral change. See Arnold, ubi supra, and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformat. vol. IV. p. 572, &c.—Mur.

² See Hartknoch's Preussische Kirchenhistorie, b. II. ch. II. p. 340, &c.; Schlüsselburg's Catalogus Hæreticor. lib. IX. the whole of it; Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Stancarus, tome III. p. 2649, &c. Before he came to Königsberg in 1548, he lived a while among the Grisons and the Swiss, and among them he occasioned disputes; for he approved of several Lutheran sentiments, particularly those respecting the efficacy of the sacraments, which were offensive to the Grisons and the Swiss. See Museum Helveticum, tom. V. p. 484, 490, 491, [and De Porta's Historia Reformat. Ecclesiar. Ræticar. lib. II. p. 89, 121.—Mur.] On the commotions he excited in Poland in 1556, see Bullinger, in Poeslin's Centuria I. Epistoliarum, &c. p. 371, 459, &c. [Stancarus is said to have contributed to the spread of Socinian sentiments in Poland, by maintaining that it was only the human nature of Christ which made the atonement, and by arguing that if the divine nature of Christ mediated between God and man, then his divine nature must have been inferior to that of God. From the first, the Socinians inferred that there was no need of any nature but the human in the Mediator; and from the second, they inferred that he could not at any rate be equal with God the Father. See Bayle, ubi supra, note G.—Mur.

lanethon, the principal cause of the disputes, continued alive, scarcely anything could be done to terminate them. But when he died in 1560, something could be attempted with more safety and better prospects. Therefore after other efforts, Augustus prince elector of Saxony, and John William duke of Weimar, in the year 1568 ordered the best theologians of both parties to assemble at Altenburg, and there discuss in a friendly manner their principal controversies; so that it might better appear in what way they could be settled. But the warmth of the disputants and other causes, prevented any good effects from this conference.¹ It was therefore thought best to try some other method of restoring harmony; and it was resolved that a formula or book should be drawn up by wise and moderate theologians, in which all those controversies should be examined and decided; and that this book, when approved by all the Lutheran princes and churches, should be annexed to the Symbolical books of the Lutheran church. To this great and difficult work, James Andr  , a theologian of T  bingen at that time in very high estimation, was appointed in the year 1569 by authority of his prince the duke of W  rtemberg, and of Julius duke of Brunswick. With these princes, Augustus of Saxony and other princes of the Lutheran communion, concurred; and supported by such authority, Andr   repeatedly travelled over Germany, and consulted with the ministers of the courts and with theologians, respecting the best method of drawing up the formula so that it might secure the assent of all.

38. This business was hastened forward by the rash temerity of Casper Peucer, the son-in-law of Melanethon, a physician and professor of physic at Wittenberg,² and by others, theologians at Wittenberg and at Leipsic, who were pupils of Melanethon. For relying on the approbation and countenance of George Cracovius, the chancellor of Dresden, and of others in the Saxon court both civilians and clergymen, they endeavoured by various clandestine arts in the year 1570 to abolish throughout Saxony

the doctrine of Luther concerning the holy supper, and to introduce in its stead the opinion of Calvin respecting both the Lord's Supper and the person of Christ. What Melanethon's final sentiments concerning the eucharist were, appears uncertain;³ though it is abundantly proved that he would willingly have united the Saxons and the Calvinists, but was prevented by his timidity from directly attempting such a union. His son-in-law, with his associates above named, openly assented to [the doctrines of] Calvin, as appears from their writings; and thus they showed more courage and resolution than their father-in-law and preceptor, but less prudence. Therefore in the year 1571, in a German book entitled The Foundation (die Grundfeste), and afterwards by other writings, they explicitly declared their dissent [from Luther] respecting the doctrine of the sacred supper and the person of Christ; and the more readily to accomplish their wishes, they introduced into the schools a new Catechism drawn up by Petzel, favourable to the doctrine of Calvin. These measures having produced commotions and disputes in the Lutheran church, Augustus of Saxony ordered his theologians and superintendents to assemble at Dresden in 1571, and declare their sentiments respecting the sacred supper. They did so, but deceitfully; and returning home, they zealously pursued the plan they had formed, and by teaching and writing and in other ways, endeavoured to extinguish the old Saxon doctrine concerning the sacred supper. The prince elector Augustus, when fully informed of this project by numerous witnesses, summoned the celebrated convention of Torgau in 1574; and having clearly learned the views of those Crypto-Calvinists as they were generally called, he imprisoned and banished some of them, and compelled others to change their sentiments. On none of them did he animadvert with greater severity than

¹ See Sagittarius, Introductio ad Hist. Ecclesiast. par. ii. p. 1542. [The subjects discussed were, the Majoristic, Synergistic, and Adiaphoristic contests. The debaters were in part Misnian and in part Thuringian divines. As all the transactions were in writing, the conferences were protracted to a great length; and on one single expression in the article on Justification, the discussion lasted five months.—Schl.]

² This Peucer, whom Mosheim mentions without any mark of distinction, was one of the wisest, most amiable, and most learned men who adorned the annals of German literature during this century; as the well-known history of his life, and the considerable number of his medical, mathematical, moral, and theological writings, abundantly testify.—Muel.

³ This is certain, that in his last years Melanethon was more inclined towards the doctrine of the Reformed respecting the holy supper; but it is also equally certain that he did not receive their whole doctrine on this subject. See his Reflections, in Latin, published by Petzel, Neustadt, 1600, 8vo. Here he writes, one year before his death, in a letter to Dr. Jo. Crato, p. 383, concerning the supper: Verum est, filium Deum adesse mysterio et in eo efficacem esse, et t  m   grotos   m  st  m   b  i t  b   m  st  m, ut Paulus disert   locutus est. Scio enim, te virum doctum recto cogitare, quid   m  st  m significet. Hanc nunc breviter scripsi, nec volo spargi in populum. And in p. 390, writing to Abraham Hardenberg, he cites a passage from Macarius' Homilies, which he thus translates: In ecclesia offertur panis et vinum antitypon carnis et sanguinis ipsius; et accipientes de pane visibili spiritaliter comedunt carnem Domini. And he subjoins: Scio te libenter tam vetus testimonium lecturum. This letter is dated Feb. 9, 1560. See also L  scher's Historia Motuum, vol. ii. p. 30, and especially p. 39, &c.—Schl.]

on Peucer, who had acted a leading part in the transaction. He was kept in constant and close confinement till the year 1585; when, being liberated at the intercession of the prince of Anhalt whose daughter Augustus had married, he retired to Zerbst.¹

39. The plans of the Crypto-Calvinists being frustrated, the prince elector and those who agreed with him, urged forward more anxiously and pressingly the business of the Formula of Concord already mentioned.² After various consultations therefore in the year 1576, James Andreü especially, in a convention of many divines assembled at Torgau by order of Augustus, drew up the treatise which was intended to give peace to the Lutheran church and to guard it against the opinions of the Reformed, and which from the place received the name of the Book of Torgau. This book after being examined, amended, and elucidated by most of the theologians of Lutheran Germany, was again submitted to certain select divines assembled at Bergen (an old Benedictine monastery near Magdeburg), and when all the suggestions from various quarters had been carefully weighed, the famous Formula of Concord was brought to its perfected state. James Andreü had for assistants at Bergen at first Martin Chemnitz and Nicholas Selnecker, and afterwards also Andrew Musculus, Christopher Cörner, and David Chyträus. The Saxons first received this new rule of the Lutheran religion by order of their prince Augustus; and the greatest part of the Lutheran churches afterwards followed their example, some sooner and others later.³ The effect of this celebrated

¹ See Schlüsselburg's Calvinistic Theology, in German, book ii. p. 207, b. iii. Pref. and p. 1-22, 52, 57, 69, b. iv. p. 246, &c.; Hutter's Concordia Concord, cap. i.-viii.; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzlerhist. book xvi. chap. xxiii. p. 389-395; Löschner's Historia Motuum inter Lutheranos et Reform. par. ii. p. 176, par. iii. p. 1, &c. Add, on the other side, Peucer's Historia Carcerum et Liberationis Dninae, published by Petzel, Zurich, 1605, 8vo. [Likewise Kiesling's Continuation of the Historia Motuum, Schwabach, 1770, cap. i. sec. ix. x. The Catechism of Petzel was printed at Wittenberg, 1571, and entitled, Catechesis continens Explicationem Decalogi, Symboli, Oratiosis Dominice, Doctrinæ de Penitentia et Sacramentis. The theologians of Jena and Lower Saxony wrote against this catechism. See Walch's Biblio. Theol. Selecta, tom. i. p. 485. The Crypto-Calvinists defended it the same year in a treatise entitled, Grundriss von der Person und Menschwerdung unseres Herrn Jesu Christi, wider die neuen Marcioniten, Samaritaner, &c. In reply, the divines of Lower Saxony wrote Die widerbelebte Christliche gemeine Confession und Erklärung, &c. At the convention of Dresden, the Consensus Dresdenensis, was drawn up, through the intervention of the court party and especially of the court preacher Schlütze or Sagittarius. It met with the greatest opposition from the foreign churches; and the houses of Brunswick, with the duke of Wurtemberg, made strong representations against it to the prince elector. Upon this, in 1574, followed the Eregetis perspicuus Controuersie de Cæna Domini, in which indeed they sought to keep up an appearance of coincidence with our symbolical books; but very manifestly took pains to defend the Melancthonian doctrine concerning the holy supper. The electoral prince prompted by so many complaints of foreign princes, who were apprehensive the religious peace might be assailed by the Catholics under the pretence of this contest, at last took measures to check the evil. He commanded certain articles to be drawn up, by the general adoption of which the religious contests might be terminated. These were actually formed in the diet of Torgau, 1574, and may be found in Hutter's Concordia Concord, p. 184, &c. They were however by the foreign theologians to whom they were sent for examination, deemed insufficient to remove the contests. But mild as these first articles were (and they must not be confounded with the articles of Torgau of 1576), yet many hesitated to subscribe them; and many who did subscribe afterwards revoked their subscription. And now resort was had to those harsh measures which never can be justified; to imprisonments and banishments, and to the forcible introduction of certain theological statements which were opposed to the statements of the Philippists. For Philippists [or Melancthonians] is the proper appellation for these Crypto-Calvinists; since they for the most part admitted the real presence in the eucharist, and questioned only the omnipresence of Christ's human nature.—Schl.

² See section 37, above.

³ The writers on the Formula of Concord are mentioned by Walch, Introductio ad Libros Symbolicos, lib. i. cap. vii. p. 707, and by Kücher, Bibliotheca Theologica Symbol. p. 188. A catalogue of unpublished documents relating to its history is extant in Unschuld. Nachricht. a.d. 1573, p. 322. The principal historians of it are Hospinian, a Swiss theologian, Concordia Discors; and Hutter, Concordia Concord; and by comparing the accounts of both, it will be easy to discriminate the true from the false, and to understand the reasons of what took place. [See Balthasar's Geschichte des Torgischen Buches nebst andern zur Historie des Concordienbuches gehörigen Nachrichten, Greifsw. 1741, &c. 4to; and Semler's edition of the book of Torgau from a contemporary manuscript document, with a compendium of the most remarkable parts of that manuscript collection, 1760, 8vo. In tracing the history of the Formula of Concord we should consider the preparatory events. These were (I.) the Swabian Concord or Formula Concordie inter Suevicos et Saxonicos Ecclesias, which was formed in 1574. By the Saxon churches must here be understood those of Lower Saxony, and in particular the Ecclesie Tripolitanae, or the churches of Hamburg, Lubeck, and Lüneburg, whose preachers were strenuous Lutherans; together with the duchies of Brunswick and Lüneburg, and the cities of Brunswick, and Magdeburg. All these united with the Swabian and especially with the Wurtemberg theologians against those of electoral Saxony; and they sent their formula to the prince elector of Saxony, in order to show him that his theologians had departed from the Lutheran doctrine, and that he could no longer be the chief director of the affairs of the Protestants. Then followed (II.) the convention at Torgau, in 1574. Next followed, by order of Lewis duke of Wurtemberg (III.) the convention of Maulbronn in 1576, where the Wurtemberg divines Lucas Oslander and Balth. Bidenbach, with the concurrence of some foreign divines, drew up what is called the Formula of Maulbronn; in which the orthodox ministers of our church state on what conditions they would unite with the divines of electoral Saxony, and recognise them as members of our church. Afterwards came (IV.) the Lichtenberg convention in Feb. 1576, in electoral Saxony, at which the Formula of Maulbronn was examined and pronounced too rigorous. Then followed (V.) the convention of Torgau in June of the same year, after the suspected divines of electoral Saxony were removed. Here the Book of Torgau was compiled from the Swabian Concord and the Maulbronn Formula, and this was the real basis of that Formula of Concord which was afterwards sent to all the German courts and churches to collect suggestions and amendments. After the suggestions of the foreign theologians were received, in the year 1577 and at the cloister of Bergen, the proper Formula of Concord was formed from the Book of Torgau. The principal person concerned in it was James Andreü, who was occupied many years in the Formula, as is well known, was to decide and terminate the many controversies which had drawn the Lutherans, especially after Luther's death, into disagreeing parties; and also to exclude from the Lutheran community the opinions of the Reformed respecting the Holy Supper and the person of Christ.

40. Yet the book which was to have restored harmony among the Lutherans, and which actually did so in many places, furnished also new ground of discord. In the first place the Reformed, and those who either favoured the Reformed or at least wished to be at peace with them for the sake of the common good, when they perceived that by this Formula all hope of healing the schism was at an end, and that the Reformed were entirely excluded from all communion with the Lutherans, violently attacked and in bitter terms censured both the Formula and its authors. Beyond the bounds of Germany, the Swiss (of whom Rudolph Hospinian was the chief) and the Belgians,¹ and in Germany those of the Palatinate,² of Anhalt, of Baden, and others, waged furious war upon the Formula. This imposed upon the Lutheran divines, and especially upon those of Saxony, the disagreeable task of defending it and its framers in various treatises.³

41. Even among the Lutherans themselves, some of the most distinguished churches could not be persuaded either by entreaties or arguments to receive the Formula, and to add it to their guides in doctrinal instruction. It was therefore rejected by the Hessians, the Pomeranians, the Nurembergers, the Holstenians (through the influence of Paul von Eitzen the superintendent-general), by the Silesians, the Danes, the Brunswickers or Julians, and others.⁴ But all these were not influenced by the same motives and arguments. Some of them, as the Holstenians, were led by their high respect and reverence for Melancthon, to abhor a book in which the opinions of so great a man were censured and exploded. Others were not only partial to Melancthon, but they also believed that some of the sentiments condemned in the Formula were nearer the truth than the prevailing views. Some were kept from approving the Formula by their secret attachment to the opinions of the Reformed, and some by the hopes they had indulged that the Reformed and the Lutheran churches might form an alliance.⁵ Some business, took a number of journeys and showed extraordinary zeal in the whole affair, yet incurred many reproaches by the ambiguous expressions which he employed. And by his influence it was that the opinions of the Swabian divines respecting the person of Christ, the communication of the attributes [of Christ's divine nature to his human] (communicatio idiomatum), and the omnipresence of Christ's human nature, which before had been only private opinions, were received into the Formula of Concord as doctrines of the whole Lutheran church. With him was joined Nicholas Selnecker, a native Frobenian of Herspruck, and at that time superintendent at Lepsic, a learned and persevering man, who had endured much persecution from the Philipists. The two others who were associated with James Andr   were still more learned, and at the same time much disposed to peace, namely, Martin Chemnitz and David Chytr  us, both pupils of Melancthon. The first was then superintendent at Brunswick, and had few equals in learning and facility in writing. He was a venerator of Melancthon, and endeavoured in many respects to find out a middle path, and to check the violence of Andr  . Hence he and Andr   may be considered as the proper composers of the instrument. Chytr  us was of Rostock. Musculus and C  rner were of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, and were famed for their zeal for Luther's doctrines, yet these had no great concern with the Book of Torgau.—Schl.

¹ Viller's Epistola Apologetica Reformaturum in Belgio Ecclesiarum ad e contra Auctores Libri Bergensis dicti Concordi  , with the notes of Renesse, republished by Gerdes in his Scrini   Antiquarium, or Miscellanea Groningana, tom. i. p. 121, &c. Add Unschuld. Nachricht, A.D. 1747, p. 957, &c.

² The palsgrave [i.e. the Elector Palatine] Jo. Casimir, in the year 1577, forthwith called a convention of the Reformed at Frankfurt for the purpose of repelling this Formula. See Altling's Hist. Eccles. Palatine, sec. 179, p. 143, &c.

³ See Walch's Introductio in Libros Symbolicos Lutheranos, lib. i. cap. vii. p. 734, &c.

⁴ On the fate of the Formula of Concord in Holstein, see Die D  nische Bibliothek, vol. iv. p. 212, &c., vol. v. p. 355; vol. viii. p. 333—403; vol. ix. p. 1, &c.; Muhlius, Dissert. Histor. Theolog. Diss. I. de Reformat. Holst., p. 103, &c.; Grovius, Memoire Pauli ab Eitzen, who however only touches upon this subject. The transactions in Denmark relative to the Formula and the causes of its rejection may be learned from the above-mentioned D  nische Bibliothek, which contains numerous documents, vol. iv. p. 222—282; and from Pontoppidan's Annales Hercul. D  nic   Diplomati  , tom. iii. p. 456, &c.; who also shows (p. 467, &c.) that what Von Elswich and others endeavour to make doubtful was a real fact, namely, that king Fredorick II. on receiving a copy of the Formula threw it into the fire and burned it. Respecting the rejection of the Formula by the Hessians, see the documents in Die D  nische Bibliothek, vol. vii. p. 273—364, vol. ix. p. 1—87. Add Tielemann's Vite Theologor. M  rurgens., p. 99, &c. Respecting the countries of Liegnitz and Brieg, see the Unschuld. Nachricht, A.D. 1745, p. 173, &c. [It cannot be denied that there were faults preceding this Formula of Concord which gave to many Lutheran churches a reasonable excuse for procrastinating or even refusing to subscribe to it. It was published too hastily, and before the suggestions of all the churches had been received; whence many, as, e.g. the churches of Pomerania and Holstein, believed that the Formula was sent to them only for form's sake. It was thought that the Saxons assumed a power in the whole transaction which did not belong to them, and that they sought a kind of control over the Lutheran churches which no one would in this sense concede to them.—Schl.]

⁵ It was the fact that the Formula of Concord cut off all prospects of a union of our church with the Reformed, and opposed a bar to all attempts at pacification. At that time the points in controversy with the Reformed were only two, namely, respecting the doctrine of the Supper and the person of Christ. The first pervaded the whole Lutheran church, the second did not; for before the Formula of Concord it was only the Swabian divines who defended the omnipresence of Christ's human nature, on the ground of a communication of attributes. Luther never attempted to prove his doctrine concerning the supper from the doctrine of communicatio idiomatum, but solely from the Scriptures. And if, when Zwingli (who would parry his proofs from Scripture) brought him on to the subject of the person of Christ, he derived the ubiquity of Christ's human nature from its personal union with the divine either actually feared or at least pretended to fear, that the peace and harmony of the Lutheran church might be injured by adding a new symbolical book to their old ones. And others offered other reasons for their dislike of it.

42. Julius, duke of Brunswick, had been a kind of second father of the Formula of Concord, and had contributed to the fabrication of it both by his counsels and by liberal expenditures. And when drawn up, he had commanded all the ministers of religion in his dominions to receive it and to subscribe their names to it. But after the Formula was published, Julius changed his mind and permitted his divines at Helmstadt, Tilemann Heshusius and the others, to oppose it and to exclude it from a place among the symbolical books of his territories. The principal grounds on which the divines of Julius rejected the Formula were: (I.) That the printed copy differed in some parts from the written Formula, which the Brunswickers had approved. (II.) That the doctrine of free-will was incorrectly explained in the Formula, and that some of the harsh and unsuitable phrases of Luther were employed in it. (III.) That the ubiquity (as it was then termed) or the boundless presence of Christ's human nature, which the Lutheran church had never adopted as her doctrine, was taught in it. Besides these reasons, perhaps other and secret ones influenced duke Julius not to adopt the Formula. There were various negotiations with him and his theologians to remove these difficulties; and particularly in the year 1583, a convention of theologians from the electoral Palatinate, Saxony, Brandenburg, and Brunswick, was held at Quedlinburg for the purpose of terminating this dissent; but Julius remained inflexible in his purpose, and wished to have the cause of the Formula referred to a council of the whole Lutheran church.¹ nature, yet he never maintained that the man Christ was always and everywhere present, but merely that he could be present wherever the execution of his mediatorial office and the fulfilment of his promises required, and of course at the celebration of the Holy Supper. And in this the theologians of Upper and Lower Saxony followed him. But the theologians of Swabia and Alsace maintained an absolute omnipresence; and their statements were transferred to the Formula of Concord (yet so that the other opinion was not explicitly excluded), and thus were made articles of faith (just as the doctrine of election by grace was previously a private opinion of Calvin, and was transformed by the Synod of Dort into an article of faith to all who received the decrees of that synod). Thus the points of controversy between us and the Reformed were increased by the Formula of Concord. They were also rendered more virulent, because we censured and condemned as heretical a church which hitherto wished to be a sister to us.—Schl.

¹ See Hutter's Concordia Concordis, cap. xlv. p. 1051; Rehtmeyer's Branschwieg Kirchenhistorie, vol. iii. chap. viii. sec. i. p. 483, and the writers mentioned by

43. In Saxony itself, not a few detested in their hearts that Formula which they subscribed with their hands, holding fast the doctrines which they had received from Melancthon and his friends. On the death of Augustus and the accession of Christian I. who from his childhood had been imbued with the milder sentiments of Melancthon, and is said to have been too friendly to the doctrines and institutions of the Swiss, these parties again lifted up their heads and seemed to be plotting against the Formula of Concord, in order to open the way for Calvinistic opinions and regulations being introduced among the Saxons. And they found much support from men of the first rank, and especially from Nicholas Crell, the prime minister of state. Through their influence, first some laws were enacted which might prepare the minds of the people to acquiesce in the contemplated revolution; and then in the year 1591, the formula of exorcism as it is called was required to be omitted in the administration of baptism.² Moreover, not only was there a new German catechism published, which was favourable to the designs of these patrons of the Reformed doctrines, but likewise a new edition of the German Bible with the notes of Henry Salmuth, adapted to the object in contemplation, was prepared in 1591 at Dresden. And as violent commotions and seditions of the people now broke out everywhere, the government animadverted severely on those ministers of religion who Pfaff, De Actis et Scriptis Ecclesie Württemberg, p. 62, and in his Historia Literar. Theolog. par. ii. p. 423. On the conference at Quedlinburg and its Acts, see also Die Dänische Bibliothek, part viii. p. 595, &c. [The court appears to have been actuated in this matter by political considerations. For the objections of the theologians to the Formula might admit an answer. The first objection respecting the discrepancy between the printed and the written copies of the Formula was founded on fact. There really were words and phrases interpolated in some of the statements which were not in the written copy. The other party did not deny the fact, but said they were minute things and not alterations of the doctrine, but merely changes in the phraseology introduced for the sake of perspicuity. And this was actually true. Mosheim once compared the subscribed copy with the printed; and as he asserted, the doctrine in both was the same. So that if they had been disposed, they might easily have compromised this point. So also the two other points were not so very important. The Helmstadt theologians would not concede the ubiquity; yet they held it possible that Christ, as man, should be in various places at the same time. Now, how far is one who concedes this from believing the ubiquity? The grand difficulty was this:—The electoral Saxons had in the whole business assumed too much to themselves, and had acted as lawgivers to the church. It was perceived that if this matter was allowed to pass thus, the elector of Saxony would personate the pope, and his principal clergy the cardinals, and they would in future prescribe laws to the whole Lutheran church. They resolved therefore to maintain against the Saxons their right to think for themselves in matters of religion, and show that they conceded to Saxony the direction of religious affairs only under certain restrictions.—Schl.

² See Kraft's Geschichte der Exorcismi, p. 401, &c.

opposed the designs of the court. But the sudden death of Christian, which took place this very year, frustrated all these machinations. The theologians by whom the business had been principally managed were, after the death of the elector, punished with imprisonment and exile; and Crell, the prime director of it, received in 1601 the fruit of his temerity, by being brought to a capital punishment.¹

44. At the end of the century, Samuel Huber, a Swiss of Berne, indiscreetly awakened a new controversy at Wittenberg where he taught theology. Fired with hatred of the Calvinistic doctrine of absolute decrees, he maintained that the whole human race were from eternity elected of God to salvation; and he accused his colleagues, together with all the divines of the Lutheran church, of being Calvinists, because they taught that those only are elected whom God foresaw would die in faith. Learned men are at this day agreed that Huber swerved from the common Lutheran doctrine in words rather than in meaning; for what the Lutherans maintain respecting the love of God as embracing the whole human race, and excluding no one absolutely from eternal salvation, this he would explain in a new manner and in new phraseology. But this age, having learned from numerous examples that new phraseology and new modes of explaining doctrines produced as lasting and as pernicious disturbance as new errors, urged Huber to adopt the old and universal method of teaching, in preference to his own. And when he declared that he could not do so, and his patrons here and there threatened to produce disturbance, he was compelled to relinquish his office and go into exile.

45. That the controversies here recounted and others of less magnitude were very injurious to the public interests of the church founded by Luther, no one who is well informed in the history of those times will deny.² The method also of discussing and terminating controversies in that age, if estimated according to the modern views of good men, contained much that was inconsistent with equity, moderation, and charity. And while they are unjust who indiscriminately load with reproaches the authors of those evils, and boldly pronounce them destitute of all reason and all virtue, those are still more unjust who cast all the blame on the victors, and pronounce the vanquished to be saints and deserving of a better fate. That men recently led out of the thickest darkness into the light should not at once discern and distinguish all objects, as they are able to do who have long been in the light, is not at all strange. Besides, that was an unpolished age, and one which not only tolerated but applauded many things in morals and in the modes of living, acting, and contending, which modern times, improved by experience and education, disapprove and reject. But with what views and intentions the individuals contended, whether they acted maliciously or ingenuously and in good faith, belongs not to us to decide, but to Him who knoweth the hearts of men.

46. The theologians among the Lutherans who illustrated the various branches of sacred learning form a very long list. Besides Luther and Melancthon, who excelled all the rest in genius and learning, the more distinguished were, Jerome Weller, Martin Chemnitz, John Brentius, Matthias Flacius, Urban Regius, George Major, Nicholas Amsdorf, Erasmus Sarcerius, John Matthesius, John Wigand, Francis Lambert, James Andrea, David Chytræus, Nicholas Selnecker, Martin Bucer, Paul Fagius, Casper Cruciger, Victorin Strigelius, Cyriac Spangenberg, Matthew Judex, Tilemann Heshusius, Joachim Westphal, John Epinus, Andrew Osiander, and many others.³

¹ The English reader will see some excellent observations on these deplorable controversies and their results to German Protestantism, in one of the early works of Dr. Fusey, since so celebrated. I allude to his Historical Inquiry into the Theology of Germany, Lond. 1828, p. 9, &c. On the controversies themselves, see Weismann, Memorabilia Hist. Sac. vol. i. p. 1520, &c.—R.

² For an account of these, Melchior Adamus, Vita Theologorum, the Historical and Literary (and Biographical) Dictionary, Du Pin's Bibliothèque des Auteurs séparés de la Communion de l'Eglise Romaine, and others, may be consulted. The lives of many of them have been separately written with care in our age; e.g. the life of Hieronymus Weller by Laemmel, of Flacius by Ritter, of Heshusius and Spangenberg by Leuckfeld, of Fagius by Feuerlin, of Chytræus by Schütze, of Westphal by Greivius, of Bucer by Verporten, of Epinus by Greivius, &c. [See also notices of these minor Lutheran divines in the first volume of Weismann's Memorabilia Hist. Sac. from p. 1429, &c. There is a recent life of Francis Lambert by Baum of Strasburg, 1840, 12mo.—R.]

¹ See Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part. II. book xvi. ch. xxvii. p. 863, and the writers mentioned by Engelke, Diss. de Nic. Crello, ejusque Supplicio, Rostoch, 1724.

² The writers on this controversy are mentioned by Haft, Introductio in Histor. Literar. Theolog. par. ii. lib. iii. p. 431, &c. [See, in particular, Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, book xvi. ch. xxx. vol. i. p. 952, &c. It must not be supposed by the incautious reader that Huber believed in the final salvation of all men. He used the words decree and election as equivalent to gracious invitation. This he supposed in the eternal counsels of God extended to all men equally, and without distinction. But to make their calling and election sure, they must repent and believe; which he supposed the greater part of mankind will not do, and of course will be damned to all eternity. This he expressly stated in the confession of his faith which he published in 1595. See Arnold, ubi supra, p. 953, and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iv. p. 664.—Mur.]

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMED CHURCH.

1. THE church which chooses to be called the Reformed or the Evangelical Reformed church, and which was formerly by its opponents called the Zwinglian or the Calvinistic church, and is now by many called the Calvinistic Reformed,¹ differs in character from nearly all others. For all other churches stand united by the bond of a common system of doctrine and discipline; but this is not the case with the Reformed church. It neither maintains one system of faith, for it has many creeds differing considerably in some points; nor does it adopt the same modes and forms of worship; nor has it everywhere the same constitution and government. Of course, this church does not require of its ministers that they should all hold and teach the same things, but allows very many points of doctrine and those of no little consequence to be variously stated and explained, provided the great first principles of religion and piety remain inviolate. This church may therefore be called a great community, comprising various kinds of churches, which the moderation of all in tolerating each other's differences keeps from splitting into various sects.²

¹ In England and America the term Reformed is commonly applied to all the different sects which in this century separated from the Romish church; and the term Protestant is used with the same latitude. But the Lutheran writers use the term Reformed to denote all the larger sects except their own which separated from the Romish church during this century. In this sense Mosheim here uses it. It would have been more accurate however had he said the Reformed churches; for the sects he includes do not pretend to be one church or one ecclesiastical body. They are and they profess to be as distinct from each other as any or all of them are from the Lutheran church. See the following note.—Mur.

² These observations are designed to give the Lutheran church an air of unity, which is not to be found in the Reformed. But there is a real fallacy in this specious representation of things. The Reformed church, when considered in the true extent of the term Reformed, comprehends all those religious communities which separated themselves from the church of Rome, and in this sense includes the Lutheran church as well as the others. And even when this epithet is used in opposition to the community founded by Luther, it represents not a single church, as the Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Independent, but rather a collection of churches; which, though they be invisibly united by a belief and profession of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, yet frequent separate places of worship, and have each a visible centre of external union peculiar to themselves, which is formed by certain peculiarities in their respective rules of public worship and ecclesiastical government. An attentive examination of the discipline, polity, and worship of the churches of England, Scotland, Holland, and Switzerland (as well as of those of France, Ireland, and North America), will set this matter in the clearest light. The first of these churches, being governed by bishops and not admitting the validity of Presbyterian ordination, differs from the other three more than any one of these differs from the other. There are however peculiarities of go-

2. This was not the original character of the Reformed church, but it was thrown into this state by the force of circumstances. The Swiss with whom it originated, and especially John Calvin who was its second founder, spared no pains to bring all the congregations which united with them to adopt the same forms of faith and practice and the same mode of government; and while they looked upon the Lutherans as brethren who were in error, they were not disposed to grant indulgence and impunity themselves, nor were they willing their associates should grant it, to those who openly favoured the Lutheran views of the Lord's Supper, the person of Christ, predestination, and the kindred subjects.³ But when fierce contests arose in Britain, both respecting the form of church government and respecting rites and some other subjects, between what were called the Episcopalians and the Puritans, it seemed to be necessary to expand the arms of the church, and to reckon among genuine brethren those who might deviate from the opinions and the regulations of the Genevans. And after vernment and worship which distinguish the church of Holland from that of Scotland. The institution of deacons, the use of forms for the celebration of the sacraments, an ordinary form of prayer, the observation of the festivals of Christmas, Easter, Ascension Day, and Whitsuntide, are established in the Dutch church; and it is well known that the church of Scotland differs from it in these respects. But after all, to what does the pretended uniformity among the Lutherans amount? are not some of the Lutheran churches governed by bishops, while others are ruled by elders? It shall moreover be shown in its proper place, that even in point of doctrine the Lutheran churches are not so very remarkable for their uniformity.—Macd.

³ This sentence, in connexion with what follows, seems to charge the Reformed of this century with excommunicating the Lutherans as heretics, or with refusing to have any Christian fellowship with them so long as they retained their peculiar opinions. Veniam tamen et impunitatem nec ipsi dabant, nec a suis [sociis—R.] dari volebant illis, &c. But on what grounds can Mosheim assert this? That the Reformed would not give up their own belief nor admit that the Lutherans were free from all error, is certain. But that they refused all communion with their Lutheran brethren, is I believe the direct opposite of the truth. In the conference at Marpurg in 1529, of which some notice is given above, p. 576, 7, note 5, and p. 581, the Reformed divines begged the Lutherans to allow them mutually to regard each other as brethren, notwithstanding their difference in opinion as to the eucharist. But Luther absolutely refused. See the statements of Melancthon, Bucer, and others, quoted by Hospinian, Historia Sacramentaria, par. ii. p. 131, 133, 135, 136. So also Calvin in the year 1546 expressly declared, that the Lutherans and the Reformed ought not to separate from each other, and to call each other heretics, on account of the difference between them in regard to the real presence. See Hospinian, ubi supra, p. 311. And in the year 1631, the subject came before the Reformed National Synod of France at Lyons; and they decided explicitly that their churches might consistently admit open and avowed Lutherans to enjoy the privileges of members in their respective bodies. See Aymon, Synodes Nationaux des Egl. Ref. de France, tome ii. p. 500, &c. In Schroech's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. v. p. 154. See also cent. xvii. sec. ii. part ii. chap. i. sec. 4, below.—Mur.

the Synod of Dort, much greater moderation ensued. For although the opinions of the Arminians were rejected and condemned, they found their way into the minds of great numbers. The English church, in the time of Charles I. publicly renounced the opinions of Calvin respecting the divine decrees;¹ and studied entire conformity with the opinions and practices of the first ages of Christianity. Some German churches dared not publicly give their entire assent to the Genevan views, lest they should be declared to have cut themselves off from the privileges of the Augsburg Confession. Finally, the French exiles who had long been accustomed to milder views, and had philosophised in the free manner of their countrymen, having become dispersed over the whole Reformed world, by their eloquence and their talents allured many to imitate them. All these and some other circumstances have gradually instilled such a spirit of gentleness and patience, that at the present day all, except those who either adhere to the Roman pontiff or fiercely defend the errors of the Socinians, Anabaptists, or Quakers, can hold their place among the members of the Reformed church. This has taken place contrary to the wishes and against the opposition of many; but they are far inferior in numbers and influence to the others, who suppose there are but few things necessary to be believed in order to salvation, who allow many doctrines to be variously explained, and who wish to extend the Reformed church as widely as possible.²

3. The founder of the Reformed church was Ulric Zwingli, a Swiss, an acute man and a lover of truth.³ He not only wished to have many things suppressed in the public worship and in the churches which Luther thought might be borne with, images for instance, altars, candles, the formula of exorcism, the private [auricular] confession of sins, &c. and prescribed the most simple forms of worship, but he likewise taught on some points of doctrine, in particular respecting the Lord's Supper, very differently from Luther. And those who laboured with him in banishing the popish superstitions among the Swiss, approved of these singular opinions of Zwingli. From these men all the churches of Switzerland which separated from the Romish communion received those opinions. From Switzerland, by the preachings and writings of his pupils and friends, the same tenets spread among the neighbouring nations. Thus the Reformed church of which Zwingli was the parent was at first small and of limited extent, but by degrees became an extensive body.

4. The principal cause of the separation of the Lutherans from the Swiss was Zwingli's doctrine concerning the Lord's Supper. While Luther maintained that the body and blood of Christ are truly, though in an inexplicable manner, present in the Holy Supper, and are presented along with the bread and wine in that ordinance, Zwingli held on the contrary that the bread and wine are only signs and symbols of the absent body and blood of Christ; and he so taught in his public writings from the year 1524 onward.⁴ The next year, John (Ecolampadius), a theologian of Basil and one of the most learned men of that age, did the same thing.⁵ Both were opposed by Luther and his friends, and especially by the Swabians, with great firmness and resolution. Philip, the landgrave of Hesse, fearing much injury to the incipient cause of the Protestants from these contests, endeavoured to put an end to them by a conference held at Marburg in the year 1529, between Zwingli, Luther, and some others. But he could obtain only a truce, not a peace. Luther and Zwingli came to an agreement on many points; but the controversy respecting the

¹ Many members of the church of England, with archbishop Laud at their head, did indeed propagate the doctrines of Arminius both in their pulpits and in their writings. But it is not accurate to say that the Church of England renounced publicly in that reign the opinions of Calvin. See this matter farther discussed in the note, century xvii. sec. ii. part ii. chap. ii. sec. 20.—Mur.

² There has never yet been published a full and accurate History of the Reformed church. Abraham Scultetus would have given us one down to his time, in his Annales Evangelii Renovati; but only a very small part of that work has been preserved. Theodore Hase, who projected Annales Ecclesie Reformate, was cut off by a premature death. James Basnage's famous work, which was last published, Rotterdam, 1725, 2 vols. 4to, entitled, Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformées, is not a history of this church, but merely shows that the peculiar doctrines of the Reformed church are not novel, but very ancient, and have been held in all ages of the church. Maimbourg's Histoire du Calvinisme is filled with innumerable errors, and written with the pen of partiality. [This want is not yet supplied, nor likely to be so. The separate histories which have appeared of the several Reformed churches seem to have superseded the necessity for a general history of the Reformed, as distinct from the Lutheran body.—R.]

³ See above, sec. i. History of the Reformation, p. 571, &c.

⁴ Yet before that year Zwingli had so believed and taught in private. See Gerdes, Historia Evangelii Renovati, tom. i. Append. p. 228 [and Zwingli's own letters in the recent collection by Schuler, part i. p. 258. The student should by all means read with attention the admirable exposition of the difference between the views of Zwingli and Luther on this subject, which Ranke has given in his Hist. of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 88-99.—R.]

⁵ See Fueslin, Cent. i. Epist. Theol. Reformatorem, p. 31, 35, 44, 49, &c. [See also above, sec. i. chap. ii. p. 577, and note.—Mur.]

Lord's Supper was left for Providence and time to heal.¹

5. Zwingli had but just settled his church, when in the year 1530 he fell in a battle of the Zurichers with the Roman Catholic Swiss, the defenders of the old religion. He marched out to this war, not for the purpose of fighting but for the sake of encouraging and comforting the soldiers, though he went armed according to the customs of his country.² After his death, certain good and moderate men among the Lutherans, especially Martin Bucer, laboured with all zeal and diligence by exhortations, explanations, and perhaps also by shrouding the opinions of both parties in ambiguous language, to bring about a compromise of some sort.³ That those who undertook this difficult task had good intentions and designs, no one who is himself honest and candid will call in question; but whether they took the right and proper method to accomplish their object is less clear. In Switzerland some commotions resulted from these movements of Bucer. For some refused to give up the opinion of Zwingli, while others embraced the modified views of Bucer.⁴ But these commotions had no influence to bring about a peace with Luther. Yet out of Switzerland, and among the theologians of Upper Germany who had inclined to the side of the Swiss, Bucer's efforts to settle the controversy had such effect, that in the year 1536 they sent a deputation to Wittenberg and connected themselves with Luther, abandoning the Swiss.⁵ The Swiss he could not persuade to do so; yet for some years afterwards the prospect of an agreement was not absolutely desperate. But in the year 1544, when Luther published his Confession of Faith respecting the Lord's Supper, in direct opposition to the opinions of the Swiss, the Zurichers in the following year publicly defended their cause against him; and by these movements all the efforts of the pacificators were rendered nugatory.⁶

6. The blessed death by which Luther was removed in 1546 seemed to dispel this cloud, and again to inspire the hope that a compromise might take place. For Melancthon and his friends and disciples so eagerly desired to have the Lutherans and Zwinglians unite, that he did not refuse even a dissembled peace, and was ready to turn every way to accomplish it. On the other side, John Calvin, a native of Noyon in France and a teacher at Geneva, a man venerated even by his enemies for his genius, learning, eloquence, and other endowments, and moreover the friend of Melancthon, tempered the offensive opinion of Zwingli, and endeavoured to prevail upon the Swiss, and especially the Zurichers among whom his influence was very great, to adopt his views.⁷ He rejected indeed the idea of the actual presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Holy Supper; but he supposed a certain divine influence from Christ accompanied the bread and wine, to those who received them with full faith and an honest heart; and to render this doctrine the more acceptable, he expressed it in nearly the same phraseology in which Luther expressed his doctrine.⁸ For it was the common error of all who assumed the office of pacificators in this contest, or who attempted to restore harmony, that they endeavoured rather to produce agreement in words than in sentiment. But Melancthon, though extremely desirous of peace, neither had fortitude enough openly to engage in this perilous enterprise, nor would his opposers allow him tranquillity enough after the death of Luther to collect himself and begin the arduous business. Besides, the contention which had been intermitted was renewed in 1552 by Joachim Westphal, a pastor at Hamburg, than whom, after Flacius, there was no more strenuous vindicator of the sentiments of Luther. For to the Mutual Consent of Genevans and

¹ Ruchat, Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, tome i. passim, tome ii. livr. vi. p. 463, &c.; Hottinger's Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, part iii. book vi. p. 27, 51, &c. p. 483; Löscher, Historia Motuum, par. i. cap. ii. liv. p. 65, &c. cap. vi. p. 143, &c.; Fueslin's Beiträge zur Schweizer Reformation, vol. iv. p. 120, &c. [and above, p. 577, note, and p. 581.—Mur.]

² Those of our church who formerly reproached Zwingli and the Reformed church with this death did not consider the customs of the Swiss nation in that age. For all the Swiss, when summoned to defend their country, were at that time obliged to march, and not even the religious teachers and ministers were excused. And in the very battle in which Zwingli fell there fell likewise a doctor of Bern, Hieronymus Pontanus. See Fueslin's Centuria Epistolar. Theol. Reform. p. 84, &c.

³ See Verpoorten's Comment. de Martino Bucero et ejus Sententia de Cena Domini, sec. ix. p. 23, &c. Cohurg, 1709, 8vo; Löscher's Historia Motuum, par. i. lib. ii. cap. i. p. 181, and par. ii. lib. iii. cap. ii. p. 15.

⁴ See Fueslin's Centuria I. Epistolar. Theol. p. 162, 170, 181, 182, 190, 192, 215.

⁵ Löscher, ubi supra, cap. ii. p. 205; Ruchat, Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, tome v. p. 535, &c.; Hottinger's Helvet. Kirchen, vol. iii. book vi. p. 702, &c. [See p. 558, above, note.—Mur.]

⁶ Löscher, ubi supra, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. iv. p. 241, &c. [This Confession is a different work from Luther's large Confession published in the year 1528.—Mur.]

⁷ Salig's Historie der Augsburg. Confession, vol. ii. book vii. chap. iii. p. 1075.

⁸ The English reader will see a clear and succinct statement of the Lutheran, Zwinglian, and Calvinian views on the presence of Christ in his Supper, in Hill's Lectures on Divinity, ed. of 1823, vol. iii. p. 330, &c.—R.

Zurichers in regard to the Doctrine of the Sacrament, he opposed a book written in the caustic style of Luther, entitled, A Farrago of Confused and Discordant Opinions respecting the Sacred Supper, collected from the Books of the Sacramentarians; in which he bitterly taxed the Reformed with their disagreements on the doctrine of the Supper, and most earnestly contended for the opinion of Luther. In a style no less harsh, Calvin first replied to him; and soon after, some joining Westphal and others joining Calvin, the parties became insensibly excited, and the contest raging even worse than before, no human power seemed adequate to check it.¹

7. To these controversies an immense accession was afterwards made by the contest respecting the decrees of God in relation to the eternal salvation of men, which originated with John Calvin, and which stirred up many abstruse and difficult questions. The first teachers among the Swiss were so far from the views of those who hold that God by his supreme and absolute sovereignty appointed some to everlasting joy and others to everlasting pain, from all eternity, and without any regard had to their condition and conduct, that they seemed not far removed from the sentiments of the Pelagians; nor with Zwingli did they hesitate to promise heaven to all who lived according to right reason.² But Calvin, differing widely from them, supposed that God by his sovereign pleasure assigns to mankind their future condition, and that his absolute decree is the only cause both of the eternal felicity and the eternal misery of all men.³ And this opinion was in a short time propagated by his writings and his pupils throughout the whole body of the Reformed; nay, was added to the public doctrines of the church in some regions. The Italian, Jerome Zanchius, who was devoted to the views of Calvin, first excited this baneful controversy at Strasburg, in the year 1560; and it soon grew to such a height in the hands of various persons, that it may be questioned whether this or the former controversy respecting the Lord's Supper contributed most to exasperate feelings and to confirm the schism [between the Lutherans and the Reformed].⁴

8. The only prospect remaining to the Helvetians of these animosities being calmed and these great contests subsiding, depended on the Saxons, the pupils and followers of Melancthon, who after his death, as it was well known, laboured to find out some means of reconciliation. But being destitute of a prudent leader, who could avail himself of favourable opportunities, they applied remedies to the apparently fatal wound which rendered it absolutely incurable. For while, as has been stated, they endeavoured by means of certain publications to corrupt the public teachers and the youth, or at least to induce them to tolerate the opinions of the Swiss, they drew ruin upon themselves and their project, and gave occasion for the formation of the noted Formula of Concord, which condemned the doctrines of the Reformed respecting the Sacred Supper and the person of Christ. And this document, being received by the greatest part of the Lutherans among their rules of faith, was an insurmountable obstacle to all efforts of the pacificators.

9. Thus far we have attended to the origin, causes, and progress of the schism which separated the Reformed from the Lutherans. We must next look into the internal state, the history, and the growth of the Reformed church. The history of the Reformed body during this century may be divided into two periods; of which the first extends from the year 1519, when Zwingli began to form a church separate from the Romish community, to the time when John Calvin settled at Geneva and obtained an absolute ascendancy among the Reformed. The latter period embraces the remainder of the century. In the first period, the church (which afterwards assumed the title of Reformed in imitation of their neighbours the French, who distinguished themselves from the Roman

¹ Löscher's Historia Motuum, par. II. lib. III. cap. viii. p. 83, &c.; Jo. Müller's Cimbria Literata, tom. III. p. 642, &c.; Grevius, Memoria Joachimi Westphali, p. 62, 106, &c.

² See this demonstrated by many proofs in Daillé's Apologia pro Ducibus Ecclesiarum Gallicarum Synodis, adversus Frider Spanhemium, par. IV. p. 946; Turrotin, Epistola ad Antistitem Cantuariensem, printed in the Bibliothèque Germanique, tome XIII. p. 92; Simon, Bibliothèque Critique, under the fictitious name of Sanfore, tome III. chap. xxviii. p. 292, 298; the author of the French notes to the Formula Consensus Helveticæ, p. 62, &c. The very learned Gerdes indeed in his Miscell. Groning. tom. II. p. 476, 477, seems to teach the contrary, namely, that Calvin held the same opinions as the first teachers among the Swiss. But he may be refuted by what he himself adduces concerning the disturbances in Switzerland produced by Calvin's opinions.

³ This statement appears quite too strong. Neither Calvin nor Augustine, nor any other distinguished teacher of the divine decrees in ancient times, maintained that God's "absolute decree is the only cause of eternal felicity and eternal misery." On the contrary, they maintained that the sinfulness of men is the sole cause of their eternal misery. Neither did they suppose that the righteous are saved without any acts or agency of their own.—Mur.

⁴ See Löscher's Historia Motuum, par. III. lib. V. cap. II. p. 27, &c. cap. X. p. 227; Sallig's Historie der Augsb'rg. Confession, vol. I. book II. chap. XIII. p. 441, &c.

Catholics by this title) was of no great extent, being almost confined to Switzerland. Some small states indeed in the adjacent countries of Swabia and Alsace, as Strasburg and a few others, adhered to the side of the Swiss;¹ but these in the year 1536 by the influence of Bucer abandoned the Swiss, reverted back to the Saxon community, and became reconciled with Luther. The other churches which revolted from the Romish pontiff had either embraced openly the sentiments of Luther, or were composed of persons of diverse sentiments, who may be considered as of neither party. And within these narrow limits the church collected by the efforts of Zwingli would perhaps have remained stationary, had not John Calvin arisen. For as the Swiss are contented with their own country and not solicitous to extend their empire, so they seemed not anxious for the extension of their church.²

¹ Among these states, besides Strasburg where Wolfgang Fabricius, Capito, and Martin Bucer were entirely on Zwingli's side, were the following: Reutlingen, where the pastor Conrad Hermann was of Zwingli's opinion; Ulm, where the preacher Conrad Sonnius, and Constance, where Ambrogio Blarer adhered to Bucer; Augsburg, where Martin Cellarius and Wolfgang Musculus adhered to the Reformed religion; Memmingen and Lindau, which with Strasburg and Constance at first refused to subscribe to the Augsburg Confession, and presented a separate one called "Tetrapolitana, (that of the four cities). But all these were persuaded by Bucer to subscribe to the Augsburg Confession, and to accept the Wittenberg agreement. In Strasburg, especially, the Reformed lost all public offices after the contests of Zanchius with John Marbach, John Sturm, and John Pappus; and their community at last fell to the ground. See Lüscher's Historia Motuum, tom. ii. p. 283, &c.—Schl.

² Mosheim is still blinded by his theory of the unity of the Reformed church, on which remarks were made in notes 1 and 2, page 658. He seems moreover in this section to represent what he calls the Reformed church as being originally a little schismatic body of Helvetians, headed by Zwingli and a few other obstinate men whose influence did not extend far, while the mass of those who forsook the Romish church were disposed to follow after Luther. This schismatic body, he represents, was also long held in check by the Lutherans, and several portions of it had been actually reclaimed, when John Calvin arose, infused into it some new errors, and spread it far and wide in many countries. Such is the view given by Mosheim. But the truth is, that while the Reformation was going on simultaneously in most countries of Europe under different leaders, all actuated by a similar zeal for detecting and exposing the errors of the Romish church, when the popish doctrine of transubstantiation came under their review, it was generally seen to be absurd and untenable. But when Luther's attention was called to this subject by some of his associates who were in advance of him on this point, he could see no objection to admitting the real or bodily presence of Christ in the eucharist; and he would therefore tolerate no other change in this doctrine but the substitution of consubstantiation instead of transubstantiation. This led to bitter contention, and to actual schism among the Reformers. Luther would hold no fellowship with those who denied the real presence; and so great was his influence and authority, that he actually arrested the progress of reformation at this point in most of the countries of Germany. But in all other countries, with the exception of Sweden and Denmark, he could not arrest it. Hence the Swiss, the French, the Belgians, the English, and the Scotch, severally set up their reformed national churches, all independent of each other and actually differing in several minor points, yet all with one voice discarding both the popish and the Lutheran doctrine concerning the eucharist. As for John Calvin, he was at the head of only a portion of the Swiss church, but he possessed such talents and wisdom as procured him an influence among all Protestants, greater than that of any other man then on the stage. Yet he did little directly to extend the Reformation into other countries. He rather enlightened the communities already reformed, and brought them to greater uniformity in doctrine and discipline. Indeed most of the national churches except the Lutheran embraced substantially his doctrinal views. Even the Lutherans began to make advances towards them, when opposition was raised by the strenuous adherents to Luther's creed; and after violent internal commotions, the Lutheran church succeeded in purging itself of nearly every vestige of Calvinism. —Mur.

10. In this first age of the Reformed church nothing separated it from the Lutheran save the controversy respecting the Lord's Supper; out of which arose another respecting the person of Jesus Christ, but the Lutheran church never engaged in this latter controversy as a body. For when the Swabian divines, in their disputes with the Swiss, drew an argument in proof of the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Sacred Supper from the doctrine of the communication of the divine attributes (omnipresence in particular) to the human nature of Christ, in consequence of the hypostatic union,³ the Swiss, to meet this argument, denied the communication of the divine properties to the human nature of Christ, and opposed in particular the omnipresence of the man Christ. Hence originated the very perplexing controversy respecting the communication of attributes, and the ubiquity, as the Swiss termed it, which produced so many books and subtle disquisitions and so many mutual criminations. During this period the Swiss in general followed the opinion of Zwingli respecting the Lord's Supper, which differed from that of Calvin. For this father of the Swiss church believed that the bread and wine only represent the body and blood of Christ, or are signs and emblems of the blessings procured for the human race by the death of Christ; and therefore that Christians derived no other benefit from coming to the Lord's Supper than that of meditation on the merits of

³ Especially Brentius and James Andreæ; the former in his Sententia de Libello Bullingeri, Tübingen, 1561, 4to, and still more largely in his book, De Personali Unione, et de Divina Majestate Christi; as also in his Recognitio Doctrinae de Vera Majestate Christi, Tübingen, 1564, 4to, and Andreæ in his Assertio de Persona et Unione, 1565, 4to. Also in the Conference of Maulbronn in 1564, this subject was much discussed, and the Tübingen divines published in 1565 their Declaratio et Confessio Majestatis Christi. Christopher, duke of Wurtemberg, sent this production of his divines to Augustus, the elector of Saxony, and requested him to get the opinion of his divines respecting it. But these found much to set aside in this doctrine, which they regarded as novel and dangerous. See Hutter's Concordia Concordia, p. 49, &c. 61, &c.—Schl.

Christ, or as the patrons of this sentiment used to express themselves, the Lord's Supper is nothing but a memorial of Christ.¹ Martin Bucer for the sake of peace laboured to correct and amend this doctrine of the Holy Supper and to make it appear more like, nay actually allied, to that of Luther. But the remembrance of Zwingli was too fresh to allow the Swiss to be drawn off from his opinion.

11. The Reformed church assumed an entirely new aspect when John Calvin in the year 1541 returned to Geneva, from which he had been driven, and obtained not only the direction of the new Genevan church² but vast influence in the republic. He was of Noyon in France, and a man with whom few of his age will bear any comparison for patient industry, resolution, hatred of the Roman superstition, eloquence, and genius. Possessing a most capacious mind, he endeavoured not only to establish and bless his beloved Geneva with the best regulations and institutions, but also to make it the mother and the focus of light and influence to the whole Reformed church for its enlargement and extension, just as Wittenberg was to the Lutheran community; in short, his aim was to shape the entire Reformed church after the model and pattern of that of Geneva. This was truly a great undertaking and one not unworthy of a great mind, and it was an undertaking no small part of which he actually accomplished by his perseverance and untiring zeal. In the first place therefore by his writings, his epistles, and other means, he induced very many persons of rank and fortune to emigrate from France, Italy, and other countries, and to settle at Geneva; and others in great numbers took journeys to Geneva merely to see and hear so great a man. In the next place he persuaded the senate of Geneva, in 1558, to establish a college at Geneva, in which he and his colleague Theodore Beza, and other men of great erudition and high reputation were the teachers. This new college acquired in a short time so much distinction and glory in consequence of its teachers, that students eagerly repaired to it in great numbers from England, Scotland, France, Italy, and Germany, in pursuit of sacred as well as secular learning. By means of these his pupils, Calvin enlarged everywhere the Reformed church, and recommended and propagated his own sentiments in more than one nation of Europe. He died in 1564, but his institutions continued vigorous after his decease; and the college of Geneva in particular flourished under Theodore Beza no less than under Calvin himself.³

¹ The wise and vigorous conduct of Calvin in the church and in the republic of Geneva is elucidated, with many documents never before published, by the learned men who republished with enlargements Spon's Histoire de Genève, 1730, 4to and 8vo. See tome ii. p. 87, &c. p. 100, &c. and other passages. [Senebier, in his Hist. Littér. de Genève, tome i. p. 74, gives the names of the editors of this new edition of Spon. They were Jean Antoine Gautier and Firmin Abauzit.—Ed.] [Calvin was not the first reformer of Geneva, but Wm. Farell, a zealous clergyman of Dauphiné, who preached the Gospel with acceptance there as early as the year 1532, but was driven from the city by the instigation of the bishop. His successor, Anthony Froumont, met the same fate. But as the internal state of the city became changed, and the council which had hitherto been on the side of the bishop abandoned him, and he left the city in 1533, the two preachers were recalled, and they, in connexion with a third, Peter Viret, gathered a numerous church in Geneva; so that in the year 1535 the Reformation was supported by the council. Yet the full organisation and establishment of the church was the work of John Calvin. He was born in the year 1509, and in his studies connected law with theology, studying the former at the command of his father and the latter from his own choice; and from Melchior Volmar, a German and professor of Greek at Bourges, he acquired a knowledge of the evangelical doctrines. After the death of his father he devoted himself wholly to theology, and publicly professed the Reformed doctrine, which he spread in France with all diligence. His name soon became known in Switzerland as well as France; and Farell and Viret besought him, as he was travelling through Geneva, to remain there and aid them in setting up the new church. But in the year 1538, great dissension arose in Geneva; and Calvin and his assistant Farell severely inveighed from the pulpit against the conduct of the council, who resolved to introduce the ceremonies agreed on at Berne, in the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and to reject those which these ministers wished to have adopted; and the consequence was that Calvin and Farell were banished from the republic. Calvin now spent a considerable time as a preacher and a professor at Strasburg, where he lived in great intimacy with Bucer and Capito, and with them very strenuously defended the cause of the Protestants in Germany both orally and in his writings. But in the year 1541, at the repeated and pressing invitations of the Genevans he returned to them again, and there officiated with great perseverance, zeal, prudence, and disinterestedness, to his death in the year 1564. His great talents and virtues were shaded by the love of control, by a want of tenderness, and by passionate rigour against the erring. His works have been published in nine volumes, folio; among which his Institutes of the Christian religion and his exegetical writings are most valued.—Schl.] [His life was written by Beza, and is prefixed to his Letters. See also Middleton's Evangelical Biography, vol. i. p. 1, &c.; Waterman's Memoirs of J. Calvin, Hartford, 1813, 8vo; Beza's Life of Calvin, translated by Fr. Sibson, with copious notes by an American editor, Philad. 1836, 12mo; and Bayle's Dictionary, art. Calvin.—Mur.] [The fullest and most satisfactory life of Calvin, indeed the only one worthy of the subject which has yet appeared, is by a German Protestant minister, Paul Henry, entitled Das Leben J. Calvins, d. grossen Reformators, &c. 3 vols. Hamb. 1835-44. A translation

² That this was Zwingli's real opinion respecting the Sacred Supper is demonstrated by numerous proofs in the Museum Helveticum, tom. i. p. 485, &c. 490; tom. iii. p. 631. I will adduce only one short sentence from his book De Baptismo, in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 85: "Cœna Domini non aliud, quam commemorationis nomen meretur." Compare, in various places, Fueslin's Centuria Epistolar. Theol. p. 253, 262, &c. [See above, p. 588, note.—Mur.

³ Calvin was in fact superintendent at Geneva, for he presided till his death over the body of the clergy, and in the Consistory or ecclesiastical judicatory. But when dying he proved that it was dangerous to commit to one man perpetually an office of so much authority. See Spon's Histoire de Genève, tome ii. p. 111, &c. And therefore after him the Genevan church had no standing president.

12. The theology taught by Zwingli was altered by Calvin principally in three respects. (I.) Zwingli assigned to civil rulers full and absolute power in regard to religious matters, and—what many censure him for—subjected the ministers of religion entirely to their authority.¹ He moreover did not object to a gradation of offices among religious teachers, nor to a standing superior over the ministers of parishes.² But Calvin circumscribed the power of the magistrate in matters of religion within narrow limits; and maintained that the church ought to be free and independent, and to govern itself by means of bodies of presbyters, synods, or conventions of presbyters in the manner of the ancient church; yet leaving to the magistrate the protection of the church and an external care over it; in short, he introduced at Geneva, and he endeavoured to introduce throughout the Reformed church, that form of church government which is called Presbyterian; for he did not allow of bishops and grades of rank among ministers, but maintained that (jure divino) by divine appointment they ought all to be on a level or be equals. He therefore established at Geneva a judicatory or consistory composed of ruling elders or lay presbyters and teaching elders, and he assigned to them great power. He also established conventions or synods; and in these consistories and synods he caused laws to be enacted relating to religious matters. He also among other things reinstated the ancient discipline, by which offenders were excluded from the church. All these things were effected with the consent of the greater part of the senate. (II.) To facilitate a pacification with the Lutherans, he substituted in place of the Zwinglian doctrine concerning the Lord's Supper, another doctrine in appearance more like that of Luther, indeed not greatly differing from it. For while Zwingli admitted only a symbolical presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Sacred Supper, and promised no other benefit from its celebration than the calling to mind the death of Christ and the blessings procured by that death, Calvin admitted a sort of spiritual presence—that is, he held that the regenerate, in the exercise of faith, do become united in a certain way to the man Christ, and from this union receive an increase of spiritual life. And as he used the phraseology of Luther on this subject, and acknowledged among other things that divine grace was conferred and sealed by the Sacred Supper, he was thought by many to believe in what is called impanation, or to agree very nearly with Luther.³ According to Zwingli's opinion, all Christians whatsoever, whether regenerate or in their sins, can be partakers of the body and blood of Christ; but according to Calvin none can, except the regenerate and the holy. (III.) The celebrated doctrine of an absolute decree of God respecting the salvation of men, which was unknown to Zwingli, was inculcated by Calvin; that is, he taught

¹ See Fueslin's Centur. i. Epist. Theol. tom. 1. p. 255, 260, 262, 263, &c.; Lettres de Calvin à M. Juc. de Falaix, published a few years since at Amsterdam, p. 84, 85. Calvin himself wrote to Bucer (in Fueslin, ubi supra, p. 263) that he approved of his sentiment. Perhaps he received his own opinion from Bucer. See Bossuet's Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes, tome ii. p. 8, &c. p. 14, 19; Courayer's Examen des Défauts des Théologiens, tome ii. p. 72, &c. who endeavours to show that Calvin's sentiments respecting the Lord's Supper were nearly the same as those of the Roman Catholics. But he is in general very obscure on the subject, and does not express himself uniformly, so that it is difficult to ascertain his real opinion. [The term Impanation (which signifies here the presence of Christ's body in the eucharist in or with the bread there exhibited) amounts to what is called Consubstantiation. It was a modification of the monstrous doctrine of Transubstantiation first invented by some of the disciples of Berenger, who had not a mind to break all measures with the church of Rome, and was afterwards adopted by Luther and his followers, who in reality made sad work of it. For in order to give it some faint air of possibility and to maintain it as well as they could, they fell into a wretched scholastic jargon about the nature of substances, subsistences, attributes, properties, and accidents, which did infinite mischief to the true and sublime science of Gospel theology, whose beautiful simplicity it was adapted to destroy. The very same perplexity and darkness, the same quibbling, sophistical and unintelligible logic which reigned in the attempts of the Roman Catholics to defend the doctrine of Transubstantiation, were visible in the controversial writings of the Lutherans in behalf of Consubstantiation or Impanation. The latter had, indeed, one absurdity less to maintain; but being obliged to assert, in opposition to intuitive evidence and unchangeable truth, that the same body can be in many places at the same time, they were consequently obliged to have recourse to the darkest and most intricate jargon of the schools. The modern Lutherans are grown somewhat wiser in this respect; at least they seem less zealous than their ancestors about the tenet in question.—Mack.] [The Lutherans of the present day wisely reject the opinion of Luther and the doctrine of their symbolical books. Thus Bretschneider writes, in 1819 (Entwicklung, &c. p. 715): "The modern systematic divines either change—as do Zecharia, Reinhard, Storr—the presentia reals of the body and blood of Christ into a presentia operativa, a presence of Christ, not in substance but in operation; or they deny altogether—with Henke, Eckermann, De Wette, Wegscheider—the presence of the celestial body of Christ in the sense maintained by the ancients."—Mur.]

of this elaborate work into English is advertised from two quarters in this country. There has also been recently published by M. Audin, the Romanist biographer of Luther and of Leo X. a life of Calvin, entitled Histoire de la Vie, des Ouvrages, et des Doctrines de Calvin, Paris, 2 vols. 8vo, 1841. He gives in the end of the Introduction an ample list of the Protestant and Romanist authorities which he had used. Mackenzie's Life of Calvin is a very meagre compilation, and Scott's Calvin and the Swiss Reformation is merely an abridgement of that portion of his Continuation of Milner.—R.

² This is by no means a correct representation of Zwingli's views, but there is not room here for showing how far it ought to be qualified. It will be enough to refer to the passage on this subject from one of his works, quoted by Scott in his Continuation of Milner's Church History, vol. iii. p. 32, note; and Hess's Life of Ulrich Zwingli, translated by Lucy Aikin, p. 159, &c.—R.

that God had no other ground for his electing some persons from all eternity to everlasting life, and appointing others to everlasting punishments, except his own pleasure or his most free and sovereign will.

13. The first of these three doctrines neither Calvin nor his disciples could persuade all the Reformed churches to adopt; for instance, the Germans, the English, or even the Swiss; yet he persuaded the French, the Dutch, the Scotch, and some others. The Swiss would by no means allow the form of church government established by Zwingli, and the prerogatives of the magistrates in matters of religion, to be changed. And on the two other points there was very warm debate in Switzerland for a long time. For the inhabitants of Zurich, Berne, &c. were utterly averse to parting with the doctrine they had learned from Zwingli respecting the Sacred Supper.¹ Nor were they easily persuaded to admit the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination among the doctrines of the church.² Yet by the perseverance, the high reputation, and the prudence of Calvin, after very warm altercations, a reconciliation between him and the Swiss was effected, first in regard to the Lord's Supper in 1549 and 1554, and afterwards in regard to predestination.³ After this, his pupils were so successful as gradually to bring nearly the whole Reformed church to embrace his new opinions; to which event his own writings contributed not a little.⁴

14. Let us next survey the countries in which the Reformed religion as shaped by Calvin obtained a fixed and permanent residence. Among the German princes, Frederick III. elector Palatine, in the year 1560 substituted followers of Calvin's doctrines in place of the Lutheran teachers whom he removed, and ordered his subjects to receive the rites and opinions of the Genevans.⁵ His successor Lewis in the year 1576 rescinded the acts of his father, and restored the Lutheran doctrine to its former dignity and authority. But this fell again on the accession of John Casimir to the government of the Palatine countries in 1583; for he had gone over to the side of the Reformed with his deceased father⁶ Frederick III. and it was necessary again to give Calvinism the pre-eminence.⁷ From that time onward, the Palatine church held the second rank among the Reformed churches, and it possessed such influence over the others, that the institutes of religion composed for its use by Zechariah Ursinus, and denominated the Heidelberg Catechism, were received nearly throughout the whole body.⁸ In the republic of Bremen, Albert Hardenberg, a friend of Melancthon, in the year 1556 first attempted to propagate the Calvinistic doctrine respecting the Lord's Supper. And although his attempt for the present was unsuccessful and he was expelled the city, yet it was impossible to withhold the people of Bremen from uniting with the Reformed church towards the close of the century.⁹ In what manner other portions of the German population were gradually brought to relish the doctrines of Calvin, must be learned from those who undertake to write a full history of Christianity.

15. The first among the French who abandoned the Romish religion are commonly called Lutherans, by the writers of those times; and from this name and some other circumstances, the inference has been drawn, that they were all believers in Luther's doctrines and averse from those of the Swiss.¹⁰ To me they appear to have

⁶ In the original it is not father, but brother, which is a manifest error of the press. For John Casimir was not the brother of Frederick III. but his son.—Schl.

⁷ Alting, ubi supra, p. 223, 245; Löscher, ubi supra, par. iii. lib. vi. p. 234; but especially Struve's Pfälzische Kirchenhistorie, who has learnedly treated of these events, p. 110, &c.

⁸ On the Heidelberg or Palatine Catechism and Confession, see Löscher's Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolica, p. 593 and 308 [and especially his Catechetical History of the Reformed Churches, in which he treats particularly of the history of the Heidelberg Catechism, Jena, 1756, 8vo.—Schl.]. [This excellent catechism may be found in Latin in the collections of the symbolical books of the Reformed church; and in English, in a pamphlet entitled Corpus Disciplina, or the Discipline of the Dutch Churches in England, Lond. 1645. It was on the model of this work that the Westminster divines framed the Shorter Catechism of the Presbyterian churches in Britain.—R.]

⁹ Salig, ubi supra, part iii. book x. chap. v. p. 715, and chap. vi. p. 776, &c.; Löscher, ubi supra, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. v. p. 134, and par. iii. lib. vi. cap. vii. p. 276; Gerdes, Historia Reformationis, tom. iii. p. 157 [and especially his Historia Motuum Ecclesiasticorum in Civitate Bremensi, ab anno 1547 ad an. 1561, tempore Alberti Hardenbergii Suscitatorum, ex Authenticis Monumentis, Groningen, 1756, 4to; also reprinted in his Scrinium Antiquar. seu Miscell. Groning. tom. v. par. i. See also the Brem-und Verdische Bibliothek, vol. iii. part iii. No. 5.—Schl.]

¹⁰ See Löscher's Historia Motuum, par. ii. cap. vi. p.

¹ See Fueslin's Centuria i. Epist. Theol. p. 264; Museum Helvet. tom. i. p. 490; tom. v. p. 479, 483, 490; tom. ii. p. 79, &c.

² See Museum Helveticum, tom. ii. p. 105, 107, 117; Gerdes, Miscell. Groning. tom. ii. p. 476, 477. I omit the common writers, as Ruchat, Hottinger, &c.

³ See the Consensus Genev. et Tigurinor. in Calvin's Opuscula, p. 754, &c.

⁴ Jablonski in his Epistole ad Leibnitium, published by Kepp, p. 24, 25, 41, contends that there is no longer any one among the Reformed who maintains Zwingli's opinion respecting the Lord's Supper. But it is certain there are many such; and at the present day his opinion has in a sense revived in England, in Switzerland, and in other countries.

⁵ Alting's Historia Eccles. Palatina, in Mieg's Monumenta Palatina, tom. i. p. 223, &c.; Löscher, Historia Motuum, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. iv. p. 125; Salig's Historie der Augsb. Confession, vol. iii. book ix. chap. v. p. 433, &c.

been a mixed company of various sorts of persons. The vicinity however of Geneva, Lausanne, and other cities which embraced the Calvinistic system of doctrines and discipline, and the astonishing zeal of Calvin, Farell, Beza, and others, in fostering, encouraging, and multiplying the opposers of the Romish see in France, induced them all, before the middle of the century arrived, to profess themselves the friends and brethren of the Genevans. By their enemies they were contumeliously denominated Huguenots, the origin of which appellation is uncertain. They were however tossed by various tempests and misfortunes, and endured greater calamities and sufferings than any other portion of the Protestant church, and this notwithstanding they could number exalted princes and nobles of the nation among their party.¹ Even the peace which they obtained from Henry III. in 1576 proved the commencement of a most destructive civil war, in which the very powerful family of Guise, being instigated by the Roman pontiffs, endeavoured to overthrow and extirpate the Reformed religion together with the royal family; and on the other hand, the Huguenots, led on by generals of the highest rank, fought for their religion and their kings with various success. These horrible commotions, in which both parties committed many acts that posterity must ever reprobate, were at length terminated by the prudence and heroism of Henry IV. The king himself, perceiving that his throne would never be firm and stable if he persevered in spurning the authority of the pontiff, forsook the Reformed religion and embraced the old faith; but on the other hand, he published the edict of Nantes in 1598, in which he gave to the Reformed, who he saw could not be subdued, full liberty to worship God in their own way, together with the greatest security that was possible.²

16. The Scotch church honours John Knox, a disciple of Calvin, as its founder; and from him of course it received from its books, was made penal. Many were imprisoned and put to death. In 1555, the civil courts were forbidden to hear appeals from the ecclesiastical; and all magistrates were to execute the decisions of the latter. The parliament of Paris refused to register this decree, and made a noble remonstrance to the king. In 1557, the king appointed commissioners to aid the bishops in exterminating all heretics; but the parliament refused to register this decree. In 1558, cardinal Lorrain with the consent of the king established a limited Inquisition. But several of the courts still favoured and protected the Protestants; and the king summoned a meeting called a mercurial, and learning that a number of his judges secretly favoured the Reformers, he imprisoned several of them, and one was put to death. But amid all their persecutions the Protestants multiplied greatly during this reign. Two princes of the blood, the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, and a great number of the nobility and gentry, were their friends and supporters. Hence they set up churches everywhere, had regular preachers, and stated though generally secret meetings for worship. In 1559, the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé encouraged and attended meetings of some thousands for worship in a meadow near Paris in open day, at the close of which the people publicly marched into the city. In the same year the Protestants held their first national synod privately at Paris, and there adopted a confession of faith, catechism, and directory for worship composed by Calvin, and likewise formed a system of church government. Their doctrines were strictly Calvinistic, their worship very simple and almost without written forms, and their system of government entirely Presbyterian. Single churches were governed by Consistories (Sessions) composed of the pastors and ruling elders, many of whom were noblemen. From the Consistories lay appeals to the Colloquies or Classes (Presbyteries), composed of pastors and elders deputed from the Consistories and meeting twice a year. From these Colloquies there were appeals to the Provincial Synods, composed of all the Colloquies in a province and meeting once a year. National Synods were composed of one pastor and one elder from each of the sixteen Provincial Synods. This supreme ecclesiastical tribunal did not meet regularly, but as occasion required; and at each meeting some province was named to call the next meeting. From A.D. 1559 to the year 1659, there were twenty-nine National Synods holden, which heard appeals, answered cases of conscience, revised their rules and regulations, and transacted various concerns of the whole body. (See their acts published by John Quick, entitled Synodiom in Gallia Reformata, London, 1692, 2 vols. fol.) Francis II. a youth of sixteen, and feeble both in body and mind, succeeded his father Henry II. in 1559. His mother Catherine de Medici, the duke of Guise, and his brother the cardinal of Lorraine, all decided Catholics, in fact ruled the nation and endeavoured to crush the Reformation. The king of Navarre, the prince of Condé, the admiral Coligni, and others friendly to the Protestants, conspired to overthrow the power of the Guises; but they were betrayed, and thus involved themselves and all the Protestants in persecution. Many perished, numbers fled the country, and still more were imprisoned, robbed of their property, and variously harassed during the seventeen months of this reign. In 1560, Charles IX. aged eleven years, succeeded his brother Francis till 1574. His mother was regent. To secure her power she now sought the friendship of the king of Navarre and of the Protestants, and even listened herself to Protestant preachers. She needed money, and the States General were assembled in 1561, but they did nothing but wrangle. The Catholics demanded the extirpation of all heretics, and the Protestants demanded toleration. The court issued a decree forbidding religious disputes, releasing the imprisoned Protestants and allowing toleration to all who would externally conform to the established religion, unless they chose to quit the country. The provincial authorities favourable to the Protestants carried the decree into effect the others would not. In July 1561, there was a fruitless conference of Catholic and Protestant divines as 46; Sallg's Histoire der Augsburg. Confession, vol. ii. book v. chap. v. and vi. p. 190, &c.

¹ See Histoire Eccles. des Eglises Réformées au Royaume de France, in three volumes, Antwerp, 1580, 8vo, which is commonly ascribed to Theodore Beza. The writers on the Gallic church and its Confession of faith are enumerated by Köcher, Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolica, p. 299, &c.

² Benoît, Histoire de l'Edit de Nantes, tome i. livr. v. p. 200, &c.; Daniel's Histoire de France, tome ix. p. 409, &c. of the last Paris edition; Buleux, Hist. Acad. Paris, tom. vi. the whole volume. [For a sketch of the rise and progress of Protestantism in France, till the death of Francis I. in 1547, see note 2, p. 584, &c. above. During the reign of Henry II. the son and successor of Francis, or from 1547 to 1559, the persecution of the Reformed was still more systematic, determined, and unsparring. In 1551, the civil courts were required to co-operate with the spiritual, and to exterminate all heretics. The estates of all emigrants on account of religion were to be confiscated. No books whatever might be imported from any Protestant country and to print, or sell, or possess Protestant commencement the doctrines, institutions, and government of the Genevans. In maintaining these pure and uncontaminated, Poissy to effect a compromise between the two religions. Though the country was in great disorder, the Protestants were prosperous and continually multiplying. To prevent murders and seditions, the court persuaded the people of both religions to give up their arms and to trust to the protection of the government. In January, 1562, a national convention met at St. Germain, and agreed that the Protestants should be allowed to hold private worship till a general council should decide all religious disputes. The Protestants were not quite satisfied with this, but the Catholics were outrageous. Tumults ensued. The king of Navarre, to gain an addition to his territory, abandoned the Protestants, and summoned the duke of Guise to the capital to suppress the tumults. He obeyed; and passing through Vassy in Champagne, found a Protestant assembly holding worship in a barn. His soldiers commenced a quarrel with them, and then murdered 260 of their number. A civil war now broke out. The Protestants made Orleans their head-quarters, and had the prince of Condé and admiral Coligni for leaders; while the Catholics were commanded by the duke of Guise, the king of Navarre, and the constable Montmorency. Much blood was shed and many towns were taken and ravaged. The king of Navarre fell in battle, the duke of Guise was assassinated, Montmorency and Condé were both taken prisoners. Peace was concluded at Amboise, March, 1563, on the ground of a general amnesty for the past, and free toleration of Protestant worship in particular places throughout France. The treaty was not well observed; and the Protestants, finding the court determined on their ruin, renewed the war in 1567 under Coligni and the prince of Condé. Montmorency fell, and many other noblemen on both sides. Peace was concluded early in 1568, on nearly the same terms as before. But three months after, hostile movements on the part of the court caused the war to be renewed with increased violence. The prince of Condé fell in battle in 1569; but the queen of Navarre, with her son and the young prince of Condé, all zealous Protestants, now appeared in the field. Peace was concluded in 1570 on the conditions of amnesty for the past, free toleration of the Protestants every where, a limited right to except against Catholic judges, and the possession of four cities (Rochelle, Cogniac, Montauban, and La Charité) for two years, to be garrisoned by Protestants. To lull the Protestants into security, the court now enforced the terms of the treaty with much apparent zeal, proposed a marriage between the young king of Navarre and the king's sister, and at length drew Coligni, the king of Navarre, and the prince of Condé to appear at court. All this was preparatory to the assassination of the Protestants by order of the king and queen mother on St. Bartholomew's eve, August 22, 1572. The bloody scene began at midnight at the signal of tolling the great bell of the palace, and continued three days at Paris. Coligni was the first victim. With him, five hundred noblemen and about 6,000 other Protestants were butchered in Paris alone. Orders were despatched to all parts of the empire for a similar massacre everywhere. More than 30,000—some say 70,000—perished by the hands of the royal assassins, and the pope ordered a jubilee throughout Christendom. The Protestants were weakened but not destroyed. Losing all confidence in the government, they entered into combinations for their safety. The prince of Condé escaped from his prison, and went to Germany to form alliances in their behalf. Charles IX. died in 1574, and was succeeded by his brother, Henry III. a dissolute man and a violent Catholic. Civil war raged again, but peace was concluded in 1576. The Protestants were to enjoy freedom of worship everywhere, except at Paris and within two miles of the king's residence. Courts, half Catholics and half Protestants, were to be established in the principal cities, and ten cautionary towns were to be given them. The Catholics, dissatisfied as usual with concessions of liberty to the Protestants, combined with the pope and the king of Spain, and obliged the king to abrogate his decrees for giving effect to the treaty. The war was renewed in 1577, and continued with some interruptions till 1580, when the Protestants were again allowed their former liberties, it ever has been and still is so zealous, that in the seventeenth century it did not hesitate to avenge with the sword the temerity of those who would introduce some-

and their cautionary towns for six years. But in 1584, the Catholic chiefs, particularly the Guises, formed a league with Philip, king of Spain, for exterminating the Protestants, and transferring the crown of France to the family of Guise on the demise of the present king. War was of course renewed with the Protestants, at the head of whom were the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. The Guises and their allies checked the Protestants, but alienated the king, who caused the duke of Guise to be assassinated. Henry III. now found himself so odious to the Catholic league that he was obliged to make peace with the king of Navarre and the Protestants, and they generously supported him till his death in 1589. The king of Navarre was the next legal heir to the crown of France, which he assumed with the name of Henry IV. and was supported by all the Protestants and by the Catholics who adhered to the late king. But the leaguers refused to acknowledge him, and he had to contend several years for his crown. At length in 1595, to put a stop to the civil wars, he professed the Catholic religion. Yet he gave free toleration to his Protestant subjects. In 1598, he published the edict of Nantes as the basis of their liberties, and by it he confirmed to them all the privileges ever before conceded to them; gave them equal civil rights and equal privileges in the universities and public schools; allowed them courts, half Protestant and half Catholic, in the principal cities; made them eligible to all public offices; and allowed them to establish public worship in places of a particular description throughout the realm. He also gave them an annual stipend of about 40,000 crowns, for the support of their ministers. And though the Catholics murmured and endeavoured to infringe upon their rights, Henry protected them to the end of his reign in 1610. The number of Protestants in France during the last half of this century was supposed to be from a million to a million and a half. At one time (1571) they claimed to have 2,150 churches; but many of them were only family churches or the households of the nobles. The number of regular churches stated in the acts of their national synods was generally from 700 to 800. Some of these were vastly large, and had three, four, and even five pastors; while others were very small, and two or three were joined under one pastor. They could reckon men of great learning and talents among them. They were in close fellowship with the church of Geneva, and with the Flemish Protestants. Their adherence to their creeds and also their discipline were strict. Take an example:—In 1578, the Consistory of Rochelle debarred the prince of Condé the communion, because one of his ships had taken a prize after the signing of the last peace, which he continued to hold as a lawful prize, because the capture was made before the forty days assigned for the publication of the treaty had expired. He appealed to the National Synod, but it decided against him. See Quick's Synodicon, vol. i. p. 122. For the facts in this note I am indebted chiefly to Gifford's History of France, vol. iii.; Quick's Synodicon, vol. i.; and Ingram Cobbin's Historical View of the Reformed Church of France, London, 1816. For a more full and circumstantial account, see Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ii. p. 239—348.—War. [The English reader has abundant means of becoming acquainted with the history of the Reformed church of France. The Histoire de l'Édit de Nantes, referred to by Mosheim in the beginning of this note, has been, in part, translated into English, 2 vols. 4to, London, 1694. Laval, a French refugee minister in Dublin, published A Compendious History of the Reformation and of the Reformed Churches in France, in six vols. 8vo, Lond. 1737—43, a valuable but unattractive work. More recently there has appeared Smedley's History of the Reformed Religion in France, three vols. 12mo, Lond. 1832—34, written by an English high-churchman; it is not free from prejudices against the French Reformers, and is more a political than a religious history. Browning's History of the Huguenots, new edit. in one volume, Lond. 1840, is an accurate and carefully compiled work.—R.

thing foreign into it.¹ In England the case was very different. This nation never could be persuaded to submit itself entirely to the decisions of Geneva, nor did it long retain unaltered what it did receive from that quarter. It is pretty well attested

¹ Salig's Historie der Augsb. Confession, vol. ii. b. vi. chap. i. p. 403. [Some notice of the first dawning of the Reformation in Scotland was given in note 1, p. 386, and note 1, p. 598, above. James V. died in 1542, and left his crown to an infant daughter, only a few days old, Mary queen of Scots. At the age of six years she was affianced to the dauphin of France, afterwards Francis II. and was sent to be educated in that country, and did not return to Scotland till after the death of her husband in 1561. During these 19 years, Scotland was governed by the queen dowager, Mary of Guise, widow of James V. and by a series of regents. At the commencement of this period, the Reformed doctrines were spreading slowly, without noise, and with little direct opposition. But in February, 1546, cardinal Beaton, the archbishop of St. Andrews, seized and burned at the stake George Wishart, a Reformed preacher. This excited great indignation; and Norman Leslie, a young man, with an armed force surprised and murdered the cardinal in his castle, and held possession of it fourteen months. During this time the reformed doctrines were preached freely at St. Andrews, and among others, by the famous John Knox. On the reduction of St. Andrews, Knox and most of the prisoners were sent out of the country. The same year Henry VIII. died, and the Reformation in England went forward rapidly, under Edward VI. This excited the Scotch to emulation, and several of the nobles embraced the Reformation. The queen dowager, for political reasons, found it necessary to treat the Protestants with indulgence. In 1553, Edward VI. of England died; and was succeeded by his sister Mary, a violent Catholic, whose bloody persecutions drove great numbers of her subjects into foreign countries, several of them into Scotland. This also strengthened the Reformation there. The Scottish clergy possessed about half the wealth of the country, and the nobles were eager to get their estates; while they, ignorant and dissolute, were willing to allow Protestant doctrines to spread, so long as they could enjoy their revenues. In 1554, the queen dowager was made regent. Her partialities to the French so disgusted the nation, that to maintain her power she had to favour still more the Protestants. In 1555 John Knox returned to Scotland, and he and other zealous preachers spread the Reformed doctrines with great success. The queen dowager kept many of the bishoprics and richer benefices vacant, in order to enjoy their revenues, and others she filled with persons devoted to her; and both alienated the more zealous Catholics, and weakened the power of the clergy. In 1558, the archbishop of St. Andrews commenced persecution. But the Protestants, who were now nearly half the nation, were indignant and applied to the queen regent, who gave them protection. The next year however, through French influence, she abandoned the Protestants and sided with the Catholic clergy. In May 1560, she summoned most of the Reformed ministers to appear at Stirling, to answer for their conduct. They set out attended by noblemen and immense crowds of armed companions. She was afraid to meet them and sent them a discharge, on condition that they should peaceably return to their homes. They did so; and she then basely proceeded to try them, and for their non-appearance pronounced them all outlaws. The Protestants in their rage attacked the churches and monasteries, destroying images, altars, crosses, &c. The queen resolved to quell them by force, and a civil war ensued. After various contests, the Protestants, having been frequently deceived by the queen, determined to remove her from the regency. They also found themselves so strong, that they demanded more than a bare toleration; and being aided by queen Elizabeth, they obtained a complete triumph. The queen dowager died; and the French and English embassies, which met in Scotland in 1560, negotiated a peace, by which the Protestants were left at full liberty, and all religious disputes were committed to the adjustment of a Scottish parliament. The French and English troops were both withdrawn, and a full parliament was assembled, which overturned the whole system of popery and established Protestantism in its stead. Those acts of parliament were sent to France for the queen's ratification. At the close of this year Francis II. died, and his queen Mary the next year, 1561, returned to Scotland to take the government of the country into her own hands. The first general assembly of the Scottish church was held in December, 1560. Here a Calvinistic creed and a Presbyterian form of government, as delineated in the First Book of Discipline, were adopted. Five of the pastors were made standing superintendents or visitors of the churches, instead of bishops; pastors and teachers, readers and exhorters, and annual elders and deacons, were the church officers; and church sessions, synods, and general assemblies were to be the judicatories. The clergy in vain attempted to persuade the government to transfer the funds of the Catholic churches to the Protestant. But the parliament of 1561 undertook to purge the land of idolatry, and "abbeys, cathedrals, churches, libraries, records, and even the sepulchres of the dead, perished in one common ruin." The queen did not ratify the acts of the parliament of 1560 subverting popery, and in opposition to them she set up the mass in her own chapel; yet she allowed the Protestants for the present free toleration, and also chose her council chiefly from among them. Many of the richer benefices were still held by Catholics, while others were in the hands of the Protestants; and parliament unanimously decreed, that all the incumbents should continue to enjoy their revenues, yet each paying over a third part of his income to the public treasury. In 1563, the queen had not yet sanctioned the legal abolition of popery, and the Protestant nobles did not see fit to urge it. This provoked the ministers and especially Knox, to utter violent denunciations and to commit some outrages; but the prudence of the nobles prevented any fatal consequences. In 1565, the queen married Henry lord Darnley, a weak and insolent young man, who soon rendered himself odious to his queen and to most of the nation. The next year the queen was delivered of a son, James, afterwards James VI. of Scotland. In 1566, Mary, at the instigation of the French, began to form projects for establishing popery. The next year lord Darnley was murdered; and Bothwell, the queen's favourite, who aspired to the throne, persuaded her to sanction the legal establishment of Protestantism. The scandalous marriage of the queen with Bothwell induced the nobles to seize the person of the infant prince James, for whose safety they were sollicitous. This act, and the loud demands for an investigation of the murder of Darnley, produced a civil war, in which the queen was taken, forced to resign her crown to her son, and confined in Lochleven. Escaping, she renewed the war without success, and retiring into England, she threw herself upon the generosity of queen Elizabeth, who kept her a prisoner twenty years, and then caused her to be beheaded on a charge of treasonable practices in England. Being thus delivered from a Catholic sovereign in 1567, the Protestants of Scotland found no difficulty in fully establishing, during the minority of James, their own religion, and suppressing entirely that of the Catholics. Notwithstanding many were friendly to episcopacy, the Presbyterian system of government was universally adopted, as laid down in the Second Book of Discipline. Generally, three or four contiguous churches were united and had one church session in common, from which lay appeals to the provincial synods; and these sessions, which were called elderships, afterwards became presbyteries, when the individual churches were provided with distinct sessions. James VI. on assuming the government was a zealous Protestant, though somewhat inclined to episcopacy, and disposed to make himself head of the church. He curbed the insolence of the clergy, who claimed liberty to denounce public men and measures from the pulpit, as they had done in the preceding unsettled times. There were warm disputes respecting the boundaries between the civil power and the ministerial prerogative, the expediency of admitting bishops, and the disposition to be made of the old ecclesiastical funds. In 1603 queen Elizabeth died, and James VI. of Scotland succeeded.

that the greatest part of those Englishmen who first renounced the superstitions of their fathers were more inclined to the opinions of Luther respecting the Holy Supper, the mode of public worship, and the government of the church, than to those of the Swiss. But after the death of Henry VIII. the industry of Calvin and his disciples, especially Peter Martyr, caused the former opinions to be excluded, and the latter to gain admission into the universities, the schools, the pulpits, and the minds of the majority.¹ Hence in the reign of Edward VI. when they came to deliberate what system of doctrine and discipline to establish, the English embraced the communion of the Genevans; yet with this limitation, that they would retain the old organization of the church which was very different from that of Geneva, together with some rites and ceremonies which most of the Reformed regard as very superstitious. Yet this diversity, slight as it might then be deemed and tolerable as Calvin himself intimated it to be, afterwards produced numerous perils, calamities, and wars, to the injury both of the church and the commonwealth of England.

17. This lamentable schism, which to this day no means have been able to heal, commenced with those who fled to save their lives and liberties in the year 1554, when Mary reigned or rather raged in England. Some of these celebrated their public worship according to the liturgy established by Edward VI. but others preferred the more simple and in their view more pure worship of the Swiss. The former were denominated Conformists, because they conformed their worship to the pattern legally established by Edward; the latter were called Nonconformists and also Puritans, because they desired greater purity in worship, and did not regard the liturgy of king Edward as free from all the dregs of superstition. These appellations have continued in use, and to this day they designate the Christian communities by which Great Britain is divided. When the exiles returned to their country on the accession of Elizabeth to the throne, this controversy, being introduced into England, soon became so great and threatening that the more sagacious even then despaired of any reconciliation. The wise queen did not confine the reformation to the rigorous principles of the Genevans and their followers the Puritans, but she enjoined on those to whom she entrusted this business to follow the patterns of the early ages rather than that of the Genevans.² When she had modelled the whole church and especially the public worship on these principles, she published the celebrated Act of Uniformity, requiring all Englishmen to observe her regulations. The Puritans urged that they could not in conscience yield obedience, and they bitterly complained that the discarded superstitions of popery were reintroduced. The more ardent insisted that these regulations should be wholly removed, and that the church should be regulated according to the principles of the Genevans; while the more temperate merely requested liberty to worship God themselves according to their own opinions. The queen, determined to show no indulgence to either, employed all the means which penal laws and her own sagacity could afford, in order to suppress the obstinate sect. And thus that purification of the old religion, by which the English church is equally distinguished from the popish and from all the others which have renounced the dominion of the pontiff, was confirmed and established; and at the same time a foundation was laid for permanent discord, to the vast injury of this otherwise happy nation.³

² Mosheim seems disposed, by this ambiguous expression of the primitive ages, to insinuate that queen Elizabeth had formed a pure, rational, and evangelical plan of religious discipline and worship. It is however certain that, instead of being willing to strip religion of the ceremonies which remained in it, she was rather inclined to bring the public worship still nearer to the Romish ritual (Heylin, p. 124), and had a great propensity to several usages in the church of Rome which were justly looked upon as superstitious. She thanked publicly one of her chaplains who had preached in defence of the real presence; she was fond of images, and retained some in her private chapel (Heylin, p. 124); and would undoubtedly have forbidden the marriage of the clergy, if Cecil, her secretary, had not interposed. (Strype's Life of Parker, p. 107, 108, 109.) Having appointed a committee of divines to review king Edward's liturgy, she gave them an order to strike out all offensive passages against the pope, and to make people easy about the corporeal presence of Christ in the sacrament. (Neal's Hist. of the Purit. vol. I. p. 138).—Macl.

³ No one has treated this subject more fully or more agreeably than Daniel Neal, whose History of the Puritan or Protestant Nonconformists was published not long since at London, in four volumes. The first volume of this elaborate work was printed, London, 1732, 8vo; the last volume appeared in 1738. Yet the author, who was himself a Puritan, could not so command his party feelings and his passions as entirely to avoid sectarian zeal. For while he is full in narrating and emblazoning the wrongs which the bishops inflicted or caused to be inflicted upon the Puritans, he frequently extenuates, excuses, or passes silently over the faults of the Puritan sect. [But he also often condemns them; e.g. see note 1, p. 672, below.—R.] The reader may also to the throne of England, under the name of James I. See Robertson's History of Scotland, McCre's Life of John Knox, and Scott's Lives of the Protestant Reformers in Scotland.—Mur. [See the other authorities referred to in the end of the notes, p. 586, and p. 598.—R.

¹ See Löschner's Historia Motuum, par. II. lib. III. cap. VII. p. 67, and the authorities he quotes; Salig's Historie der Augsb. Confession, vol. II. b. VI. chap III. p. 317, &c. and others.

18. The first cause which gave rise to so many strange and calamitous events was very trivial, and of no importance to religion and piety. The leaders of the Puritans held in abhorrence those garments which the English clergy wore for the sake of distinction in their public assemblies. For these garments, having been derived from the papists, were in their view the badges of Antichrist. From this they proceeded to other matters of somewhat greater importance. First, they conceived that the constitution of the English church was a departure from the form established by Christ; and they maintained, what they had learned from Calvin and the Genevans, that all the ministers of religion ought, by divine appointment, to be equal in rank and authority. They had indeed no objections to allowing an individual to bear the title of bishop, and to preside in the meetings of his brethren for the sake of preserving order; but they would not allow him to claim the prerogatives of the old bishops, to rank among the peers of the realm, to be employed in civil affairs, and be distinguished by wealth and power. The weight of this controversy was not great, so long as the English prelates founded their rank and authority upon the laws of the land and human constitution; but it became of vast moment from the year 1588, when Richard Bancroft, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, first ventured publicly to affirm that bishops are an order superior to that of presbyters, not by mere human appointment, but by the will of God.¹ This sentiment meeting the approbation of great numbers, the consequence was what might be anticipated, that none were deemed properly inducted into the sacred office unless they were ordained by a bishop; and that the ministers of those churches which have no bishops were declared to lack the qualifications necessary for their office, and to be inferior to the popish priests.

19. In the next place, the Puritans conceived that those churches which, from being the residence or seat of the bishops, are called cathedrals, ought to be done away, together with all who live upon their revenues, the archdeacons, the deans, the prebendaries, and the canons; they also disapproved of the mode of worship usually practised in cathedrals, and in particular, denied that instrumental music and chanting were proper in the worship of God. They likewise thought that not only the vicious, but also persons of dubious piety should be excluded from the church. For it being their opinion that the church is the company of the faithful, they of course held that care should be taken lest any who are destitute of faith should creep into it. They required many alterations in those rites and ceremonies which were enjoined by the authority of the queen and the supreme council.² For instance,

² MacLaine supposes the supreme council here mentioned to be the noted high commission court. But that court was an executive and visitatorial body, not legislative. It seems therefore that Mosheim intended by the supreme council either the British parliament, or perhaps the Queen's privy council, which possessed much the same powers as a German prince with his Consistorial council. The queen with her privy council repeatedly published injunctions or regulations for the church, which she enforced by the episcopal and the high commission courts; and these arbitrary decrees of the queen were substituted for acts of parliament, which she more than once forbade to legislate on such subjects, so that she assumed to be the real lawgiver of the English church. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. chap. iv. p. 167, &c. Yet the account which MacLaine here gives of the high commission court is worth repeating. "This court," says he, "took its rise from a remarkable clause in the Act of Supremacy, by which the queen and her successors were empowered to choose persons to exercise, under her, all manner of jurisdiction, privileges, and pre-eminences, touching any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the realms of England and Ireland; as also to visit, reform, redress, order, correct, and amend all errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, contempts, offences, enormities whatsoever; provided that they have no power to determine anything to be heresy but what has been adjudged to be so by the authority of the canonical scripture, or by the first four general councils, or any of them, or by any other general council, wherein the same was declared heresy by the express and plain words of canonical scripture, or such as shall hereafter be declared to be heresy by the High Court of Parliament, with the assent of the clergy in Convocation." Upon the authority of this clause, the queen appointed a certain number of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, who in many instances abused their power. The court they composed was called the Court of High Commission, because it claimed a more extensive jurisdiction and higher powers than the ordinary Courts of the Bishops. Its jurisdiction reached over the whole kingdom, and was much the same with that which had been lodged in the single person of lord Cromwell, vicar general to Henry VIII. These commissioners were empowered to make inquiry, not only by the legal methods of juries and witnesses, but by all other ways and means which they could devise, that is, by rack, torture, inquisition, and imprisonment. They were vested with a right to examine such persons as they suspected, by administering to them an oath (not allowed of in their commission, and therefore called ex-officio), by which they were obliged to answer all questions, and thereby might be obliged to accuse themselves or their most intimate friends. The fines they imposed were merely discretionary; the imprisonment to which they condemned was limited by no rule but their own pleasure; they imposed, when they thought proper, new articles of faith on the clergy, and practised all the iniquities and cruelties of consult Strype's Lives of archbishops Parker, Grindal, and Whitgift, which are written with great copiousness and labour. [See also Bogue and Bennet's History of Dissenters, vol. i. London, 1809, and Benjamin Brook's Lives of the Puritans, vol. i. London, 1813.—Mur.] On Elizabeth's policy in religious matters towards both the Romanists and the Puritans, see Hallam's Constitutional Hist. of England, vol. i. chaps. iii. and iv. For some new facts on the early Puritan history of this reign, see Brook's Memoir of the Life, &c. of Tho. Cartwright, Lond. 1845.—R.

¹ See Strype's Life and Acts of Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, p. 121, Lond. 1718, fol. [Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. chap. vii. p. 180, &c.—Mur.]

they deemed all holy days, consecrated to the memory of the saints, to be unlawful; they would prohibit the sign of the cross in various transactions, but especially in the sacrament of baptism; they were displeased with the employment of sponsors or godfathers and godmothers at the baptism of infants whose parents were still living;¹ nor would they allow new-born infants to be baptized by any persons but the priests; they would not have the sacred books of secondary rank, or those commonly denominated the Apocrypha, to be read and expounded to the people; the stated forms of prayer they would not indeed wholly exclude from public worship, but they demanded that the teachers should be allowed to vary from them and to alter them as they saw fit, and be permitted to pray to God in their own language, and not merely in the words of others: in short, they conceived that the worship of their country ought to be conformable to the principles and institutions of the Genevans, and that nothing should be tolerated which was coincident with the Romish worship.

. 20. These opinions could not well be defended or impugned, without calling in the aid of certain general principles which would support the positions adopted, and from which the importance of the controversy may be estimated. Those who sided with the queen and the supreme council maintained (I.) that the right to reform or to abolish and correct errors and defects, both in doctrine and in discipline and worship, belonged to the civil magistrate. The Puritans on the contrary denied that God had assigned this office to the magistrate, and held with Calvin that it was rather the business of the ministers of Christ to restore religion to its purity and dignity. (II.) The former supposed that the rule of proceeding in reforming the doctrine and discipline of the church was not to be derived exclusively from the Holy Scriptures, but also from the writings and the practice of the early ages of the church. The Puritans on the other hand maintained, that the divinely-inspired books were the only pure source from which could be derived rules for purging and regulating the church, and that the enactments and the doctors of the early ages had no authority whatever. (III.) The former declared the church of Rome to be a true church, though much deformed and corrupted; they said the Roman pontiff presumptuously indeed claims to be the head and monarch of the whole church, yet he must be acknowledged to be a legitimate bishop; and of course the ministers ordained by his authority have the most perfect right to minister in holy things. It was necessary for the English prelates to inculcate such principles, if they would trace back the origin and prerogatives of their office to the apostles of Christ. But very different were the views of the Puritans. They constantly maintained that the Romish church had forfeited the title and the rights of a true church; that its bishop was the very Antichrist; that all its discipline and worship were vain, superstitious, and opposed to the precepts of the gospel; and of course, that all communion with that church was to be shunned as pestilential. (IV.) The former deemed the best form of the church to be that which prevailed in the first four or five centuries; indeed, that it was preferable to that established by the Apostles themselves, because they gave such a shape to the church as suited its infantile and nascent state, and left to those who should come after them to regulate it more perfectly, when it should become fully established and extended. On the contrary, the Puritans contended that all the principles of church government were laid down in the Scriptures; and that the ambassadors of Christ set forth an unchangeable pattern which was to be imitated by all succeeding ages, when they directed the first Christian churches to be regulated and governed in the manner then practised in the Jewish congregations [or Synagogues]. (V.) The former contended that things indifferent which are neither commanded nor forbidden by the Holy Scriptures, such as the rites of public worship, the attire of the priests, the festivals, &c. the supreme magistrate may regulate and establish according to his pleasure; and that to disobey his laws on these subjects is as sinful as to violate his laws relative to civil affairs. But the Puritans contended that it was improper and wrong to impose as necessary things what Christ himself had left free; for thus the liberty which Christ has procured for us is subverted. They added that such rites as tend to infect the mind with superstition can by no means be regarded as indifferent, but must be avoided as impious and profane. And such, in their estimation, were those ancient ceremonies which a real inquisition.. See Rapin's and Hume's Histories of England under the Reign of Elizabeth, and Neal's History of the Puritans, passim.—Mur.

¹ Other rites and customs displeasing to the Puritans and omitted by our author were, kneeling at the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, bowing at the name of Jesus, giving the ring in marriage, the prohibition of marriage during certain times of the year, and the licensing it for money, as also the confirmation of children by episcopal imposition of hands.—MacL.

the queen and the parliament refused to abrogate.¹

21. This contest of the court and bishops with those who called aloud for a farther reformation of the church would have been far more severe and perilous, if those who bore the common name of Puritans had been agreed in their opinions and feelings. But this body was composed of persons of various dispositions and characters, whose only bond of union was their dislike of the religion and discipline established by law; and therefore it very soon became divided into sects, some of which were both misled themselves and misled others by fanatical imaginations, and others displayed their folly by devising strange and unusual forms for the constitution of churches. Among these sects, none is more famous than that which was formed about the year 1581 by Robert Brown, an unstable and fickle-minded man. He did not differ materially from either the Episcopalians or the other Puritans as to the doctrines of religion, but he had new and singular views of the nature of the church and of the regulation and government of it. He first distributed the whole body of Christians into small associations, such as those collected by the apostles; because so many persons as could conveniently be assembled in one place and that of moderate dimensions, he affirmed constituted a church and enjoyed all the powers and privileges of a church. And each of these small congregations he pronounced to be independent and free, by divine constitution, from all jurisdiction both of bishops who, according to the court, and of synods which, according to the Puritans, have the right of governing the church. The supreme power to provide for the welfare and the peace of these little associations, according to his views, resided in the people, and all the members had equal powers and prerogatives. The congregated multitude therefore deliberated on sacred subjects, and whatever was voted by the majority was considered as legitimately decided. The brotherhood selected certain persons from among themselves to teach publicly and to administer ordinances; and if the interests of the church seemed to require it, they remanded these teachers of their own creation again to a private station. For these teachers were in no respects more sacred or elevated than the rest of the brethren, except by their power to perform sacred functions, for which they were wholly indebted to the election and consent of the brethren. Moreover the office of teaching was by no means confined to them, but all the brethren, if they pleased, might prophesy in public or exhort and instruct the fraternity. Hence, when the appointed preacher of the church had closed his discourse, the brethren severally were at liberty to hold forth and to exhibit what they might have been revolving in their minds, or had not clearly apprehended in the discourse of the preacher. In short, Brown thought that the Christian world should now present the same aspect as that of the churches in the days of the Apostles. In maintaining such opinions, he and his associates were so intolerant as to hold that all bonds of harmony, communion, and charity, with churches differently constituted were to be severed; and to declare that the English church in particular was above all others to be shunned, as being a spurious church, contaminated with the pollutions of popery and destitute of all divine influences. This sect, impatient under the great injuries it received (perhaps through its own fault) in England, removed to Holland, and settled at Middleburg, Amsterdam, and Leyden; but it did not long continue. Brown himself returned to England, and forsaking his new opinions, obtained a parsonage in the Established Church. The other exiles became embroiled by many internal dissensions.² These effects induced the wiser among them to modify the discipline of their founder and make it more tolerable. In this manner, from them originated the noted sect of the Independents or Congregational Brethren, which still exists. But their history belongs to the next century.

22. In the provinces of the Netherlands it was long doubtful whether those who renounced the Romish communion would join the fellowship of the Lutherans or that of the Swiss, for each of these had many and strong partisans.³ But in the year

¹ Mosheim in these five articles has followed the account of this controversy given by Mr. Neal, in his History of the Puritans. This latter adds a sixth article, not of debate but of union. Both parties (says he) agreed too well in asserting the necessity of a uniformity of public worship, and of calling in the sword of the magistrate for the support and the defence of their several principles, which they made an ill use of in their turns, as they could grasp the power into their hands. The standard of uniformity, according to the bishops, was the queen's supremacy and the laws of the land; according to the Puritans, the decrees of provincial and national synods allowed and enforced by the civil magistrate. But neither party was for admitting that liberty of conscience and freedom of profession which is every man's right as far as is consistent with the peace of the government under which he lives.—MacL.

² Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. chap. vi. p. 324; Hornbeck's Summa Contrroversiarum, lib. x. p. 738, &c.; Fuller's Ecclesiastical History of Britain, book x. p. 168 [Brook's Lives of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 306, &c.—Mur.]

³ Loecherer's Historia Motuum, par. iii. lib. v. cap. iv. p. 74.

1571, the preference was publicly given to the Swiss. For the Belgic Confession of Faith,¹ which was published in this year, was for the most part in unison with that adopted by the French Reformed church, and differed from the Augsburg Confession in several respects, and especially on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper.² The causes of this will readily appear if we consider the proximity of the French and the number of their residing in the Netherlands, the high reputation of Calvin and the Genevan school, and the indefatigable industry of the Genevans in extending the boundaries of their church. From this period the Belgians publicly assumed the title of the Reformed instead of that of Lutherans which they had before borne; and in this they followed the example of the French, who had invented and first assumed this appellation. So long however as the Belgians were subject to the Spaniards, they disused the term Reformed to avoid incurring odium, and styled themselves Associates of the Augsburg Confession; because the Spanish court looked upon Lutherans as far better citizens than the disciples of Calvin, who from their commotions in France were deemed more inclined to sedition.³

23. The knowledge of a more sound religion was carried into Poland by the disciples of Luther from Saxony. Afterwards, not only the Bohemian Brethren whom the Romish priests had expelled from their country, but likewise some of the Swiss, disseminated their opinions among the Poles; not to mention the Anabaptists, the Antitrinitarians, and others, who travelled in that country and there collected congregations.⁴ Hence there existed here and there throughout Poland three religious associations—those of the Bohemian Brethren, the Lutherans, and the Swiss. In order to oppose with greater vigour their common enemies, they held a convention at Sendomir in the year 1570, and entered into a kind of confederation, the terms of which are comprehended in a confession usually called the Agreement of Sendomir.⁵ But as this compromise was deemed too condescending and injurious to the truth (for in it the opinions which separate the Lutherans from the Reformed were expressed in vague and ambiguous language), it was not long after opposed by many of the Lutherans, and in the next century was entirely abrogated; nor have those who desired and laboured to restore it to this day met with the success they had hoped for. In both the [Brandenburg and the Polish] Prussias, after the death of Luther and Melancthon, very large congregations of the Reformed religion were gathered by several persons, which are still in a flourishing state.⁶

24. The Bohemian Brethren as they are called, or the Moravians, who were descended from the better sort of Hussites, and had adopted some peculiar regulations designed especially to guard against the reigning vices, upon hearing of Luther's efforts to reform the church, sent envoys to him as early as 1522, soliciting his friendship; and

¹ For an account of the Belgic Confession, see Köcher's Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolica, p. 216. [It was first composed in the Walloon language by Guy de Bres, and first printed in French in 1562. Afterwards it was translated into various languages, and was ratified (together with the Heidelberg Catechism) which it harmonizes) by the Synod of Dort in 1619, and again at the Hague in 1651.—Mur.]

² Brandt's Historie der Reformatie in en omtrent de Nederlanden, vol. i. book v. p. 253, &c. [translated into English; see note 3, pages 599, 600, above.—R.]

³ The words of Brandt, ubi supra, p. 254, 255, are these: "Nochtan behelphen s'ick de Nederlandsche Ge-reformeerden met den titel van Augsbursche Confessie, om dat die te hove niet so ongunstigh was als de Calvinische of Franche, die de partij doorgens hield te wesen een oproeyiger Secte dan de Luthersche." [This sentence stands as follows in the English translation:—"Nevertheless the Dutch Reformed screened themselves sometimes behind the Augsburgian Confession, because it was not so disagreeable at court as the French or Calvinian, since the latter sect was esteemed to be more addicted to tumults and uproars than the Lutheran." Brandt's Hist. of the Reformation, &c. vol. i. p. 142.—R.]

⁴ Löschner's Historia Motuum, par. iii. lib. iii. cap. ii. p. 36; Salig's Historie der Augsburg. Confession, vol. ii. b. vi. chaps. iii. iv. v. p. 516; Regenvolscius, Historia Ecclesiar. Slavonicar. lib. i. cap. xvi. &c. p. 71, &c.; Solignac's Histoire de Pologne, tome v. p. 40, &c.; Kautz, Præcipua Relig. Evangelica in Polonia fide, Hamb. 1734, 4to. [The disciples of Luther from Saxony were not the first preachers of reformation in Poland as Mosheim asserts. The Bohemian Brethren had been labouring there from the time of John Huss, and in the year 1500 they had nearly two hundred houses of worship and were favoured by many of the nobility. See Regenvolscius, ubi supra, and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Ref. vol. ii. p. 667, 681. The most eminent among the Reformed clergy of Poland was the famous John à Lasco, who preached some time in London, and returning to Poland in 1556 did much to advance the Reformation there. See his history and many of his letters in Gerdes, Miscell. Groning. tom. i.—v. The Protestants of Great Poland were chiefly Bohemian Brethren; those of Little Poland embraced the views of the Swiss. Both these became united in 1535, but their union with the Lutherans was not so easily effected.—Mur. [Regenvolscius, whose Systema Historico-Chronologicum Ecclesiar. Slavorum. Utrecht, 1652, is referred to in this and the preceding note, was an assumed name. The author was Wengierski, a minister of the Reformed church. For much valuable information on the ecclesiastical history of Poland, see Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, referred to at p. 286, note 2, above; an excellent work, which has been translated into German, Leip. 1841.—R.]

⁵ See Jablonski's Historia Consensus Sendomiriensis, Berlin, 1731, 4to; and his Epistola Apologetica, printed in the same year, and directed against the exceptions of a certain Polish antagonist. [The English reader will find a translation of this Consensus with the original in Krasinski, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 383, &c.—R.]

⁶ Löschner's Historia Motuum, par. iii. lib. vi. cap. i. p. 216.

afterwards from time to time, they proffered the hand of friendship to the Saxons and to other members of our community.¹ Nor did Luther and his friends find anything very censurable either in their doctrines or their discipline; nay, the confession which they submitted to his judgment he did not indeed approve in all respects, yet he thought it might be tolerated.² After the death of Luther, most of the Brethren being expelled their country in the year 1547, many of them, and especially among those who settled in Poland, inclined towards the side of the Reformed. There seemed indeed to be a renewal of the harmony between the Bohemians and the Lutherans at the time of the Agreement of Sendomir already mentioned; but the influence of this agreement was soon afterwards greatly weakened, and gradually all the Bohemians united themselves with the Swiss.³ This union at first contained the stipulation that each community should enjoy its own regulations, and that they should keep up their separate meetings for worship; but in the following century, at the councils of Ostrog, A.D. 1620 and 1627, all difference was done away; and the two communities of

Bohemians and Swiss became consolidated into one, which took the name of the Church of the United Brethren, and retained the form and regulations of the Bohemians, but embraced the doctrines of the Reformed.⁴

25. The descendants of the Waldenses, who lived shut up in the valleys of Piedmont, were led by their proximity to the French and Genevans to embrace their doctrines and worship. Yet they retained not a few of their ancient rules of discipline so late as the year 1630. But in this year the greatest part of the Waldenses were swept off by pestilence; and their new teachers whom they obtained from France, regulated all their affairs according to the pattern of the French Reformed Church.⁵ The Hungarians and Transylvanians were excited to burst the bonds of superstition by the writings and the disciples of Luther. Afterwards Matthew Devay and others in a more private way, and then about the year 1550 Stephen Szegeidin and others more openly, spread among them successfully the sentiments of the Swiss respecting the Lord's Supper and the government of the church. This produced here as in other countries, first, contests among the friends of a purer religion, and at length a manifest schism, which time has strengthened rather than diminished.⁶

¹ On the doctrinal views of the Bohemian Brethren and their church, see the following papers by Elsner, in Gerdes' Miscell. Growing: Brevis Conspectus Doctrinæ Fratrum Bohemorum, in vol. iii. p. 381, &c.; De Institutione Catechetica Polonica-Reformata, in vol. iv. p. 31, &c.; Series Episcoporum sive Seniorum Unitatis Fratrum Bohemorum, ibid. p. 45, &c. with Addenda, p. 172, &c.—It.

² See Carpov's Nachricht von den Böhmischen Brüdern, p. 46, &c.; Köcher's Bildhuthen Theologie Symbolica, p. 76, &c. [In the year 1522, the Brethren sent two delegates to Luther, namely, John Horn and Mich. Weis, to congratulate him on his attaining to a knowledge of the truth. They also sent him soon afterwards a book entitled Instruction for Children, which they had composed for the benefit of their church. But as they here expressed clearly their opinion of the Lord's Supper (namely, that Christ himself was not actually present in it) and he freely censured this opinion, their intercourse with Luther was for a time interrupted. They were also displeased that he was more solicitous about purity of doctrine than the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline. But as they perceived that it would be for their advantage to be reckoned among the adherents to the Augsburg Confession, they at times sought his communion and exhibited to him their Confession, which he afterwards caused to be published. See Comenius, Historia Fratrum Bohemorum, Halle, 1702, 4to, p. 22, &c.; and Köcher, Von den Glaubensbekenntnissen der Böhmischen Brüder, Frankf. 1741, 8vo.—Schl.

³ Besides those who treat professedly of the Bohemian Brethren, as Comenius, Camerarius, and Lasitius, the reader may consult Löscher's Historia Motuani, par. ii. lib. v. cap. vi. p. 99, &c.; Salig's Historie der Augsburg. Confession, vol. ii. b. vi. chap. iii. p. 520, &c.; Regenvolscius, Historia Ecclesiæ Slavonicarum, lib. i. cap. xiii. xiv. xv. &c. [On the Bohemian Reformation see Gieseler's Lehrbuch d. Neueren Kirchenges. vol. i. p. 437, &c. The English reader has now access to a detailed account of the religious changes in that country, in a recent publication entitled The Reformation and Anti-Reformation in Bohemia, Lond. 1845, 2 vols. translated from the German. The author's name however is not given, which, with its scanty references to authorities, detracts greatly from its value.—R.

⁴ Regenvolscius, ubi supra, lib. i. cap. xiv. p. 120.

[On the doctrinal views of the Bohemian Brethren, which coincided generally with those of Calvin, Jo. Theoph. Elsner (one of that sect) wrote an elaborate treatise entitled Brevis Conspectus Doctrinæ Fratrum Bohemorum, in which he shows what was their belief in the 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries; and which is printed in Gerdes' Serimium Antiquar. sine Miscellanea Groningana, tom. iii. p. 381—457.—Mur.

⁵ Leger's Histoire Générale des Eglises Vaudoises, livr. 4. chap. xxxiii. p. 205, 206; Scultet's Annales Religieuses Evangéliques, p. 294; Gerdes, Historia Evangelii Renovati, tom. ii. p. 401. [In the year 1530, the Waldenses, having heard of the Reformation in Switzerland and Germany, sent two of their barbs or ministers, Geo. Morel and Peter Masson or Latome, to Berne, Fribourg, and Strasburg, to confer with the Reformers there. Their written communication to Oecolampadius at Basel describes their faith and practice with great simplicity and candour; and the written answer of Oecolampadius was such as might be expected—kind, affectionate, and fraternal. See them in Gerdes, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 401—417. In their council in Angrogne, A.D. 1532, they adopted a short confession of faith, professedly embracing the doctrines they had firmly believed for four hundred years, yet manifestly a departure in some particulars from the principles stated by their deputies to Oecolampadius, and conformed to the new views he had communicated to them, especially in regard to free-will, grace, predestination, and several points of practical religion. See this confession in Perrin's History of the Waldenses (English translation), part i. b. ii. chap. iv. p. 59, &c. In the same council they took measures to procure an impression of the whole Bible in their native language, and also a supply of other religious books. See Perrin, ubi supra, p. 61.—Mur.] The history of this interesting people at a later period is referred to in the subsequent century.—R.

⁶ Debrezen's Historia Ecclesiæ Reformata in Hungaria et Transylvania, lib. ii. p. 64, 72, 98, &c. Compare the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1738. p. 1076,

26. After the promulgation of the Formula of Concord, many of the German churches which before belonged to the Lutheran communion united themselves to the Reformed. Among these were the churches of Nassau, Hanau, Isenburg, and others. In the year 1595, the princes of Anhalt, at the instigation especially of Wolfgang Ameling, embraced the Reformed worship in place of the Lutheran, which produced a long contest between the inhabitants of that principality and the Lutherans.¹ In Denmark also, near the close of the century, the Reformed doctrines especially in regard to the Lord's Supper gained some footing; for that kingdom abounded in disciples and admirers of Melancthon, who were disposed to promote peace among the Protestants, at the head of whom was Nicholas Hemming, a pious and learned divine of Copenhagen. But the designs of Hemming and his friends becoming known prematurely, the other divines who were unwilling to have Lutheranism set aside opposed so many obstructions by means of the king, that those designs miscarried.²

27. Moreover, the nations which held communion with the Swiss did not embrace all the Helvetic tenets and institutions. The Swiss indeed ardently wished them to do so, but untoward circumstances frustrated their hopes. The English, as is well known, perseveringly rejected the ecclesiastical constitution and the form of worship adopted by the other Reformed churches; nor could they be persuaded to receive the common opinions of the Swiss respecting the Lord's Supper and the divine decrees, as the public sentiments of the whole nation.³ The churches of the Palatinate, Bremen, Poland, Hungary, and Holland, agreed indeed with the Swiss or French respecting the Lord's Supper, the simplicity of their worship, and the form of church government; but not likewise in respect to predestination, which difficult subject they left to the discretion of individuals.⁴ And down to the time of the Synod of Dort, no portion of the reformed community required, by any positive injunction, a belief in the opinion of the Genevans respecting the causes of everlasting salvation and damnation. Yet the greatest part of the teachers in most of these countries gradually came spontaneously into the Genevan views, in consequence especially of the reputation and influence of the school of Geneva, to which most of the candidates for the ministry of that age were accustomed to resort for instruction.

28. The inspired books of the Old and New Testaments are held by the Reformed

³ It is true indeed that the doctrine of Zwingli, who represented the bread and wine as nothing more than the external signs of the death of Christ, was not adopted by the church of England; but the doctrine of Calvin was embraced by that church, and is plainly taught in the thirty-eighth article of its faith. As to what relates to the doctrine of the divine decrees, Mosheim is equally mistaken. The seventeenth article of the church of England is, as bishop Burnet candidly acknowledges, framed according to St. Augustine's doctrine, which scarcely differs at all from that of Calvin; and though it be expressed with a certain latitude which renders it susceptible of a mitigated interpretation, yet it is very probable that those who penned it were patrons of the doctrine of absolute decrees. The very cautions which are subjoined to this article intimate that Calvinism was what it was meant to establish. It is certain that the Calvinistical doctrine of predestination prevailed among the first English Reformers, the greatest part of whom were at least Sublapsarians; in the reign of queen Elizabeth this doctrine was predominant, but after that period it lost ground imperceptibly, and was renounced by the church of England in the reign of king Charles I. [not by the church, only by some of its ministers]. Some members of that church still adhered nevertheless to the tenets of Calvin, and maintained not only that the thirty-nine articles were Calvinistical, but also affirmed that they were not susceptible of being interpreted in that latitude for which the Arminians contended. These episcopal votaries of Calvinism were called Doctrinal Puritans. See Burnet's Exposition of the XXXIX. Articles, art. 7, and Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 579.—Mackl. [See also Toplady's History of Calvinism, 2 vols. 8vo; bishop Tomline's Refutation of Calvinism, 8vo; Scott's Remarks on Tomline on Calvinism, 8vo; and The Fathers, the Reformers, and the Public Formularies of the Church of England, in Harmony with Calvin, &c. Philadelphia, 1817, 12mo, p. 108.—119.—Mur.] [On the other side however of this controversy, see the able Bampton Lectures of the late archbishop Lawrence, entitled An Attempt to Illustrate those Articles of the Church of England which the Calvinists improperly consider as Calvinistical, Oxf. 1804, 3d ed. 1838, which though ingenious is not convincing.—R.

⁴ See Grotius, Apologeticum eorum qui Hollandia ante Mutationem, a.d. 1618, præfuerunt, cap. iii. p. 54, &c. ed. Paris, 1640, 12mo.

&c.; Haner's Historia Ecclesiæ Transylvanicarum, Frankf. 1694, 12mo. [See above, p. 585, notes 2 and 3.—Mur.] [Add to these authorities on the Lutheran side, Ribini's Memorabilia Augustanæ Confessionis in Regno Hungariæ, Posen, 1757–89, 2 vols. It brings down the history to the year 1740. And on the side of the Reformed, see the valuable work, containing many important public papers, edited by Lampe and entitled Historia Ecclesiæ Reformata in Hungaria et Transylvania, Utrecht, 1728, 4to, referred to by Mosheim in the beginning of this note under the name of the author, which was suppressed by Lampe. He was Paul Embler Debrezinius, a minister of the Reformed church there. See Ribini, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 31. See also Bod, De Reformationis Hungariæ Patronis, in Gerdes, Miscell. Groning. vol. iv. p. 133, &c.; and another dissertation by the same writer, who was a minister in Transylvania, De Reform. Hungar. Ministris, in Gerdes, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 346, &c.—R.

¹ Bechman's Historie des Hauses Anhalt, vol. ii. part vi. p. 133, &c.; Kraft's Ausführliche Historie von dem Erczimo, p. 428, 497, &c. [Though the princes professed Calvinism, and introduced Calvinist ministers in all the churches where they had the right of patronage, yet the people were left free in their choice; and the noblemen and their vassals who were attached to Lutheranism had secured to them the unrestrained exercise of their religion. By virtue of a convention made in 1679, the Lutherans were permitted to erect new churches. The Zerbst line, with the greatest part of its subjects, profess Lutheranism, but the three other lines with their respective territories are Calvinists.—Mackl.

² Pontoppidan's Annales Ecclesiæ Danicæ Diplomaticæ, tom. iii. p. 57, &c.

to be the only source of divine truth, except that the English forbid contempt to be shown to the authority of the church in the five first centuries.¹ And they maintain equally with the Lutherans that these books are clear, full, and complete, so far as regards things necessary to salvation; and that they are to be interpreted from themselves [or independently] and by comparing one part with another, and not after the dictates of human reason or of Christian antiquity. Several of their theologians indeed have been thought to extend too far the powers of human reason in comprehending and explaining the nature of the divine mysteries; and this has led many to represent the Reformed as upholding two sources of religious knowledge, the holy Scriptures and reason or rather the capacity of the human mind. But in this matter, if we do not mistake the fact, both parties err through eagerness to vanquish and subdue their adversaries. For if we except the improper phraseology of certain individuals, it will appear that the Reformed in general believe, as we do, that absurdities can never be believed, and consequently that doctrines which contain absolute absurdities must be false and cannot be believed; yet they sometimes contentiously apply this principle to overthrow those Lutheran tenets which they reject.²

29. The Reformed, if we restrict this appellation to those who approve the sentiments of Calvin, differ from the Lutherans in regard to three subjects.—I. The doctrine of the Holy Supper, in which the Lutherans say that the body and blood of Christ are truly, though in an inexplicable manner, presented to both the pious and the ungodly; while the Reformed suppose that the human nature of Christ is present only by the symbols of it. Yet they do not all explain their doctrine in the same manner. II. The doctrine of the eternal decrees of God in regard to the salvation of men, the ground of which the Lutherans suppose to be, the faith or unbelief of men in Christ foreseen by God from eternity; but the Reformed suppose it to be the free and sovereign good pleasure of God. III. Certain rites and institutions, which the Reformed think have a tendency to superstition, but which the Lutherans think are partly tolerable and partly useful to Christians. Such are images in churches, sacred garments for the clergy, the private confession of sins, the use of small circular pieces of bread [wafers] such as were anciently distributed in the Holy Supper, the formula of exorcism as it is called in the sacrament of baptism, and some others. These the Reformed would have to be abrogated, because they think religious worship should be restored to its primitive simplicity, and the additions made to it be wholly struck off.³

¹ This was the proper place for giving an account of the symbolical books of the Reformed church; but Mosheim has entirely omitted that topic. No doubt the Reformed church, as one general community distinct from Romanism and Lutheranism, has not any books universally recognised as symbolical throughout its several churches. But each church of the Reformed body has its own Confession, and these are ordinarily published together in one collection, and are usually spoken of as the Symbolical books of the Reformed church. The first collection of these Confessions was published at Geneva in 1581, under the title of Harmonia Confessionum fidei Orthodoxarum et Reformatarum Ecclesiarum. It comprised eleven confessions, the articles of which are classed together and printed in nineteen different sections. Another collection appeared in 1612, containing some additional matter entitled Corpus et Syntagma Confessionum Fidei, &c. reprinted in Geneva in 1654, in which the several confessions are given separately. The first-named collection was translated into English and published in the same form as the Latin copy, in London in 1613, 4to, and recently re-edited by the Rev. Peter Hall, 8vo, under the title of The Harmony of Protestant Confessions, &c. London, 1842. In this edition, the editor has subjoined three additional confessions which were not given in the edition of 1613, namely, the English thirty-nine articles, the Irish articles, and the judgment of the Synod of Dort. The latest edition of the Reformed Symbolical books is by the celebrated Augusti of Bonn, entitled, Corpus Librorum Symbolicarum qui in Ecclesia Reformatarum Auctoritatem Publicam obtinuerunt, Elberf. 1827, 8vo. The confessions are arranged chronologically, and comprise the following:—The three Swiss confessions, the French confession of 1561, the English thirty-nine articles, the Scots confession of 1560, the Dutch or Belgic confession, the articles of the Synod of Dort, the Hungarian confession of 1570, the two Polish confessions of Sandomir in 1570 and Thorn in 1595, the early Bohemian confession, the Tetrapolitan, the Brandenburg confession in German, and the Lepsic Agreement of 1631 also in German, the Declaration at Thorn in 1645, the Helvetic Agreement or Formula consensus on the doctrine of Grace in 1675, together with the Genevan and Heidelberg Catechisms. With the exception of the two documents in German, all the rest are in Latin. The compiler purposely omitted the Westminster Confession and Catechisms, on the ground

² There is nothing in the thirty-nine articles of the church of England which implies its considering the writings of the fathers of the first five centuries as an authoritative criterion of religious truth. There is indeed a clause in the Act of Uniformity [Act of Supremacy] passed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, declaring that her delegates in ecclesiastical matters, should not determine anything to be heresy but what was adjudged so by the authority of Scripture or by the first four general councils; and this has perhaps misled Mosheim in the passage to which this note refers. Much respect indeed, and perhaps too much, has been paid to the fathers, but that has been always a matter of choice and not of obligation.—Macl. [It was in regard to the constitution and government of the church rather than in articles of faith, that the church of England paid more deference to the fathers than the rest of the Reformed did; and on this subject they have actually copied after the practice of the first five centuries, as being obligatory upon the conscience. See sec. 20, p. 671, above, and Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. 1. chap. iv. p. 183, 184.—Mur.]

³ Our author has here undoubtedly in view the Lutheran doctrine of consubstantiation, which supposes the same extended body to be totally present in different places at one and the same time. To call this a gross and glaring contradiction, seems rather the dictate of common sense than the suggestion of a contentious spirit.—Macl.

30. This short list of topics will be seen to be in fact a long one, by those who are aware what a multitude of abstruse questions extending through the whole system of theology these few differences produced. For the controversy respecting the mode of the presence of Christ's body and blood in the Holy Supper afforded to the polemics ample room to expatiate on the mysteries of religion, or the nature and use of the sacraments; and to institute subtle discussions respecting the majesty and glory of Christ's human nature, the communication of divine attributes to it, and the proper attitude of the mind in the worship of Christ. The dispute respecting the divine decrees afforded abundant matter for debate on the nature of the divine attributes and particularly God's justice and goodness, on the certainty and necessity of all events, on the connexion between human liberty and divine providence, on the extent of the love which God has for men, and of the blessings procured for us by the merits of Christ; on the nature of that divine influence which renews the minds of men, on the perseverance of the persons who are appointed to eternal life in the covenant of God, and on various other subjects of no small moment. Nor was the last dissension, respecting rites and institutions, unproductive. For besides discussions respecting the origin and antiquity of certain rites, it produced the following controversies by no means contemptible:—What kind of things are they which may be justly denominated indifferent, or neither good nor bad? How far is it proper to yield to an adversary who contends about things in their nature indifferent? How far does Christian liberty extend? Is it lawful, for the sake of gratifying the people, to retain various ancient customs and institutions, which have a superstitious aspect yet are capable of a good interpretation? and others of a similar nature.

31. It has been debated, and sometimes with great warmth of feeling, particularly among the English and the Dutch, to whom rightfully belong the government of the church and the power of establishing rules and regulations in matters of religion. In these contests, those have come off victorious who maintain that the authority to regulate sacred affairs is, by the appointment of Christ himself, vested in the church, and therefore ought by no means to be committed into the hands of civil magistrates; yet they admit the right of temporal sovereigns to advise and to succour the church when in trouble, to assemble and preside in the conventions of the church, to see that her officers decree nothing prejudicial to the commonwealth, and to strengthen and confirm with their authority the decrees of the ministers of religion. The kings of England indeed, from the time of Henry VIII. have declared themselves to be supreme heads of the church as well in spiritual as in temporal things; and it is manifest that Henry VIII. and his son Edward VI. attached very ample powers to this title, and considered themselves authorized to do whatever the Roman pontiffs might do.¹ But queen Elizabeth greatly limited this prerogative, and declared that the authority of the kings of England did not extend to religion itself and to things sacred, but only to the persons who teach religion and minister in sacred things.² In England

¹ Neal's History, &c. vol. i. ch. i. p. 11, and others.

² Le Courayer's Supplément aux Deux Ouvrages pour la Défense de la Validité des Ordinations Anglicanes, chap. xv. p. 416, &c. [Courayer's book I have not seen; but in what respects queen Elizabeth limited the powers of the kings of England as supreme heads of the church, or when and where she declared that the regal power did not extend to religion itself and to things sacred, I am unable to determine. Burnet indeed (Hist. of the Reform. vol. iii. p. 492, ed. London, 1825) says of the power conferred on Elizabeth at the commencement of her reign by the Act of Supremacy: "It was in many things short of the authority that king Henry had claimed." But he specifies no particulars; and it is well known that Henry far transgressed the limits which he pretended to set to his own power as head of the church. Neal says of the power given to Elizabeth by the above act of her parliament: "Nor is it the whole that the queen claimed, who sometimes stretched her prerogative beyond it." (Hist. of the Puritans, vol. i. ch. iv. p. 168.) Hume says of this act, (Hist. of England, vol. iv. ch. xxxviii. p. 151, edit. Philad. 1810): "Though the queen was there denominated governess, not head, of the church, it conveyed the same extensive power which, under the latter title, had been exercised by her father and brother." And he adds (ibid. p. 274): "Scarcely any sovereign before Elizabeth, and none after her, carried higher, both in speculation and practice, the authority of the crown." He likewise says (p. 290): "Religion was a point of which Elizabeth was, if possible, still more jealous than of matters of state. She pretended that, in quality of supreme head or governor of the church, she was fully empowered, by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to doctrine, discipline, or worship; and she never would allow her parliaments so much as to take these points into consideration." And the whole history of her reign appears to confirm these statements, which are so contrary to the assertions of Mosheim. See Hume, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 150, &c. 272, 290, &c. 292, 336, 364, &c. 462. The powers of the English monarchs, as heads of the church, from Henry VIII. to Charles I. are thus defined by Neal, in his History of the Puritans, vol. i.)

that they did not possess the full authority of symbolical books among Presbyterians; and the authority he quotes for this singular piece of information is a statement by Whiston, that in a meeting of Presbyterial ministers in London in 1719, a majority had decided against subscription to the Confession! as if this Arian vote affected its authority in Scotland, Ireland, or in other Presbyterian churches. I may add that the Westminster Confession and the two Catechisms were translated into Latin by G. Dillingham, and printed at Cambridge in 1656, and at Edinb. in 1694, under the title of Confessio Fidei in Consensu Theologorum auctoritate Parliamenti Anglicani indicito elaborata, &c. The Shorter Catechism was also translated into Greek by John Harmer, Regius Professor of Greek in Oxford, and printed, with a Latin version au regard, as 'H Κατήχησις τῆς Χριστιανικῆς ὁρθότητος συντομωτέρα. Lond. 1659, 18mo.—R.

therefore the constitution of the church is very nearly the same as that of the state. The clergy, distributed into two houses called the upper and lower houses of Convocation, are assembled by the order of the king and a summons from the archbishop of Canterbury; and they decree by common consent whatever the interests of the church are thought to demand; and the king and Parliament give to their decrees the sanctions and authority of laws.¹ Yet this subject has been much controverted, the king and the Parliament putting one construction upon the ecclesiastical constitution, and the rulers of the church, particularly those who think the church is an independent body, giving a different construction of it. And in fact, the ecclesiastical constitution of England has not a fixed and uniform character, but it depends on custom and usage and the fluctuations of time rather than on established laws.

32. The question, what is the best form and organization of a Christian church? produced likewise warm contests, which hitherto no means have been found able to decide. The Genevans guided by Calvin judged it proper that the private affairs of single churches should be directed by a body of elders or presbyters, all equals; that matters of a more public and important character should be decided in conventions of delegated elders in the provinces; and that the interests of the whole church and matters of special difficulty should be discussed, as anciently, in a council of the whole church.² Nor did the Genevans omit any exertions to persuade all their confederates to embrace this system. But the English judged the old system of church government to be very sacred, and therefore not to be changed. This system commits the inspection and care of certain minor provinces exclusively to the bishop; under the bishops are the presbyters of single churches; under the presbyters are the ministers or deacons; and the common inch. iv. p. 169—172:—"They never pretended to be spiritual persons, or to exercise any part of the ecclesiastical function in their own person; they neither preached nor administered the sacraments," &c. "But, abating this point, it appears very probable, that all the jurisdiction and authority claimed by the pope, as the head of the church, was transferred to the king by the Act of Supremacy, as far as was consistent with the laws of the land then in being, though since it has undergone some abatements." He then proceeds to the following specifications:—"I. The kings and queens of England claimed authority in matters of faith, and to be the ultimate judges of what is agreeable or repugnant to the word of God." "II. With regard to discipline,—the king is the supreme and ultimate judge in the spiritual courts by his delegates, as he is in the courts of common law by his judges." "III. As to rites and ceremonies, the Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz. cap. 1.) says expressly, that the queen's majesty, by advice of her ecclesiastical commissioners, or of her metropolitan, may ordain and publish such ceremonies or rites as may be most for the advancement of God's glory and the edifying of the church. Accordingly, her majesty published her injunctions without sending them into convocation or parliament, and erected a court of High Commission for ecclesiastical causes, consisting of commissioners of her own nomination, to see them put in execution. Nay, so jealous was queen Elizabeth of this branch of her prerogative, that she would not suffer her high court of parliament to pass any bill for the amendment or alteration of the ceremonies of the church, it being (as she said) an invasion of her prerogative." "IV. The kings of England claimed the sole power of the nomination of bishops; and the deans and chapters were obliged to choose those whom their majesties named, under penalty of a præmunire; and after they were chosen and consecrated, they might not act but by commission from the crown." "V. No convocation or synods of the clergy can assemble but by a writ or precept from the crown; and when assembled, they can do no business without the king's letters patent, appointing them the particular subjects they are to debate upon; and after all, their enacts are of no force without the royal sanction." "Upon the whole it is evident, by the express words of several statutes (31 Hen. VIII. chap. xiv. 1 Eliz. c. 1.), that all jurisdiction, ecclesiastical as well as civil, was vested in the king, and taken away from the bishops, except by delegation from him. The king was chief in the determination of all causes in the church; he had authority to make laws, ceremonies, and constitutions, and without him no such laws, ceremonies, or constitutions, are or ought to be of force. And lastly, all appeals, which before had been made to Rome, are for ever hereafter to be made to his majesty's chancery, to be ended and determined, as the manner now is, by delegates."—Mur.

¹ Costin, De Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Religione et Discipline, cap. viii. p. 53, in Smith's Vite Eruditiss. Fiodrum, London, 1700, 4to; Wilkins, De Vet. et Mod. Synodi Anglic. Constitutione, in his Concil. Mag. Brit. tom. i. p. vii. &c.

² Maclaine thinks Mosheim has here made a great mistake, in specifying three judicatories as provided by the Genevan plan, while in fact the Genevan republic had but two ecclesiastical bodies, the Venerable Company of the pastors and professors, and the Consistory. But there is no need of severe criticism. The Presbyterian system is simply this: that single churches should each have a judicatory composed of all the elders belonging to it; that this judicatory be responsible to one or more higher judicatories, composed of delegated elders; and that the highest judicatory be that of a national synod, constituted in the same manner. Where the state is very small, as that of Geneva, there would be but one delegated body in which each individual church would be represented. But in larger states, as France, Holland, and Scotland, there would be a gradation of three or four distinct judicatories, each higher composed of delegates from the next lower. In France, there were (1), Consistories or church sessions (2), the Elderships or Presbyteries (3), the provincial councils, and (4) the national Synods, all formed on this plan. In Scotland originally the lowest judicatory was that of three or four contiguous churches united, then the provincial synods, and last the General Assembly. But at an early period each church came to have its distinct session; and this produced a gradation of four judicatories in Scotland. But while the Reformed admitted of no higher judicatory than a national council, or considered the church of each country as an independent body, they allowed of a connexion between national churches. Thus the national synods of the French church in this century held a continued correspondence by letters and envoys with the church of Geneva, and also regularly sent representatives to the Reformed church of the Low Countries, and received delegates from them. And in the next century, the Reformed Dutch church invited the Reformed churches of France, Germany, England, &c. to assist them, by their representatives, in the national synod of Dort. So at the present day, in the United States of America, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church annually exchanges delegates with the General Associations of the New-England States, and also holds correspondence with some transatlantic bodies.—Mur.

terests of the whole body are discussed in assemblies of the bishops and those next in rank to them. And this system, with some exceptions, is adopted by the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren who belong to the Reformed church.¹ This single disagreement, as each party traced the origin of its own system to Jesus Christ and his apostles, was sufficient to divide the whole Reformed church into sects, and in fact it rent the English church into two factions, to the great injury of the community. But in contravention of the wishes of many, the prudence of certain excellent individuals prevented the evil from spreading abroad, and destroying the fellowship of foreigners with the English. These men disseminated the principle that Jesus Christ prescribed no definite form of government for his church, and therefore that every nation may frame such a system for itself as the circumstances of the country require, provided it be not prejudicial to the truth nor tend to the restoration of superstition.²

33. Calvin believed that those who led vicious and ungodly lives ought to be deprived of communion in divine ordinances, and that profligates and the slaves of lust were also to be restrained by the laws of the state. In this matter he differed from Zwingli, who ascribed all power to the magistrates alone, and would not allow to the ministers of religion the right to exclude transgressors from the church, or to deprive them of the communion.³ And so great was the influence of Calvin at Geneva, that he was able, though with great perils and amid perpetual conflicts with the patrons of licentiousness, to establish there a rigorous system of moral discipline, supported and exercised with the countenance of the laws, whereby abandoned characters were first excluded from the church by the ecclesiastical court or the Consistory, and then were either banished the city or restrained by other punishments.⁴ The clergy in the cantons of Switzerland wished to copy after this discipline of Calvin, and to obtain the same power over transgressors; but their desires and efforts were in vain. For the people in the cantons of Berne, Zurich, Basil, &c. would by no means allow a removal of the boundaries set by Zwingli to the jurisdiction of the church, or permit the enlargement of its powers and prerogatives.⁵

34. That all branches of learning both sacred and profane were everywhere successfully cultivated among the Reformed in this century, is well known; and the numerous monuments of their splendid talents which are still preserved forbid any one to be ignorant of the fact. Zwingli was disposed to exclude philosophy from the church;⁶ but the succeeding Swiss doctors soon discovered that in such a world as this, and especially in the disputes on religious subjects, a knowledge of it cannot be dispensed with. Hence when Calvin erected the academy of Geneva in 1558, he at once provided for it a professor of philosophy. But this professor was required to explain in his lectures none but the Aristotelian philosophy, which then reigned in all the schools.⁷ Nor did the other universities of the Reformed suffer a

¹ See the Epistola de Ordinatione et Successione Episcopali in Unitate Fratrum Bohemorum conservata, in Paff's Institut. Juris Eccles. p. 410.

² Here may be consulted with advantage the discussions on the subject between Fred. Spanheim and John Van der Waeyen. In the works of Spanheim, tom. ii. lib. viii. ix. p. 102, &c. The same opinion is said to have been embraced by the British divines who lived near the time of the Reformation, and to have been first repudiated by Archbishop Whitgift. Neal, History of the Puritans, vol. iii. p. 140. [This statement is incorrect as respects Archbishop Whitgift. Neal says (vol. iii. p. 117, ed. London, 1822), "Most of our first Reformers were so far in these sentiments" (those of the Erastians) "as to maintain, that no one form of church government is prescribed in Scripture as an invariable rule for future ages; as Craumer, Redmayn, Cox, &c.; and Archbishop Whitgift, in his controversy with Cartwright, delivers the same opinion: 'I deny (says he) that the Scripture has set down any one certain form of church government to be perpetual.'"]

"The chief patrons of this scheme in the (Westminster) Assembly were Dr. Lightfoot, Mr. Colman, Mr. Selden, Mr. Whitlock; and in the House of Commons, besides Selden and Whitlock, Oliver St. John, Esq. Sir Thomas Widdrington, John Crew, Esq. Sir John Hilsley, and others of the greatest names."—Mur.

³ See the excellent letter of Rud. Gualther, in Fueslin's Centuria I. Epistolar. Reformat. p. 471, where he says: "Excommunicationem neque Zwinglius—neque Bullingerus anquam probaverunt, et—obtestantur illi qui eam aliquando voluerunt. Introducere—Basiliæ quidem (Ecolampadius, multum dissuadente Zwinglio, instituerat—sed adeo non durabilis fuit illa constitutio, ut (Ecolampadius illam abrogavit," &c. Compare p. 90.

⁴ Nothing caused Calvin more troubles, cabals, and perils at Geneva, than his determined resolution to purge the church of transgressors, and to restrain and punish those who violated the rules established by the church, or by the Consistory which represented the church. See his Life written by Beza and prefixed to his letters; the Notes to the second volume of Spon's Histoire de Genève; and Calvin himself in his Letters, especially in those which he wrote to James de Palais or De Bourgogne, published at Amsterdam, 1741, 8vo, p. 126, 127, 132, 153, 157. The party at Geneva which defended the former licentiousness of morals, not only with their tongues but by their actions and with force of arms, and which Calvin called the sect of the Libertines, was very powerful. But Calvin's resolution was also invincible, and his rigorous discipline triumphed.

⁵ See for example the commotions at Lausanne, in the Museum Helveticum, tom. ii. p. 119, &c. The disputes on this subject among the people of the Palatinate, who wished to adopt the Genevan discipline, are described by Altling, in his Hist. Eccles. Palatina, and by Struve, in his Hiftorische Kirchenhist. p. 212, &c.

⁶ Zwingli, in the dedication of his book on true and false religion to Francis I. king of France, says expressly, on p. 12, "Philosophia interdictum est a Christi scholis, et isti (the Sorbonists) fecerunt eam celestis verbi magistrum."

⁷ Beza's Epist. Theolog. Ep. xxxvi. pag. 156; "Certum nobis ac constitutum est et in ipsis tradendis Logicidifferent philosophy to be taught in them. Yet at Basil, the system of Peter Ramus was for a time preferred by some to that of Aristotle.¹

35. The Reformed church from its very commencement had many expositors of the Scriptures, several of whom were ingenious and excellent. Zwingli's labours in explanation of most of the books of the New Testament are not to be despised. He was followed by Henry Bullinger, John Ecolampadius, Wolfgang Musculus, and many others, not his equals indeed in genius and learning, yet all of them meriting some praise. But the first rank among the interpreters of this age is deservedly assigned to John Calvin, who endeavoured to expound nearly the whole of the sacred volume; and to Theodore Beza, whose New Testament illustrated with learned remarks of various kinds, especially critical ones, has been often published, and has not to this day lost all the renown and estimation in which it was formerly held. It is an honour to most of these expositors, that disregarding allegories and mystical interpretations, they endeavour to ascertain the literal import of the language used by the inspired men; but on the other hand some of them, and in particular Calvin, have been reproached, because they venture to refer to Jewish affairs some predictions of the ancient prophets which relate to Jesus Christ and represent him as present to their view, and thus have deprived Christianity of important corroboration.²

36. The state of dogmatic theology among the Swiss and the other Reformed was much the same as it was among the Lutherans. Zwingli early collected and digested the principal doctrines of Christianity in his little book on True and False Religion. Afterwards, John Calvin produced a much larger and more perfect work of this sort, entitled Institutes of the Christian Religion,³ which long held the same rank and authority in nearly all countries of the Reformed church which Melancthon's Common-place Book (Loci Communes) did among the Lutherans. Calvin was succeeded by many writers on dogmatic theology, some more prolix and others more concise, as Musculus, Peter Martyr, Piscator, and others. The earlier the writer in this department, the less he has of subtlety and philosophical discrimination; and in this they resemble Calvin, whose Institutes are written in a perspicuous and elegant style, and have nothing abstruse and difficult to be comprehended in the arguments or mode of reasoning. But after a while, the Aristotelico-Scholastic philosophy which was everywhere inculcated invaded also the fields of theology; and it was everywhere barren, thorny, and frightful, by means of its barbarous terms, its captious interrogatories, its subtle distinctions, and its rubbish of useless matter.⁴

37. Their instructions for regulating the

iii. p. 497, &c. It was translated into English by Norton so early as 1561, an edition which was frequently reprinted during the remainder of that century. More recently it has been translated by John Allen, Lond. 1813, 3 vols. 8vo.—R.

⁴ Yet what is called the scholastic mode of treating theology appears to have pervaded the Reformed church somewhat later than it did our church. At least it was quite recent in Holland at the time of the council of Dort [A.D. 1619]. In this council, John Maccovius, a professor at Franeker who was initiated in all the mysteries of the philosophic schools, was accused by Sibr. Lubbert of corrupting the truths of revelation. The case being investigated, the judges decided that Maccovius had not indeed perverted Christian doctrines, but that he employed a mode of teaching of less simplicity than was proper; for he followed rather the example of the Scholastic doctors than that of the Holy Spirit. We will give the decision of the council in the language of Walter Balcanquhall, in his epistle to Sir Dudley Carleton (which is the 350th of the Epistola Ecclesiastica, published by Limborch, p. 574):—"Maccovium—nullius haereseos reum teneri—peccasse eum, quod quibusdam ambiguis et obscuris Scholasticis phrasibus usus sit; quod Scholasticum docendi modum conetur in Belgicis Academiis introducere. Monendum esse eum, ut cum Spiritu Sancto loquatur, non cum Bellarmino et Suarezio." Maccovius did not obey these admonitions, as is manifest from his writings, which are full of scholastic wit and knotty discussions. He therefore seems to have first taught the Dutch to philosophise on revealed religion. Yet he had associates, as William Ames and others. And it must be true that this philosophic or scholastic form of theology was extensively prevalent among the Reformed, anterior to the Synod of Dort, if that be true which Simon Episcopus states in his last oration to his disciples at Leyden; namely, that he had studiously avoided it, and had thereby incurred the violent hatred of the other doctors. He says (in Limborch's Vita Episcopii, p. 123): "Videbam veritatem multarum et maximarum rerum in ipsa Scriptura sacra, elaboratis humana industria phrasibus, ingeniosis vocabularum fictionibus, locorum communium artificiosis texturis, exquisitis terminorum ac formularum inventionibus adeo involutam, perplexam et intricatam redditam esse, ut Edippo saepe opus esset ad Sphingem illam Theologicam enodandam. Ita est, et hinc prime lacrymae." And a little after, p. 124, he adds: "Reducendum itaque terminorum Apostolicorum et culvis obviatorum simplicitatem semper sequendum putavi, et sequestrandam, quas Academicæ et Scholæ tanquam proprias sibi vindicant, Logicas, philosophicasque speculationes ac dictiones."

et in ceteris explicandis disciplinis, ab Aristotelis sententia ne tantillum quidem deflectere."

¹ See Brandt's Vita Jacobi Arminii, and the notes we formerly annexed to it, p. 8, 12, 13.

² See Hunnius, Calvinus Judaizans, Wittenberg, 1595, 8vo; to which Pareus opposed his Calvinus Orthodoxus, Neustadt, 1595, 8vo. [Even the Catholics have done Calvin the justice to rank him among the good commentators. Simon, in his Histoire Crit. du Vieux Test. p. 434, places him above Luther as to discrimination and soundness of judgment, though he ascribes to Luther more knowledge of the Hebrew. He adds: "Au reste, Calvin aiant l'esprit fort élevé on trouve dans tous ses Commentaires sur l'Ecriture un je ne-sai-quoi qui plaît d'abord, et comme il s'étoit principalement appliqué à connoître l'homme, il a rempli ses Livres d'une Morale qui touche."—Sch.] life and conduct are annexed for the most part by the Reformed theologians of this age to their doctrines of faith, which was according to the example of Calvin, whom they nearly all follow as their guide. For in the last chapter but one of his Institutes, he treats of the civil power or the government of the state, and in the last chapter, of the life and conduct of a Christian; but he is less full than the importance and copiousness of the subject demand. Those otherwise excellent men were prevented from labouring to elucidate and systematize this branch of sacred knowledge, by the same causes which diverted our theologians from it, and especially by the tumult of perpetual controversy. It is conceded by eminent divines among the Reformed, that William Perkins, an Englishman,¹ first undertook to explain in a more accurate manner the science of practical theology, which Calvin and his contemporaries had left in a rude and imperfect state. With him was associated, among the Hollanders, William Telling,² who wrote however in the Dutch language. In emulation of them, William Ames, an Englishman,³ but a theologian of Franeker in Holland, undertook to compose a complete system of practical theology.⁴ Afterwards others prosecuted the subject.

³ Gerdes has given the literary history of this most celebrated work in his Miscell. Groning. vol. I. p. 451; &c. The English reader will see a full account of it in Scott's Continuation of Milner's Church Hist. vol.

38. There did not arise in this century so many sects and religious contests among the Reformed as there were among us; a fact which, while they may esteem it much to their credit, may be easily traced to adequate causes by one acquainted with the history of the Reformed church.⁵ Yet John Calvin mentions and confutes one very pernicious faction, which was far worse than any of ours; namely, the sect of the Libertines or the Spirituals, which originated from Anthony Pockes, Gerhard Ruff, Quintin, and others, its leaders and founders, in Flanders; and thence passed into France, where it obtained countenance from Margaret, the queen of Navarre and sister of Francis I. and found patrons likewise in other sections of the Reformed church.⁶ These Spirituals, if we carefully consider all that Calvin and others have written against them, maintained, though not always with sufficient perspicuity (for I do not know that any of their own writings are extant), that God himself works all things in all men, or is the cause and author of all human actions; that therefore the common notions of a difference

¹ William Perkins was born in 1558, educated at Cambridge, where he became fellow of his college and also the minister of a parish. He died in 1602, aged 44. In early life he was profane, prodigal, and given to intemperance; but when reformed, he became eminent for piety and an exemplary life. He was a Puritan, and as such repeatedly persecuted, was strictly Calvinistic, a very popular and faithful preacher, and a voluminous writer. His works, which were printed in Latin at Geneva, 1603, in 3 vols. fol. have been much read and admired on the Continent. See Brook's Lines of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 129, &c.—Mur. [His works in English also fill three vols. fol. Cambr. 1603; they were several times reprinted in the early part of that century. He was rather a practical than a philosophical or scientific writer on moral theology; and it is probable that he owes the position which he here occupies in the pages of Mosheim to the circumstance of the Genevan translation having rendered his works more accessible to continental scholars than those of others of his countrymen.—H.]

² Telling died in 1629 at Haarlem, where he was a preacher. His practical writings bear the marks of that age, and generally have allegorical titles; e.g. The Pole-Star of Genuine Piety. At this day, they are useful only in the history of practical theology.—Schl.

³ In the original text, Dr. Ames is called a Scotchman. So palpable an error is corrected without scruple in the translation. He was born in the county of Norfolk, England, in the year 1576, educated at Cambridge under Mr. Perkins, became fellow of his college, was a zealous Puritan, and persecuted in 1610. He fled into Holland, preached a while in the English church at the Hague, was made professor of divinity at Franeker, resigned the office at the end of 12 years on account of his health, and retired to Rotterdam, where he died in 1633, aged 57. His widow and children removed to New-England, to which he had intended to emigrate. He was learned, acute, soundly Calvinistic, and a strict Independent. His writings are numerous, chiefly polemic and doctrinal, and written in a clear, concise, nervous Latin style. See Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, vol. iii. p. 45, &c. and Brook's Lines of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 403, &c.—Mur.

⁴ See the Dedication and Preface to Ames' formerly very famous work, De Conscientia et ejus Jure. In page 3 of the Preface, among other things, he says: "Quod hæc pars prophetiæ (i.e. practical theology), hactenus minus fuerit exculta, hoc inde fuit, quod principales nostri perpetuo in acie adversus hostes pugnam, fidem promulgare et arcam ecclesiæ purgare, necessitate quadam cogebantur, ita ut agros et vineas plantare et rigare non poterint ex voto, sicut bello fervente usu venire solet." His Exhortation, addressed to the theological students at Franeker, and subjoined to the above work, is worthy of perusal. From this address we may learn among other things, that in the universities of the Reformed, the chief attention was then bestowed on dogmatic and polemic theology, and that practical theology lay neglected: "Theologi præclare se instructos putant ad omnes officii sui partes, si dogmata tantum intelligant. Neque tamen omnia dogmata scrutantur, sed illa sola, quæ precipue solent agitari et in controversiam vocari."

⁵ MacLaine says here: "Mosheim ought to have given us a hint of his manner of accounting for this, to avoid the suspicion of having been somewhat at a loss for a favourable solution." Schlegel therefore subjoins the following: "The Reformed church was at first small and more closely knit together than the Lutheran; and of course there could not arise in it such wide-spreading contentions. The leading persons also were able so to temper their disagreements, that they could not break out into a great flame." Zwingle and Calvin were men of great influence, who could arrest all contentions with as much power as Luther could. But Melancthon, when he was dead, there was no one to be found in our church competent to extinguish the fire which during his lifetime had been smoking in the ashes." A better solution may be found, I think, in the spirit and the religious principles of the two communities. For in the English church, which most resembled the Lutheran in these respects, there was as violent and as pernicious contention as among the Lutherans.—Mur.

⁶ See Calvin's Instructio adversus fanaticam et furiosam Sectam Libertinorum, qui se Spirituales vocant in his Tractatus Theologici, p. 599, &c.

between good actions and bad are false and vain; that men cannot, properly speaking, commit sin; that religion consists in the union of the rational soul or the spirit with God; that if a person attains to this, by contemplation and directing his mind upward, he may freely obey the instincts of his nature; for whatever he may do, he will be innocent and after death will be united to God. These doctrines are so similar to the views of the ancient Beghards or Brethren of the Free Spirit, that I have very little doubt these Spirituals were their descendants; and the fact that this sect originated in Flanders, which in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries was full of this sort of people, corroborates the supposition.

39. Totally different in character from these Spiritual Libertines, though not unfrequently confounded with them, were those Libertines of Geneva with whom Calvin had to contend fiercely all his life. The latter were no other than citizens of Geneva who could not endure Calvin's rigorous discipline, and who in opposition to his regulations defended with craft and violence, with factions, insults, and abuse, the dissolute morals of their progenitors, their brothels and carousals, their sports and frolics; all of which, as well as other indications of an irreligious spirit, Calvin most severely condemned and chastised.¹ There were moreover in this turbulent faction, persons not only dissolute in their lives, but also scoffers and despisers of all religion. Such a character was James Gruet, who not only assailed Calvin with all his power and called him bishop of Ascoli² and the new pope, but also discarded and opposed the divinity of the Christian religion, the immortality of the soul, the distinction between right and wrong, and whatever else was most sacred in the view of Christians; and for this he was punished capitally in the year 1550.³

40. Calvin had also at Geneva controversies with some who could not digest his doctrines, and especially his gloomy doctrine of absolute decrees. Being a man of excessive ardour and too jealous of his own reputation, he would not suffer them to reside at Geneva; nay, yielding to his passions in the heat of controversy, he frequently accused them of crimes and enormities from which they have been acquitted by the judgment of posterity.⁴ Among these was Sebastian Castalio, master of the public school at Geneva; a man not indeed free from all faults, yet honest and distinguished for erudition and the elegance of his genius. As he would not praise all that Calvin and his colleagues did and taught, and especially as he rejected Calvin's and Beza's doctrine of pure and absolute predestination, he was required in 1544 to resign his office and go into exile. But the authorities of Basil received the exile, and gave him the Greek professorship in their university.⁵

41. Similar was the fate of Jerome Bolsec, a French Carmelite monk but greatly inferior to Castalio in learning and genius. He came to Geneva, allured by the Reformation to which he was inclined, and there established himself a physician. But in the year 1551 he most imprudently declaimed with vehemence in a public assembly against the doctrines of God's absolute decrees. For this he was cast into prison, and at last was compelled to leave the city. He returned to his native country, and to the Romish religion which he had before renounced; and now he assailed the reputation and the life and conduct of Calvin, and likewise of his colleague Beza, in the most slanderous publications.⁶ From Bolsec's calumny originated the enmity between Calvin and James of Burgundy, an illustrious descendant from the dukes of Burgundy, and a great patron and intimate friend of Calvin, who had been led by his attachment to him to fix his residence at Geneva. James employed Bolsec as his

⁴ We may venture to say this at the present day, since the Genevans themselves and other doctors of the Reformed church ingenuously confess that the great talents of Calvin were attended by no small defects of character, which however they think should be overlooked on account of his extraordinary merits. See the notes to Spon's Histoire de Genève, tome ii. p. 110, &c. and elsewhere; also the Preface to the Lettres de Calvin à Jacques de Bourgogne, p. xix, &c.

⁵ See Uytendogaerd's Ecclesiastical History, written in Dutch, part ii. p. 70-73, where he endeavours to evince the innocence of Castalio; Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 792, &c. [article, Castalio, which is elaborate, and appears to be candid.—Mur.] Coloniesius, Italia Orientalis, p. 99, and others. [See Püeslin's Lebensgeschichte Seb. Castalio, Frankfurt and Leipzig, 1774, 8vo.—Schl. Castalio was born in Dauphiny or Savoy, 1515, and spent his days at Strasburg, Geneva, and Basil, where he died in 1563. He was an elegant Latin and Greek scholar, and wrote much, particularly translations into Latin and French. His Latin translation of the Bible is his most important work. He denied unconditional election, considered the Canticles as an uninspired book, and rejected Calvin's opinion respecting Christ's descent into hell. These were his chief errors.—Mur.

⁶ See Bayle's Dictionnaire, article Bolsec, tome i. p. 592; Spon's Histoire de Genève, the note, tome ii. p. 55; Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tome xxxii. p. 440, and tome xxxvi. p. 409.

¹ See Spon's Histoire de Genève, tome ii. p. 44, in the notes of the editor.

² The import of this title of reproach, or the ground of its pertinence in the view of Gruet, is not explained by the historians who mention it, nor was Schlegel able satisfactorily to account for it. See his long note.—Mur.

³ See Spon, ubi supra, tome ii. p. 47, the note.

personal physician, and therefore supported him all he could, when borne down by the influence of Calvin, to prevent his being entirely prostrated. This so exasperated Calvin, that to avoid his resentments James thought proper to retire from Geneva into the country.¹

42. Bernardino Ochino, an Italian of Sienna and formerly vicar-general of the order of Capuchins, a man of a well informed and discriminating mind, who preached to an Italian congregation at Zurich, was in the year 1563 condemned and ordered into exile, by the decision of the whole Reformed church of Switzerland. For, in his books which were numerous, among other opinions differing from the common views, he taught in particular that the law respecting the marriage of a single wife was not in all cases without some exceptions. His works show that he speculated on many subjects more boldly than that age would permit, and in a manner different from the Swiss theologians. Yet there are those who maintain that his errors, when being old and indigent he was compelled to forsake Switzerland, were not so great as to deserve to be punished with banishment. He retired into Poland, and there united with the Antitrinitarians and Anabaptists, and died in the year 1564.²

43. While the Reformed punished with so great severity the audacity of those who conceived some change was requisite in the prevailing doctrines, they believed that the greatest mildness and gentleness ought to be manifested in those most violent contests between the English puritans and Episcopalians. For while they were particularly attached to the Puritans, who contended for the doctrines and discipline of the Swiss, they still regarded the Episcopalians with brotherly affection, and urged their confederates the Puritans to do the same; notwithstanding the Episcopalians injured most sensibly the greater part of the Reformed community, and by proclaiming the divine origin of their own discipline, scarcely allowed to the Reformed the name and the prerogatives of a true church. This moderation resulted from prudence, from the fear of offending a high-spirited and prosperous nation and its most powerful queen, whose influence governed even Holland also; and finally, from the danger of a destructive schism among the Reformed. For it is one thing to coerce and to cast out feeble and unarmed individuals, who are disposed to disturb the peace of a city by advancing opinions, not perhaps absolutely absurd nor of dangerous tendency, yet really novel; and quite another thing to provoke and drive to a secession a noble and most flourishing church, which may be defective in some respects. Moreover, the ground of the discussion [in England] hitherto did not seem to be religion itself, but its external forms, and the constitution of the church. Yet soon afterwards, some of the great principles of religion itself were brought under discussion.³

44. No one can deny or be ignorant of the fact, that the Reformed church in this age abounded in very eminent men, who were distinguished for their acquisitions of knowledge both human and divine. Besides Ulric Zwingli, John Calvin, and Theodore Beza, men of inexhaustible genius, the following have acquired by their writings immortal praise; namely, John Oecolampadius, Henry Bullinger, William Farel, Peter Viret, Peter Martyr, Theodore Bibliander, Wolfgang Musculus, Conrad Pellican, Lewis Lavater, Rudolph Hospinian, Zacharias Ursinus, Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, Stephen Sezedginus, and many others; whose names and merits may be learned from the common writers of literary history, especially from Melchior Adami, Anthony Wood, Gerhard Brandt, Daniel Neal, an Englishman, the very learned and industrious author of the History of the Puritans, and from other writers.¹

¹ See the Lettres de Calvin à Jacques de Bourgogne, Preface, p. viii. &c.; Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tome xxii. p. 444, and tome xxiv. p. 406.
² Boverius, Annales Capucinorum; and from these Annals, the author of the book entitled, La Guerre Scraphique, ou Histoire des Peris qu'a courue la Barbe des Capucins, livr. H. p. 147, livr. iii. p. 192, 230, &c.; Observationes Italicæ Latine, tom. iv. observ. xx. p. 406, tom. v. observ. i. p. 3, &c.; Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2165; Sand's Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitaria, p. 4, &c.; Nicæon, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illustres, tome xix. p. 160 &c. [See the sketch of his life, p. 672, above, near the end of note 1.—Mur.] [For a full account of Ochino's history and writings, see Frechisel's Leio Sozini u. d. Anti-trinitarier seiner Zeit, p. 202—276. The English reader may consult McCrie's Reformation in Italy, p. 431, &c.—R.]
³ The sarcasms of Mosheim in this section against the Reformed, do him no honour. The note of Mac-laine however is worth inserting. It is this: "All the Protestant divines of the Reformed church, whether Puritans or others, seemed indeed hitherto of one mind about the doctrines of faith. But towards the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, there arose a party who were first for softening, and then for overthrowing the received opinions concerning predestination, perseverance, free-will, effectual grace, and the extent of Christ's redemption. These are the doctrines to which Mosheim alludes in this passage. The clergy of the episcopal church began to lean towards the notions concerning these intricate points which Arminius propagated some time after this; while, on the other hand, the Puritans adhered rigorously to the system of Calvin. Several episcopal doctors remained attached to the same system, and all these supporters of Calvinism, whether Episcopal or Presbyterian, were called doctrinal Puritans."—Mur.

¹ All the larger biographical dictionaries may be

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE SECT OF ANABAPTISTS OR MENNONITES.

I. The origin of the sect who, from their repetition of the baptism received in other communities, are called Anabaptists,² but consulted, and also the Encyclopædias, particularly that of Dr. Rees. To these may be added Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, and Brook's Lines of the Puritans, besides the numerous biographies of individual men. The means of becoming acquainted with the lives, characters, and writings of distinguished modern theologians are so abundant, and the extent of the subject so great, that full lists of all the authors of each century will not be given in the notes to the centuries in this volume as in those prior to the Reformation.—Mur. [The above reference to Brook's Lines of the Puritans must have been an oversight; for that work, as its very name imports, contains no account of any of these foreigners. Within the last few years separate biographies of several of these leading reformers have appeared in Germany which have supplanted previous works. In addition to Schuler's life of Zwingli, Herzog's life of Oecolampadius, and Kirchofer's life of Farell mentioned in the note at page 572, and Henry's life of Calvin, in note 3, page 663, above, I may add here Baum's Theodore Beza nach handschriftlichen Quellen dargestellt, Leip. 1843, vol. 1st. I believe the second volume of this valuable work, which was much wanted, has not yet appeared. Hess, the author of a meagre life of Zwingli, has also published Lebensgeschichte H. Bullingers. Zur. 1828, two parts, though never completed. A full biography of this influential Reformer, so well known and so highly respected in Britain, is very desirable; and for such a work much new and valuable materials have been recently rendered accessible in the Zurich Letters published by the Parker Society. There are no separate lives, of any great value, of the other foreign reformers mentioned in the text. Of Archbishop Cranmer we have had two recent lives; the one by the Rev. H. J. Todd, Lond. 1831, 2 vols. 8vo, which is the preferable one; and the other by the Rev. C. W. Le Bas, Lond. 1833, 2 vols. 12mo.—R.

² The modern Mennonites are offended with this term, and profess to be entirely free from the practice of repeating baptism, on which this name is founded. They admit that the old Anabaptists had the custom of re-baptizing such as joined them from other denominations of Christians; but they say, the custom at this day is laid aside by the more the greater part of their community. See Schyn's Historie Mennonitarum plenior Deductio, cap. lii. p. 32. But, unless I am altogether deceived, these good men here lose sight of that simplicity and ingenuousness, which they at times so highly recommend; and artfully conceal the true ground of this appellation. They pretend that their predecessors were called Anabaptists, for this reason, that they thought those who had been baptized in other communities after they became adults and attained to the full use of reason, were to be baptized again. But it is certain that the name was given to them not only for that reason, but more especially because they considered the persons who were initiated into the Christian church by baptism in their infancy, as not belonging to the church at all; and therefore when such persons would join the Anabaptists, they baptized them a second time. And in this sentiment all the sects of Anabaptists continue down to the present time, however much they may differ in other opinions and customs. Among the ancient Anabaptists, those in particular who are called Flemings or Flandrians most fully merit this appellation. For they rebaptize not only those who received baptism in other denominations in their childhood or infancy, but likewise those who received it in adult years. Nay, each particular sect of Anabaptists rebaptize those who come to them from the other sects of their denomination, for each sect considers its own baptism to be the only true and valid baptism. The more moderate Anabaptists, or the Waterlandians as they are called, are a little wiser, because they do not rebaptize such as were baptized at adult years in other denominations, nor those who were baptized in other who are also denominated Mennonites, from the celebrated man to whom they owe a large share of their present prosperity, is involved in much obscurity.³ For they sects of Anabaptists. And yet they are justly denominated Anabaptists, because they rebaptize those who received baptism in their infancy. Still however the patrons of the sect most carefully keep this custom out of sight; because they are afraid lest the almost extinguished odium should revive, and the modern Mennonites be regarded as descended from the flagitious Anabaptists, if they should frankly state the facts as they are. Hear a very recent writer, Schyn (ubi supra, p. 32), where he endeavours to show that his brethren are unjustly stigmatized with the odious name of Anabaptists. He says, "that Anabaptism has become wholly obsolete; and for many years past, no person of any sect whatever who holds the Christian faith, if baptized according to the command of Christ, when he wishes to join our churches, is rebaptized." On reading this, who would not readily suppose that the repetition of baptism no longer exists among the Mennonites of our times? But the fallacy is in some measure betrayed by the words which we have printed in capital letters, "according to the command of Christ." For the Anabaptists contend that it is without any command of Christ, that infants are admitted to baptism. And the whole design is more clearly indicated by the words which follow; sed illum etiam ADULTORUM baptismum, ut sufficientem agnoscent. And yet, as if he had fully established his point, Schyn thus concludes his argument:—Quare verissimum est, illud odiosum nomen Anabaptistarum illis non convenire. But it does certainly belong to them; because the very best of the Mennonites, equally with those from whom they are descended, think that the baptism of infants has no validity; and therefore they cause those who have already been baptized among other Christians, to be again baptized with their baptism. There are many things which induce me to believe that reliance cannot always be placed on the Confessions and the expositions of the modern Mennonites. Being instructed by the miseries and sufferings of their fathers, they conceal entirely those principles of their sect from which their character and state would most clearly appear; and the others which they cannot conceal, they most studiously disguise that they may not appear too bad. [This long and invidious note of Mosheim the translator would gladly have omitted, if he had felt himself at liberty to suppress anything contained in the book. For to what purpose are such discussions? The point at issue is, whether the Mennonites or Baptists are properly denominated Anabaptists. And the fact is that according to their own principles they are not, in the literal and proper sense of the word, Anabaptists or Rebaptizers. But according to the principles of all believers in infant baptism they are, literally and truly, Anabaptists. For they hold infant baptism to be no valid Christian baptism; and therefore, to be consistent, when they receive to their church one who had been baptized in infancy, they must give him baptism; for he is on their principles an unbaptized person. But according to the believers in infant baptism, such a person had previously received a real Christian baptism; and therefore to baptize him now is to rebaptize him. Such being the true state of the case, is not Mosheim's eagerness to fasten on the Mennonites the odious name of Anabaptists, as good proof—to say the least—of disingenuousness, as is their eagerness to get rid of it? He if successful gains nothing, except to render them odious. They are striving to have a fair trial of their case solely upon its merits, without being exposed to the prejudice of words and names.—Mur.

³ The writers who treat of the Anabaptists and who confute them, are enumerated at large by Sagittarius, Introductio ad Hist. Eccles. tom. i. p. 826, &c.; and by Flafl, Introduct. in Hist. Litterarum Theol. par. ii. p. 349, &c. To their lists must be added the very recent writer and doctor among the Mennonites, Herman Schyn, who first published his Historia Mennonitarum, Amsterd. 1723, 8vo, and afterwards his Historia Mennonitarum Plenior Deductio, Amsterd. 1729, 8vo. Both the works will aid in acquiring a knowledge of the affairs of this sect; but neither of them deserves the title of a History of the Mennonites. For the writer suddenly started up in various countries of Europe, under the influence of leaders of dissimilar characters and views; and at a time when the first contests with the Catholics so distracted the attention of all, that they scarcely noticed any other passing occurrences. The modern Mennonites affirm that their predecessors were the descendants of those Waldenses who were oppressed by the tyranny of the papists; and that they were a most pure offspring, and most averse from any inclinations towards sedition as well as from all fanatical views.¹ On the contrary, their adversaries contend that they are descended from those turbulent and furious Anabaptists, who in the sixteenth century involved Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and especially Westphalia, in so many calamities and civil wars; but that being terrified by the dreadful fate of their associates, through the influence of Menno Simonis especially, they have gradually assumed a more sober character. After duly examining the whole subject with impartiality, I conceive that neither statement is altogether true.

2. In the first place, I believe the Mennonites are not altogether in the wrong, when they boast of a descent from those Waldensians, Petrobrusians, and others, who are usually styled the Witnesses for the truth before Luther. Prior to the age of Luther, there lay concealed in almost every country of Europe, but especially in Bohemia, Moravia, Switzerland, and Germany, very many persons, in whose minds was deeply rooted that principle which the Waldensians, the Wickliffites, and the Hussites maintained, some more covertly and others more openly; namely, that the kingdom which Christ set up on the earth, or the visible church, is an assembly of holy persons, and ought therefore to be entirely free, not only from ungodly persons and sinners, but from all institutions of human device against ungodliness. This principle lay at the foundation and was the source of all that was new and singular in the religion of the Mennonites; and the greatest part of their singular opinions, as is well attested, were approved some centuries before Luther's time, by those who had such views of the nature of the church of Christ.² Some of this class of people, perceiving that such a church as they had formed an idea of would never be estab-

² As respects the Waldensians, see Limborch's Historia Inquisitionis, lib. i. cap. viii. p. 37. [See also Lydius' Waldensia, and Allix's Ancient Churches of Piedmont, chap. xxii.—xxvi. p. 211—230, N.—Macl.] That the Wickliffites and Hussites were not far from the same sentiments can be shown by adequate testimony. [That the Mennonites, as being one of those Protestant sects which renounced the Romish religion in the 16th century, resembled very much the Waldenses, the Wickliffites, and the Hussites, those earlier revoltors from the Romish worship, is undoubtedly true. And it may therefore be justly said that "the greatest part of their singular opinions," meaning those in which they differed from the Romish church, "were approved some centuries before Luther's time." And this, I think, must be all that Moheim intended to say. For, that in most of the points in which they appeared singular among Protestants, they bore a nearer resemblance to the proper Waldenses, the Wickliffites, and the Hussites, than the other Protestants or than the Lutherans and the Reformed did, is very far from being true. On the contrary, it is a well-known historic fact that in the sixteenth century the genuine descendants of the old Waldensians, Wickliffites, and Hussites, who were numerous in France, England, Bohemia, Moravia, &c. readily united with the Lutheran and the Reformed communities, and at length became absorbed in them; and that very few, if any of them, ever manifested a preference for the Mennonites or for any of the Antipædobaptist sects of that age. The history of the Reformation in all the countries where the ancient sects were found fully establishes this fact, which is so adverse to the supposition of a legitimate descent of the Mennonites from the pure Waldensians. The first Mennonites were not persons who had before borne the name of Waldensians, or who were known descendants of Waldensians; nor did they originate either in or near the countries where the Waldensians in that age resided. And if we endeavour to trace the history of that grand peculiarity of all Mennonites, their confining baptism to adult believers and rejecting infant baptism altogether, we shall find that at the time Menno first embraced it, it existed among the numerous German Anabaptists but not among the Waldenses of France or Bohemia, who were then universally believers in infant baptism and were in fraternal communion with the Lutheran and Reformed churches. These Waldensian Pædobaptists, moreover, declared that they held the same belief which their fathers had maintained for several centuries; and they appealed to their old books to make good their assertions. See Perrin's History of the Waldenses, part i. book i. chap. iv. p. 15, of the English translation; and part iii. book iii. ch. iv. p. 99. Nor does ecclesiastical history appear to me to disprove the truth of their assertion. There were indeed various mystical sects tinged more or less with Manichean views in the twelfth and following centuries, who rejected all water baptism on much the same grounds as the Quakers still do (p. 387, &c. above); and some of these assailed infant baptism especially as being peculiarly unsuitable and absurd. There is also pretty good evidence that early in the 12th century Peter Bruys and his successor Henry, with their followers the Petrobrussians and Henricians, did at first reject infant baptism without discarding all baptism. (See page 426, and the notes there.) But soon after Peter Waldo arose and gave birth to the proper Waldensians, and we hear no more of the Petrobrussians and Henricians. They probably gave up their opposition to infant-baptism. See Wall's Hist. of Infant Baptism, part ii. chap. vii.—Mur.

deems it more his business to defend and justify his sect, than to give a regular narrative of their origin, progress, and revolutions. Yet he does not perform the functions of a vindicator so learnedly and judiciously, that the Mennonites could not have a better patron. Of the historians and Confessions of the Mennonites, Köcher treats expressly, in his Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolice, p. 461, &c. [The principal English histories of baptism and of the Baptists or Mennonites, are Wall's Hist. of Infant Baptism, 2 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1705; his Defence of the History, and Gale's Reflections on Wall's History; Crosby's Hist. of the [English] Baptists, 4 vols. 8vo, 1738—40; Robert Robinson's Hist. of Baptism, Lond. 1790, 4to; and Benedict's General Hist. of the Baptists, Boston, 1813, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [See also Ivimey's History of the English Baptists to the death of George III. Lond. 1811—30, 4 vols. 8vo.—R.

¹ Abrahamzon's Verdodiging der Christenen, die doopsgezinde genand worden, p. 29; Schyn's Plenior deductio Histor. Mennonit. cap. i. p. 2, &c.

lished by human means, indulged the hope that God himself would in his own time erect for himself a new church, free from every blemish and impurity; and that he would raise up certain persons and fill them with heavenly light for the accomplishment of this great object. Others, more discreet, looked for neither miracles nor inspiration; but judged that the church might be purified from all the contaminations of evil men, and be brought into the state that Christ had intended, by human efforts and care, provided the practice and the regulations of the ancient Christians were restored to their pristine dignity and influence.

3. The spirits and courage of this people who had long been severely persecuted and scattered over many countries, revived as soon as they heard that Luther, aided by many good men, was successfully engaged in reforming the very corrupt state of the church. According to their different principles and views, some supposed that the time was now come when God himself would take possession of men's hearts and would set up his heavenly kingdom on the earth; others concluded that the long-expected and wished-for restitution of the church, to be effected indeed under the providence of God but yet by human agency, was now at hand. With these, as is common in such great revolutions, were joined many everywhere of similar aims but of unlike capacities; who in a short time by their discourses, their dreams, and their prophecies, roused up a large part of Europe, and drew over to the party a vast multitude of the ignorant and ill-informed people. The leaders of this great multitude, erroneously conceiving that the new kingdom which they foretold was to be free from all evils and imperfections, because they considered the reformation of the church which Luther had commenced as not corresponding with the magnitude of the case, did themselves project a more perfect reformation of it, or rather projected another and altogether a divine church.

4 Whether the origin of this discordant sect which caused such mischief in both the civil and religious community, is to be sought for in Switzerland or in Holland and Germany, or in some other country, it is not important to know and is impossible fully to determine.¹ In my opinion this only can be affirmed, that at one and the same time—that is, not long after the commencement of the Reformation by Luther—there arose men of this sort in several different countries. This may be inferred from the fact that nearly all the first leaders of any note among the Anabaptists were founders of distinct sects. For though all these reformers of the church, or rather these projectors of new churches, are called Anabaptists, because they all denied that infants are proper subjects of baptism, and solemnly baptized over again those who had been baptized in infancy, yet from the very beginning, just as at the present day, they were split into various parties which disagreed and disputed about points of no small importance. The worst part of this motley tribe, viz. that which supposed the founders of their ideal and perfect church would be endued with divine powers and would work miracles, began to raise great disturbances in Saxony and the neighbouring countries in the year 1521, under the guidance of Thomas Munzer, Mark Stubner, Nicholas Storek, and other chiefs. They first pursued their object by means of harangues, discussions, and the detail of divine visions to which the leaders of their party made pretensions. But finding these means less efficient than they could wish, and that their influence was resisted by the arguments of Luther and others, they rushed to arms. Munzer and his associates having collected a vast army from among the credulous populace, particularly in the rural parts of Suabia, Thuringia, Franconia, and Saxony, proclaimed war in the year 1525 against all law and civil governments, and declared that Christ alone would reign from that time forward. But these forces were routed without much difficulty by the elector of Saxony and other princes; Munzer, the firebrand of sedition, was put to death, and his aiders and abettors were dispersed.²

5. By this bloody defeat, the others who were actuated by the same turbulent and fanatical spirit were rendered indeed more timid but not more wise. It appears that from this time onward there roamed about Germany, Switzerland, and Holland, many persons infected with the same criminal principles which had proved the ruin of Munzer; that in many places they disturbed both the church and the state by their seditious discourses; that they gathered here and there larger or smaller congregations, and in the name of God announced sudden destruction as about to overtake the magistrates and the civil governments; and

¹ Whether the Anabaptists appeared first in Germany or in Switzerland is made the subject of inquiry by Fueslin, Beiträge zur Schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte, vol. i. p. 190, vol. ii. p. 64, 65, p. 265, 327, 328, vol. iii. p. 323. But he is not self-consistent in the discussion, nor has he accomplished anything.

² See Seekendorff's Historia Lutheranismi, lib. i. p. 192, 304, &c. lib. ii. p. 13; Sleidan, Commentarii, lib. v. p. 47; Camerarius, Vita Melancthonis, p. 41, &c.

while they pretended to be ambassadors of God, often audaciously insulted the divine majesty by their shameful conduct and crimes. Infamous with posterity beyond others of this senseless tribe, were the names of Lewis Hätzer, Balthazar Hubmeyer, Felix Mantz, Conrad Grebel, Melchior Hoffmann, George Jacobs, and others; who, had their abilities been adequate, would have involved all Switzerland, Holland, and Germany, in tumults and wars.¹ Among these people there were some strangely delirious, and who fancied they had incredible visions; but those of them who were not destitute of all power of reasoning taught for substance the following doctrines:—(I.) That the church of Christ ought to be free from all sin. (II.) That a community of goods and universal equality should be introduced. (III.) That all usury, tithes, and tributes, should be abolished. (IV.) That the baptism of infants was an invention of the devil. (V.) That all Christians had a right to act as teachers. (VI.) That of course the Christian church had no need of ministers or teachers. (VII.) Neither was there any need of magistrates under the reign of Christ. (VIII.) That God still made known his will to certain persons, by dreams and visions.² I omit other opinions. It would however betray ignorance or want of candour to deny, that there were others everywhere who held in general the same opinions yet lived more quietly and peaceably, and in whom no great fault can be found except their erroneous opinions and their zeal to disseminate them among the people. Nor do I fear to add, that among the followers not only of these more sober Anabaptists but even of those altogether misguided, there were many persons of honest intentions and of real piety, whom an unsuspecting simplicity and a laudable desire to reform the church had led to join the party.

¹ See the details collected, among others by Ottius, in his Annales Anabaptistici, p. 21, &c. by Hornbeck, Summa Controuersiarum, lib. v. p. 334; Mattheus, Ausbeute Velt. Ael., tom. iv. p. 629, 677, 679, the recent ed.; Raupach's Austria Evangelica, tom. ii. p. 41; Schellhorn, Acta ad Historiam Eccles. Pertinentia, tom. i. p. 100; Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzehistorie, book xvi. chap. xxi. p. 727, &c. Fueslin, in the various documents relating to the Anabaptists which he has inserted in his Beiträge zu der Schweizerrischen Reformationsgeschichte (and more recently Professor Wills, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Anabaptismus in Deutschland nebst wichtigen Urkunden und Beylagen, Nuremb. 1773, 8vo.—Lewis Hätzer, whom some take to be a Bavarian and others a Swiss, was a man of abilities, and well versed especially in the languages. Joachim Vadianus (see Fueslin, vol. v. p. 397) calls him, "Commodissimi ingenii hominem, clarum virum, linguæ etiam et admirabili ingenii dextérité præditi." He lived in the time of the Reformation at Zurich, and aided the Reformers by his discourses and his writings; among other things he translated (Geolampadius' Book De Sacramento Eucharistia into German in the year 1526. But he afterwards separated from the Reformers and followed his own views in theology, which were often singular, as appears from his writings published between the years 1523 and 1529. Among other works he translated the prophets with the assistance of Hans Denk. He also wrote in the year 1523 a book against the divinity of Christ, which Ambrose Blaurer, by direction of Zwingli, confuted. He was among the extravagant Anabaptists and was beleagued at Constance in 1529, because he cohabited with many women and perverted the Scriptures to justify his unchastity.—Balthazar Hubmeyer, who sometimes called himself Friedberger, from his native place in Bavaria, is in the above-cited epistle of Vadianus pronounced, eloquentissimus, and humanissimus vir. Before the Reformation he was for a time preacher in the principal church at Regensburg, where he became suspected on account of some erroneous doctrines, and was obliged to quit the place. Afterwards he preached at Waldshut. But as he allowed himself to be led astray by Thomas Münzer, he was driven from that place also; and fleeing to Zurich he was thrown into prison, but after a three days' discussion with Zwingli he recanted. Yet continuing afterwards enthusiastic, he was expelled the city and retired to Moravia, where he fell into the hands of the Austrian government and was burned alive at Vienna in 1528. His writings are enumerated by Fueslin, Beiträge, vol. v. p. 399, &c.—Felix Mantz of Zurich, was there apprehended with others on account of his Anabaptistic doctrines, and was drowned. See Fueslin, Beiträge, vol. v. p. 259, &c.—Grebel was also of Zurich, of a good family and of great talents, but of so great obstinacy that nothing could induce him to change his opinions. Yet he fortunately escaped from prison and afterwards died a natural death.—Melchior Hoffmann was a furrier of Suabia who laboured to disseminate the doctrines of the Anabaptists in the Netherlands, and in Lower Saxony and Livonia, and died in prison at Strasburg in 1533. To enumerate his writings here would be tedious.—Jacobs is called in the documents (see Fueslin's Beiträge, vol. v. p. 265) Georg von Hauze Jacobs, genant Blaurack von Chur. He was twice apprehended at Zurich, was beaten with rods, and after twice swearing to keep the peace was banished the country.—To the preceding may be added Hans Denk, who once taught in the school of St. Sebald at Nuremberg; but after his connexion with the Anabaptists he resided chiefly at

6. While this tumultuous sect was spreading itself through nearly all Europe, the emperors, kings, princes, and magistrates resisted them with very severe edicts, and at last with capital punishments.³ But

Basil and at Worms. He taught also the restoration of all things, and aided Hätzer, as already stated, in his translation of the prophets, which was published at Worms, 1527, folio. His smaller pieces were printed a second time, Amsterdam, 1690, 12mo. Several extracts are given by Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzehistorie, part iv. sec. ii. No. 31, p. 530, &c. See also Büttlinghausen's Beiträge zur Pfälzischen Geschichte, part iii. p. 299, whence we learn that Denk recanted before he died, and that his recantation was published, probably by Geolampadius.—Schli. [See some additional particulars relative to Hätzer, Hoffmann, Denk, and others, and illustrative of this party generally and their fanatical tenets, in Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation, vol. iii. p. 559, &c. The whole chapter indeed (book vi. chap. ix.) is a very important contribution to the early history of Anabaptism.—R.

² These are chiefly collected from the documents published by Fueslin. [Whether they also denied the divinity of Christ and justified polygamy, Fueslin examines in the third volume of his Beiträge, p. 119, and convinces by documents that they did not.—Schli.

³ If I do not mistake, it was first in Saxony and in the year 1525, that laws were enacted against this sort of people. And these laws were frequently renewed in the years 1527, 1528, and 1534. See Kapp's Nachlese von Reformations- Urkunden, par. i. p. 176. As the impudence of many of this sect became more bold, Charles V. published severe decrees against them in 1527 and 1529. Ottius, Annales Anabaptist. p. 45. The Swiss at first proceeded very gently against their Anabaptists; but when many of them became more here also the maxim was fully verified which long experience has proved true, that the human mind, when either agitated by fanatical fury or strongly bound by the cords of religion, is not easily cured by terrors and dangers. Vast numbers of these people in nearly all the countries of Europe would rather perish miserably by drowning, hanging, burning, or decapitation, than renounce the opinions they had embraced. And therefore the Mennonites at this day show us ponderous volumes filled with the accounts of the lives and sufferings of those of their party who expiated by their death, the crimes they were supposed to have committed against either the church or the state.¹ I could wish there had been some distinction made, and that all who believed that adults only are to be baptized and that the ungodly are to be expelled the church, had not been indiscriminately put to death. For they did not all suffer on account of their crimes, but many of them merely for the erroneous opinions which they maintained honestly and without fraud or crime. Yet most of them divulged among the people their dreams of a new church of Christ about to be set up, and of the impending abolition of all magistracies, laws, and punishments; and hence the very name of Anabaptist presented at once before the mind the idea of a seditious person, that is, one who was a public pest. It is indeed true that many Anabaptists were put to death, not as being bad citizens or injurious members of civil society, but as being incurable heretics who were condemned by the old canon laws; for the error concerning adult baptism or Catabaptism and Anabaptism, was in that age looked upon as a horrible offence. But it is also true that very many were put to death for holding opinions dangerous to the republic and to the civil authorities; and numbers likewise suffered for their temerity, their imprudences, and their criminal deeds.

7. A shocking example of this is visible in the case of those Anabaptists from Holland who came to Munster, a city of Westphalia, in the year 1533, and there committed deeds which would be scarcely credible were they not so well attested as to compel belief. These insatuated men, whose brains were turned by that dream of a new kingdom of Christ about to be erected on the earth, which bewildered the great body of Anabaptists, having for leaders certain illiterate and plebeian men, e.g. John Matthæi, John Bockold a tailor of Leyden, one Gerhard, and some others, persuaded not only the common people but likewise some of the religious teachers, that their blessed heavenly Jerusalem was about to be established at Munster, and would thence be extended to other places. Under this pretext they deposed the magistrates, took command of the city, and ventured upon all the criminal and ridiculous measures which their perverse ingenuity could devise.² John Bockold was created king and lawgiver to this celestial republic. But the issue of the scene was tragical and distressing. For after a long siege, the city being captured in 1536 by its bishop, Francis count Waldec who was also its temporal lord, this New Jerusalem of the Anabaptists was destroyed, and its king punished with the utmost severity.³ From these and other events of a similar character which occurred about this time in various places,⁴ it was but too manifest

² Bockholdt, or Bockelson, alias John of Leyden, who headed them at Munster, ran stark naked in the streets, married eleven wives at the same time to show his approbation of polygamy, and entitled himself King of Sion, all which was but a very small part of the pernicious follies of this mock monarch.—Mael.

³ Corvinus, Narratio de miserabili Monaster. Anabapt. obsidione, first published, Wittenb. 1536, and then elsewhere; and the other writers mentioned by Sagittarius, Introd. in Hist. Eccles. tom. I. p. 537 and 835; add Hamelmann's Historia Renati Evangelii in Urbe Monasterii, in his Opera Genealogico-Historica, p. 1203, &c. The elegant and accurately written Latin elegiac poem of Boland, entitled, Motus Monasteriensis Cologne, 1546, 8vo.; Kersenoort's Historia Belli Monasteriensis, published by Gerdes, Miscell. Groning. tom. II. p. 377. Gerdes also treats (ibid. tom. II. p. 403) of Bernhard Rotmann, a minister of the gospel at Munster, a man in other respects neither of a bad character nor unlearned, who joined with these Anabaptists and aided them in their mad projects. [For the details of this Anabaptist occupation of Munster and of the shocking scenes enacted there, the English reader may consult Robertson's History of Charles V. book v. vol. III. p. 67, &c. or still better, Ranke's Hist. of the Reformation, vol. III. p. 573, &c.—Z.]

⁴ The scenes of violence, tumult, and sedition which were exhibited in Holland by this odious tribe, were also terrible. They formed the design of reducing the city of Leyden to ashes, but were happily prevented and severely punished. John of Leyden, the Anabaptist king of Munster, had taken it into his head that God had made him a present of the cities of Amsterdam, Deventer, and Wessel, in consequence thereof he sent bishops to these three places to preach his gospel of sedition and carnage. About the beginning of the year 1535, twelve Anabaptists, of whom five were women, assembled at midnight in a private house at Amsterdam. One of them who was a tailor by profession fell into a trance, and after having preached and prayed for the space of four hours, stripped himself naked, threw his clothes into the fire, and commanded all the assembly to do the same, in which he was obeyed without the least reluctance. He then ordered them to follow him through the streets in this state of nature, which they accordingly did, howling and bawling out, "Woe! woe! the wrath of God! the wrath of God! woe to Babylon!" When, after being seized and brought before the magistrates, clothes were offered them to cover their indecency, they refused them obstinately and cried aloud, "We are the naked truth!" When they were brought bold in consequence of this lenity, the canton of Zurich in the year 1525 suspended over them capital punishment.

¹ See Jöhring's Preface to his Historia der Mennoniten, p. 3, &c.

whether the principles of this school would lead unstable and incautious men; and hence it is not strange that the magistrates were eager to extirpate the roots of such mischief with fire and sword.¹

8. When this miserable sect was in the utmost consternation, partly from the extinction of all their hopes from the men of Munster, and partly from anxiety about their personal safety, while they saw the best as well as the worst among them daily hurried away to certain execution, great consolation and relief were afforded them by Menno Simonis of Friesland, who was once a popish priest and, as he himself confesses, a debauched character. He first covertly and secretly united with the Anabaptists; but afterwards in the year 1536, quitting the sacred office he had hitherto held among the papists, he openly espoused their cause. And now in the year 1537, he listened to the entreaties of several of these people—whom he describes as sober, pious persons who had taken no part in the criminal transactions at Munster, though others believe they had been associates of the Westphalian rabble, but had become wiser by the calamities of their brethren—and consented to assume the functions of a religious teacher among them. From this period to the end of his days, or for about five-and-twenty years, he travelled with his wife and children amid perpetual sufferings and daily perils of his life, over many districts of country—first in West Friesland, the territory of Groningen, and East Friesland, and then in Gelderland, Holland, Brabant, Westphalia, and the German provinces along the shores of the Baltic as far as Livonia; and in this way he gathered an immense number of followers, so that he may justly be considered as almost the common father and bishop of all the Anabaptists, and as the founder of the flourishing sect which has continued down to our times. The causes of this great success may readily be conceived, if we consider the manners and the spirit of the man and the condition of the party at the time he joined them. Menno possessed genius though not much cultivated, as his writings evince, and a natural eloquence. Of learning he had just enough to be esteemed very learned, and almost an oracle, by the raw and undiscerning multitude. Moreover, if we may judge from his words and actions, he was a man of integrity, mild, accommodating, laborious, patient of injuries, and so ardent in his piety as to exemplify in his own life the precepts which he gave to others. A man of such a character would readily obtain followers among any people; but among none more readily than among such as the Anabaptists then were, a people simple, ignorant of all learning, accustomed to teachers who raved and howled rather than instructed them, very often deluded by impostors, worn out with perpetual suffering, and now in constant peril of their lives.²

² Menno was born, not as many say in 1496, but in 1505 and at Witmarsum, a village near Bolswert in Friesland. After being variously tossed about during his whole life, he died in 1561 in the duchy of Holstein, on an estate situated not far from Oldesloe, and belonging to a nobleman who was touched with compassion for the man exposed now to continual plots, and who received both him and his associates under his protection and afforded him an asylum. An account of Menno has been carefully drawn up by Möller, in his Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 835, &c. See also Schyn's Historie Mennonit. plenior deductio cap. vi. p. 116. His writings, which are nearly all in the Dutch language, were published; the most complete edition is, Amsterdam, 1651, folio. One who is disgusted with a style immoderately diffuse and rambling, with frequent and needless repetitions, with great confusion in the thoughts and matter, with pious but extremely languid exhortations, will rise from the perusal of them with but little satisfaction. [A concise history of his life, or rather a development of his religious views drawn up by himself, is found both prefixed to the complete edition of his works (Amsterdam, 1651, fol.), and in the 2d vol. of Schyn's Historie Mennonit. plenior deductio, p. 118, &c.—It contains, I. A short and lucid account how and why he forsook popery. II. A short and plain Confession of Faith of the Mennonites. III. Concise instructions in questions and answers derived from Scripture, for those who would join their community. Menno was born in 1505 at Witmarsum in Friesland. In his 24th year he became a priest of the Romish church in the village of Pinningen. His rector had some learning, and both he and another clergyman under him had some acquaintance with the Scriptures, while Menno had never read them, being afraid they would mislead him. But the thought at length occurred to him as he read mass, whether the bread and the wine could be the real body and blood of Christ. At first, he supposed this thought was a suggestion of the devil, and he often confessed it and sighed and prayed over it, but could not get rid of it. With his fellow-clergymen he daily spent his time in playing, drinking, and other indulgences. At length he took up reading the New Testament, and from that he soon learned that he had hitherto been deceived in regard to the mass; Luther also helped him to the idea, that to disregard human prescriptions did not draw after it eternal death. His examination of the Scriptures carried him farther and farther, and he began to be called an evangelical preacher, and everybody loved him. But when he heard that an honest man was put to death at Lewarden, because he had been rebaptized to the scaffold, they sang and danced and discovered all the marks of enthusiastic frenzy. These tumults were followed by a regular and deep-laid conspiracy, formed by Van Geelen (an envoy of the mock-king of Munster who had made a very considerable number of proselytes) against the magistrates of Amsterdam, with a design to wrest the government of that city out of their hands. This incendiary marched his fanatical troop to the town-house on the day appointed, drums beating, and colours flying, and fixed there his headquarters. He was attacked by the burghers, assisted by some regular troops, and headed by several of the burgomasters of the city. After an obstinate resistance he was surrounded, with his whole troop, who were put to death in the severest and most dreadful manner, to serve as examples to the other branches of the sect, who were exciting commotions of a like nature in Friesland, Groningen, and other provinces and cities in the Netherlands.—Maccl.

1. Brandt's Historie de Reformatie in de Nederlande, vol. i. book ii. p. 119, &c.

9. Menno had struck out a system of doctrine which was much milder and more tolerable than that of the furious and fanatical portion of the Anabaptists; yet perhaps one which was somewhat harsher, though better digested, than that of the wiser and more moderate Anabaptists, who merely wished to see the church restored to its long-lost purity, but had undefined conceptions about it. He therefore condemned the expectation of a new kingdom of Jesus Christ, to be set up in the world by violence and the expulsion of magistrates, which had been the prolific cause of so many seditions and crimes; he condemned the marvellous restitution of the church by a new and extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit; he condemned the licentiousness of polygamy and divorce; and he would not endure those who believed that the Holy Spirit descended into the minds of many just as he did at the first establishment of Christianity, and manifested his presence by miracles, prophecies, divine dreams, and visions. The common Anabaptist doctrines in regard to infant baptism, a coming thousand years' reign of Christ before the end of the world, the inadmissibility of magistrates in the Christian church, the prohibition of wars and oaths by Christ, the inutility and the mischief of human learning,—these doctrines he retained indeed, but he so corrected and improved them that they appeared to come nearer to accordance with the common tenets of Protestants. This system of religion was so highly recommended by the nature of the precepts themselves, by the eloquence of the preacher, and by the circumstances of the times, that it very easily gained the ascent of most of the Anabaptists. And thus the influence of Menno caused the Anabaptists of both sorts, after excluding fanatical persons and rejecting opinions pernicious to the state, to become consolidated as it were into one family or community.¹

he was at first surprised to hear of a repetition of baptism; he went to the Scriptures and he could find nothing said there about infant baptism. He held a discussion on the subject with his rector, who was obliged to concede the same fact. Some ancient writers taught him that children by such baptism were cleansed from original sin; but this seemed to him, according to the Scriptures, to militate against the efficacy of Christ's blood. After this (we give, all along, his own account) he turned to Luther; but his assertion that children must be baptized on account of their own faith appeared contrary to the Scriptures. Equally unsatisfactory to him was the opinion of Bucer, that the baptism of infants is necessary in order that they may be more carefully watched, and be trained up in the ways of the Lord; and also Bullinger's referring it to a covenant and appealing to circumcision. Not long after that, he was made rector of his native village, Witmarsum, where he preached much indeed from the Scriptures, but without being himself made better. In the mean time, he glories in having attained to correct views of baptism and of the Lord's Supper, by the illumination of the Holy Ghost and by frequent perusal of the Scriptures. With the disturbances of Munster he was greatly troubled; he ascribed them to erring zeal, and he opposed them in his sermons and exhortations. Yet he was so much affected by the example of the multitudes who sacrificed themselves for the interests of the party, that he felt more and more distress and shame on account of his own state of mind; he prayed God to aid him, his whole state of mind became changed, and he now taught Christian piety much more purely and effectually. And the discovery which he had made of the corrupt state of the Romish church induced him in the year 1536 utterly to renounce it as well as his priestly office, which he calls his departure from Babylon. The next year, there came to him several godly Anabaptists who most importunately entreated him, in their own name and in that of other devout men of the same faith, to become the teacher of this dispersed and persecuted company. He at length consented, and he remarks on this occasion that he was called to the office of teacher neither by the insurgents of Munster nor by any other turbulent party, but by true professors of Christ and his word, who sought the salvation of all around them and took up their cross. Thenceforth, during eighteen years, amid many perils and discouragements, poverty and want, and often concealed in lurking-places with his wife and children, he discharged the duties of his office; and thereby (says he) hath God in many cities and countries brought his church to such a glorious state, that not only have a multitude of violent persons been reclaimed, but also the most renowned doctors and the most cruel tyrants have been made to stand confounded and ashamed before those who have suffered with him. To this, which is Menno's own account, other writers add that with unwearied activity in Friesland, Gelderland, Holland, and Brabant, in Westphalia, and generally in northern Germany, as far as Livonia, he either planted and strengthened Anabaptist churches, or reduced them to order and to unanimity, until at last in 1561 he died at Oldesloe in the duchy of Holstein. Translated from Schroeckh's Kirchengeschichte seit der Reformation, vol. v. p. 441, 447.—Mur.

¹ These facts show how the famous question concerning the origin of the Mennonites may be readily solved. The Mennonites use every argument they can devise to prevent credence being given to what is taught in innumerable books, that the modern are the descendants of the ancient Anabaptists. See Schyn's Historia Mennonitarum, cap. viii. ix. xxi. p. 223, &c. Nor is the reason of their zeal in this matter difficult to ascertain. This timid people, living dispersed among their enemies, are afraid lest the malevolent should take occasion from that relationship to renew those laws against their existence and their safety by which those ancient disturbers of the public peace were put down. At least they hope the severe odium which has long ranked against them will be much diminished, provided they can fully eradicate from the public mind the belief that the Mennonites are the successors of the Anabaptists, or rather are themselves Anabaptists, though reformed and made wiser than their predecessors. But I must candidly own that after carefully comparing what the Mennonites and their antagonists have advanced on this subject, I am unable to determine what the precise point in dispute between them is. In the first place, if the Mennonites wish to maintain that Menno, the founder of the present existing sect, was not infected with those opinions by which the men of Munster and others like them drew upon themselves deserved punishments, and consequently that he did not propose to establish a new church of Christ entirely free from all evil, nor command the abolition of all civil laws and magistrates, nor impose upon himself and others by fanatical dreams, then they will find us all ready to agree with them. All this is readily conceded by those who at the same time contend that there most certainly was an intimate connexion between the ancient and the modern Anabaptists. Again, if the Mennonites would maintain that the churches which have adopted the discipline of Menno down to the present time have been studious of peace and tranquillity, have plotted no insurrections or revo-

10. Menno must have possessed more than human power to be able to diffuse peace and good order throughout so discordant a body, and bind together in harmonious bonds men actuated by very different spirits. About the middle of the century therefore a violent dispute arose among the Anabaptists [or Mennonites] respecting excommunication, occasioned chiefly by Leonard Bouwenson and Theodore Philip, and its effects have continued down to the present time. The men just named not only maintained that all transgressors, even those who seriously lamented and deplored their fall, ought to be at once cast out of the church without previous admonition, but also that the excommunicated were to be debarred all social intercourse with their wives, husbands, brothers, sisters, children, and other relatives. They likewise required obedience to a very austere and difficult system of morals. But many of the Anabaptists looked upon this as going too far. And hence very soon the Anabaptists became split into two sects—the one more lenient towards transgressors, the other more severe; the one requiring a sordid style of living and very austere morals, the other conceding something to human nature and to the elegances of life. Menno laboured indeed to restore harmony to his community, but discovering no possible way to effect it, he fluctuated as it were during his whole life between those two sects. For at one time he seemed to favour the severer party, and at another the more lax brethren. And this inconstancy in one of so high authority tended to increase not a little the disquietude and commotion among them.¹

lutions among the people who were their fellow-citizens, have always been averse from slaughter and blood, and have shunned all familiarity with persons professing to have visions and to hold converse with God; and likewise have excluded from their public discourses, and from their confessions of faith, those [principles and tenets] which led the ancient Anabaptists to pursue a different course of conduct; here also we present them the hand of friendship and agreement. And finally, if they contend that not all who bore the name of Anabaptists prior to the times of Menno were as delirious and as furious as Munzer or the faction at Munster and others were, that many persons of this name abstained from all criminal and flagitious deeds and only trod in the steps of the ancient Waldenses, Henriicians, Petrobrussians, Hussites, and Wicliffites, and that these upright and peaceable persons subjected themselves to the precepts and opinions of Menno, we shall still make no objections.

But (I.) If they would have us believe that none of the Mennonites are by birth and blood descendants of those people who once overwhelmed Germany and other countries with so many calamities, or that none of the furious and fanatical Anabaptists became members of the community which derives its name from Menno, then they may be confuted both by the testimony of Menno himself, who proclaims that he had convinced some of this pestiferous faction, and also by many other proofs. The first Mennonite churches were certainly composed of Anabaptists of both the better sort and the worse. Nor if the Mennonites should admit this (which is true beyond contradiction), would they expose themselves to more infamy than we do, when we admit that our ancestors were blind idolaters? And (II.) We must be equally at variance with them, if they deny that the Mennonites hold any portion of all those opinions which once betrayed the turbulent and seditious Anabaptists into so many and so enormous crimes. For, not to mention what has long since been remarked by others, that Menno himself styled those Anabaptists of Munster whom his children at this day execrate as pests, his brethren, though with the qualification of erring; I say, not to mention this, it is the fact that the very doctrine concerning the nature of Christ's kingdom or the church of the New Testament, which led the ancient Anabaptists step by step to become furious and open rebels, is not yet wholly eradicated from the minds of the modern Mennonites, although it has gradually become weakened, and in the more moderate has ceased to vegetate or at least has lost its power to do harm. I will not here inquire whether even the more peaceful community of Menno has not at any time been agitated with violent commotions, nor am I disposed to pry into what may be now taking place among its minor sects and parties; for that the larger sects, especially those of North Holland, shun the men who are actuated by a fanatical spirit, is sufficiently evinced by the fact that they most carefully exclude all Quakers from their communion.

11. These two large sects of Anabaptists [or Mennonites] are distinguished by the appellations of the Fine and the Coarse (die Feinen und die Groben—Subtilles et Crassi) i.e. the More Rigid and the More Lax.² Those called the Fine hold and observe more strictly than the others both the ancient doctrines and the morals and discipline of the Anabaptists; the Coarse depart farther from the original opinions, morals, and discipline of the sect, and approach nearer to those of the Protestants. The greater part of the Coarse or lax Mennonites at first were inhabitants of a region in the North of Holland called Waterland, and hence this whole sect obtained the name of Waterlanders.³ A majority of the severer sect were inhabitants of Flanders, and hence their whole sect received the name of Flemings or Flandrians. Among these Flandrians there soon after arose new broils and contentions, not indeed respecting doctrines, but respecting the offences for which men should be excommunicated, and other minor matters. And hence again arose the two sects of Flandrians and Frieslanders, disagreeing in morals and discipline, and receiving their appellations from the majority of their respective partisans. To these were added a third sect of Germans, for many [followers of Menno] had removed from Germany and settled in Holland and the Netherlands. But the greatest part of the Flandrians, the Frieslanders, and the Germans, gradually came over to the moderate sect of Waterlanders and became reconciled to them. Such of the more rigid as would not follow this example are at this day denominated the old Flemings or Flandrians; but they are far inferior in numbers to the more moderate [or the Waterlanders].

¹ See the history of the contests and controversies among the Mennonites previous to the year 1615, composed by some Mennonite writer and translated from Dutch into German by Jehring, and published, Jena, 1720, 4to; also Rues, Nachrichten von dem Zustande der Mennoniten, Jena, 1743, 8vo.

² The terms Coarse and Fine are a literal translation of groben and feinen, which are the German denominations used to distinguish these two sects.—The same terms have been introduced among the Protestants in Holland; the Fine denoting a set of people whose extraordinary and sometimes fanatical devotion resembles that of the English Methodists; while the Coarse is applied to the generality of Christians who make no extraordinary pretensions to uncommon degrees of sanctity and devotion.—Mud.

³ See Spanheim, Elenchus Controneri. Theolog. Opp. tom. iii. p. 172. This sect are also called Johannites from John de Ries [Hans de Rys], who in various ways was serviceable to them, and in particular with the aid of Lubbert Gerard in 1580, composed a confession of faith. This confession, which exceeds all the others of the Mennonites in simplicity and soundness, has been often published, and recently by Schyn, in his Historia Mennonitarum, cap. vii. p. 172. It was explained in a copious commentary in 1686, by Peter Joannis, a Netherlander and minister among the Waterlanders. Yet this celebrated confession is said to be only the private confession of that church over which its author presided, and not the general one of the Waterlander church. See Rues, Nachrichten, p. 93, 94. [For Rues asserts that he had seen a document according to which an old minister of the church at Gouda affirmed before

12. As soon as fanatical delirium subsided among the Mennonites, all their sects however diverse in many respects agreed in this, that the principles of religion are to be derived solely from the Holy Scriptures. And to make this the more manifest, they caused their confessions of faith, or papers containing a summary of their views of God and the right mode of worshipping him, to be drawn up almost the very words of the divine books. The first of these Confessions, both in the order of time and in rank, is that which the Waterlanders exhibit. This was followed by others, some of them common ones presented to the magistrates, and others peculiar to certain parties.¹ But there is ground for inquiry whether these formulas contain all that the Mennonites believe true, or whether they omit some things which are important for understanding the internal state of the sect. It will be seen indeed by every reader who bestows on them but a moderate degree of attention, that the doctrines which seem prejudicial to society, particularly those respecting magistrates and oaths, are most cautiously guarded and embellished, lest they should appear alarming. Moreover, the discerning reader will easily perceive that these points are not placed in their proper attitude, but appear artificially expressed. All this will be made clear from what follows.

13. The old Anabaptists, because they believed they had the Holy Spirit for their guide and teacher, did not so much as think of drawing up a system of religious doctrines, and of imbuing the minds of their people with a sound knowledge of religion. And hence they disagreed exceedingly on points of the greatest importance; for instance, respecting the divinity of the Saviour, which some professed and others denied, and respecting polygamy and divorce. A little more attention was given to this matter by Menno and his disciples. Yet there was, even subsequently to his time, vast license of opinion on religious subjects among the Mennonites, and especially among those called the Fine or the More Rigid. And this single fact would be sufficient proof, if other arguments were not at hand, that the leaders of the sect esteemed it the smallest part of their duty to guard their people against embracing corrupt doctrines; and that they considered the very soul of religion to consist in holiness of life and conduct. At length necessity induced first the Waterlanders and afterwards the others to set forth publicly a summary of their faith, digested under certain heads; for that rashness of questioning and disputing on sacred subjects, which had long been tolerated had drawn upon the community very great odium, and seemed to threaten to bring on it banishment if not something worse. Yet the Mennonite Confessions appear to be rather shields provided for blunting the points of their enemies' arguments, than established rules of faith from which no one may deviate. For if we except a portion of the modern Waterlanders, it was never decreed among them, as it is among other sects of Christians, that no one must venture to believe or to teach otherwise than is laid down in the public formulas. It was an established principle with them all from the beginning (as is evinced by the general character and spirit notaries and witnesses, that the Waterland churches had never bound themselves by any particular confession of their faith, but that Rys drew up this confession for some English Baptists who retired to Holland, and who would not unite themselves with the Waterlanders until they had ascertained what their doctrinal views were. Rys however solemnly declared that this confession should not afterwards be binding on any one, but should be regarded as a mere private writing which had reference only to the time then present.—Schl.

¹ Schyn treats expressly of these confessions in his Historie Mennonitar. plenior deductio cap. iv. p. 78. And he concludes by saying (p. 115): "It hence appears that the Mennonites, from the time of Menno, have been as well agreed in regard to the principal and fundamental articles of faith as any other sect of Christians." But if perchance the good man should bring us to believe so, he would still find it very difficult to persuade many of his brethren of it, who have not yet ceased to contend warmly, and who think that the points which he regards as unimportant to religion and piety are of vast moment. And indeed how could any of the Mennonites before this century believe what he asserts, while the parties among them contended about matters which he treats with contempt, as if their eternal salvation hung suspended on them?

of the sect), that religion is comprised in piety, and that the holiness of its members is the surest index of a true church.

14. If we are to form our judgment of the Mennonite religion from their confessions of faith which are in everybody's hands, in most things it differs but little from that of the Reformed, but it departs more widely from that of the Lutherans. For they attribute to what are called the sacraments no other virtue than that of being signs and emblems, and they have a system of discipline not much different from that of the Presbyterians. The doctrines by which they are distinguished from all other Christian sects are reducible to three heads. Some of these doctrines are common to all the sects of Mennonites; others are received only in certain of the larger associations (and these are the doctrines which rendered Menno himself not perfectly acceptable to all); and lastly, others exist only in the minor and more obscure associations. These last rise and sink by turns with the sects which embrace them, and therefore deserve not a more particular notice.

15. All the opinions which are common to the whole body are founded on this one principle as their basis, namely, that the kingdom which Christ has established on the earth, or the church, is a visible society or company in which is no place for any but holy and pious persons, and which therefore has none of those institutions and provisions which human sagacity has devised on account of the ungodly. This principle was frankly avowed by the ancestors of the Mennonites; but the moderns in their confessions either cover it up under words of dubious import, or appear to reject it; yet they cannot actually reject it, unless they would be inconsistent and would deprive their doctrines of their natural basis.¹ But in regard to the most modern Mennonites, as they have departed in very many things from the views and the institutions of their fathers, so they have nearly altogether abandoned this principle respecting the nature of the Christian church. And in this matter sad experience rather than either reason or the holy Scriptures has taught them wisdom. They therefore admit, first, that there is an invisible church of Christ or one not open to human view, which extends through all Christian sects. And in the next place, they do not place the mark of a true church, as they once did, in the holiness of all its members; for they admit that the visible church of Christ consists of both good and bad men. On the contrary, they declare that the marks of a true church are a knowledge of the truth as taught by Jesus Christ, and the agreement of all the members in professing and maintaining that truth.

¹ This appears from their confessions, and even from those in which there is the greatest care to prevent the idea from entering the reader's mind. For instance, they first speak in lofty terms of the dignity, the excellence, the utility, and the divine origin of civil magistracy, and I am entirely willing they should be supposed to speak here according to their real sentiments. But afterwards, when they come to the reasons why they would have no magistrates in their community, they incautiously express what is in their hearts. In the 37th article of the Waterland Confession they say:—"This political power the Lord Jesus hath not established in his spiritual kingdom, the church of the New Testament, nor hath he added it to the offices in his church." The Mennonites believe, therefore, that the New Testament church is a republic, which is free from all evils and from restraints upon the wicked. But why, I ask, did they not frankly avow this fact while explaining their views of the church, and not affect ambiguity and concealment?

16. Nevertheless, from that doctrine of the old Anabaptists respecting the church flow the principal opinions by which they are distinguished from other Christians. This doctrine requires, I. That they should receive none into their church by the sacrament of baptism, unless they are adults and have the full use of their reason; because it is uncertain with regard to infants whether they will become pious or irreligious, neither can they pledge their faith to the church to lead a holy life. It requires, II. that they should not admit of magistrates, nor suffer any of their members to perform the functions of a magistrate; because, where there are no bad men, there can be no need of magistrates. It requires, III. that they should deny the justice of repelling force by force, or of waging war; because, as those who are perfectly holy cannot be provoked by injuries nor commit them, so they have no need of the support of arms in order to their safety. It requires, IV. that they should have strong aversion to all penalties and punishments, and especially to capital punishments; because punishments are aimed against the wickedness and the crimes of men, but the church of Christ is free from all crimes and wickedness. It forbids, V. the calling of God to witness any transactions, or the confirming anything by an oath; because minds that are actuated solely by the love of what is good and right, never violate their faith nor dissemble the truth. From this doctrine follows likewise, VI. the severe and rigid discipline of the old Anabaptists which produced so many commotions among them.²

² This derivation of the Anabaptist tenets from one single principle, although it appears forced, especially in regard to the second and third points, yet must be admitted to be ingenious. But whether it is histori-

17. The Mennonites have a system of morals (or at least once had—whether they still retain it is uncertain) coinciding with that fundamental doctrine which was the source of their other peculiarities, that is, one which is austere and rigid. For those who believe that sanctity of life is the only indication of a true church, must be especially careful lest any appearance of sinful conduct should stain the lives of their people. Hence they all once taught that Jesus Christ has established a new law for human conduct, far more perfect than the old law of Moses and the ancient prophets; and they would not tolerate any in their churches whom they perceived swerving from the extreme of gravity and simplicity in their attitudes, looks, clothing, and style of living, or whose desires extended beyond the bare necessities of life, or who imitated the customs of the world, or showed any regard for the elegances of fashionable life. But this ancient austerity became in a great measure extinct in the larger associations, particularly among the Waterlanders and the Germans, after they had acquired wealth by their merchandise and other occupations; so that at this day the Mennonite congregations furnish their pastors with as much matter for censure and admonition as the other Christian communities do theirs.¹ Some of the smaller associations however and likewise the people who live remote from cities, copy more closely and successfully the manners, ally true is another question. Neither Menno nor the first Anabaptists and such disciplined intellects as to be able thus systematically to link together their thoughts. Their tenets had been advanced long before the Reformation, by the Cathari, the Albigenses, and the Waldenses, as also by the Hussites. This can be shown by unquestionable documents, from the records of the Inquisition and from Confessions; and Mosheim himself maintains the fact in sec. 2 of this chapter. Those sects were indeed oppressed but not exterminated. Adherents to their tenets were dispersed everywhere in Germany, Switzerland, Bohemia, and Moravia; and they were emboldened by the Reformation to stand forth openly, to form a closer union among themselves, and to make proselytes to their tenets. From them sprang the Anabaptists, whose teachers were men for the most part without learning, who understood the Scriptures according to the letter, and applied the words of the Bible without philosophical deductions, according to their perverse mode of interpretation, to their peculiar doctrines concerning the church, anabaptism, wars, capital punishments, oaths, &c. Even their doctrine concerning magistrates they derived from Luke xxii. 25, and 1 Corinth. vi. 1, and the manner in which they were treated by the magistrates may have had a considerable influence on their doctrine respecting them.—Schl.

¹ It is certain that the Mennonites in Holland at this day are, in their tables, their equipages, and their country seats, the most luxurious part of the Dutch nation. This is more especially true of the Mennonites of Amsterdam, who are very numerous and extremely opulent.—Macl. [This was written about the year 1764, and at the Hague, where Dr. Maclaine spent nearly his whole life. It is therefore the testimony of an eye-witness residing on the spot.—Mur.

the abstinence, and the simplicity of their fathers.

18. The opinions and practices which divide the principal associations of Mennonites, if we admit those of less importance, are chiefly the following:—I. Menno denied that Christ received from the Virgin Mary that human body which he assumed; on the contrary, he supposed it was produced out of nothing in the womb of the immaculate Virgin, by the power of the Holy Ghost.² This opinion the Fine Anabaptists or the old Flemings still hold tenaciously, but all the other associations have long since given it up.³ II. The

² Thus the opinion of Menno is stated by Schyn, Historie Mennonit. plenior Deductio p. 164, 165, but others report it differently. After considering some passages in Menno's writings, in which he treats expressly on this subject, I think it most probable that he was strongly inclined to this opinion, and that it was solely in this sense that he ascribed to Christ a divine and celestial body. For whatever comes immediately from the Holy Spirit may be fitly called celestial and divine. Yet I must confess that Menno appears not to have been so certain of this opinion, as never to have thought of exchanging it for a better. For he expresses himself here and there ambiguously and inconsistently; from which I conclude that he gave up the common opinion respecting the origin of Christ's human body, but was in doubt which of the various opinions that occurred to his thoughts to adopt in the place of it. See Poeslin's Critica l. Epist. Reformat. p. 383, &c. Menno is commonly represented as the author of this doctrine concerning the origin of Christ's body, which his more rigid disciples still retain. But it appears to have been older than Menno, and to have been only adopted by him together with other opinions of the Anabaptists. For Boland (Motus Monasteriensis, lib. x. v. 49, &c.) expressly testifies of many of the Anabaptists of Munster (who certainly received no instructions from Menno), that they held this opinion concerning the body of Christ:

Esse (Christum) Deum statunt alii, sed corpore carum
Humanam sumpto sustinuisse negant:
At Diam mentem tenuis quasi fauce canalis
Per Mariæ corpus virginis isse ferunt.

[It is very probable that this doctrine was propagated from the Manichæans of the middle ages to the Anabaptists. For thus Moneta at least says, in his Summa adn. Catharos et Waldenses, lib. iii. c. lii.: "Dicunt (Cathari) quod corpus spirituale accipit (Christus), operatione Spiritus Sancti, ex alia materia fabricatum."—Schl. [And is it not probable likewise that most if not all the peculiar sentiments of the old Anabaptists of Germany originated from the influence of that Manichæan leaven, which was introduced into Europe in the ninth century by the Paulicians, and which spread far, and produced from that time onward various fanatical and enthusiastic sects, down even to the time of the Reformation? See the history of the Paulicians, in cent. ix. part ii. chap. v. and the chapters on Heresies in the subsequent centuries.—Mur.

³ I perceive that many represent the Waterlanders in particular as according to this doctrine of Menno respecting Christ's body. See Histoire des Anabaptistes, p. 223; Cérémonies et Coutumes de tous les Peuples du Monde, tome iv. p. 200. But the Confession of the Waterlanders or that of John de Ries will itself confute this error. Add Schyn's Historie Mennonitar. plenior Deductio, p. 165, (Rues (p. 16) attributes this doctrine solely to the old Flemings; yet he states as their opinion that the human nature of Christ, which God first created out of nothing, received its support and growth from the blood of the holy Virgin Mary. At the same time, they explicitly guarded themselves against the charge of partaking in the error of the Valentianians, more rigid Mennonites after the example of their ancestors regard as disciplinable offences, not only those wicked actions which are manifest violations of the law of God, but likewise the slightest indications either of a latent inclination to sensuality, or of a mind disposed to levity and inclined to follow the customs of the world; as, for example, ornaments for the head, elegant clothing, rich and unnecessary furniture, and the like; and they think that all transgressors should be excommunicated forthwith and without a previous admonition, and that no allowance should be made for the weakness of human nature. But the other Mennonites hold that none but contemners of the divine law deserve excommunication, and they only when they pertinaciously disregard the admonitions of the church.

III. The more rigid Mennonites hold that excommunicated persons are to be shunned as if they were pests, and are to be deprived of all social intercourse. Hence the ties of kindred must be severed, and the voice of nature must be unheeded. Between parents and their children, husbands and their wives, there must be no kind looks, no conversation, no manifestation of affection, and no kind offices, when the church has once pronounced them unworthy of her communion. But the more moderate think that the sanctity and the honour of the church are sufficiently consulted, if all particular intimacy with the excommunicated is avoided. IV. The old Flemings maintain that the example of Christ, which has in this instance the force of a law, requires his disciples to wash the feet of their guests in token of their love; and for this reason, they have been called Podopitæ [Feet-washers]. But others deny that this rite was enjoined by Christ.

19. Literature and whatever comes under the name of learning, but especially philosophy, were formerly believed by this whole sect to be exceedingly prejudicial to the church of Christ and to the progress of religion and piety. Hence, although the sect could boast of a number of writers in this century, yet not one of them affords pleasure to the reader either by his ingenuity or his learning. The more rigid Mennonites retain this sentiment of their ancestors even to our times; and therefore, despising the cultivation of their minds, they devote themselves to hand labour, the mechanic arts, and traffic. But the Water-landers are honourably distinguished from the others in this as well as in many other respects. For they permit several of their members to prosecute at the universities the study of languages, history, antiquities, and especially the medical art, the utility of which they are unable to deny. And hence it is that so many of their ministers at the present day bear the title of Doctors of Physic. In our age, these milder and more discreet Anabaptists pursue also the study of philosophy, and they regard it as very useful to mankind. Hence, among their teachers, there are not a few who have the title of Masters of Arts. Indeed it is only a few years since they established a college at Amsterdam, in which a man of erudition sustains the office of Professor of Philosophy. Yet they still persevere in the opinion that theology must be kept pure and uncontaminated with philosophy, and must never be modified by its precepts. Even the more rigid Flemings also in our times are gradually laying aside their ancient hatred of literature and science, and permitting their members to study languages, history, and other branches of learning.

20. That ignorance which the ancient Anabaptists reckoned among the means of their felicity, contributed much, indeed very much, to generate sects among them; in which they abounded from the first, much more than any other religious community. This will be readily conceded by any one who looks into the causes and grounds of their dissensions. For their vehement contests were for the most part not so much respecting the doctrines and mysteries of religion, as respecting what is to be esteemed lawful, proper, pious, right, and commendable; and what, on the contrary, is to be accounted criminal and faulty. Because they maintained that sanctity of life and purity of manners were the only sign of a true church; yet what was holy and religious and what not so, they did not determine by reason and judgment nor by a correct interpretation of the divine laws, (because they had no men who possessed solid knowledge on moral subjects), but rather by their feelings and imaginations. Now, as this mode of discriminating good from evil is ever fluctuating and various, according to the different capacities and temperaments of men, it was unavoidable that different opinions should arise among them; and diversity of sentiment nowhere more certainly produces permanent schisms, than among a people who are ignorant and therefore pertinacious.

21. The Mennonites first obtained a by this doctrine. Menno embraced this doctrine, as Rues also maintains, because he could not conceive how the human nature of Christ could be without sin, if it be admitted that it descended from Mary. But his disciples appeal for proof to 1 Corinth. xv. 47, and John vi. 51.—Schl.

quiet and stable residence in the United Provinces of Belgium, by the favour of William prince of Orange, the immortal vindicator of Batavian liberty, whom they had aided with a large sum of money in the year 1572, when he was destitute of the resources necessary for his vast undertakings.¹ Yet the benefits of this indulgence reached by slow degrees to all who resided in Holland. For opposition was made to the will of the prince both by the magistrates and by the clergy, and especially by those of Zealand and Amsterdam, who remembered the seditions raised by the Anabaptists only a short time previously.² These impediments [to their peace] were in a great measure removed in this century, partly by the perseverance and authority of William and his son Maurice, and partly by the good behaviour of the Mennonites themselves; for they showed great proofs of their loyalty to the state, and became daily more cautious not to afford any ground to their adversaries for entertaining suspicions of them. Yet full and complete peace was first given to them in the following century, A.D. 1626, after they had again purged themselves from those crimes and pernicious errors which were charged upon them, by the presentation of a confession of their faith.³

22. Those among the English who reject the baptism of infants are not called Anabaptists, but only Baptists. It is probable that these Baptists originated from the Germans and the Dutch, and that they all once held the same sentiments with the Mennonites. But they are now divided into two general classes, the one called that of the General Baptists or Remonstrants, because they believe that God has excluded no man from salvation by any sovereign decree; the other are called Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, because they agree very nearly with the Calvinists or Presbyterians in their religious sentiments.⁴ This latter sect reside chiefly at London and in the adjacent towns and villages; and they recede so far from the opinions of their progenitors, that they have almost nothing in common with the other Anabaptists, except that they baptize only adults, and immerse totally in the water whenever they administer the ordinance. Hence if the government requires it, they allow a professor of religion to take an oath, to bear arms, and to fill public civil offices. Their churches are organized after the Presbyterian [or more strictly, the Independent] plan, and are under the direction of men of learning and literature.⁵ It appears from the confession of these Baptists published in 1643, that they then held the same sentiments as they do at the present day.⁶

23. The General Baptists, or as some call them the Antipædobaptists who are dispersed in great numbers over many provinces of England, consist of illiterate persons of low condition, for like the ancient Mennonites they despise learning. Their religion is very general and indefinite, so that they tolerate persons of all sects, even Arians and Socinians, and do not reject any person, provided he professes to be a Christian and to receive the holy Scriptures as the rule of religious faith and practice.⁷ They

⁴ Whiston's Memoirs of his Life and Writings, vol. ii. p. 461.

⁵ Böhm's Englische Reformations-historie, p. 151, 473, 536, book viii. p. 1152, &c. [Crosby's History of the English Baptists, vol. i.: Bogue and Bennet's History of the Dissenters, vol. i. chap. i. sec. iii. p. 141, &c. Dutch and German Anabaptists or Mennonites appeared in England, and doubtless made some proselytes there, as early as the year 1535, and thenceforward to the end of the century. But they were so rigorously persecuted, not only by Henry VIII. but by Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, that they can hardly be said to have existed as a visible sect in England, during the sixteenth century. And their division into General and Particular Baptists, did not take place till the reign of James I. See Wall's Hist. of Infant Baptism, part ii. chap. vii. sec. vi. p. 206, &c.—Mur.

⁶ Bibliothèque Britannique, tome vi. p. 2. [The Baptist Confession of 1643, was "set forth in the name of seven congregations then gathered in London." In September, 1689, elders and messengers from upward of one hundred congregations of Calvinistic Baptists in England and Wales met in London, and drew up a more full confession and substantially the same in doctrine, but expressed very much in the words of the Westminster and the Savoy Confessions, with both which it agrees in doctrine, while in discipline and worship it accords only with the latter. The Calvinistic Baptists in England have generally been on the most friendly terms with the Independents or Congregationalists there; and often both sects worshipped together, and were under the same pastors. See Bogue and Bennet's History of Dissenters, vol. i. p. 142, 143, vol. ii. p. 140, &c. also the Confession of the Baptist Convention of 1689 and its Preface.—Mur.

⁷ This appears from their confession (drawn up in

¹ Brandt's Historie de Reformatie in de Nedderlande, vol. i. book x. p. 525, 526; Cérémonies et Coutumes de tous les Peuples du Monde, tome iv. p. 201. [General History of the United Netherlands, (in German), vol. iii. p. 317, &c. Wagener, in the passage here referred to, relates the matter thus. At Middleburg, because the Anabaptists would not take the citizen's oath, it was resolved to exclude them from the privileges of citizenship, or at least not to admit them fully to the rank of citizens. But the prince opposed it, and maintained very rationally that an Anabaptist's affirmation ought to be held equivalent to an oath; and that in this case no farther coercion could be used with them, unless we would justify the Catholics in compelling the Reformed by force to adopt a mode of worship from which their consciences revolted. And afterwards, when the city council demanded of them to mount guard and threatened to close their shops if they refused, the prince commanded the city council peremptorily to trouble the Anabaptists no more, for declining oaths and the bearing of arms. This took place in the year 1578.—Schl.

² Brandt, ubi supra, book xi. p. 555, 586, 587, &c. 609, 610, b. xiv. p. 780, b. xvi. p. 811.

³ Schyn's Historia Mennonitar. plenior Deductio, cap. iv. p. 29, &c.

have this in common with the Particular Baptists that they baptize only adults, and these they immerse wholly in water; but they differ from them in this, that they re-baptize those who were either baptized only in infancy and childhood, or were not immersed, which if report may be credited the Particular Baptists will not do.¹ There are likewise other peculiarities of this sect. (I.) Like the ancient Mennonites, they regard their own church as being the only true church of Christ, and most carefully avoid communion with all other religious societies. (II.) They immerse candidates for baptism only once, and not three times; and they esteem it unessential whether new converts be baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or only in the name of Jesus. (III.) With Menno they expect a millennial reign of Christ. (IV.) Many of them likewise adopt Menno's opinion respecting the origin of Christ's body. (V.) They consider the decree of the apostles, Acts xv. 25, respecting blood and things strangled, to be a law binding on the church universal. (VI.) They believe that the soul, between death and the resurrection at the last day, has neither pleasure nor pain, but is in a state of insensibility. (VII.) They use extreme unction. (VIII.) Some of them, in addition to Sunday or the Lord's day, keep also the Jewish Sabbath.² I omit the notice of some minor points. These Baptists have bishops whom they call messengers (for thus they interpret the word ἄγγελος in the Apocalyptical epistles), and presbyters and deacons. Their bishops are often men of learning.³

24. David George [or Joris], a Hollander of Delft, gave origin and name to a singular sect. Having at last forsaken the Anabaptists, he retired to Basil in 1544, assumed a new name [John Bruck von Binningen], and there died in 1556. He was well esteemed by the people of Basil so long as he lived, for being a man of wealth he united magnificence with virtue and integrity. But after his death, his son-in-law Nicholas Blesdyck accused him before the senate of most pestilent errors, and the cause being tried, his body was committed to the common hangman to be burned. Nothing can be more impious and scandalous than his opinions, if the historians of his case and his adversaries have estimated them correctly. For he is said to have declared himself to be a third David and another son of God, the fountain of all divine wisdom; to have denied the existence of heaven and hell, both good and bad angels, and a final judgment; to have treated all the laws of modesty and decorum with contempt, and to have taught other things equally bad.⁴ But if I do not greatly mis-

1660 and published by Wm. Whiston, in the Memoirs of his Life, vol. ii. p. 561, which is so general that all Christian sects, with the exception of a few points, could embrace it. Whiston himself, though an Arian, joined this community of Baptists, whom he considered to bear the nearest resemblance to the most ancient Christians. Thomas Emlyn, a famous Socinian, also lived among them, according to the testimony of Whiston.

¹ I know not on what authority Mosheim makes this distinction between the General and the Particular Baptists; and I know of no sufficient proof of its reality. Neither does it appear, as Mosheim seemed to be informed, that the General Baptists were more numerous in England than the Particular Baptists. On the contrary, I suppose the former to have always been the smaller community, and at the present day they are only about one-sixth part as numerous as the Particular Baptists. See Bogue and Bennett, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 328.—Mur.

² These statements are derived from Whiston's Memoirs of his Life, vol. ii. p. 461, and from Wall's Hist. of Infant Baptism, part ii. p. 300, &c. edit. Latin. [p. 280, &c. ed. London, 1705. Wall does not represent all these as distinguishing tenets of the General Baptists. He enumerates the various peculiarities to be found among the English Baptists of all sorts. Some of the peculiarities mentioned constitute distinct sects, as the eighth, which gives rise to the small and now almost extinct sect of Seventh-day Baptists; who however do not keep both days, Saturday and Sunday, but only the former. The second peculiarity, so far as respects a single application of water, is not peculiar to the Baptists; and so far as it respects baptizing in the name of Jesus only, was confined (as Wall supposed), to the General Baptists, who were early inclined to Anti-Trinitarianism, and of late in England have generally taken that ground.—Mur.

³ Whiston, Memoirs of his Life, vol. ii. p. 466, &c. There is extant, Crosby's History of the English Baptists, London, 1728, 4 vols. 8vo, which however I have never seen. [This Crosby was himself a General Baptist and kept a private school, in which he taught young men mathematics and had also a small bookstore. He died in 1752. See Alberti's Letters on the most Recent State of Religion and Learning in England (in German), Preface to vol. iv. From Crosby, Alberti has translated the Confessions of both the Particular and the General Baptists into German, and subjoined them as an Appendix to his fourth volume, p. 1245, &c. and 1323, &c.—Schl. [The Rev. John Smyth is commonly represented as the father of the sect of General or Arminian Baptists in England. (See Bogue and Bennet, History of Dissenters, vol. i. p. 159.) He was fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, a popular preacher, and a great sufferer for non-conformity. Separating from the church of England he joined the Brownists, was one of their leading men in 1592, and was imprisoned during eleven months. At length he fled with other Brownists to Holland, and in 1606 joined the English Brownist church at Amsterdam. Here he fell into Arminian and Baptist opinions, on which he had disputes with Ainsworth, Robinson, and others; and he removed with his adherents to Leyden, where he died in 1610. Soon after his death, his followers returned to England; and as is generally supposed, they were the first congregation of English General Baptists. See his life in Brook's Lives of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 195, &c.—Mur.

⁴ See the Historia Davidis Georgii, by his son-in-law, Blesdyck, published by Revius; also his Life, written in German by Stoltzeroth, and many others. Among the more modern writers, see Arnold, Kirchen-und Ketzer-historie, vol. i. book xvi. chap. xvi. sec. 44, &c. and his extensive collections in vindication of the reputation of David George, in vol. ii. p. 534, &c. Also p. 1185, &c. See also More's Enthusiasmus Triumphatus sect. xxiii. &c. p. 23, &c. Add especially, the documents which are brought to light in my History of Michael Servetus, (in German), p. 425, &c. [David Joris was born at Delft in 1501. Though placed at school, he learned nothing. But his inclination led take, the barbarous and coarse style of his compositions,—for he possessed some genius but no learning, led his opposers often to put a harsh and unjust construction upon his sentences. That he possessed more sense and more virtue than is commonly supposed, is at least evinced not only by his books, of which he published a great many, but also by his disciples, who were persons by no means base but of great simplicity of manners and character, and who were formerly numerous in Holstein, and are said to be so still in Friesland and in other countries.¹ In the manner of the more moderate Anabaptists, he laboured to revive languishing piety among his fellow-men, and in this matter his imagination, which was excessively warm, so deceived him that he falsely supposed he had divine visions; and he placed religion in the exclusion of all external objects from the thoughts and the cultivation of silence, contemplation, and a peculiar and indescribable state of the soul. The Mystics therefore of the highest order and the Quakers might claim him if they would, and they might assign him no mean rank among their sort of people.

him to learn the art of painting on glass, which caused him to travel in the Netherlands, France, and England. Returning in 1521, he pursued that business in his native town. The Reformation here caused considerable commotion, and in 1530 Joris for obstructing a Catholic procession was imprisoned, whipped, and had his tongue bored. He at length turned to the Anabaptists, but being more moderate than they and opposed to their tumultuous proceedings, it was not till 1531 that he actually was rebaptized. He then joined the party of Hoffmann, but he was not well pleased with any of them, and at length he united some contending parties together, and actually established a particular sect of Anabaptists. He next began to have visions and revelations. As his adherents suffered persecution in Westphalia and Holland, he often attended them and comforted and animated them in their dying hours. He saw his own mother decapitated at Delft in 1537. A monitory letter which he sent to the senate of Holland caused the bearer to lose his head. In 1539 the landgrave of Hesse, to whom he applied for protection, offered to afford it provided he would become a Lutheran. In 1542 he published his famous Book of Wonders, in which he exposed all the fanciful opinions that floated in his imagination. He wandered in various countries till he was safe nowhere. Therefore in 1544 he retired to Basil, where he lived twelve years under the name of John von Brügge, was owner of a house in the city and an estate in the country, was a peaceable and good citizen and held communion with the Reformed Church. His son-in-law Blesdyck was a Reformed preacher in the Palatinate, and had some variance with Joris before his death. Afterwards, provoked perhaps by the disposition Joris made of his property, he brought heavy charges against him. His family and friends and acquaintances denied the truth of the charges before the court. But what they would not admit was attempted to be proved from his writings. The university and the clergy pronounced his opinions heretical, and the dead man, who could no longer defend himself, was condemned. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. v. p. 442, &c. and Von Einem's and Schlegel's notes upon this section of Mosheim.—Mur.

¹ See Möller's Introducio in Hist. Chersones. Cimbrice, par. ii. p. 116, &c. and his Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 422, &c.

25. An intimate friend of David George, but of a somewhat different turn of mind, Henry Nicolai of Westphalia, gave much trouble to the Dutch and the English from the year 1555, by founding and propagating the Family of Love as he denominated his sect. To this man nearly the same remarks apply, which were made of his friend. He would perhaps have in great measure avoided the foul blots which many have fastened upon him, if he had possessed the genius and learning requisite to a correct and lucid expression of his thoughts. What his aims were, appears pretty clearly from the name of the sect which he set up.² For he declared himself divinely appointed and sent to teach mankind that the whole of religion consists in the exercise of divine love; that all other things, which are supposed to belong either to religion or to the worship of God, are of no importance; and of course that it is of no consequence what views any one has of the divine nature, provided he burns with a flame of piety and love. To these opinions he perhaps added some other fanciful views, as is usual with men in whom the imagination predominates; but what they were in particular, I apprehend, may be better learned from his books than from the confutations of his adversaries.³

² See Hornbeck's Summa Controversiarum, lib. vi. p. 393; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part i. book xvi. chap. xvi. sec. xxxvi. p. 746; Böhm's Englische Reformations-historie, book iv. chap. v. p. 541, &c.

³ The last and most learned of those who attacked the Familists was Henry More, the celebrated English divine and philosopher, in his Mystery of Godliness, book vi. chaps. xii.—xviii. George Fox, the father of the Quakers, severely chastised this Family of Love, because they would take an oath, dance, sing, and be cheerful; and he called them a company of fanatics. See Sewel's History of the Quakers, book iii. p. 88, 89, 314, &c. [Henry Nicolai or Nicholas was born at Munster, and commenced his career about the year 1516 in the Netherlands, thence he passed over to England in the latter years of Edward VI. and joined the Dutch congregation in London. But his sect did not become visible till some time in the reign of queen Elizabeth. In 1575 they laid a confession of their faith, with a number of their books, before the parliament and prayed for toleration. In 1580, the queen and her council undertook to suppress them. They continued in England till the middle of the following century, when they became absorbed in other sects. Nicolai published a number of tracts and letters in Dutch for the edification of his followers, and to vindicate his principles against gainsayers. In one of his pieces he mystically styles himself: "A man whom God had awaked from the dead, anointed and filled with the Holy Ghost, endowed with God in the Spirit of his love, and elevated with Christ to an inheritance in heavenly blessings, enlightened with the Spirit of heavenly truth, and with the true light of the all-perfect Being," &c. In his preface to one of his tracts he calls himself: "The chosen servant of God, by whom the heavenly revelation should again be made known to the world." His followers in 1575 affirmed that they neither denied that baptism which consists in repentance and newness of life, nor the holy sacrament of baptism which betokens the new birth in Christ, and which is to be administered to children; that they admitted also the perfect

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE SOCINIANS.

1. THE Socinians derived their name from the illustrious house of Sozini, which long flourished at Sienna, a noble city of Tuscany, and gave birth, it is said, to a number of distinguished men. For it was from this family were descended Lælius and Faustus Socinus, who are commonly regarded as the parents of the sect. Lælius Socinus was the son of Marianus, a celebrated lawyer; and to great learning and talents he added, as even his enemies acknowledge, a pure and blameless life. Leaving his native country from religious considerations in 1547, he travelled over various countries, France, England, Holland, Germany, and Poland; everywhere examining carefully the opinions of those who had abandoned the Romish church concerning God and divine things, for the sake of discovering and finding the truth. At length he settled down at Zurich in Switzerland, and there died in the year 1562, when he was not yet forty years old.¹ Being a man of a mild and gentle spirit and averse from all contention, he adopted the Helvetic Confession and wished to be thought a member of the Swiss church; yet he did not absolutely conceal his doubts on religious subjects, but proposed them in his letters to learned friends with whom he was intimate.² But Faustus Socinus, his nephew and heir, is said to have drawn from the writings left by Lælius his real sentiments concerning religion, and by publishing them to have gathered the sect.

2. The name Socinians is often used in two different senses—a proper and an improper, or a limited and a more general. For in common speech all are denominated Socinians who teach doctrines akin to those of the Socinians; and especially those who either wholly deny or weaken and render dubious the Christian doctrine of three persons in the Godhead, and that of the divine nature of our Saviour. But in a more limited sense those only are called Socinians who receive, either entire or in its principal parts, that system of religion which Faustus Socinus either produced himself, or set forth when produced by his uncle and recommended to the Unitarian brethren (as they choose to be called) living in Poland and Transylvania.³

3. While the Reformation was still immature, certain persons who looked upon everything the Romish church had hitherto professed as erroneous, began to undermine the doctrine of our Saviour's divinity and the truths connected with it, and proposed reducing the whole of religion to practical piety and virtue. But the vigilance both of the Lutherans and of the Reformed and Papists promptly resisted them, and prevented their organizing a sect. As early as the year 1526 divine honours were denied to Jesus Christ by Lewis Hätzer, a name famous among the vagrant Anabaptists, and who was beheaded at Constance in 1529.⁴ Nor were there wanting other men of like sentiments among the Anabaptists, though

¹ There is still wanting a full and accurate history both of the sect which follows the Socini, and also of Lælius and Faustus Socinus, and of those next to them most active in establishing and building up this community. For the curiosity of those who wish to acquire an accurate knowledge of this whole subject is awakened but not satisfied by what they find in Hornbeck's Socinianismus Confutatus, vol. i.; Calovius, Opera Anti-Sociniana; Cloppenburg's Diss. de Origine et Progressu Socinianismi (Opp. tom. ii. Lugd. Bat. 1708, 4to); Sandius, Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitarianum; Lubieniec's Historia Reformationis Polonica; Lauterbach's Polnisch-Arianischen Socinianismus, Frankf. 1725, 8vo. And the Histoire de Socinianisme, by Lamy, Paris, 1723, 4to, is a compilation from the common writers, and abounds not only with errors but with various matter quite foreign from a history of the Socinian sect and religion. The very industrious and learned Maturin Viess la Croze promised the world a complete history of Socinianism down to our times—see his Dissert. Historiques, tome i. p. 142—but he did not fulfil his promise. [Besides the above, there are Zeltner's Historia Crypto-Socinianismi Altorfui quondam Academic infesti Arcana, Lips. 1729, 4to; Toulmin's Memoirs of the Life, Character, Sentiments and Writings of Faustus Socinus, Lond. 1777, 8vo; Bock's Historia Antitrinitarianum, nuncupate Socinianismi et Socinianorum, quorum Auctores Promotores, Cæsus, Tempora recensentur, Königsb. 1774-81, 2 vols. 8vo. The first vol. gives account of modern Socinian authors, and the second traces the origin of Anti-Trinitarianism. The whole therefore is only a broad introduction to a proper History of the Socinian community. And Hegu, Vita Lælii Socini, Lips. 1814, 8vo.—Mur.] [Another valuable work on this subject has recently appeared in Germany, which supplies much additional information respecting the lives of two of the founders of this sect, namely, Servetus and the elder Socinus. I allude to Trechsel's Die Protestantischen Antitrinitarier vor Faustus Socin. Heidel. 1839-44; 2 vols. 8vo. It is entitled, Michael Servet u. seine Vorgänger, and the second, Lælio Socini u. d. Antitrinitarier seiner Zeit. It also a brief notice of Lælius Socinus in McCrele's Hist. of the Reformation in Italy, 2d edit. p. 424, &c.—R.

² Sand's Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitarior. p. 16; Ottius, Annales Anabaptist. p. 50; Bretinger's Museum Helveticum, tom. v. p. 391, tom. vi. p. 100, 479, &c. [See above, p. 687, note 1.—Mur.

satisfaction made by Christ for the sins of men. They appeared always cheerful and in a happy state of mind, which offended the more gloomy Mystics and produced heavy charges against them. Yet nothing appeared in their mora. conduct to justify those criminalations. Arnold, Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xvi. chap. xxi. sec. xxxvi. p. 873, ed. Schaffhausen; and Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. v. p. 478, &c.—Mur.

¹ Cloppenburg, Diss. de Origine et Progressu Socinianismi; Hornbeck, Summa Contracessionarum, p. 563, &c.; Hottinger, Historia Ecclesiast. tom. ix. p. 417, &c. and others.

² Zanchius, Præfatio ad Librum de tribus Elohim; Beza, Epistole, ep. lxxxi. p. 167. Several writings are ascribed to him (see Sand's Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitar. p. 18); but it is very doubtful whether he was the author of any of them.

that whole sect cannot be charged with this error. Besides these, John Campanus of Juliers, in what year is not ascertained, among other unsound doctrines which he spread at Wittemberg and elsewhere, made the Son of God to be inferior to the Father; and declared the appellation Holy Spirit to denote not a divine person but the nature both of the Father and the Son; that is, he revived substantially the monstrous errors of the Arians.¹ In the territory of the Grisons in Switzerland, at Strasburg, and perhaps elsewhere, one Claudius, an Allobrogian or Savoyard, excited much commotion about the year 1530 and onward, by impugning the divinity of our Saviour.² But none of these was able to establish a sect.

4. Those who watched over the interests of the Reformed church were much more alarmed by the conduct of Michael Servetus³ or Servetus, as his name is written in Latin,

¹ See Schellhorn's very learned Dissertation De Joh. Campano Anti-Trinitario, in his Amenitates Literar. tom. xl. p. 1—92. [He was a native of Maseyk in the territory of Liege, and came to Wittemberg in 1528; but so concealed his opinions that they first became known after he had retired to Marburg, where he wished to take part in the public dispute and to debate with Luther on the subject of the Lord's Supper, but was refused. He repeated the same at Torgau, where he likewise sought in vain to dispute with Luther. This filled him with resentment against Luther and his associates, and induced him to quit Wittemberg (to which he had returned) and go to Niemek, the pastor of which, Wicelius, fell under suspicion of Anti-Trinitarianism in consequence of his harbouring Campanus, and soon after went over to the Catholics. Campanus went from Saxony to the duchy of Juliers; and both orally and in writing declared himself opposed to the Reformers, and sought in an underhand manner to disseminate his Arian doctrines. But he was committed to prison by the Catholics at Cleves, and continued in confinement twenty-six years. Whether he made his escape from prison or was set at liberty is not known. All we know is that he lived to a great age. The substance of his doctrine may be learned from the very scarce book entitled, The Divine and Holy Scripture, many years since Obscured and Darkened by Unwholesome Doctrine and Teachers (by God's permission), now Restored and Amended, by the very learned John Campanus, 1532, 8vo (in German).—Schl. (Respecting Hetzer and Campanus, with their other associates, Denk. Hoffmann, Joris, &c. additional information may be obtained in Trechsel's Michael Servet u. seine Vorgänger, p. 18, &c. 26, &c.—R.]

² See Schellhorn's Dissertation, De Mino Celso Senensi, Claudio item Allobroge, homine Fanatica et S.S. Trinitatis hoste, Ulm, 1748, 8vo; Breitingher's Museon Helveticum, tom. vii. p. 667; Haller's letter in Fuslin's Centuria. Epistolar. Reform. &c. p. 140, &c. [He first held Christ to be a mere man; but the Swiss divines brought him to admit that he was the natural Son of God, though he would not allow his eternal existence, and he positively denied three persons in the Godhead. He also maintained that the beginning of John's Gospel had been falsified. He was imprisoned at Strasburg and then banished. Schroeckh, Kirchen-gesch. seit der Reformation, vol. v. p. 491.—Mur.]

³ By rejecting the last syllable of the name, which is a common Spanish termination, there remains the name Serve; and the letters of this name, a little transposed, produce Reeves, which is the name Servetus assumed in the titles of his books. Omitting also his family name altogether, he called himself from his birthplace, Michael Villanovanus, or simply Villanovanus.

a Spanish physician, born at Villa Nueva in Aragon, a man of no ordinary genius and of extensive knowledge. He first published in 1531, De Trinitatis Erroribus, libri Septem, and the next year Dialogorum de Trinitate, libri duo, in which he most violently assailed the opinion held by the great body of Christians respecting the divine nature and the three persons in it. After retiring to France and passing through various scenes, he subsequently fixed his residence at Vienne, where he was a successful practitioner of physic; and now, by his strong power of imagination, he devised a new and singular species of religion, which he committed to a book that he secretly printed at Vienne in 1553, and which he entitled Christianismi Restitutio (a Restoration of Christianity).⁴ Many things seemed to conspire to favour his designs; genius, learning, eloquence, courage, pertinacity, a show of piety, and lastly numerous patrons and friends in France, Germany, and Italy, whom he had conciliated by his natural and acquired endowments. But all his hopes were frustrated by Calvin, who caused Servetus to be seized in 1553 at Geneva, as he was passing through Switzerland towards Italy after his escape from prison at Vienne, and to be accused of blasphemy by one of Calvin's servants. The issue of the accusation was that Servetus, as he would not renounce the opinions he had embraced, was burned alive by a decree of the judges as being a pertinacious heretic and blasphemer. For in that age, the ancient laws against heretics enacted by the emperor Frederick II. and often renewed afterwards, were in full force at Geneva. A better fate was merited by this highly gifted and very learned man; yet he laboured under no small moral defects, for he was beyond all measure arrogant, and at the same time ill-tempered, contentious, unyielding, and a semi-fanatic.⁵

⁴ The full title of this now exceedingly rare work is, *Christianismi Restitutio. Totius ecclesie Apostolicae est ad sua lumina vocatio, in integram restituta cognitioque Dei, fidei Christi, justificationis nostrae, regenerationis baptismi, et carae Domini manducationis. Restitutio denique nobis regno caelesti, Babylonis impiae captivitate soluta, et anti-Christo cum suis praeiis destructo, copied from an accurate reprint now before me, which is also scarce. It is anonymous, but on the last page (p. 734) there are the initials, M. S. V. (Michael Servetus Villanovanus) and the year, 1553. An analysis of the contents of this celebrated work may be seen in the notes to the article on Servetus, in Chaussepied, Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. et Crit. tome iv. See also the Appendix to Henry's Das Leben Calvins, vol. iii. p. 81, &c.—R.]*

⁵ I have composed in the German language a copious history of this man who was so unlike everybody but himself, which was published at Helmstadt, 1748, 4to, and again, with large additions, Helmst., 1749, 4to. [Maclean recommends to those who cannot read the German to peruse a juvenile production of one of Mosheim's pupils composed twenty years earlier, entitled, Historia Mich. Serveti, quum Praeside J. Laur.

5. Servetus had devised a strange system of religion, a great part of which was intimately connected with his notions of the nature of things, which were also strange, nor can it be stated fully in a few words. He supposed in general that the true doc-

Mosheim, &c. exposit Henricus ab Allicariden, Helmstadt, 1727, 4to. But Mosheim, in his history of Servetus, pronounces this an incorrect performance and not to be relied on. Von Einem here introduces in a long note of twenty-three pages an epitome of Mosheim's history of Servetus. The account which Schroeckh gives of Servetus (Kirchengesch. seit der Reformat. vol. v. p. 519, &c.) accords in general with that of Mosheim as abridged by Von Einem. From both these sources the following sketch is made:—

He was born at Villa Nueva, in Aragon, A.D. 1509. His father was a lawyer, and sent him to Toulouse to study law. But he preferred literature and theology, Hebrew, Greek, the fathers, the Bible, and the writings of the Reformers, seemed to have engaged his chief attention. On his return to Spain he connected himself with Jo. Quintana, confessor to the emperor Charles V. and accompanied him to Italy, where he witnessed the emperor's coronation at Bologna, A.D. 1529. The year following he accompanied Quintana into Germany, and perhaps was at Augsburg when the Protestants presented their Confession of Faith; and he might there first become acquainted with Bucer and Capito. When and where he separated from Quintana does not appear. But in the year 1530 he went to Basil to confer with Œcolampadius. He had then struck out a new path in theology. He rejected the doctrine of three divine persons, denied the eternal generation of the Son, and admitted no eternity of the Son except in the purpose of God. Œcolampadius attempted in vain to bring him to other views; and he laid his case before Zwingli, Bucer, Capito, and Bullinger, who all considered him a gross heretic. He left Basil, determined to publish his projected work [De Trinitatis Erroribus]. It was printed at Haguenau in 1531, and was at once everywhere condemned. Quintana laid it before the emperor, who ordered it to be suppressed. Servetus was assailed by his best friends wherever he went, and was pressed to abandon his errors. He therefore wrote his Dialogues, which he printed in 1532. He there condemned his former book as a juvenile and ill-reasoned performance, yet brought forward substantially the same doctrines, and urged them with all his powers of logic and satire. In 1533, he went to Italy and travelled in France. He studied a while at Paris, then went to Orleans, and thence to Lyons, where he resided two years as a superintendent of the press, held a correspondence with Calvin, and began to write his great theological work. In 1537, he went again to Paris, became a master of arts, and lectured on mathematics and astronomy. He also devoted a year to the study of physic, and now commenced medical writer and physician, yet continued to labour on his Restoration of Christianity. But he soon got into collision with the medical fraternity and had to leave Paris. In 1538, he went to Lyons, thence to Avignon, and thence to Charleux, where he resided as a physician till 1540. He next went again to Lyons, and soon after to Vienne, where he resided twelve years as a physician under the patronage of the archbishop and the clergy, to whom he rendered himself quite acceptable. During this time, though still labouring secretly upon his Restoration of Christianity, he professed to be a sound Catholic and passed currently for one. He also re-edited Ptolemy's geography with corrections and notes, and published notes on Pagnini's Latin Bible, the chief object of which was to show that all the Old Testament prophecies which were commonly applied to Christ, had a previous and literal fulfilment in events prior to his advent, and only an allegorical application to him. At length he determined to print his favourite work on theology. It was worked off in a retired house in Vienne by his friends, and he himself corrected the press. It was finished in January, 1553, and bore on its titlepage [on the last page] only the initials of his name, M. S. V. (Michael Servetus Villanovanus.) Parcels of the book were sent to Lyons, to Frankfort, and elsewhere. A few copies reached Geneva, and Calvin was one of the first who read it. Near the end of February one Trie, a young French Protestant residing at Geneva, wrote to his Catholic friend at Lyons who had laboured hard to convert him to popery, taxing the Catholics of Lyons with harbouring Servetus, the impious author of this new book which excited such universal abhorrence. This letter first awakened suspicion at Vienne that Servetus was the author of it. A process before the Inquisition was commenced against him, but the proof was deemed insufficient. The court, however, prosecuted the matter with zeal, and obtained more and more evidence against him. Servetus at length, foreseeing the probable result, took to flight. The court still proceeded till they deemed the evidence sufficient, and then condemned him in his absence. Servetus fled to Geneva and there lay concealed four weeks, waiting for an opportunity to proceed to Italy and Naples. Just as he was getting into a boat to depart he was discovered by Calvin himself, who gave notice immediately to the government and they apprehended him. Nicholas de la Fontaine, Calvin's secretary, took the part of an accuser, and Calvin himself is supposed to have framed the thirty-eight articles of charge. They were taken from his writings, especially from his last work, and related to his views of the Trinity and infant baptism, his taxing Moses with falsely representing the land of Canaan as very fertile, his perverting the prophecies concerning Christ, and several other points of less importance. In the first hearing Servetus acknowledged himself the author of the books whence the charges were drawn, but either explained away or justified the articles alleged, and La Fontaine was unable to meet his arguments. In the second hearing Calvin was present, and he exposed the evasive pleas of the criminal. In the mean time the council of Geneva wrote to the authorities of Vienne informing them of the arrest of Servetus, and inquiring respecting the proceeding against him at Vienne. The governor of the castle of Vienne came to Geneva, exhibited a copy of the sentence passed upon Servetus, and requested that the prisoner might be delivered up to him to be conveyed to Vienne. Servetus was called before the court, and with tears entreated that he might not be delivered up, but that he might be tried at Geneva. To gratify his wishes, the court of Geneva refused to give him up, and proceeded in his trial. He denied the competence of a civil court to try a case of heresy, but his objection was overruled. He also appealed to the council of 200, but the appeal was not admitted. He attempted to accuse Calvin of heresy, but the court would not listen to his accusations. He objected that Calvin reigned at Geneva, and begged to have his case tried by the other cantons. Accordingly the court ordered that Calvin should extract objectionable passages from Servetus' books, in his own words; that Servetus should signify such explanations and arguments as he saw fit, then Calvin to reply, and Servetus to answer, and the whole be transmitted to Berne, Basil, Zurich, and Schaffhausen, for the opinion of those cantons. This was accordingly done. The reply from all the cantons was, that the Genevans were in duty bound to restrain the madness and wickedness of Servetus, and to prevent him from propagating his errors in future. But the manner in which this object should be accomplished was left to the discretion of the court of Geneva. The authorities of Basil, however, intimated that a perpetual imprisonment might be sufficient. The court of Geneva now unanimously condemned Servetus to be burned alive the day following. Calvin and the other ministers of Geneva interceded for a milder death, but the court would not yield. Servetus was immediately informed of his sentence, and was greatly overcome. The next day, Oct. 27, 1553, he appeared more composed. Parcell attended him as clergyman and urged him to retract, which he pertinaciously refused. He was conducted to the presence of the court, where his sentence was pronounced in form. He begged for a commutation of the mode of death, and Parcell also urged the same; but the court would not listen. He was conducted slowly to the place of execution, permitted and even urged to address the people, which he refused. At length he was fastened by a chain to a stake, seated on a block, and surrounded by combustibles. The fire was kindled, and he expired at the end of half an hour. To the last, he maintained the correctness of the opinions for which he suffered, and cried repeatedly, "Jesus, thou Son of trine of Jesus Christ was lost, even before the council of Nice, and indeed that it was never taught with sufficient clearness and the eternal God, have mercy on me." At this day, all agree that Servetus ought not to have been put to death, but in that age different sentiments prevailed. The burning of heretics was then almost universally approved and practised. There were some, however, especially among the French and Italian Protestants, whose exposure to be themselves put to death by the papists on this principle, led them to question the correctness of the principle. Calvin therefore, who certainly had some hand in the death of Servetus, was censured by a few Protestants; while the great body of them, and even the mild Melancthon, fully approved of his conduct. Some of the moderns have unjustly charged Calvin with being actuated solely by personal enmity against Servetus, and by the natural severity of his disposition. On the other hand, some have attempted entirely to exculpate him, and to attribute his conduct to the purest motives. He doubtless thought he was doing right, and had the approbation of his own conscience; as he certainly had of the wisest and best men of that age, who as occasion was presented pursued the same course themselves. But had he lived in our age, he would undoubtedly have thought and acted differently. See Beza's Life of Calvin, by Sibson, ed. Philadelphia, 1836, note c. p. 156-204.—Mur. [The great notoriety of this tragical event and the polemical purposes which it has been made to serve, render it expedient to furnish the student with references to the best sources of information respecting its details. Among these, every candid inquirer will at once ask for the original record of the trial, as absolutely necessary to enable him to form an upright judgment on the several questions which have been so keenly agitated respecting the opinions of Servetus, the character of Calvin, and the conduct and jurisdiction of the Genevan magistrates. Yet, strange to say, after a protracted controversy of nearly three hundred years, this indispensable document has not yet been given to the public entire. In the beginning of the last century (1717) M. de la Roche, in his Memoirs of Literature, vol. i. folio, p. 349, 357, and 373, and vol. ii. 4to, p. 25, 57, 73, and 81, published a short history of Servetus, in seven letters; in compiling which, he appears to have had access to the original documents in the archives of Geneva, several valuable extracts from which he gives at length. About the middle of the century, Mosheim made use of extracts by a different hand taken from the same source, in drawing up the biography of Servetus, which he published in his Andersweitiger Versuch einer vollständigen u. unparteiischen Ketzergeschichte, Helm. 1748; and completed in his Neue Nachrichten von dem berühmten Spanischen Arzte, Mich. Servet, 1750. Subsequent inquirers however failed to discover among the Genevan archives, the original records of the trial which had supplied these two sets of extracts; and they were consequently believed to be lost. Under that impression Trechsel, when preparing the work on Servetus referred to in a preceding note, had to content himself with making use of a pretty full manuscript copy of the trial made in the last century, which he found among the records of the church of Berne, and which is now found to be a sufficiently accurate transcript. In the appendix to his work, Trechsel has printed in full this important document, omitting however the papers which had been previously published by M. de la Roche. It is entitled Procédure contre Servet, and extends to thirty-six closely printed octavo pages. It is the first and as yet only attempt towards placing before the public the whole transaction and the conduct of the several parties concerned in it, in an authentic form; though being only a copy and that too a comparatively modern one, it cannot be fully relied on. At length, however, in the year 1842, the original records of the whole affair were found in Geneva, and have been freely used by M. de la Valayre, in the account of Servetus published in his Légendes Suisses, Paris, 1842; and by M. Albert Rilliet in his Relation du Procès criminel intenté à Genève en 1553 contre Michel Servet, rédigée d'après les Documents originaux, Gen. 1844. It is much to be regretted that M. Rilliet had not, in an Appendix to his excellent little work, given a complete copy of perspicuity; and that the restitution and explanation of it were divinely committed to him. As respects God and the divine Trinity, he believed in general that the supreme Being before the foundation of the world produced in himself and formed two personal representations, economies, dispositions, dispensations, or modes of existence (for he did not always use the same terms), namely, the Word and the Holy Spirit, by which he might both make known his will to mankind and impart to them his blessings: That the Word was joined to the man Christ, who was by the efficient volition of God born of the Virgin Mary, and that on this account Christ might justly be called God: That the Holy Spirit animates the created universe, and in particular produces holy and divine emotions and purposes in men: That after the destruction of this world, both these economies will cease to be, and will be reabsorbed in God. Yet this doctrine he did not always state in the same manner, and he often uses loose and ambiguous terms, so that it is exceedingly difficult to ascertain his real meaning. His moral principles agreed in many respects with the opinions of the Anabaptists, with whom also he agreed in this, that he most severely condemned the baptism of infants.

6. This projected restoration of the church, of which Servetus hoped to be himself the author, died with him. For notwithstanding public fame ascribed to him many disciples, and not a few divines of that age professed to have great apprehensions from the sect of Servetus, yet it may be justly doubted whether he left behind him one genuine disciple. Those who are called Servetians, and followers of the doctrine of Servetus, by the writers of that age, differed widely from Servetus in many respects; and in particular, they entertained very different opinions respecting the doctrine of the divine Trinity. Valentine Gentilis of Naples, whom the government of Berne put to death in 1566, did not hold the opinions of Servetus as many writers all the original documents preserved in the Genevan archives, for every one who wishes to judge for himself must still have recourse to Trechsel's second-hand transcript. The original documents relative to Servetus's arrest, trial, and condemnation at Vienne in 1553, were published for the first time from the archives in that city, by the Abbé D'Artigny, in the Nouveaux Mémoires d'Histoire, &c. Paris, 1749, vol. ii. sec. 55. I may merely add that the English reader, in addition to the ordinary lives of Calvin and the letters on Servetus in the Memoirs of Literature already mentioned, may consult The Life of Servetus, translated from the French [of Chaffepie's Nouveaux Dictionnaire, &c.] by James Yalr, minister of the Scots' Church in Camperdown, Lond. 1771, 8vo, and the Rev. Mr. Tweedie's translation of Rilliet's work, entitled Calvin and Servetus, Edin. 1846, 12mo.—R.

affirm, but held Arian sentiments, and made the Son and the Holy Spirit to be inferior to the Father.¹ Not much different were the views of Matthew Gribaldus, a jurist of Pavia, who was removed by a timely death at Geneva in 1566, when about to undergo a capital trial; for he distributed the divine nature into three Eternal Spirits, differing in rank as well as numerically.² It is not equally certain what was the criminal error of John Paul Alciati, a Piedmontese, and of Sylvester Tellius, who were banished from Geneva in 1559, or what was the error of Paruta, Leonardi,³ and others, who are sometimes numbered among the followers of Servetus; yet it is not at all probable that any one of these regarded Servetus as his master. Peter Gonesius, who is said to have introduced the errors of Servetus into Poland,⁴ although he may have taught some things akin to them, yet explained the most sacred mystery of the divine Trinity in a very different manner from Servetus.

7. No one of those who have been named professed that form of religion which is properly called Socinian. The Socinian writers generally trace the origin of their sect to Italy, and refer it to the year 1546. In this year and in the vicinity of Venice, especially at Vicenza, they tell us that more than forty men, eminent no less for genius and erudition than for their love of truth, often assembled together in secret; and they not only consulted on a general reformation in religion, but undertook more especially to refute the doctrines which were afterwards publicly rejected by the Socinian sect. They add that Ladius Socinus, Alciati, Oelhino, Paruta, Gentilis, and others, stood conspicuous among these persons. But by the imprudence of one of the associates the temerity of these men became known; two of them were seized and put to death, the others escaped and fled into Switzerland, Germany, Moravia, and other countries. Among these exiles was Socinus, who after various wanderings passed into Poland in 1551 and again in 1558, and there disseminated the seeds of that scheme of doctrine which he and his associates had devised in their own country, and which subsequently produced abundant fruits.⁵ That this repre-

¹ Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Gentilis, tom. ii. p. 1251; Spon's Histoire de Genève, livr. iii. tome ii. p. 80, &c.; Sand's Bibliotheca Anti-Trinitar. p. 26; Lamy's Histoire du Socinianisme, par. ii. chap. vi. p. 251; Fueslin's Reytrüge zu d. Schriftz. 1617, fol. v. p. 381. [Gentilis fled from his country from religious motives about the middle of the century, and settled at Geneva in connexion with the Italian church there. Here with others he uttered anti-trinitarian sentiments, for which he was arraigned in 1558, subscribed to an orthodox confession of faith, and promised under oath not to leave the city without permission. He however fled clandestinely, and travelled in France, Switzerland, Germany, and Poland, propagating Arian sentiments. He was imprisoned at Lyons and at Berne, and was expelled from Poland. In 1566 he came to Berne a second time, was apprehended and condemned to death for having obstinately and contrary to his oath assailed the doctrine of the Trinity. See Bayle, ubi supra. Aretius a Reformed divine, wrote Historia Val. Gentilis justo Capitis supplicio Bernæ affecti, 1617, fol.—Mur. [A full account of Gentilis has been lately given by Trechsel, in his Lebio Suzini und die Anti-trinitarier seiner Zeit, p. 316. The English translation of Aretius' work bears the following title: History of Valentinus Gentilis, the Trinitheist, tried, condemned, and put to death by the Protestant Reformed City and Church of Bern for Asserting the Three Divine Persons of the Trinity to be Three Distinct Eternal Spirits, Lond. 1696, 8vo.—R.

² Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 17; Lamy, ubi supra, par. ii. chap. vi. p. 257, &c.; Spon's Histoire de Genève, tome ii. p. 85, note; Haller, in the Museum Tigurinum, tom. ii. p. 114. [See also Trechsel, ubi supra, p. 277, &c.—R.

³ Of these, and other persons of this class, see Sand, Lamy, and Labueneceus, Historia Reformat. Polonica, lib. ii. cap. v. p. 96. Concerning Alciati in particular, see Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 229; also, Spon, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 85, 86. [This Alciati was a Milanese gentleman, and one of those Italians who fled from their country to join the Protestants, and who afterwards so relied upon the mystery of the Trinity as to form a new party, equally odious to Protestants and to Catholics. Alciati had been a soldier, and he commenced his innovations at Geneva, in concert with a physician named Blandrata and a lawyer named Gribaud (in Latin Gribaldus), with whom became associated Valentinus Gentilis. The precautions taken against them, and the severe procedure against Gentilis, intimidated the others and induced them to seek another residence. They chose Poland, where Blandrata and Alciati disseminated their heresy with sufficient success. They allured Gentilis to come and join them. He was under obligation to Alciati, at whose entreaty the bailiff of Gex had let him out of prison. It is said that from Poland they went to Moravia. Gentilis was beheaded at Berne, Alciati retired to Dantzic, and there died in the sentiments of Socinus. He wrote two letters to Gregory Paul in 1564 and 1565, in which he maintains that Christ had no existence till he was born of Mary. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Mur. [See also respecting Alciati, Trechsel, ubi supra, p. 310.—R.

⁴ This is affirmed by many who here follow Wisso-watus and Labueneceus, Historia Reformat. Polonica, cap. vi. p. 111, &c.; but how truly it is affirmed may be learned from Labueneceus himself, who says of Gonesius: "He brought into his country the doctrine of Servetus concerning the pre-eminence of the Father, which he did not dissemble." But if Gonesius taught the pre-eminence of the Father, he differed much from Servetus, who denied all real distinctions in the divine nature. As to the opinions of Gonesius, see Sand, ubi supra, p. 40, from whom chiefly Lamy borrows his account, Histoire du Socinianisme, tome ii. chap. x. p. 278. [This Gonesius was of Podlachia, and studied in Saxony and Switzerland, where he got hold of the writings of Servetus. On his return home, he became intimate with some Anabaptists in Moravia, and in the year 1556 he controverted the doctrine of the Trinity, first in a synod of the Polish Reformed, in which he pronounced it a fiction gendered in the human brain. Two years afterwards, he also rejected infant baptism. He likewise spoke contemptuously of civil authorities. See Lauterbach's Polnisch. Arminischen Socinianismus.—Schl. [See additional notices of Gonesius in Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, vol. i. p. 346, &c. His Polish name was Goniolondzi, or of Goniolondz, a little town of Polachia, of which he was probably a native. Chapter viii. of the first volume and chap. xiv. of the second volume of the first treat of the rise and progress of the Anti-Trinitarian sect in Poland, which afterwards, down to the middle of the 17th century, became their principal seat.—R.

⁵ See Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 18, who likewise mentions (p. 25), some writings which are said—but on altogether questionable authority—to sentation is wholly a fiction cannot be maintained; yet it is easily shown that the system of religion which bears the name of Socinus was by no means fabricated in those meetings at Venice and Vicenza.¹

8. We can give a more certain account of the origin and progress of Socinian principles in religion. As not only the papists but also the Lutherans and the Swiss, were everywhere watchful to prevent both Anabaptists and the opposers of the glory of Jesus Christ and the triune God, from gain-have been published by those Venetian inventors of the Socinian system. Wissowatius, Narratio, quomodo in Polonia Reformatio Unitaria separati sunt, subjoined to Sand, p. 209, 210; Lubieniecius, Historia Reformatiois Polonica, lib. ii. cap. i. p. 38, who says he derived this account from the Commentaries of Budzinius, never published, and from the life of Lælius Socinus. See also Przypocovius, Vita Socini, and others.

¹ The late Zeltner, in his Historia Crypto-Socinianismi Altorfii, cap. ii. sec. xli. note, p. 321, wished to have the truth of this story more accurately examined by the learned. Till this is done, we will here offer a few remarks which will perhaps throw some light on the subject. In the thing itself, in my judgment, there is nothing incredible. It appears from many documents that after the Reformation commenced in Germany, many persons in various countries subject to the Romish see consulted together respecting the abolition of superstition; and it is the more probable that this was done by some learned men in the Venetian territory, as it is well known that in that age there were living among the Venetians a considerable number of men who wished well, if not to Luther himself, yet to his design of reforming religion and restoring it to its native simplicity. It is likewise easy to believe that these consultations were interrupted by the vigilance of the satellites of Rome, and that some of those concerned in them were arrested and put to death, and that others saved themselves by flight. But it is very doubtful, nay incredible, that all those persons were at these consultations, who are reported to have borne a part in them. Indeed I am of opinion that many of those who afterwards obtained celebrity by opposing the Christian doctrine of a Trinity in the Godhead, are rashly placed by incompetent judges in the list of members of such a Venetian association, because they have supposed that this was the parent and the cradle of the whole Unitarian sect. This at least I certainly know, that Ochino must be excluded from it. For, not to mention that it is uncertain whether he has been justly or unjustly ranked among Socinians, it is clear from Boverius, Annales Capucinorum, and from other unquestionable testimonies, that he left Italy and removed to Geneva as early as the year 1543. See La Guerre Séraphique ou l'Histoire des Périls, qu'a courus la Parole des Capucins, livr. iii. p. 191, 216, &c. Respecting Lælius Socinus himself, who is represented as at the head of the association in question, I would confidently assert the same as of Ochino [namely, that he is unjustly placed among the members of this association.] For who can believe that a young man only twenty-one years old (for such was Lælius at that time), left his native country and repaired to Venice or Vicenza, to have a free discussion with others relative to the general interests of religion; and that this youth had such influence as to obtain the first rank in a numerous body of men distinguished for talent and learning? Besides, from the life of Lælius and from other testimonies, it can be proved that he retired from Italy, not to escape impending danger to his life, but for the sake of improvement and to acquire a knowledge of the truth among foreign nations. He certainly returned afterwards to his own country, and in 1551 resided some time at Sienna, while his father resided at Bologna. See his letter to Bullinger, in the Museum Helveticum, tom. v. p. 429, &c. Who can suppose the man would have undertaken such a journey, if but a few years previously he had with difficulty escaped from the hands of the inquisitors and a capital punishment?

ing anywhere a permanent habitation, a large number of this sort of people retired to Poland, supposing that a nation so strongly attached to liberty in general would not disapprove of liberty of opinion in religious matters. Here they at first cautiously disclosed their views, being timid and doubtful what would be the issue. Hence for a number of years they lived intermixed with the Lutherans and Calvinists, who had acquired a firm establishment in Poland; nor were they excluded either from their communion in worship or from their deliberative bodies. But after acquiring the friendship of some of the noble and opulent, they ventured to act more courageously and to attack openly the common views of Christians. Hence originated, first, violent contests with the Swiss [or Reformed], with whom they were principally connected; the issue of which at last was, that in the Synod of Petrikow, A.D. 1565, they were required to secede and to form themselves into a separate community.² These founders of

But supposing all the rest to be true which the Socinians tell us respecting the members and the character of this Venetian association, which had for its object the disrobing our Saviour of his divine majesty, yet this we can never concede to them, that the Socinian system of doctrine was invented and drawn up in that association. It was unquestionably of later origin, and was long under the correcting and improving hand of many ingenious men, before it acquired its complete and permanent form. If any one wishes for proof of this, let him only look at the doctrines and reasonings of some of those who are said to have been members of the association in question, which he will find to have been exceedingly diversified. It appears from many facts reported in various documents concerning Lælius Socinus, that his mind had not yet become established in any definite system of religious doctrine at the time he left Italy; and that he spent many years subsequently to that period in inquiring, doubting, examining, and discussing. And I could almost believe that he finally died still hesitating what to believe on various points. Gribaud and Aleati, of whom notice has already been taken, were inclined to Arian views, and had not so low an opinion of our Saviour as the Socinians had. These examples fully show that these Italian reformers (if they really existed, which I here assume but do not affirm), had come to no fixed conclusions, but were dispersed and compelled to go into exile before they had come to be of one opinion on points of the highest importance in religion. This account of the origin of Socinianism which many inconsiderately adopt, has also been objected to by Fueslin, Beysätze zu d. Schweiz. Ref. vol. iii. p. 327, &c. [See also Trochels's Lehrn Socini u. d. Antitrinitarier seiner Zeit, especially the third section; Boek, in his Hist. Anthin. vol. ii. p. 395, &c. has replied at some length to this note of Mosheim, and laboured to show that there was such a society at Vicenza.—R.]

² Lamy, Histoire du Socinianisme, par. i. chap. vi. vii. viii. &c. p. 16, &c.; Stoienky (Stoienus), Epitome Originis Unitariorum in Polonia, in Sand, p. 183, &c.; Schomann's Testamentum, ibid. p. 194; Wissowatius, De Separatione Unitariorum a Reformatis, ibid. p. 211, 212; Lubieniecius, Historia Reformat. Polonica, lib. ii. cap. vi. &c. p. 111, &c.; cap. viii. p. 144; lib. iii. cap. i. p. 158, &c. [Among the Polish Antitrinitarians must also be reckoned the Frenchman Peter Statorius, who came to Poland in 1559 and was rector of the school at Pinczow. To the same party Gregory Pauli, a Pole, afterwards joined himself. He had taught with great reputation in the Reformed church at Cracow, was deposed on account of his erroneous opinions, and

the Socinian sect were commonly called Pinczovians, from the town [of Pinczow] where the leaders of the sect resided. The greatest part of these however professed Arian sentiments respecting the divine nature, representing the Son and the Holy Spirit to be persons begotten by the one God the Father, and inferior to him.¹

9. As soon as the Unitarians became separated from the other communities of Christians in Poland, they had to contend with many difficulties, both internal and external. Without, they were oppressed both by the papists and by the Reformed and Lutherans; within, there was danger lest the feeble flock should become torn by factions. For they had not yet agreed upon any common formula of faith. Some continued still to adhere to Arian views, and were called Farnovians.² Others chose to go farther, and to ascribe almost nothing to Christ but the prerogatives of an ambassador of God. The worst of these were the Budnecians, who maintained that Christ was born just as all other men are, and therefore was unworthy of any divine worship or adoration.³ Nor were they free from superstitious persons who wished to introduce among them the practical notions of the Anabaptists; namely, a community of goods, a universal equality in rank and power, and other things of the like nature.⁴ From these troubles however they were happily soon relieved by the perseverance and authority of certain teachers, whose plans were so successful that in a short time they reduced those factions to narrow limits, then openly associated himself with the Unitarians. The Stanecian controversy contributed most to the discovery of the error of these people in regard to the Trinity. For many synods and conferences being held on that controversy, the Unitarians exposed themselves in them, and thus awakened the zeal of believers in the Trinity to oppose them in the debates. In the years 1564 and 1566 appeared the first royal edicts against the Unitarians, by which they were banished the realm. Gentils therefore retired to Switzerland, and Aiciati to Prussia. Others found concealed retreats with some of the nobles, till they could openly appear again in public. Under the same protection and patronage, they at length obtained churches, schools, and printing establishments of their own.—Schl.

¹ This will readily appear to one who shall attentively peruse the writers just quoted. It is indeed true that all who then bore the name of Unitarian Brethren, did not hold precisely the same opinion respecting the divine nature. Some of the principal doctors among them were inclined towards those views of Jesus Christ which afterwards were the common views of the Socinian sect; but the greater part of them agreed with the Arians, and affirmed that our Saviour was produced by God the Father before the foundation of the world, but that he was greatly inferior to the Father.

² Concerning these, see below, sec. 24 of this chapter, p. 712.—Mur.

³ Epist. de Vita And. Wisnawiti, subjoined to Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 226, and Sand himself on Simon Budnecus, p. 54.

⁴ Lubieniecius, Historia Reformationis Polonicæ, lib. iii. cap. xii. p. 240.

established flourishing churches at Cracow, Lublin, Pinczow, Lucklavitz, and especially at Smigla, a town which lay in the territories of the famous Andrew Dudycz,⁵ and in many other places, both in Poland and in Lithuania; and moreover, they obtained license to publish books in two different towns.⁶ These privileges were crowned by John Sienienius [Sieniensky], the waiwode of Podolia; who granted them a residence in his new town of Racovia [Racow] in the district of Sendomir, which he built in 1569.⁷ After obtaining this residence, the sect which was dispersed far and wide among their enemies, supposing they had now obtained a fixed and permanent location for their religion, did not hesitate to make this place [Lacow] the established centre of their church and community.

⁵ See Adelt's Historia Arianismi Smiglenis, Dantzig, 1741, 8vo. [This [Dudycz, pronounced—R.] Dudith, who was certainly one of the most learned and eminent men of the sixteenth century, was born at Buda in the year 1533; and after having studied in the most famous universities, and travelled through almost all the countries of Europe, (visiting England in 1551 in the suite of Cardinal Pole), was named to the bishopric of Tula by the emperor Ferdinand, and made privy counsellor to that prince. He had by the force of his genius and the study of the ancient orators, acquired such a mastery and irresistible eloquence, that in all public deliberations he carried everything before him. In the council (of Trent), where he was sent in the name of the emperor and of the Hungarian clergy, he spoke with such energy against several abuses of the church of Rome, and particularly against the celibacy of the clergy, that the pope being informed thereof by his legates, solicited the emperor to recall him. Ferdinand complied; but having heard Dudycz's report of what passed in that famous council, he approved of his conduct, and rewarded him with the bishopric of Chonot. He afterwards married a maid of honour of the queen of Hungary, and resigned his bishopric; the emperor however still continued his friend and protector. The papal excommunication was levelled at his head, but he treated it with contempt. Tired of the fopples and superstitious of the church of Rome, he retired to Cracow, where he embraced the Protestant religion publicly, after having been for a good while its secret friend. It is said that he showed some inclination towards the Socinian system. Some of his friends deny this; others confess it, but maintain that he afterwards changed his sentiments in that respect. He was well acquainted with several branches of philosophy and the mathematics, with the sciences of physic, history, theology, and the civil law. He was such an enthuſiastic admirer of Cicero, that he copied over three times with his own hand the whole works of that immortal author. He had something majestic in his figure, and in the air of his countenance. His life was regular and virtuous, his manners elegant and easy, and his benevolence warm and extensive.—Mur.] See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformat. vol. ii. p. 738, &c. and Rees' Cyclopaedia, article Dudith.—Mur. [See note i, p. 619, above; and also Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, vol. ii. p. 385, &c.—R.]

⁶ Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 201.

⁷ Sand, ubi supra, p. 201; Lubieniecius, ubi supra, p. 239, &c. [Here all the most famous Unitarians were established as teachers; here in 1602 they set up a school which they called Athenæ Sarmaticæ, in which the number of students often exceeded 1000, and which was attended even by Catholics, because the mode of teaching was the same as that of the Jesuits, and no one was solicited to change his religion. Here also they had, next to that at Lublin and the one in Lithuania, their most famous printing establishment, first the Kadeckish and then the Sternackish, till the year 1638, from which so many works of the Unitarians were issued.—Schl.]

10. The first care of the leaders of their church after they saw their affairs in this settled state, was to translate the Holy Scriptures into the Polish language, the publication of which took place in 1572. They previously had a Polish translation of the Bible which they had made in 1565, conjointly with the Reformed to whose church they then belonged. But this version, after they were ordered to separate themselves from the Reformed, they considered not well suited to their condition.¹ In the next place, they drew up and published a small work containing the principal articles of their religious faith. This was in the year 1574, at which time the first Catechism and Confession of the Unitarians was printed at Cracow.² The system of religion contained in this book is extremely simple and free from all subtleties; yet it bears

baptists; nor did they reject this appellation but tacitly admitted it. The remainder of the short preface consists of entreaties to the readers to regard the whole as written in good faith, to read and judge for themselves, and forsaking the doctrine of Babylon and conduct and conversation of Sodom, to take refuge in the ark of Noah, i.e. among the Unitarians. In the commencement of the book, the whole of the Christian religion is reduced to six heads: I. of God and Jesus Christ; II. of justification; III. of discipline; IV. of prayer; V. of baptism; VI. of the Lord's supper. And these six topics are then explained successively, by first giving a long and full answer or exposition of each; and then dividing them into subordinate questions or members, and subjoining answers with scripture proofs annexed. It is manifest even from this performance, that the infancy of the Socinian theology was very feeble and imbecile; that its teachers were not distinguished for a deep and accurate knowledge of divine things, and that they inbred their flocks with only a few and very simple precepts. In their description of God which comes first in order, the authors at once let out their views concerning Jesus Christ; for they inculcate that he, together with all creatures, is subject to God. It is also worthy of notice, that they make no mention of God's infinity, his omniscience, his immensity, his eternity, his omnipotence, his omnipresence, his perfect simplicity, and the other attributes of the Supreme Being which are above human comprehension; but merely exalt God for his wisdom, his immortality, his goodness, and his supreme dominion over all things. It would seem therefore that the leaders of the community, even then, believed that nothing is to be admitted in theology which human reason cannot fully comprehend and understand. Their erroneous views of our Saviour are thus expressed—Our mediator with God is a man, who was anciently promised to the fathers by the prophets, and in these latter days was born of the seed of David, whom God the Father had made Lord and Christ, that is, the most perfect prophet, the most holy priest, and the most invincible king, by whom he created the new world (for those declarations of the sacred volume which represent the whole material universe as created by our Saviour, they maintain as the Socinians do, to be figurative; and understand them to refer to the restoration of mankind, so that they may not be compelled unwillingly to admit his divine power and glory), restored all things, reconciled them to himself, made peace, and bestowed eternal life upon his elect; to the end that, next to the most high God, we should believe in him, adore him, pray to him, imitate him according to our ability, and find rest to our souls in him (a). Although they here call Jesus Christ the most holy priest, which they afterwards confirm with passages of Scripture, yet they nowhere explain the nature of that priesthood which they ascribe to him. The Holy Spirit they most explicitly declare not to be a divine person, and they represent him as a divine power or energy—The Holy Spirit is the power of God, the fulness of which God the Father hath bestowed on his only begotten Son, our Lord; that we being adopted might receive of his fulness (b). Their opinion of justification is thus expressed—Justification is the remission of all our past sins from mere grace, through our Lord Jesus Christ, without our works and merits, in a lively faith; and the unhesitating expectation of eternal life; and a real not a feigned amendment of life, by the aid of the Spirit of God, to the glory of God our Father and the edification of our neighbours. (c)

¹ See Ringeltaube, Von den Polnischen Bibeln, p. 90, 113, 142, who gives farther information respecting Polish translations of the Bible by Socinians.

² This little work, from which alone the character of the Unitarian theology anterior to the times of Faustus Socinus, can be learned with certainty, is not mentioned, so far as I know, by any Unitarian author, nor by any one who has either written their history or opposed their doctrine. I am ready to believe that the Socinians themselves afterwards, when they had acquired more dexterity and power and had shaped their theology more artificially, wisely took care to have the copies of this confession destroyed, lest they should fall under the charge of feckleness and of abandoning the tenets of their predecessors, or incur the charge of forsaking their ancient simplicity, which is apt to produce divisions and parties. It will therefore be doing service to the history of Christian doctrine, to describe here summarily the form and character of this first Socinian creed, which was set forth prior to the Racovian Catechism. This very rare book is a very small one, and bears the following title: Catechesis et Confessio fidei Cæticæ per Poloniam Congregati in Nomine Jesu Christi Domini nostri Crucifixi et Resurrecti. Deuter. vi. Audi Israel, Dominus Deus noster Deus unus est. Johannis viii. deit Jesus: Quem vos deitis vestrum esse Deum, et Patrem meum. Typis Alexandri Turobinii, anno nati Jesu Christi, filii Dei. 1574, pp. 160, 12mo. That it was printed at Cracow appears from the close of the preface, which is dated in this city in the year 1574. Post Jesum Christum natum. The Unitarians then had a printing-office at Cracow, which was soon after removed to Racow. The Alexander Turobinus who is said to be the printer, is called Turobinczyk, by Sand, (Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 51), and undoubtedly derived his name from his native place, Turobin, in the district of Chelm in Red Russia. That the author of the book was the noted George Schomann, has been proved from Schomann's Testamentum published by Sand, and from other Documents, by Müller who gives a particular account of Schomann in his Essay, De Unitariorum Catechesi et Confessione omnium prima, written since my remarks on the subject; and which is printed in Bartholomew's Fortgezezte nützlichen Anmerkungen von allerhand Heterien, vol. xvi. p. 758. The preface composed in the name of the whole association, begins with this salutation: Omnibus salutem æternam sistentibus, gratiam et pacem ab uno illo altissimo Deo patre, per unigenitum ejus filium Dominum nostrum, Jesum Christum crucifixum, ex animo precatur oratus exigit et allietus per Poloniam, in nomine ejusdem Jesu Christi Nazarenæ baptizatus. Their reasons for writing and publishing the book are thus stated: namely, the reproaches which in one place and another are cast upon the Anabaptists. Hence it appears, that the people who were afterwards called Socinians, were in that age denominated Ana-altogether a Socinian aspect in regard to the points most essential to that system. Nor will this surprise us, if we consider that the papers of Lælius Socinus (which he undoubtedly left in Poland), were in the hands of a great many persons; and by these, the Arians who had formerly had the ascendancy, were led to change their opinion respecting Jesus Christ.¹ The name Socinian was not yet known. Those who afterwards bore this name were then usually called by the Poles Anabaptists, because in their churches they admitted none to baptism but adults, and were accustomed to rebaptize those who came over to them from other communities.²

(a) Est homo, mediator noster apud Deum, patribus olim per prophetas promissus et ultimis tandem temporibus ex David semine natus, quem Deus pater legit Dominum et Christum, hoc est, p. rectissimum prophetam, sanctis immo sacerdotem, invictissimum regem, per quem novum mundum creavit, omnia restauravit, æternam reconciliavit, pacemque, et vitam æternam electis suis donavit; ut in illum, post Deum altissimum, credamus, illum adoremus, imitemur, amemus, pro modulo nostro imitemur, et in illo requiem animabus nostris inveniamus.

(b) Spiritus sanctus est virtus Dei, cuius plenitudo dedit Deus pater filio suo unigenito, Domino nostro, ut nos adoptivi ex plenitudine ejus acciperemus.

(c) Justification est ex mera gratia, per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, sine operibus et meritis nostris, omnium præteritorum peccatorum nostrorum in viva fide remissio, vitæ quæ æternæ indubitata expectatio, et auxilium spiritus Dei vitæ nostræ non simulata, sed vera correctio, ad gloriam Dei patris et ædificationem proximorum nostrorum.

11. The affairs of the Unitarians assumed a new aspect under the dexterity and industry of Faustus Socinus, a man of superior genius, of moderate learning, of a firm and resolute spirit, less erudite than his uncle Lælius, but more bold and courageous. When after various wanderings he first arrived among the Polish Unitarians in 1579, he met with much trouble and opposition from very many who accounted some of his opinions wide of the truth. And in reality the religious system of Faustus (which he is said to have derived from the papers left by Lælius), had much less simplicity than that of the Unitarians. Nevertheless by his wealth, his eloquence, his abilities as a writer, the patronage of the great, the elegance of his manners, and other advantages which he possessed, he overcame at length all difficulties, and by seasonably yielding at one time and contesting at another, he brought the whole Unitarian people to surrender to those opinions of his which they had before continued, and to coalesce and become one community.³

As they make justification to consist in a great measure in a reformation of the life, so in the explanation of this general account they introduce a part of their doctrine of morals which is contained in a very few precepts, and those expressed almost wholly in the words of the Scriptures. Their system of morality has these peculiarities, that it forbids taking an oath and the repelling of injuries. They define ecclesiastical discipline thus—It is the frequent reminding individuals of their duty, and the admonition of such as sin against God or their neighbour, first privately, and then also publicly before the whole assembly; and finally, the rejection of the pertinacious from the communion of saints, that so being ashamed they may repent, or if they will not repent may be damned eternally.^(a) Their explanation of this point shows how incomplete and imperfect were their ideas on the subject. For they first treat of the government of the Christian church and of the ministers of religion, whom they divide into bishops, deacons, elders or presbyters, and widows; they next enumerate the duties of husbands and wives, the aged and the young, parents and children, servants and masters, citizens towards magistrates, the rich and the poor; and lastly, they treat of admonishing sinners first, and then depriving them of communion if they will not reform. Respecting prayer, their precepts are in general sound and good. But on the subject of baptism they differ from other Christians in this, that they make it to consist in immersion and emersion, and allow it to be administered only to adults. Baptism, say they, is the immersion in water and the emersion of a person who believes the gospel and exercises repentance, in the name of the Father and Son and Holy Spirit, or in the name of Jesus Christ; whereby he publicly professes that by the grace of God the Father he has been washed in the blood of Christ, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, from all his sins; so that being ingrafted into the body of Christ he may mortify the old Adam and be transformed into the celestial Adam, in the firm assurance of eternal life after the resurrection.^(b) Lastly, concerning the Lord's Supper, they give such a representation as a Zwinglian would readily admit. At the end of the book is added Economia Christiana seu Pastoralis domesticus; that is, brief instructions how the heads of families should preserve and maintain piety and the fear of God in their houses, and containing also forms of prayers to be used morning and evening and at other times. The copy of this Catechism which I now possess was presented by Martin Chemn (whom the Socinians name among the first patrons of their church) to M. Christopher Heiligmeier in the year 1580, as appears from a long inscription at the end of the book. Chemn there promises his friend other writings of the same kind if this should be received cheerfully and kindly, and concludes with these words of St. Paul, "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty."—1 Cor. i. 27.

¹ This we are clearly taught by Schomann in his Testamentum, published by Sand, p. 194, 195. Sub idem tempus (A.D. 1560) ex rhapsodiis Lælii Socini quidam fratres didicerunt, Del filium non esse secundum

Trinitatis personam patri coessentiali et coequali, sed hominem Jesum Christum, ex Spiritu Sancto conceptum, ex virgine Maria natum, crucifixum et resuscitatum; a quibus nos commoniti, sacras literas perscrutari, persuasi sumus. These words most clearly show that the Pinczovians, (as they were called), before they separated from the Reformed in 1565, professed to believe in a Trinity of some sort, and did not divest Jesus Christ of all divinity. For this Schomann was a doctor of great authority among them; and in the year 1565, (as he himself informs us), at the convention of Petrewo, he contended ("pro uno Deo patri") for one God the Father, in opposition to the Reformed, who, he says, ("Deum trinum defendebant"), maintained a threefold God. Yet in the following year, with others he was induced by the papers of Lælius Socinus to so alter his opinions, that he denied Christ to be a divine person. He therefore with his Pinczovian flock before this time, must necessarily have been not a Socinian but an Arian.

² This the Unitarians themselves attest in the preface to their Catechism, as we have observed above; and it is confirmed by the author of the Epistola de vita Andr. Wissowatii, subjoined to Sand's Bibliotheca. For he says, (p. 225), that his sect bore the name of Arians and of Anabaptists; but that the other Christians in Poland were all promiscuously called Chrzescians from Chrzest, which denotes baptism.

³ See Bayle, Diogenes, article Socinus, tome iv. p. 2741; Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 64; Przykowski [in Latin Przykopcius] Vita Socini, prefixed to his works; Lamy, Histoire du Socinisme, par. i. chap. xxiv. p. 101, &c.; par. ii. chap. xxii. p. 375, &c. and many others. [The English reader may consult Toulmin's Memoirs of the Life, Character, &c. of Faustus Socinus, Lond. 1777; but it is a superficial work, and consists of little else than an eulogium on his character and an account of his opinions and writings.—R.]

(a) Disciplina ecclesiastica est officii singulorum frequens communitio, et peccantium contra Deum vel proximum primum privata, deinde etiam publica, coram toto eccle. communitate, denique pertinacium a communione sacrorum alienatio, ut pudore suffusi convertantur, aut si id nolint, aeternum damnetur.

(b) Baptismus est hominis Evangelio credentis, et penitentia agniti, in nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti, vel in nomine Jesu Christi, in aquam immersionis et emersionis, qua publice profitetur, se gratia Dei patris, in sanguine Christi, opera Spiritus Sancti, ab omnibus peccatis ablutum esse, ut in corpus Christi inseruus, mortificet veterem Adamum, et transformetur in Adamum illum celestem, certus, se post resurrectionem consequitur esse vitam æternam.

12. Through his influence therefore the ill-digested, dubious, and unpolished religion of the old Unitarians became greatly altered, was more ingeniously stated, and more artfully and dexterously defended.¹ Under the guidance of so spirited and respectable a leader, the community likewise which before was a little feeble flock, rose in a short time to distinction and honour, by the accession to it of great numbers of all orders and classes, among whom were many persons of illustrious birth, of opulence, influence, eloquence, and learning. Of these, some helped forward the growing church by their wealth and influence, and others by their pens and their genius; and they boldly resisted the enemies, whom the prosperity of the community everywhere called forth. The Unitarian religion, thus new modelled and made almost a new system, required a new confession of faith to set forth its principles. Therefore laying aside the old Catechism, which was but a rude and ill-digested work, Socinus himself drew up a new religious summary, which being corrected by some and enlarged by others, resulted at last in that celebrated work which is usually called the Racovian Catechism, and which is accounted the common creed of the whole sect. The ship seemed now to have reached the port, when James Sieminski, lord of Racow, in the year 1600 renounced the Reformed religion and came over to this sect, and two years afterwards caused a famous school, intended for a seminary of the church, to be established in his own city which he had rendered the metropolis of the Socinian community.²

¹ It is therefore manifest that the modern Unitarians are, with great propriety, called Socinians. For the glory of bringing their sect to establishment and order (if we may use the word glory of what has little glory attached to it), belongs exclusively to the two Socini. Lælius indeed who was naturally timid, died in the bloom of life at Zurich in 1562, a professed member of the Reformed church, for he would not by setting up a new sect subvert his own tranquillity. And there are probable grounds for supposing, that he had not brought to perfection that system of religion which he had projected, and that he died in a state of uncertainty and doubt respecting many points of no small importance. Yet it was he who collected the materials which Faustus afterwards used; he secretly injected scruples into the minds of many, and, by the arguments against the divinity of our Saviour which he committed to paper, he induced the Arians of Poland, even after he was dead, unhesitatingly to unite themselves with those who maintained Christ to be only a man on a level with Adam, that is, one whom God created. What Lælius left unfinished, Faustus beyond controversy completed and put to use. Yet what part he received from his uncle and what he added of his own (for he certainly added not a little), it is very difficult to ascertain; because only a few of the writings of Lælius are extant, and of those of which he is said to be the author, some ought undoubtedly to be attributed to others. This however we know, from the testimony of Faustus himself, that what he taught respecting the person of Jesus Christ was for the most part excoigated by Lælius.

² See Wissowatius, Narratio de Separatione Unitariarum a Reformatis, p. 214; Lubieniec, Historia Reformat. Polonica, lib. iii. cap. xii. p. 240, &c. [The Polish names of these well-known writers are Wyszowsky and Lubieniecki.—R.]

13. In the year 1563, the doctrines of the Socinians were carried from Poland into the neighbouring Transylvania, by means especially of George Blandrata, whose exquisite skill in the medical art induced John Sigismund, at that time prince of Transylvania, to send for him and make him his own physician. For this Blandrata, possessing intelligence and address and especially in court affairs, with the aid of Francis Davides whom he took along with him, did not cease to urge the prince himself as well as most of the leading men, until he had infected the whole province with his sentiments, and had procured for his adherents the liberty of publicly professing and teaching his doctrines. The Bathori [or Battory] indeed, whom the suffrages of the nobles afterwards created dukes of Transylvania, were by no means favourable to Socinian principles; but they were utterly unable to suppress the numerous and powerful sect.³ Nor were the lords of Transylvania who succeeded the Bathori able to affect it. Hence, to the present time, in this one province, the Socinians by virtue of the public laws and of certain compacts enjoy their schools and houses of worship, and keep up their public meetings, though in the midst of continual snares.⁴ About the same time, this sect attempted to occupy a portion of Hungary⁵ and of Austria.⁶ But the united efforts of the papists and the followers of the Reformed religion, rendered those attempts abortive.

rionum a Reformatis, p. 214; Lubieniec, Historia Reformat. Polonica, lib. iii. cap. xii. p. 240, &c. [The Polish names of these well-known writers are Wyszowsky and Lubieniecki.—R.]

³ See Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 28 and 55; Debrezenius, Historia Ecclesie Reformatæ in Hungaria, p. 147, &c.; Schneitzel, De Statu Ecclesie Lutheranæ in Transylvania, p. 55; Lamy, Histoire du Socinianisme, par. i. chap. xiii. &c. p. 46, &c.; Salig's Hist. der Augsburg. Confession, vol. ii. book vi. chap. vii. p. 847, &c. [In the year 1568, the Unitarians held a disputation with the Trinitarians at Weissenburg (in Transylvania), which was continued to the tenth day; and of which Blandrata, there and in the same year, published his Brevi exaratto Disputationis Albani; Casper Helt did the same at Clausenburg. In the name of the Reformed. At the close of the debate, the Unitarians obtained from the nobles who had been on the spot all the privileges enjoyed by the Kvangeliæ. They also got possession of the cathedral church of Clausenburg, filled the offices of instruction in the schools with Unitarians, and controlled all things according to their pleasure. Under Stephen Bathori, Francis Davides went so far as to oppose the offering of prayer to Christ. To confute him, Blandrata called Faustus Socinus from Basil in 1578, and he so persecuted Davides, that the latter was condemned in 1579 to perpetual imprisonment, in which he ended his days.—Schl.]

⁴ Zeltner's Historia Crypto-Socinianismi Altorfni, cap. ii. p. 357, 359. [See also Walch's Neueste Religionsgesch. vol. v. No. 3.—Schl.]

⁵ Debrezenius, Historia Ecclesie Reformatæ in Hungaria, p. 169, &c.

⁶ Spondanus, Continuatio Annalium Baronii, ad ann. 1568, No. 24, p. 704.

14. The Socinians having obtained a stable domicile for their fortunes at Racow, and being sustained by patrons and friends of great authority and talent, began zealously to seek the enlargement of their church and the propagation of their religion through all Europe. Accordingly in the first place, they procured a large number of books to be composed by their brightest men of genius, some explaining and defending their religious principles, and others expounding or rather perverting the sacred Scriptures according to the views of their sect; and these books they printed at Racow and dispersed everywhere.¹ In the next place, near the close of the century, as appears incontrovertibly from many documents, they sent their emissaries into various countries to make proselytes and to establish new congregations. But these envoys, though some of them had the advantages of a noble birth and others possessed extensive learning and acuteness in reasoning, were almost everywhere unsuccessful. A small company of Socinians existed in obscurity at Dantzic for a time, but it seems gradually to have disappeared with this century.² In Holland, first Erasmus Johannes,³ and afterwards Andrew Voidovius and Christopher Ostorodt, great pillars of the sect, laboured not without success to gain disciples and followers. But the vigilance of the theologians and the magistrates prevented their acquiring strength and establishing associations.⁴ Nor did the Socinians find the Britons more accommodating. In Germany, Adam Neuser and some others, at the time when the prospects of the Unitarians were dark and dubious in Poland, entering into a confederacy with the Transylvanians, contaminated the Palatinate with the errors of this sect; but the mischievous design was seasonably detected and frustrated. Neuser then betook himself to the Turk, and enlisted among the Janizaries at Constantinople.⁵

¹ A considerable part of these books was edited in the collection, entitled Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, printed A.D. 1656, in 6 vols. fol. The collection indeed leaves out many of the productions of the first founders of the sect; yet it is quite sufficient to acquaint us with its genius and character. [It comprises the works of only four of their more celebrated writers, namely, Crellinus, Slichtingius, Woltzogenus, and Przdeciwius, according to their Latinized names.—R.]

² Zeltner's Hist. Crypto-Socin. Altorfi, p. 199, note.

³ Or Jansen, see Sand's Biblioth. p. 87.

⁴ Zeltner, ubi supra, p. 31 and 178. [Brandt, in his History of the Reformation, &c. tells us that Ostorodt and Voidovius were banished, and that their books were condemned to be burned publicly by the hands of the common hangman. Accordingly the pile was raised, the executioner approached, and the multitude was assembled, but the books did not appear. The magistrates, who were curious to peruse their contents, had quietly divided them among themselves and their friends.—Muel.]

⁵ Struve's Pfälzische Kirchenhist. chap. v. sec. liii. p.

15. Although the Socinians profess to believe that all knowledge of divine things must be derived from the sacred books of Christians, yet in reality they hold that the sense of Scripture must be estimated and explained in conformity with the dictates of right reason; and of course they subject religious truth in some measure to the empire of reason. For they intimate, sometimes tacitly and sometimes expressly, that the inspired writers frequently slipped, through defects both of memory and of capacity; that they express the conceptions of their minds in language which is not sufficiently clear and explicit; that they obscure plain subjects by Asiatic phraseology, that is, by inflated and extravagant expressions, and therefore they must be made intelligible by the aid of reason and sagacity. From such propositions, any person of tolerable understanding would readily infer that in general the history of the Jews and of our Saviour, may be learned from the books of the Old and New Testaments, and that there is no reason to question the truth of this history; but that the doctrines which are set forth in these books, must be so understood and explained as not to appear contrary to ordinary apprehension or reason. The inspired books, therefore, do not declare what views we should hold concerning God and his counsels, but human sagacity points out to us what system of religion we are to search for in the Scriptures.

16. This opinion becomes still worse, when we consider what this sect understood by the term reason. For by the splendid name of right reason, they appear to mean that measure of intelligence or that power of comprehending and understanding things which we derive from nature. And hence the fundamental maxim of the whole Socinian theology is this: Nothing must be admitted as a divine doctrine but what the human mind can fully understand; and whatever the holy Scriptures teach concerning the nature of God, his counsels and purposes, and the way of salvation, must be corrected by art and reason till it shall agree with the capacities of our minds.¹ Whoever admits 214; Altling's Hist. Eccles. Palatin. in Meigs' Monum. Palatina, p. 266, &c. 337; La Croze, Dissertationes Historiquæ, tome I. p. 101, 127. Compare Raupach's Presbyterologia Austriaca, p. 113, where he treats of John Matthei who was implicated in these communications.

² Ziegler, in his condensed view of the peculiar doctrines of Faustus Socinus (in Henke's Neuen Magazin für Religionsphilosophie, &c. vol. iv. st. ii. p. 204, &c.) contraverts this statement of Mosheim; and maintains that Socinus aimed to base his doctrines wholly on the Scriptures, and not on reason as a higher authority. Schroeckh, in his Kirchenge. seit d. Reform. (vol. v. p. 560, &c.) replies to Ziegler; and while he admits that Socinus professed to regard the Bible as the source of all religious truth, and nowhere expressly allows

this must also admit that there may be as many religions as there are people. For as one person is more obtuse than another or more acute, so also what is plain and easy of comprehension to one, another will complain of as abstruse and hard to be understood. Neither do the Socinians appear to fear this consequence very greatly; for they allow their people to explain variously many doctrines of the greatest importance, provided they entertain no doubts respecting the general credibility of the history of Jesus Christ, and hold what the Scriptures inculcate in regard to morals and conduct.

17. Proceeding on this maxim, the Socinians either reject or bring down to their comprehension whatever presents any difficulty to the human mind in the doctrine concerning God and the Son of God, Jesus Christ, or concerning the nature of man or the entire plan of salvation as proposed by the inspired writers, or concerning the doctrine of eternal rewards and punishments. God is indeed vastly more perfect than men are, yet he is not altogether unlike them; by that power with which he controls all nature he caused Jesus Christ, an extraordinary man, to be born of the Virgin Mary; this man he caught up to heaven, imbued him with a portion of his own energy which is called the Holy Spirit, and with a full knowledge of his will; and then sent him back to this world that he might promulgate to mankind a new rule of life more perfect than the old one, and might evince the truth of his doctrine by his life and his death. Those who obey the voice of this divine teacher, and all can obey it if they are so disposed, being clad in other bodies shall for ever inhabit the blessed abode where God resides; those who do otherwise, being consumed by exquisite torments, will at length sink into annihilation. These few propositions contain the whole system of Socinian theology, when divested of the decorations and subtle argumentations of their theologians.

18. The general character of the Socinian theology requires them to limit their moral precepts entirely to external duties and conduct. For while they deny on the one hand that men's minds are purified by a divine influence, and on the other, that any man can so control himself as wholly to extinguish his evil propensities and passions, no alternative is left but to hold him to be a holy man who lives agreeably to those precepts of the divine law which regulate the words and the external actions. Yet in describing the duties of men, they were obliged to be uncommonly rigorous; because they maintained that the object for which God sent Jesus Christ into the world was to promulgate a most perfect law. And hence very many of them hold it unlawful to resist injuries, to bear arms, to take oaths, to inflict capital punishments on malefactors, to oppose the tyranny of civil rulers, to acquire wealth by honest industry, and the like. And here also we unexpectedly meet with this singularity, that while on other subjects they boldly offer the greatest violence to the language of the sacred writers, in order to obtain support for their doctrines, they require that whatever is found in the Scriptures relating to life and morals, should be understood and construed in the most simple and literal manner.

19. The Racovian Catechism, which is generally regarded as the only creed of the sect and as an accurate portrait of their religion, contains only the popular system of doctrine, not that which their leaders and doctors hold impressed on their minds.¹ A person therefore who wishes to know the grounds and the sources from which the reason to have dominion over revelation, he yet maintains that Socinus, who was but a poor expositor, took great liberties with the Scriptures, and in reality practised upon the principle stated by Mosheim, though perhaps without much consciousness of it. And the subsequent Socinians, he says, proceeded farther and farther, till they at last discovered what was the fundamental principle of their theology; and since this discovery they do not hesitate to avow it. Hence he concludes that Mosheim is quite justifiable in making such a statement as he here gives.—Mur.

¹ Schmidt has treated expressly of the authors and the history of this celebrated book, in his essay De Catechesi Racoviensi, published in 1707. Add Köcher's Bibliotheca Theol. Symbol. p. 656, &c. The very learned and veracious Eder not long since published a new edition of it, with a solid confutation annexed, Frankf. and Leips. 1739, 8vo. [There are properly two Racovian Catechisms, a larger and a smaller. The writer of the smaller was Valentine Smulcius, who drew it up in German and first published it in 1605. It is entitled, Der kleine Catechismus zur Übung der Kinder in dem Christlichen Gottesdienste in Rakow, 1605. The largest was likewise published in German by the same Smulcius in 1608; but Masceovius [in Polish Moszczewski.—R.] translated it into Latin in 1609, under the title, Catechesis Ecclesiastica, quæ in Regno Poloniæ, et magno ducatu Lithuanicæ, et aliis ad istud Regnum pertinentibus Provinciis, affirmant neminem alium, præter Patrem Domini nostri Jesu Christi, esse illum personam Davem Luvicæ, &c. Afterwards Crellius and Slichtingius revised and amended it; and after their death Wissowatius and Stegmann the younger published it in 1665. In 1680, it was subjoined to Crellius' Ethica Aristotelica as an Appendix, in order to procure it a wider circulation. All these editions were in 4to. In the year 1684, there was an edition in 8vo still more complete, as it contained the notes of Ruarus, Wissowatius the younger, and of one not named.—Schl. [This catechism was first published in English in 1652, translated, it is conjectured, by the well-known English Unitarian of those days, John Biddle. A new translation appeared thirty years ago, entitled The Racovian Catechism with Notes and Illustrations; to which is prefixed a Sketch of the History of Unitarianism in Poland and the adjacent Countries, by Thomas Rees, F.S.A. London, 1818, 12mo. The introductory sketch is drawn up with care, and contains a more accurate account of the early editions of the work than that given by Schlegel in the preceding part of this note.—R.]

plain statements of the Catechism originated, must read and examine the works of their theologians. Besides, the Catechism omits many doctrines and regulations of the Socinians which might contribute to increase the odium under which the sect labours, but which serve to lay open its internal character and state. It appears therefore to have been written for foreigners in order to mitigate their indignation against the sect, rather than for the use of Socinians themselves.¹ And hence it never obtained among them the authority of a public rule of faith; but their doctors have always been at full liberty either to alter it or to exchange it for another. By what rules the church is to be governed, and in what manner public religious worship is to be celebrated, their doctors have not taught us with sufficient clearness and uniformity. But in most things they appear disposed to follow the customs of the Protestants.²

20. Few are ignorant that the first originators of the Socinian scheme possessed fine talents and much erudition. But when these were dead or removed, the Unitarians of Poland seem to have had but little thirst for knowledge and intellectual cultivation, and not to have required their teachers to be men of acumen and well instructed in literature and the arts. They however adopted other views after they obtained liberty to open schools at Racow and Lublin, and when they had discovered that their cause could not possibly be upheld without defenders and vindicators in no respect inferior to their opponents. Their love of learning began to be ardent from about the time that Faustus Socinus undertook to sustain and to regulate their tottering and ill-arranged church; and not a few persons eminent for their learning as well as their birth, were to be found among them. For they were anxious to have the study of eloquence pursued, the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin literature taught to the young, and philosophy expounded to select individuals. The Racovians, according to the custom of the age, made Aristotle their guide in philosophy, as appears from Crellius' Ethica, and from other monuments of those times.

21. At the same time the leaders of the sect declare in numerous places in their books, that both in the interpretation of the Scriptures and in explaining and in demonstrating the truths of religion in general, clearness and simplicity are alone to be consulted, and that no regard should be paid to the subtleties of philosophy and logic; which rule, if the interpreters and doctors in the highest esteem among them had considered as binding on themselves, they would have given much less vexation to their opposers. For in most of their books exquisite subtilty and art are found, combined with an indescribable amount of either real or fictitious simplicity. They are most acute and seem to be all intellect when discussing those subjects which other Christians consider as lying beyond man's power of comprehension, and therefore as simply to be believed. On the contrary, all their sagacity and powers of reason forsake them just where the wisest of men have maintained that free scope should be given to reason and human ingenuity. Although this may appear contradictory, yet it all flows from that one maxim of the whole school, that whatever surpasses the comprehension of the human mind must be banished from Christian theology.

22. The Unitarians, as soon as they were separated from the society of the Reformed in Poland, became divided into parties, as has been already mentioned. The topics of dispute among them were, the dignity of Jesus Christ, Christian morals, whether infants are proper subjects of baptism, whether the Holy Spirit is a person or a divine attribute, and some other subjects. Among these parties, two continued longer than the others, and showed themselves less docile and manageable to the pacificators, namely, the Budnæan and Favorian sects. The former had for its founder and leader Simon Budny, a man of acuteness, who perceiving more clearly than others whither the principles of Lælius Socinus would lead, maintained that Jesus Christ was not to be honoured with our prayers nor with any other kind of worship; and in order more easily to support this error, he declared that Christ was conceived not by virtue of any divine power, but in the way in which all other men are. These tenets indeed harmonise very well with the first principles of the Socinian scheme, but to the majority they appeared intolerable and execrable. Budny therefore who had many disciples in Lithuania and Russian Poland, was deposed from his ministerial office in 1584, and with his adherents was excommunicated. But he is said to have afterwards renounced this opinion, and to have been restored to the communion of the sect.

¹ This may be inferred from the fact, that they presented a Latin copy of it to king James I. but a German copy to the university of Wittenberg. [To show their gratitude, the theologians of Wittenberg allowed a feeble confutation of it to be drawn up by Balduinus, which was first published in 1619, and James I. condemned the book to the flames.—Schl.]

² This appears from Peter Moroscowius or Morazkowskii's Politia Ecclesiastica, quam vulgo Agenda vocant, sive forma Regiminis exterioris Ecclesiæ Christianæ in Polonia, quæ unum Deum Patrem, per Filium ejus unigenitum in Spiritu Sancto confitentur. In three books, composed in 1642, and published by Gæder a few years since at Nuremberg, 4to. This book is mentioned by Sand, Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 142, who says it was written for the use of the Belgic churches.

23. Into nearly the same error which had proved disastrous to Budny, a little while after fell Francis Davides, a Hungarian, and superintendent of the Socinian churches in Transylvania; for he resolutely denied that prayer or any other religious worship should be offered to Jesus Christ. After Blandrata and also Faustus Socinus himself (who had been sent for into Transylvania for this very object in 1573), had in vain employed all the resources of their ingenuity in efforts to reclaim Davides, the prince of Transylvania, Christopher Bathori, threw him into prison, where he died at an advanced age, A.D. 1579.² Yet his sad fate did not end the controversy which he had commenced. For Davides left behind him disciples who long contended strenuously for the tenets of their master, and who gave no little trouble to Socinus and his followers in Poland and Lithuania. Among them the following were most distinguished; James Palæologus of Chios who was burned at Rome in 1585, Christian Francken who held a dispute with Socinus himself, John Sommer rector of the school at Clausenburg,³ and others. This sect was usually called by the Socinian writers the sect of Semi-Judaizers.⁴

24. Towards the Farnowski the Socinians were much more indulgent; for they were not excommunicated nor required to abandon the opinions they held, but only to conceal them and not advance them in their sermons.⁵ The head of this party was Stanislaus Farnowski [in Latin Farnovius or Farnesius] who was induced by Peter Gonesius to prefer the Arian hypothesis before the Socinian; and who maintained that before the foundation of the world Christ was either begotten or produced out of nothing by the supreme God. What he thought of the Holy Spirit is less clear; but it is known that he forbade his followers to pray to the Holy Spirit.⁶ When Farnowski separated himself from the other Unitarians in 1568, he had many adherents who were distinguished both for influence and learning; among others, Martin Czechowicz, John Niemciowicz, Stanislaus Wisnowski [or Wisnowius], John Sokolowski [in Latin Falconius], and Geo. Schomann. But a part of these were overcome by the mildness and disputatious skill of the Socinians; and others were afterwards discouraged by the dexterity of Faustus Socinus. At last the party being bereft of its leader Farnowski, who died in the year 1615, became dispersed and extinct.⁷

⁴ Faustus Socinus wrote a book expressly contra Semi-Judaizantes, which is in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 804. Socinus and his friends did not expend so much effort in the suppression of this faction, because they supposed it very pernicious to the Christian religion. On the contrary, Socinus himself concedes that the point in debate was of no great consequence, when he declares that it is not necessary to salvation that a person should pray to Christ. In his answer to Wujek (Opp. tom. ii. p. 534, &c.) he says:—"But if any one is possessed of so great faith that he dare always go directly to God himself, and does not need the consolation which arises from the invocation of Christ his brother, tempted in all things; such a one is not obliged to pray to Christ."^a According to his judgment, therefore, those have a higher degree of faith who, neglecting Christ, pray only to God himself. Why then so severely avenge the crime of Davides, who wished to lead all Christians directly to the Father? Lubieniec also, in his Historia Reform. Polonica, lib. iii. cap. xi. p. 228, not obscurely detracts very much from the importance of this controversy, when he writes that in Transylvania there was a storm in a cup, fluctus in simpulo excitatus esse. From which it appears manifest that the Socinians made war upon Davides and his adherents, perhaps solely for this reason, lest by tolerating his opinion they should inflame the enmity of other Christians against themselves, which they already felt to be sufficiently great; to which they deemed the opinion, in itself considered, to be one which might be tolerated.

⁵ Epistola de Vita Wisnowitii, p. 226. According to the testimony of Sand (Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 87), Erasmus Johannis was admitted to the office of teacher in the Socinian congregation at Clausenburg, on the condition that in his sermons he should advance nothing to show that Jesus Christ existed before Mary.

⁶ Sand's Biblioth. p. 52, and in various passages under the names we have mentioned.

⁷ We omit here the names of the more distinguished Socinian writers of this century, because a large part of them have been already noticed in the preceding history. The rest may be easily collected from Sand's Bibliotheca.

(a) Quod si quis tanta fide præritus, ut ad Deum ipsum peripetuo recta accedere audiat, nec consolatione, que ex Christi fratris sui per omnia seculi invocatione, indiget, hic non opus habet, ut Christum invocet.

¹ See Sand's Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. p. 54, 55; Epistola de Vita Wisnowitii, lib. p. 226; Ringeltaube, Von den Polnischen Bibeln, p. 144, 152, &c. Moreover Cyllius, the most learned Socinian of our age (in the Thesaurus Epistolæ Craxianæ, tom. i. p. 111), is of opinion (how justly I cannot say) that Adam Neuser, a German, was the author of this degrading opinion of Christ. [For further particulars respecting Budny, in Latin Budnaus, see Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, vol. ii. p. 362, &c.—R.]

² Sand, ubi supra, p. 55, 56; Faustus Socinus, Opp. tom. i. p. 353, 395, tom. ii. p. 713, 771, where is given his Dispute with Davides. Lubieniec, Hist. Reform. Polon. lib. iii. cap. xi. p. 228. [Additional information respecting Davides may be seen in the Sketch prefixed to Rees's Racovian Catechism, from p. 41, &c.—R.]

³ See respecting these persons, Sand's Biblioth. p. 57, 58, 86. The dispute of Socinus with Francken on this subject is in Socinus' Opera, tom. ii. p. 767. [Palæologus was actually of the race of the Greek emperors who bore this name. At Rome he fell into the hands of the Inquisition, but he escaped by flight. In Germany he held himself for a Protestant, and in Poland for a Socinian. They made him their rector at Clausenburg. But as he journeyed through Moravia he was seized by order of the emperor Maximilian and transmitted to Rome.—Francken was of Gardzlegen and a native Lutheran. But he turned Catholic and entered the order of Jesuits. Afterwards he revolted to the Unitarians, and was made rector first of Chmielnizk in Poland, and then of Clausenburg. As the Turkish war obliged him to go to Prague, he again turned Catholic. His writings are mentioned by Sand, ubi supra. Sommer was a native of Pirna in Meissen, and went to Transylvania at the instigation of Blandrata.—Schl.]

CENTURY SEVENTEENTH.

SECTION I.

GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE arduous efforts commenced by the Roman pontiffs in the preceding century for extending the Christian church, and thus exalting the glory and dominion of the Romish see, were in this century placed upon a permanent and solid basis; whereas they had been previously tottering and ill-supported. In the first place, Gregory XV., at the instigation of his chaplain Narnius, established at Rome in 1622 the famous Congregation for Propagating the Faith (Congregatio de Propaganda Fide), and furnished it with very extensive revenues. This body which consists of thirteen cardinals, two priests, and one monk, together with a secretary,¹ has for its object the support and the propagation of the Romish religion in all parts of the world. Urban VIII. and after him many wealthy individuals enriched it with such ample revenues, that it is able to support an almost unlimited expenditure. Hence it sends out numerous missionaries to the most remote nations, publishes books of various kinds necessary for learning foreign and some of them barbarous languages; causes instructions in Christianity and other works designed to enkindle piety or confute error, to be drawn up in the languages and printed in the appropriate characters of the several nations; maintains and educates a vast number of selected youth designed for missionaries; liberally educates and supports young men who are annually sent to Rome from foreign countries, in order to become instructors of their countrymen on their return home; takes up and provides for persons, whose constancy in professing and defending the Romish religion has drawn on them banishment or other calamities; and plans and accomplishes various objects, almost beyond belief to those not acquainted with their affairs. The institution has a very splendid and extensive palace devoted to its use, the delightful situation of which gives it exquisite charms.²

2. To this institution, Urban VIII. in the year 1627 added another, not indeed equally magnificent yet renowned and very useful, namely the College or Seminary for propagating the faith; in which young men from almost all nations were educated to become preachers of Christianity in foreign countries, and were instructed and imbued with the utmost care in all the science and learning necessary for so important an office. The commencement of this great institution was owing to the zeal of John Baptist Viles, a Spaniard residing at Rome; who for this object presented to the pontiff all his possessions and property, including his very elegant mansion. Many others afterwards imitated his liberality, and to this day imitate it. Urban at first placed this college under the care and authority of three canons of the three patriarchal churches at Rome; but since the year 1641, it has been under the control of the congregation already mentioned as established by Gregory XV.³

¹ This is the number of members in this body as stated by Gregory XV. in his bull for its establishment, Bullarium Romanum, tom. iiii. p. 472, ed. Luxemb. Nor is a larger number mentioned by Cerri, État Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 259. But Aymon, in his Tableau de la Cour de Rome, par. iiii. chap. iiii. p. 279, makes it to consist of eighteen cardinals, one papal secretary, one apostolical protonotary, one referent or referendary, and one of the assessors and scribes of [the Inquisition or] what is called the Sacred Office. [Cerri was Secretary to the Congregation De Propaganda Fide, and compiled his work about the year 1673, for the use of Innocent XI. It was written in Italian, but whether printed in that language I am not aware; Mosheim used a French translation; and I find it was also translated into English from a manuscript copy in Italian, by Sir Richard Steele, and published at London in 1715.—H.]

² The authors who treat of this Congregation are enumerated by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbi Exorientis, cap. xxviii. p. 565. To whom may be added, Dorotheus Avelanus, De Montibus Pietatis Ecclesie Romanæ, p. 522, &c. where there is a list of the books published by the Congregation up to the year 1667. [The annual revenue of this Congregation, near the close of the seventeenth century, was about 24,000 Romish dollars. Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. iiii. p. 715.—MUR.]

³ Helyot, Histoire des Ordres Monastiques Religieux et Militaires, tome viii. chap. xii. p. 71, &c.; Cerri, État présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 293, &c. where however the first founder is erroneously called Vives. (It is not certain that Viles rather than Vives was the true name of the founder. He established ten scholarships.

3. In 1663, the Congregation of Priests for Foreign Missions was instituted by the royal authority in France; and likewise the Parisian Seminary for Missions to Foreign Nations was founded by certain French bishops and theologians, in which men might be educated and instructed in order to become preachers of Christianity among the nations estranged from Christ. From this Seminary even at the present day [1750] are sent forth the apostolic vicars of Siam, Tonquin, and Cochín China, the bishops of Babylon, and the apostolic vicars of Persia, and other missionaries to the Asiatic nations; and they derive their support from the ample revenues of the Congregation and the Seminary.¹ But the Priests for foreign missions² and their pupils generally have much contention and controversy with the Jesuits and their missionaries. For they are displeased with the method pursued by the Jesuits for the conversion of the Chinese and others; and besides, the Jesuits will not submit to the commands of the apostolic vicars and bishops appointed by the Congregation, as required by the pope and by the Romish college for propagating the faith. Likewise the French Congregation of the Holy Sepulchre, instituted by Autherius the [titular] bishop of Bethlehem, was required by Urban VIII. in the year 1644, to have fit men always in readiness to be sent to the nations ignorant of Christianity, whenever the pontiff or the Congregation for Propagating the Faith, should demand their services.³ The other bodies of less note established in various countries for the purpose of enlarging the church, and the pains taken by the Jesuits and the other orders to provide a supply of missionaries, I shall leave to others to enumerate and describe.

4. From these colleges and societies issued those swarms of missionaries who travelled over the whole world so far as it for youth from foreign lands. Cardinal Barberini, the pope's brother, in 1637 and 1638 added thirty-one more scholarships, for Georgians, Persians, Nestorians, Jacobites, Melchites, Copts, Abyssinians, and Indians; and in defect of these, for Armenians from Poland, Russia, and Constantinople. The scholars on Barberini's foundation were to pledge themselves to become missionaries among their own countrymen, or to go wherever the Congregation de Propaganda should order them. Urban Cerrí was secretary to the Congregation de Propaganda, and drew up an account of the Present State of the Romish Church in all parts of the world for the use of Innocent XI. which fell into the hands of the Protestants, and was translated and published, English and French, in the year 1716. Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 715, &c.—Mur.

¹ See particularly the Gallia Christiana of the Benedictines, tom. vii. p. 1024, &c.; Helyot, Histoire des Ordres, tome viii. chap. xli. p. 84, &c.

² They are generally called by the French, Messieurs des Missions Étrangères.

³ Helyot, ubi supra, chap. xlii. p. 87-100.

is yet discovered, and from among the most ferocious nations gathered congregations which were, if not in reality, yet in name and in some of their usages, Christian. Among these missionaries, the Jesuits, the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Capuchins obtained the greatest glory. Yet they mutually assail and publicly accuse each other of disregarding and dishonouring the cause of Christ, and even of corrupting his holy doctrines. The Jesuits, in particular, are the most spoken against, both by the others who labour with them in the glorious cause of enlarging the Saviour's empire, and by the great body of their own church. For it is alleged that they instil into most of their proselytes not the pure religion which Christ taught, but a lax and corrupt system of faith and practice; that they not only tolerate or wink at practices and opinions which are superstitious and profane, but even encourage them among their followers; that they amass vast riches by traffic, and by other unbecoming arts and occupations; that they are eager after worldly honours, and court the favour of the great by adulation and presents; that they involve themselves needlessly in civil affairs, and in the intrigues of courts; that they frequently excite seditions and civil wars in nations; and finally, that they will not obey the Roman pontiff and the vicars and bishops whom he sends out. If one calls for the witnesses to support these heavy charges, he finds himself overwhelmed with their multitude and their splendour. For illustrious and most respectable men are brought forward from every Catholic country; and among these are many on whom no suspicion of envy, credulity, or ignorance can fall, such as cardinals, members of the Congregation for Propagating the Faith, and—what cannot be surpassed—some of the pontiff's themselves. Nor do these witnesses come forward unarmed for the contest; for they assail the doubting with the actual proceedings of Jesuits, particularly in China, India, Abyssinia, and Japan, to the great injury of the Romish cause.⁴

5. Though the Jesuits exerted all their sagacity and cunning, (for which they are said to be pre-eminent), in order to silence these accusations, yet they could not prevent their being heard and regarded at Rome. Among many circumstances which go to prove this, may be mentioned especially the following, that the board at Rome which controls absolutely all sacred missions, has now for many years employed the Jesuits more sparingly and more cautiously than formerly; and that on great and trying occasions it sets a higher value on the sobriety, poverty, and patience of even the Capuchins and Carmelites, than on the abundant resources, the ingenuity, and the courage of the Jesuits. Yet neither this board nor even the pontiffs, are able to correct all that they either tacitly or openly censure in the Jesuits; but they are obliged, however much against their wishes, to tolerate a great number of things. For the disciples of St. Ignatius have acquired in various ways so great influence and so much wealth throughout the Romish world, that they dare menace even the head of the church; nor can they without hazard be compelled to obey his injunctions, whenever they are indisposed to submit. This most powerful society either itself dictates the decrees of the Romish court, or if dictated by others, it either with impunity refuses to obey them, or by its ingenuity gives them such an interpretation as the interests of the Ignatian fraternity demand. At least common fame so reports and appeals to the evidence of striking facts, while the Jesuits deny the charge.¹

⁴ A great amount of testimony is collected by the author of the Histoire de la Compagnie de Jésus, Utrecht, 1741, 8vo, throughout the preface.

6. The cause of this great dissension between the Jesuits and the other Christian missionaries is, that the Jesuits pursue a very different method in converting nations to Christianity from that practised by their colleagues and associates. The Jesuits are of opinion that people deeply sunk in superstition should be approached with art and policy; and that they are to be led, by a cautious and careful hand, to embrace the Gospel. Hence they explain and interpret the received doctrines and opinions of the pagans,—as, for instance, the precepts of Confucius in China,—in such a manner that they may seem to differ as little as possible from the doctrines of Christianity; and if they find anything in their religion or their history analogous at all to the faith and the history of Christians, they readily adduce it in proof of the harmony between the old religion and the new. The rites and usages also which the nations received from their progenitors, unless they are totally opposite to the Christian rites, they tolerate; and either changing their form a little or referring them to a better end than before, accommodate them to Christianity. The natural biases and propensities of the people they treat with all the indulgence possible, and carefully avoid whatever is opposed to them. The priests and men of learning, by whom the populace is generally led, they labour in all possible ways and even by pious frauds to secure and bring over to their party. They court the favour and the friendship of those in power by presents, by the cultivation of various arts, mathematics, medicine, painting, &c. and by affording them counsel and aid in their difficulties. I might specify many other particulars. Now all these methods their colleagues and associates look upon as artifices and tricks, unworthy of ambassadors of Christ, who as they think should plead the cause of God openly and ingenuously, without deception and cunning. Hence they attack superstition and everything that grows out of it or tends towards it, openly and avowedly; they do not spare either the ancestors or the ancient ceremonies of the pagans, they pay no attention to their chiefs, their courts, their priests, they state the mysteries of Christianity nakedly, and do not hesitate to oppose the hereditary religions of the nations.

7. The name and the religion of Christians were proclaimed over nearly all Asia in this century, by these ministers of the Romish see. We begin with India, nearly all the parts of which, and especially those formerly subject to the Portuguese till they were driven out by the Dutch, received some sparks of the heavenly light, though involved in much obscurity, by the labours of the Jesuits and also of some Theatins and Augustinians. But of all the missions which were undertaken to these nations, none has been more talked of than that to Madura; and none is said to have produced more abundant fruits even to the present times. Robert de Nobili, or as some write it, De Nobilibus, an Italian Jesuit who commenced this mission, reflecting that the Indians abhor all Europeans, and on the other hand venerate exclusively the race of Brahmins as if descended from the gods, and that they will listen to no other teachers, feigned himself a Brahmin from a distant country, and by staining his face and adopting that very austere and painful mode of life which the Sanianes or penitents lead, he persuaded the credulous people to believe him. By this artifice he first brought over twelve Brahmins to adopt his discipline, and their example induced a great multitude to follow him as their master. After the death of Robert, this singular establishment lay for some time neglected.¹ But afterwards, by the counsels and exertions of the Portuguese Jesuits it was revived; and it is continued at the present time by such Jesuits both French and Portuguese as think themselves able to submit to its very severe rules. These fictitious Brahmins who deny themselves to be Europeans or Franks, (Pranghis, as the Indians pronounce it), and pretend to have been born in the northern regions, are said to be at the head of a community almost beyond number, and one which is annually increasing by large accessions; nor is this very incredible.² But what is reported of the immense hardships and sufferings which they endure for the sake of Christ, is by many thought to admit some doubt. For it is said they practise deception, and torture themselves variously in public, but in private regale themselves with wine, flesh, and other sensual pleasures.

¹ The reader however will bear in mind that the statements in this section, though perfectly correct in the middle of the last century, are quite inapplicable to the state of matters at the present day. The dissolution of the order of the Jesuits in 1773 by Clement XIV. though it has been revived by Pius VII. in 1817, so crippled its resources, that it has never been able to recover its former ascendancy in Rome, or throughout the papal church.—A.

8. The Jesuits were the first who exhibited a knowledge of the truth to the inhabitants of Siam, Tonquin, and Cochin China, Alexander of Rhodes being leader of the enterprise.³ And vast numbers in those nations are said to have eagerly em-

¹ Cerri, État Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 173.

² The Jesuits can scarcely find adequate words when they would either extol the glory and the effects of this mission, or describe the sufferings and labours voluntarily endured by the missionaries. See the Lettres Curieuses et Edifiantes écrites des Missions Étrangères, tome i. p. 9, 32, 46, 50, 55, [ed. 1819, tome vi. p. 24, &c.] Father Martin there (p. 9) [p. 24] pronounces it the most beautiful and most perfect mission that ever was; "la plus belle qui soit au monde." Each of the missionaries is said to have baptized at least a thousand persons annually, (p. 11) [p. 25]. "Le moins que chaque Missionnaire en baptise par an, est mille." Yet if credit is to be given to him, (p. 12) [p. 26], access to the sacred font was not unadvisedly permitted. Persons were long under trial, and were instructed for four months in order to their being received; and those received so live that they appear more like heavenly angels than like men—"ils vivent comme des anges." And very rarely do there occur among them any instances of such sins as merit eternal death. If the causes of this extraordinary sanctity are demanded, the Jesuits mention two. The first is, the lives of the missionaries, than which nothing could be more austere and more repelling to human nature; (p. 15) [p. 27] "La vie des Missionnaires ne sauroit être plus austère ni plus affreuse, selon la nature." See also tome xii. p. 236; tome xv. p. 211, &c. They neither allow themselves the use of bread, wine, flesh, nor fish, but live upon water and pulse of the most insipid kinds, and without condiments. Their dress and other things correspond with their diet. The other reason assigned is, that these new Christians live entirely separated from Europeans, who are said (p. 16, 17) by their licentiousness and corrupt morals, to contaminate all Christian converts from among the Indians. See also what is said in various places in these Lettres, concerning this mission to Madura; e.g. tome ii. p. 1, &c.; tome iii. p. 217; tome v. p. 2; tome vi. p. 119, &c.; tome ix. p. 126, and elsewhere. Madura is a kingdom situated in the heart of the Peninsula of India on this side of the Ganges. An accurate geographical map of all the countries embraced in the mission to Madura was published by the Jesuits, in the Lettres Edifiantes des Missions, tome xv. p. 60, &c. [tome vii. p. 321, ed. Lyons, 1819. There is also a map of all Hindostan in tome viii. p. 239.—Mur.] The French Jesuits established a mission after the model of this, in the Indian kingdom of the Carnatic and its vicinity. See Lettres Edifiantes, tome v. p. 3, 240. Near the end of the century, other Jesuits projected a similar mission in the territories of the king of Maravia, (or Marawas). See Lettres Edifiantes, tome ii. p. 1; tome x. p. 79. But the Jesuits themselves admit, (Lettres Edifiantes, tome vi. p. 3, 15, 66, 107, &c.) that their mission was more successful in the kingdom of Maravia than in that of the Carnatic. Perhaps the French Jesuits who founded the Carnatic mission, were unable so perfectly and patiently to follow that severe and painful mode of living which this plan required, as the Portuguese and Spanish Jesuits were. Recently, Benedict XIV. who does not approve of this crafty method of the Jesuits in converting nations, by a mandate issued A.D. 1744, has prostrated all these once most celebrated missions. This pontiff would have no wives and tricks employed in the important work of extending the limits of the church. See Norbert's Memoires Historiques pour les Missions Orientales, tome i. and iv. The entire history of these missions, together with a copy of Benedict's decree, is in Manichius, Origines et Antiquité Christiane, tom. ii. 245, &c. [Robert de Nobili, was born of high parentage at Rome, in 1577, became a Jesuit at the age of twenty, studied philosophy at Naples and theology at Rome. In the year 1606, he obtained leave to go as a missionary to the Indies, and was made an assistant to the Jesuit, Gonsalvo Fernandes, who by ten years labour among the Indians had only been able to baptise a few natives who were at the point of death. Robert, early perceiving that the Indian ideas of caste formed a great obstacle to their conversion, and prevented all success among the higher castes, determined to convert this insurmountable obstacle into a successful engine. Having obtained the approbation of his plan by the archbishop of Cranganore, he assumed the habits and the garb of a Brahmin, shut himself up in a cell, avoided society, learned well the Tamil and the Sanscrit languages, and studied the sacred books of the Hindoos; and then came forth avowing himself a foreign Brahmin, and a reformer of the corruptions of the Brahminic religion. All admired his eloquence and his learning. He first gained one Brahmin to his Christian Brahminism, and then others, till the number amounted to seventy. These offered some opposition from the other Brahmins; but Robert's chief difficulty was from the opposition of the Catholics to his whole plan. The case was carried to Rome, and there warmly debated; and it was not without difficulty that Robert was permitted to go on in his begun course. Yet he continued his labours nearly half a century, and then died at Melapore, in 1656. After his death, his semi-Christian community declined for a time; but it was revived again by other Jesuits, and so enlarged that in 1699 it was said to embrace more than 150,000 members. (Lett. Edif. tome vi. p. 25, ed. 1819.) After the whole plan was condemned however by Benedict XIV. in 1744, the community rapidly declined and soon became extinct. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. iii. p. 707, &c. and vol. vii. p. 36, &c.—Mur.]

³ See the various writings and especially the Journal of Alexander de Rhodes, a man not lacking in genius and discernment, published at Paris, 1666 and 1682, 4to. [See Relazione de' felici Successi della S. Fede predicata da' P.P. della Compagnia di Gesù nel Regno del Turchino; Rome, 1640, 4to. His Catechismus Latino-Turchinensis, is one of the most rare books, as also his Grammat. ling. Annamitica, the vernacular language of Tonquin. Alexander went to that country in 1627, and in the space of three years converted more than 5000 persons; among whom he formed some to be so good converts, that in the year 1634 it was estimated there were more than 30,000 Christians in Tonquin. From Macao he entered upon a mission in Cochin-China; but after he had converted numbers, he was imprisoned and banished the country. The mission however was afterwards prosecuted by other fathers. See Relation de tout ce qui se passa à la Cochinchine, Paris, 1652, 8vo; Bérro, Relazione della nuova Missione de' P.P. della Compagnia di Gesù nel regno de' Cochinchini, Rome, 1631, 8vo; and Delle Missioni de' Padri della compagnia di Gesù nel regno del Turchino, Rome, 1663, 4to.—Sch.]

braced it. Influenced by this good news, Alexander VII. in the year 1658 thought it advisable to place some bishops over this new church; and therefore ordered certain French priests of the Congregation of Priests for Foreign Missions, to repair thither clothed with authority from him. But the Jesuits, who can bear no superiors and scarcely any equals, treated those pious and good men with very great contumely and abuse, and would not suffer them to enter into their harvest.¹ Hence arose in the court of Rome a protracted contest, the issue of which plainly showed that the Jesuits would easily resort to the authority of the pontiffs to extend and confirm their power, but treated it with contempt when it opposed their interests and emoluments. Subsequently the French king Lewis XIV. sent a splendid embassy in the year 1684 to the king of Siam, whose prime minister at that time was a Greek Christian named Constantius, a crafty and ambitious man, soliciting that monarch to pay homage to our Saviour. The embassy was accompanied by many priests and Jesuits, among whom were several well skilled in the arts and sciences, for which the king had some taste. These induced a portion of the people to abandon the superstition of their fathers; but all their efforts to convert the king and chiefs were in vain. And all hopes of adding the Siamese to the Christian church soon became extinct, together with the king and his favourite Constantius, who had invited the French into the country and wished by their means to establish his own power. For in a sedition raised in 1688, some of the princes put them both to death;² whereupon the French were obliged to return home.

¹ There were various pamphlets published at Paris in 1666, 1674, and 1681, in 4to, in which these French missionaries, whom the Jesuits refused to admit as fellow-labourers in enlightening idolaters, eloquently described their sufferings and their wrongs. The most accurate and full is the account given by Francis Pallu, whom the pope had made bishop of Heliopolis, printed in French, Paris, 1688, 8vo. The subject is also expressly taken up in the Gallia Christiana of the Benedictines, tom. vii. p. 1027. A concise history of the affair is given by Cerri, État Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 199, &c. who, though he was secretary of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide inveighs with great severity against the frauds, the cruelty, and the lust of domination of the Jesuits; and laments that his Congregation had not the power requisite to restrain that arrogant sect. At the close of his narrative he remarks that he was not at liberty to state all the crimes committed by the Jesuits in this controversy, because the pontiff ordered them to be kept out of sight. Véritable Sainteté a ordonné qu'ils demeurassent sous le secret. See also Helyot's Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, tome viii chap. xli. p. 84, &c.

² An account of this mission and its proceedings has been given by Tachard, Chaumont, J. A. Loubere, and others. Among these the preference is due to Loubere, who was a man of learning and genius. [His work is entitled, Du Royaume de Siam, par M. de la Loubere, Envoyé Extraordinaire du Roy auprès du Roy de Siam, en 1687 et 1688, 2 vols. 8vo, Amsterdam, 1691. It is

9. China, the largest and most opulent of all the Asiatic kingdoms, was visited by great numbers of Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, Capuchins, and others, at the commencement of this century, for the purpose of spreading the knowledge of Christianity. All these, though disagreeing in other things, unite in proclaiming the astonishing success of their labours. But the Jesuits justly claim the chief honour of surmounting the obstacles which opposed the progress of Christianity among that discerning and proud nation, so tenacious of the customs of their ancestors. For discovering that the Chinese, who are naturally perspicacious and eager after knowledge, were very fond of the arts and sciences and chiefly occupied with the geography of the country and the transactions of the embassy. Father Tachard's book is entitled, Voyages de Siam des Pères Jésuites envoyés par le Roy, avec leurs observations, Paris, 1686, 4to, and Amsterdam, 1699, 12mo. Second Voyage au Royaume de Siam, Paris, 1689, 4to, and Amsterdam, 1699, 12mo. How far such Jesuitical accounts deserve credit the world already knows. Here belongs also, Récit de l'Ambassade de M. de Chaumont à la Cour du Roy de Siam, avec ce qui s'est passé de plus remarquable durant son Voyage, Paris, 1686, 12mo, which was followed by Journal ou Suite du Voyage de Siam, par M. l'Abbé de Choisy (who accompanied M. Chaumont), Amsterdam, 1687, 12mo. The unhappy change which afterwards took place in Siam to the disadvantage of the French, is described by Farges, a French officer, who was an eyewitness, in his Relation des Révolutions arrivées à Siam dans l'année 1678, Amsterdam, 1691, 12mo.; and by Father d'Orleans, in his Histoire de M. Constance, premier Ministre du Roy de Siam, et de la dernière Révolution, Paris, 1692, 12mo.—Schl. [The politic Constantius, who had himself been in France, hoped to derive some advantages from a French alliance; and the Jesuit missionaries united with him in representing the king as much inclined to embrace Christianity. But when Chaumont, the French ambassador arrived (if we may believe the Jesuit Tachard) the king of Siam told the ambassador, "that it was no light matter to change a nation's religion after it had prevailed for more than 2,200 years; and that he wondered the king of France should interest himself so much in a matter that did not concern him but God only, and one too which God himself seemed to leave very much to the free choice of men. Could not God (said he), who gave to all men similar bodies and similar souls, have given them also similar views of religion if he had seen fit? And as he has not done so, it is presumable that he takes pleasure in being worshipped in so many different ways." He however allowed Christianity to be preached in his realm. The French court, not less solicitous probably to secure the trade of the country than to change its religion, sent a second embassy in 1688 under De la Loubere, which was accompanied by a large military force. The French were now in possession of the port of Mequi and the castle of Bancop, which were keys to the country, and Constantius himself began to be alarmed. But the same year the nobles conspired against this minister and slew him, and in the tumult the king himself lost his life. This revolution changed the whole face of things, and the French were obliged to quit the country. Yet probably some priests remained behind; for the very next year, it is said, some thousands of Siamese were baptized. At least it is certain Christianity was not exterminated; for near the close of the century Cerri states that an apostolical vicar was residing in the capital, had a church there and a seminary in which he educated natives for the priesthood, and that some of the great men of the court were professed Christians. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformaton, vol. vii. p. 54, &c. who refers to the authors above mentioned.—Mur.

especially of the mathematics, the Jesuits sent among them men who were not only well acquainted with human nature and discreet in managing affairs, but likewise profoundly versed in learning and the abstruse sciences. Some of these by their address, the elegance of their manners, and their skill in business, soon acquired such influence that high honours and offices were conferred on them by the emperor, and they were employed in affairs of the greatest consequence in the court itself. Supported by such patrons, other teachers of humbler rank and talents were, without much difficulty, able to collect disciples of every rank, sex, and age, in all the provinces of this vast empire.

10. This prosperity was checked in some measure when Xun-Chi, the first emperor of the Mongol race, died and left his son a minor. For the chief nobles to whose care and instruction the heir of the empire was committed, having long viewed Christianity with strong aversion, abused their power to prostrate both it and its friends and especially the Jesuits, whom they stripped of all their advantages, their fortunes, and privileges, and persecuted with great cruelty. The first man among the Jesuits, John Adam Schall, venerable not only for the high office he sustained in the court but also for his age and his extensive learning, was cast into prison and condemned to be put to death, while the others were banished from the country. This was in the year 1664. But in the year 1669, when Cham-Hi took the sceptre into his own hands, the prostrate cause of Christianity was not only restored, but in process of time so advanced and exalted that the Jesuits commonly reckon this to be the commencement of the golden age of the Christians in China. For the emperor, who possessed very great talents and genius and was eager in the pursuit of knowledge and improvements,¹ first recalled the Jesuits to court and restored them to their former rank, and then sent for others of the same family from Europe, especially those who were skilful in the different arts and sciences. Some of these he placed in the highest offices of the state, and employed in civil transactions of the greatest importance. And some of them, particularly Frenchmen, he received to personal intimacy and made them his own teachers in various things, especially in philosophy and the mathematics. It was not difficult for the Jesuits when thus exalted to obtain many friends and supporters of Christianity, and to provide protection for its preachers. And hence from nearly all the countries of Europe and Asia many labourers entered into this harvest; and an immense number of people, with but little difficulty, were brought to profess Christianity. The religion of Christ seemed quite triumphant in China, when in the year 1692 this emperor who was so extremely partial to the Jesuits published that famous law, in which he denied that the Christian religion was injurious to the state, as its opposers had contended, and gave all his subjects full liberty to embrace it; nay more, he erected a splendid temple for the Jesuits in 1700, within the limits of his own palace.²

11. That the Jesuits actually accomplished all that is above stated is not denied even by their worst enemies; but whether their mode of proceeding was regular and upright, or such as the nature and dignity of the Christian religion demanded, was long contested with great acrimony and still is so. The enemies of the Jesuits (and they are both numerous and very bitter, especially among the Dominicans and the Jansenists) strenuously maintain that they purchased this success at the expense of committing offences and crimes of a detestable character. In the first place, they are charged with putting a most unfaithful construction upon the old religion of the Chinese, and persuading the emperor and his nobles that there was very little if any difference between the original and ancient religion of China, or the precepts of Confucius the great philosopher and lawgiver of that nation and the religion of Christ; and to this execrable misrepresentation, it is said, they added others of less moment; in particular they led the Chinese (who overrate everything ancient and undervalue what is new) to believe that many ages ago the Chinese had been made acquainted with Christ and had paid him worship, and that to these false representations must be attributed the favourable disposition of the emperor towards Christianity and the adherence of the leading men to the side of the Jesuits. In the next place, they are charged with being utterly regardless of the duties and virtues which become the ministers of Christ. For they not only accepted but eagerly sought after honours and civil offices; and elated by the munificence of the emperor, their whole life was contaminated by the magnificence of their dress, the luxury of their tables, the multitude of their servants, and the splendour of their palaces. It was alleged that they devoted themselves not so much to spreading the knowledge of Christianity as to teaching human science, especially the mathematics; and that they even took charge of military affairs and commanded in the field of battle. And lastly, Jesuits of inferior rank are represented as engaging with eagerness in usurious speculations, in merchandise, and in other arts, by which wealth and worldly distinction are acquired, to the immense disgrace of their profession. Some of these charges the Jesuits indeed admit, but at the same time labour to extenuate; but the first and the last, they contend, are sheer fabrications of their enemies. And doubtless those who have opportunity to examine the matter thoroughly will be willing to admit, that envy and ill-will have had some share in this controversy.

¹ See Bouvet's Iran Regia Monarchæ Sinarum, which Leibnitz translated into Latin, and published in the second part of his Neposina Sinica, 1690, 8vo. Add Du Halde's Description de la Chine, and the Lettres of the Jesuits respecting their missions, in which they here and there extol the virtues of this emperor, whom all admit to have been a great man.

² A concise but neat account of all these events is given by Du Halde, Description de la Chine, tome iii. p. 128, &c.; and by the Jesuit Fontaney, Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses, tome viii. p. 176, &c. [ed. Lyons, 1319, tome ix. p. 434, &c.—Mur.] A more full account is in various books, of which the most easy to be procured is Suarez, De Libertate Religionem Christianam apud Sinas Propagandi Narratio, published by Leibnitz, 1698, in the first part of his Neposina Sinica. Most of the others are enumerated by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbi exorientis, cap. xxxix. p. 663, &c. See also my Ecclesiastical History of China written in German, and published both in a separate work and as a preface to the German translation of Du Halde's work. [This History was translated into English, and published in the year 1750, with the title, Authentic Memoirs of the Christian Church in China.—MacL.]

12. The principal charge against the Jesuits in China is, that they confound light and darkness; or that the more easily to overcome the scruples of the Chinese, they mix the superstitions of China with Christianity, and allow their disciples to follow the profane customs and the impious rites of their ancestors. The Jesuit Matthew Ricci, the father of the Chinese church, supposed that the greatest part of the rites which were enjoined by the Chinese laws, might suitably be observed by the converts to Christianity; for they originated, he said, not from religious considerations but from state policy, or were civil and not religious ceremonies; nor were they viewed in any other light, except perhaps by some of the lower class of people.¹ A contrary opinion was embraced, not only by the Dominicans and Franciscans who were associated with the Jesuits in the mission, but also by very learned men among the Jesuits themselves both in China and Japan; one of whom, Nicholas Lombard, stated the grounds of his dissent in writing.² This controversy having been long agitated in private was brought to Rome by the Dominicans in the year 1645, and since that period it has greatly disturbed the whole Romish church. Innocent X. in the year just named decided in favour of the Dominicans, and condemned the indulgence allowed by the Jesuits to the Chinese. But Alexander VII. in the year 1656, at the instigation of the Jesuits, nullified this decision in effect though not in express terms, and declared that certain rites to which the Chinese were attached might be observed by Christians. The Dominicans renewed their complaints in the years 1661 and 1674 under the pontificate of Clement X. but they seem to have been foiled by the power of the Jesuits. In the year 1684, this fatal controversy was renewed in China where it had been at rest for several years, and was prosecuted with greater warmth than before. Victory seemed inclining to the side of the Dominicans, when Charles Maigrot, a doctor of the Sorbonne, whom the pontiff had constituted his vicar in the province of Fohi and who was afterwards bishop of Conon, by a public decree in the year 1693 decided that the opinions and regulations of the Jesuits were contrary to the purity of the Christian religion. But the pontiff, to whose authority [and sanction] Maigrot had subjected his decree, would not decide either way on any part of it, until the whole cause should have a legal investigation. Accordingly in the year 1699 he appointed a board of special judges, or a Congregation as the Romish court terms it, to give this angry contest a thorough examination. As soon as this resolution of the pontiff was made known, all the enemies of the Jesuits in the Romish church and particularly in France took the field; and in various pamphlets they assailed the character and the proceedings of the Jesuits in the most vehement manner. Nor were the Jesuits wanting in effort on their part.³ The termination of this conflict belongs to the history of the next century.

13. This controversy, which has called forth the talents of so many men of the finest genius, if we separate from it some to this volume the tracts of Lombard and Antony de St. Maria against the Jesuits, with the remarks of Leibnitz. There is also in this work (p. 413) a long dissertation of Leibnitz addressed to Remond on the philosophy of the Chinese, in which he pleads the cause of the Jesuits.

¹ Du Halde, Description de la Chine, tome iii. p. 142, &c. The other writers, who are very numerous, are mentioned by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbi exorientis, cap. xxxix. p. 665, &c. Add Voltaire, Siècle du Louis XIV. tome ii. p. 318, &c. But especially worth reading is the ingenious patron of the Jesuits and himself a Jesuit, Gabriel Daniel, Histoire Apologétique de la Conduite des Jésuites de la Chine, printed in the third vol. of his Miscellaneous Tracts, p. 1, &c.

B B b

¹ See Mamachius, Origines et Antiquité Christianæ, tom. ii. p. 373, &c.

² See Kortholt's Preface to the Second Volume of his Epistol. Leibnit. sec. vi. p. 18, &c. who has subjoined minor questions and those which relate rather to the Jesuits themselves than to the subject in debate, may be all embraced under two heads. (I.) The Chinese call the supreme god whom they worship TIEN and SHANG-TI; that is, in their language, Heaven. And the Jesuits transferred this name to the God of the Christians, whence it seemed to follow that they thought there was no difference between the chief God of the Chinese and the infinitely perfect God of the Christians, or that the Chinese had the same ideas of their TIEN or heaven, as the Christians have of God. But this the adversaries of the Jesuits deny. The first question therefore is, whether the Chinese understand by the words specified the visible material heavens, or the Lord of heaven, that eternal and all perfect Being whose throne is in the heavens and who from that throne in infinite wisdom rules all human affairs; that is, such a God as Christianity presents to us for our worship. The Jesuits maintain the latter, for they contend that these names were used by the ancient Chinese philosophers (who they think had just ideas of natural religion) to denote very clearly such a God as the Christians worship; and therefore they would not prohibit their converts from continuing to use those terms in their prayers and discourses to designate the Supreme Being; nay, they used them constantly themselves to denote the true God. But their adversaries maintain the contrary opinion, and contend that the ancient philosophy of the Chinese was full of impiety, and made no distinction between God the divine Spirit and nature or the material world. They assert moreover that Confucius himself, whom the Chinese hold in the highest veneration, was a stranger to religion and piety, and one who supposed that all existing things arose necessarily into being in the course of nature. This disagreement gave rise to very learned discussions concerning the customs, laws, and opinions of the ancient Chinese, which discussions have indeed made us acquainted with many things that were previously not well understood, but they have not decided the point for which they were undertaken. It seems that entire assent is not to be given either to the positions of the Jesuits or to those of their adversaries; and that the TIEN of the ancient Chinese was indeed far inferior in his attributes to the God of Christians, and yet was something different from the visible heavens or the air.

14. The ancient laws of China require the people annually at stated seasons to honour their deceased ancestors, with certain ceremonies which seem to be of a religious nature; and moreover all the literati of the nation at certain times must pay a kind of worship, which also seems to have a religious aspect, to the philosopher Confucius (who is accounted the father of all wisdom), in the buildings consecrated to him. (II.) Hence a second question is, whether those honours which the Chinese are required to pay to the souls of their deceased ancestors, and all the literati to Confucius, the oracle of the nation, are civil honours or religious, whether they are sacrifices or only regulations established for state purposes. The Jesuits allege that the ancient Chinese lawgivers instituted these rites to keep the people in order, and to preserve the tranquillity of the state; that the Chinese do not offer religious worship to the souls of their ancestors nor to Confucius, but only testify by certain ceremonies their grateful sense of the merits and the benefits, both of their ancestors and Confucius, and engage to copy after their example. And hence they conclude that it is allowable for Christians to observe these sacred rites of their country, provided they understand the true nature and grounds of them, and always keep in sight the object of their institution. And whoever wishes to see the cause of Christianity flourish and advance in China can scarcely think differently from the Jesuits, whether their statements are erroneous or correct. For it has been established by public law for many ages, that no one shall be accounted a good citizen in that country or be admitted to any office in the state, who does not perform the ceremonies in question. But the Dominicans and the other opposers of the Jesuits, contend that these rites are no small part of the Chinese religion, that Confucius and the souls of their ancestors are objects of religious worship to the Chinese, and of course that those who observe these rites offer an affront to the Divine Majesty and cannot be accounted Christians. The more candid among the Jesuits themselves do not deny that this is a very difficult question to decide; and hence some of them at last resorted to the plea of necessity, and urged that minor evils, if productive of the greatest advantages, are scarcely to be accounted evils.¹

¹ The public honours paid to Confucius twice a-year used to be performed before his statue, erected in the great hall or temple which is dedicated to his memory. At present they are performed before a kind of tablet, placed in the most conspicuous part of the edifice with the following inscription: "The throne of the soul of the most holy and the most excellent chief teacher, Confucius." The literati or learned celebrate this famous festival in the following manner:—The chief mandarin of the place exercises the office of priest, and the others discharge the functions of deacons, sub-

15. At the commencement of this century, Japan was filled with an astonishing multitude of people, whom the Jesuits especially had convinced of the excellence of the Christian religion. But this very brilliant success was somewhat disturbed, partly by the hatred of Christianity entertained by the national priests and by certain nobles of the court, which gave rise to severe persecutions in one place and another both of the newly converted Christians and their teachers, and partly by the internal broils and contentions among those who had the charge of this rising church. For here as in other countries the Augustinian, Dominican, and Franciscan missionaries waged a most pernicious war against the Jesuits. For both at the court of Rome and elsewhere, they taxed them with insatiable avarice, with too great indulgence both to the vices and the superstitions of the Japanese, with a crafty management unbecoming the ministers of Christ, with an eagerness to reign and give law, and with other crimes of no less magnitude. The Jesuits, on the other hand, complained that their accusers, by their imprudence, their ignorance of human nature, their pertinacity, the asperity of their manners, their rustic mode of life, and other faults, injured rather than promoted the progress of the Christian cause among that high-minded and discerning people. Yet all these causes were by no means adequate to arrest the progress of Christianity, or to bring very great evils upon the immense multitude who had made profession of this religion. And perhaps means might have been devised at Rome, if not for entirely removing yet for quieting and moderating these contentions.¹

16. But in the year 1615, the emperor of Japan himself commenced against the Christians a most direful persecution, which exceeds anything to be found in the whole history of the Christian church; and this persecution continued many years, and did not cease until it had exterminated Christianity from that empire. For the Christian religion was condemned as altogether intolerable, because it was deemed ruinous to the safety of the nation and to the majesty of their supreme pontiff, whom the populace of Japan believed to be the offspring of the gods themselves, and likewise to the most sacred institutions and religion of their ancestors. The foreign Christians therefore, the Portuguese especially and the Spaniards, were required to depart from the kingdom; and the Japanese who had renounced their idols were required to abandon Christ or undergo the most cruel death. This dreadful persecution destroyed an innumerable multitude of people of every class, age, sex, and rank, who preferred to die amid the most exquisite tortures rather than violate their vows of fidelity to Christ. And if either the Jesuits or their adversaries were guilty of faults while pleading the cause of Christ, they now as it were atoned for them by their own blood. For most of them gave themselves up to death for Christ with the greatest firmness, and some of them with joy and triumph. The causes of this horrid persecution are differently stated by different parties. The Jesuits throw some of the blame on the imprudent conduct of the Dominicans and Franciscans, and these in return ascribe it to the avacious, factious, arrogant temper of the Jesuits.² And both unitedly accuse the demons, and so on. A certain sacrifice called Chi, which consists of wine, blood, fruits, &c. is offered after the worshippers have prepared themselves for this ceremony by fasting and other acts of abstinence and mortification. They kneel before the inscription, prostrate the body nine times before it, until the head touches the ground, repeat a great variety of prayers; after which, the priest taking in one hand a cupful of wine and in the other a like cup filled with blood, makes a solemn libation to the deceased and dismisses the assembly with a blessing. The rites performed by families in honour of their deceased parents are pretty much of the same nature.

Now, in order to know with certainty whether this festival and these rites be of a civil or a religious nature, we have only to inquire whether they be the same with those ceremonies which are performed by the Chinese in the worship they pay to certain celestial and terrestrial spirits or geni, which worship is undoubtedly of a religious kind. The learned Leibnitz, in the preface to his Novissimus Sinica, undertook to affirm that the services now mentioned were not of the same kind, and consequently that the Jesuits were accused unjustly. But that great man does not appear to have examined this matter with his usual sagacity and attention. For it is evident from a multitude of accounts every way worthy of credit, and particularly from the observations made on the Chinese missions by that learned and candid Franciscan Antonio de S. Maria (Ep. Leibnitii, vol. ii.), not only that Confucius was worshipped among the idols and the celestial and terrestrial spirits of the Chinese, but that the oblations and ceremonies observed in honour of him were perfectly the same with those which were performed as acts of worship to these idols and spirits. Those who desire a more ample account of this matter may consult the following authors:—Budeus, Annal. Hist. Phil. p. 287, where he treats De superstitione Memoriorum apud Sinenses cultu; Wolfius, Not. ad Censuram, p. 312; Charnov, Annal. ad Meirgotti Historiam Cultus Sincensis. But more especially Arnaud, Morale Pratique des Jéuites, tome iii. v. vii. and a collection of historical relations published at Cologne in 8vo, in the year 1700, under the following title: Historia Cultus Sincensis, seu Patria Scripta de Cultibus Sinarum inter Vicarios Apostolicos, et P. P. S. I. controversis.—Murl.

¹ Besides the writers mentioned by Fabricius, Luce Evangelii toti orbi eorum, cap. xi. p. 678, &c. see Charlevoix, Histoire Générale de Japon, tome ii. livr. xi. &c. p. 87, &c.

² Kaempfer has given a neat account of this protracted business in the sixth of those Dissertations which he has annexed to his History of Japan, sec. iv. &c. p. 64-75, of the English edition. But it will also be but fair to hear the fuller statement of Charlevoix, who has omitted nothing that would go to excuse the Jesuits, in his Histoire Générale de Japon, tome ii. livr. xii. p. 136, &c. The other writers are mentioned by Fabri-

Dutch and English of studiously inflaming the emperor of Japan with hatred against the Portuguese and Spaniards, as well as clus, Lux Evangelii toti orbi exoriente, cap. xl. p. 678. Add the Acta Sanctorum, tom. i. Mensis Februarii, p. 723, &c. where may be seen the history of the church founded in Japan, and the life and death of those who were first slain by the Japanese on account of Christianity. Mamachi, Origines et Antiquit. Christianae, tom. ii. p. 376, &c. [Francis Xavier first preached the gospel in Japan in 1549. After he left that country in 1552 great numbers were converted, and some Japanese became Jesuits. Schools and churches were erected even in the capital Meaco. In 1585 a Japanese embassy was sent to Rome. Christianity at that time seemed about to become the prevailing religion; there were at least 200,000 Christians, and among them princes, courtiers, chief nobles, and generals; the Bonzes and their religion were openly ridiculed, and the emperor had excluded paganism altogether from a new city which he founded, and he was on terms of intimacy with the Jesuits. But the base conduct of the Europeans led the emperor to suspect Christianity to be all a farce, and he became jealous of the designs of these strangers. He was also offended at the refusal of some converted females to surrender to him their chastity; and at the instigation of his favourite in 1587, he commenced a persecution. All Jesuits were ordered to quit the country. Some obeyed, but others remained under the protection of the nobles. Out of about 250 churches, 70 were pulled down. In 1590, more than 20,000 Christians lost their lives. But the next year added 12,000 new converts. In 1596, a Spanish sea-captain driven upon the coast showed a chart of extensive countries subject to his master; and being asked how his master could conquer so many nations, he said, their missionaries went forward and prepared the minds of the people to favour him, and then fleets and armies made an easy conquest. This statement was transmitted to court, and produced great jealousy of the missionaries. The emperor swore that the Spaniards should never thus conquer Japan; and he immediately set himself to exterminate Christianity, which he called a devilish law. The missionaries were imprisoned, and not a few of them as well as their converts were put to death. The persecution continued several years. Yet in 1603 there were 120 Jesuits, most of them priests, in Japan. After this, an English officer of a Dutch ship cautioned the Japanese to beware of the military enterprises of the Spaniards; and represented the priests as designing men who had been excluded from most European countries, and who did not teach genuine Christianity. This produced a fresh persecution; and in the province of Nangasaki, where there had been more than 40,000 Christians, not one could be found in 1622; all had either renounced their religion or been put to death. Hitherto, however the number of Christians in Japan had not diminished greatly; and some estimates make them to have been about 400,000, and others near 600,000. But now things began to take a different turn. In 1616, Iejas, guardian to the young prince Idojori (who was favourable to Christianity, as were many of the nobles), slew his ward and proclaimed himself emperor. The Jesuits were objects of his jealousy; and various causes induced him to forbid the farther spread of Christianity, and the ingress of monks and priests into the country. He likewise determined to bring back the Japanese Christians to the old religion. Edicts were issued for these purposes, but they were not at once rigorously executed. At length some Franciscan monks, sent as envoys from the Spanish governor of Manila, imprudently ventured to preach openly in the streets of Meaco and to erect a church there. This exasperated the government and brought on a persecution, which is without a parallel in the annals of the church. Among the causes of it, were the intercepted letters mentioned in the text, giving account of a projected insurrection of the Christians as soon as a Spanish force should appear on the coast. As soon as these letters reached the court in 1637, decrees were passed requiring all foreigners to quit the country at once on pain of death, and subjecting every foreigner to the same penalty who should ever after set his foot in the country. The return of the Japanese Christians to paganism was now per-against the Roman pontiffs; so that they alone might have control among the Japanese and might secure their commerce to themselves. The Dutch and English reply that neither the Spaniards nor any other adherents to the Roman pontiffs were accused by them, but only that the perfidy of the Spaniards was detected. And indeed nearly all agree in this, that the emperor was persuaded by certain letters intercepted by the Dutch and by other evidence bearing a strong probability, that the Jesuits and the other teachers of the new religion designed to raise a sedition by means of their disciples, and to bring Japan under the power of the Spanish king; and hence the tyrant, equally cruel and jealous, thought he could not be quiet and secure unless he destroyed every vestige of Christianity. From that time Japan has been closed against all foreigners, and even the phantoms of the Christian name are exterminated with fire and sword. A few of the Hollanders who are allowed annually to import a small quantity of European merchandise, live in an extreme corner of the kingdom, as it were enclosed in a prison.

17. Many respectable and pious men endeavoured to rouse the Lutherans, in imitation of the Catholics, to efforts for imparting Christian truth to the nations enveloped in the darkness of degrading superstition. No one was more zealous in this cause than the Austrian nobleman, Justinian Ernest, baron of Wels, who proposed the formation of a society for this purpose which should bear the name of Jesus.¹ But there were various causes, temporarily required, on pain of death. These decrees were rigorously executed; and two years after, the Portuguese were all driven from the country, and only the Hollanders were allowed to introduce a small quantity of European goods, and to live as it were imprisoned in a corner of the empire. Thus fell the Japanese church after it had stood very nearly a century. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. iii. p. 668, &c.—Mur.

¹ Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xvii. chap. xv. sec. 23, &c. p. 1065, and part iii. chap. xv. sec. 18, p. 150; Möller, Gimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 75. [In 1664, this Hungarian baron published two letters addressed to the Lutheran community, on a reformation of manners and on efforts for the conversion of the heathen. In the first, he proposed these three questions—Is it right that we Evangelical Christians should keep the gospel to ourselves, and not seek to spread it abroad? Is it right that we everywhere encourage so many to study theology, yet give them no opportunity to go abroad, but rather keep them, three, six, or more years, waiting for parishes to become vacant or for the posts of schoolmasters? Is it right that we should expend so much in dress, high living, useless amusements, and expensive fashions, yet hitherto have never thought of any means for spreading the gospel? His proposal to form a missionary association was approved by some, but objected to by others, especially among the higher clergy. He himself advanced 12,000 dollars for the object, went to Holland on the subject, and at length shipped for the Dutch West Indies to engage himself in missionary labour, but he was no more heard of. Some feeble attempts were made to get up a missionary association afterwards; but to no and especially the situation of the Lutheran princes few of whom possessed any territories or fortified posts out of Europe, which prevented this matter from ever proceeding beyond good wishes and consultations. But the Reformed, and especially the English and the Dutch, whose mercantile adventures carried them to the remotest parts of the world and who planted extensive colonies during this century in Asia, Africa, and America, enjoyed the best advantages for extending the limits of the Christian church. Nor did these nations wholly neglect this duty; although they are taxed with grasping at the wealth of the Indians but neglecting their souls, and perhaps they did not perform so much as they might have done. Among the English, by an act of parliament in the year 1647, the business of propagating Christianity was committed to the care of a society composed of men of the highest respectability and integrity. This society was revived in the reign of Charles II. A.D. 1661, and again confirmed and invested with extraordinary privileges and rights by William III. in the year 1701; and being enriched with the splendid donations of kings, nobles, and private individuals, it has continued down to our own times.¹ From this noble institution great advantages have been derived and are still daily derived, by many nations ignorant of Christ and especially by those in America. By the labours of the Dutch, an immense number of people in the island of Ceylon, on the coast of Malabar, in the island of Formosa, and in other countries of Asia, (which the Dutch either conquered from the Portuguese or otherwise brought under their power), are said to have renounced the impious rites of their fathers.² If perhaps some extravagance may be found in these narrations, yet it is most certain that this nation after it had obtained a firm establishment in the East Indies, adopted at great expense various measures well calculated to imbue the natives with a knowledge of Christian principles.³

18. As the interior parts of Africa Proper have not yet been accessible to Europeans, they still remain wholly destitute of the light of Christian truth. But in the mari-

² See the letters addressed to John Leusden, De Successu Evangelii apud Indos Orientales, published at Utrecht, 1699, 8vo.

³ See Braun's La véritable Religion des Hollandois, p. 71, 267, &c. Amsterd. 1675, 12mo. This work is in answer to the malignant tract of Stoup, entitled, La Religion des Hollandois, in which he would insinuate that the Dutch have no regard for religion whatever. [The Dutch conquered Ceylon from the Portuguese about the middle of this century, and immediately established there the Protestant religion, excluding all others from every office. The Portuguese inhabitants, and the natives, both Catholics and pagans, in large numbers embraced the established faith at least in pretence. The country was divided into 240 parishes, a church was erected and a school established in each. Every ten schools had a catechist who was their superintendent. About 15 clergymen were assigned to the island. In 1672 Baldeus, one of the Dutch ministers, gives account of 30 native churches in the province of Jaffnapatnam, in which were about 30,000 attendants on worship upon Sundays, and about 16,000 pupils in the schools during the week. Near the close of the century, Leusden wrote to Dr. Increase Mather of Boston, "that in and near the island of Ceylon, the Dutch pastors had baptised about 300,000" of the natives. (Mather's Eccles. Hist. of New England, book iii. p. 195, fol. edit.) The Dutch had also translated and published in the Cingalese language, considerable portions of the Bible, besides catechisms, prayers, and other Christian books. The Dutch having possessed themselves of a large part of the island of Java, opened a church in Batavia the capital, in the year 1621. Pursuing much the same plans here as at Ceylon, in the year 1721 they could reckon 100,000 Christians in Java, and two Dutch, two Portuguese, and one or two Malay churches at Batavia. The New Testament in Malay was printed at Amsterdam, 1668, at the expense of the Dutch East India Company. Soon after establishing the gospel in Java, the Dutch sent ministers from Batavia to the island of Amboyna; and in 1686, it is said, they had converted 30,000 of the natives. Here too schools were established and a number of ministers stationed, at the expense of the Dutch East India Company. In 1634, the Dutch formed a settlement on the western part of the island Formosa. Robert Junius of Delft was sent out by the Dutch government to establish Christianity there. He is said to have baptised 6000 persons, and to have set up schools in which about six hundred young men were taught to read. He composed some prayers and translated certain psalms into the Formosan language; and though his labours were chiefly in the northern parts of the island, yet he had planted churches in twenty-three towns in the south, and had set pastors over them when he returned to Holland. In 1661, the gospels of Matthew and John were translated into the Formosan language by Dan. Gravius, and printed at Amsterdam, together with a Catechism. But probably before these books reached the island, it was captured by a Chinese pirate, and it has since belonged to the Chinese. Besides the converts in these places, the Dutch made many others in Sumatra, Timor, Celebes, Banda, Ternate, and the neighbouring Molucca Islands. See Brown's Hist. of the Propagation of Christianity, vol. i. chap. iii. p. 15-28.—Mur.

purpose during this century. See the authors above cited.—Mur.

¹ Kennet, Relation de la Société établie pour la Propagation de l'Evangile par le Roy Guillaume III. Rotterd. 1708, 12mo. [In 1619 an ordinance was passed by the English parliament, for the erection of a corporation, by the name of the President and Society for the propagation of the Gospel in New-England; and a general collection for its endowment was ordered to be made in all the countries, cities, towns, and parishes of England and Wales. Notwithstanding very considerable opposition to the measure, funds were raised in this manner, which enabled the society to purchase lands worth from five to six hundred pounds a year. On the restoration of Charles II. the corporation became dead in law; and Colonel Bedingfield, a Roman Catholic, who had sold to it an estate of 322 pounds per annum, seized upon that estate and refused to refund the money he had received for it. But in 1691 a new charter was granted by the king, and the honourable Robert Boyle brought a suit in chancery against Bedingfield and recovered the land. Boyle was appointed the first governor of the company, and held the office about thirty years. (See Brown's History of the Propagation of Christianity, vol. i. p. 62, &c. and Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, ed. of Toulmin, vol. iv. p. 360, &c. but especially the Connecticut Evangel. Magazine, vol. iv. p. 1, &c.) It was this society which supported the various missionary operations in New-England during the seventeenth century. Their expenditure in the year 1661 amounted to £738 8s 1d.—Mur.

time parts, especially those where the Portuguese have obtained settlements, the power of the barbarous superstitions has here and there been prostrated, and the Romish rites have succeeded in their place. Yet the candid even of the Romish communion do not deny, that the number of those in this part of the world who deserve the appellation of genuine Christians is but small; that the greater part so worship Christ, as at the same time to follow the abominable superstitions of their fathers; and that even the best of them have many defects. What little advances Christianity has made in that country are to be ascribed almost wholly to the efforts of the Capuchins, who in this century encountered incredible toils and hardships in bringing some of the ferocious nations of Africa to a knowledge of Christ. They persuaded among others the kings of Owerri and Benin to admit the truth of Christianity; and induced the very cruel and heroic queen of Matamba, Anna Zingha, in 1652 to allow herself and people to be baptized.¹ For the Roman pontiffs, or rather the society at Rome which superintends the propagation of Christianity, have judged that African missions for various reasons were attended with peculiar dangers and difficulties, and could not well be performed by any but those early accustomed to austere modes of living and to the endurance of hardships. Nor did the other Romish monks appear to envy very much the Capuchins their hard-earned glory.

19. The India of the West or what is commonly called America is inhabited by innumerable colonists professing the Romish religion, Spanish, Portuguese, and French.² But these colonists, especially the Spanish and Portuguese, as appears from the testimony of very respectable men belonging themselves to the Catholic church, are, even the priests not excepted, the lowest and most abandoned of all who bear the Christian name, and far surpass even the pagans in ridiculous rites and flagitious conduct.³ Those of the aboriginal Americans who have been reduced to servitude by the Europeans, or who reside in the vicinity of Europeans, have received some slight knowledge of the Romish religion from the Jesuits, Franciscans, and others; but the little knowledge they have received is wholly obscured by the barbarity of their customs and manners. Those Catholic priests of various orders and classes, who in modern times have visited the wandering tribes of the forests remote from the settlements of Europeans, have learned by experience that the Indians, unless they become civilized and cease to roam, are absolutely incapable of receiving and retaining on their minds the principles of Christianity.⁴ And hence, in some provinces both of South and North America, Indian commonwealths have been founded by the Jesuits with great efforts, and guarded with laws similar to those of the Europeans; and the access of all Europeans to them has nearly been cut off, to prevent their being corrupted by European vices, while the Jesuits sustain the rank both of teachers and of magistrates among them. But while the Jesuits highly extol the merits and zeal of their order in this thing, others deny their claims, and maintain that they are more eager after public honours, wealth, and power, than the advancement of Christianity; and allege that they have collected immense quantities of gold from Paraguay which is subject to their sole authority and from other countries, which they have transmitted to their society in Europe.⁵

¹ For illustration of these facts, besides Cerri, Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 222, &c. see Cavazzi, Relation Historique de l'Afrique [d'Ethiopie] Occidentale, which Labat published in French, tome iii. p. 433, &c. tome iv. p. 28, 354, &c. and nearly the whole work, which is chiefly occupied with the history of the missions performed by the Capuchins in Africa during the last century. [MacLaine finds all these references totally wrong. Schlegel says: Moshelm meant Father Fortunatus Alamandini's Historical Description of the kingdoms of Congo, Matamba, and Angola, in Italian, Bologna, 1687, fol. whose statements the Italian Capuchin and missionary, Cavazzi de Montecavallo, has copied. And these last, Labat actually translated in a free manner into French, and published in five volumes, 12mo, Paris, 1732, under the title, Relation Historique de l'Ethiopie Occidentale. And this last is the work which Moshelm had in his eye, and not that of the same Labat, which was also published in five volumes 12mo, in 1728, entitled, Nouvelle Relation de l'Afrique Occidentale.—Mur.]

² See the authors mentioned by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbis exorientis, cap. xlviii. xlix. p. 769, &c. The state of the Romish religion in that part of America occupied by Christians, is briefly exhibited by Cerri, Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 245.

³ See in particular, Frezier, Voyage de la Mer du Sud, p. 167, 218, 328, 353, 402, 417, 432, 533.

⁴ An immense number of facts on this subject are found in the letters which the French Jesuits wrote to their European friends respecting the success of their missions, and which have been published at Paris.

⁵ Labat, when asked by Tamburini, the general of the order of the Jesuits, what progress Christianity was making among the Americans, boldly and frankly said, Either none or very little; that he had not met with one adult among those tribes who was truly a Christian, that the preachers among them were useful only by baptizing occasionally infants who were at the point of death. Voyage du P. Labat en Espagne et en Italie, tome viii. p. 7. "Je lui répondis qu'on n'y avoit fait jusqu'à présent d'autres progrès que de baptiser quelques enfans moribonds sans avoir pu convertir véritablement aucun adulte." He added that to make the Americans Christians, they must first be made men—"Qu'il en falloit faire des hommes, avant qu'en faire des Chrétiens." This resolute Dominican, who had been a missionary in the American islands, wished to give the father of the Jesuits some salutary counsels respecting the immense possessions and wealth

20. In the American provinces which the British occupied in this century, the cause of Christianity was urged with more wisdom and of course with more success, upon the stupidity and amazing listlessness of the Indians. The glory of commencing this most important work is justly claimed by those Independents, as they are called, who had to forsake their country on account of their dissent from the religion established by law. Some families of this sect, that they might transmit uncontaminated to their children the religious principles they had embraced, removed in the year 1620 from Holland to New-England, and there laid the foundation of a new commonwealth.¹ As these first adventurers were not unsuccessful, they were followed in 1629 by very many of those called Puritans in England, who were impatient of the evils which they suffered from the persecution of the bishops, and of the court which favoured those bishops.² But these emigrants had at first to encounter so many hardships and difficulties in the dreary and uncultivated wilderness, that they could pay but little attention to the instruction of the Indians. More courage and more leisure for such enterprises were enjoyed by the new Puritan exiles from England, who went to America in 1623 [1633], and subsequently, Thomas Mayhew, Thomas Shepherd, John Eliot, and many others. All these merited high praise by their efforts for the salvation of the Americans; but none more than Eliot, who by translating the holy Scriptures and other religious books into the Indian language, and by collecting and suitably instructing no small number of Christian converts among the barbarians, obtained after his death the honourable title of the Apostle of the Indians.³ These of his sons in the American islands, but the cautious old man dexterously avoided the subject:—"Je voulais le mettre sur les biens que la Compagnie possède aux Isles; il éluda délicatement cet Article." With no less spirit the same Labat checked the supreme pontiff himself, Clement XI. who commended the activity of the Spaniards and Portuguese in furthering the salvation of the Americans, but taxed the French with negligence in this very important matter:—the Spaniards and the Portuguese, said Labat, have no cause to boast of the success of their labours; they only induce the Indians to feign themselves Christians, through fear of tortures and death. "Les Missionnaires Espagnols et Portugais n'avoient pas sujet de se vanter des prétendues conversions des Indiens, puisqu'il étoit constant qu'ils n'avoient fait que des hypocrites, que la crainte de la mort ou des tourmens avoit forcez à recevoir de baptême, et qui étoient demeurez après l'avoir reçu, aussi idolâtres qu'au paravant." ubi supra, p. 12. To this testimony, so very recent and of so high authority, so many more ancient might be added that it would be difficult to recount them. See also respecting the American Jesuits, the Mémoire touchant l'Établissement considérable des Pères Jésuites dans les Indes d'Espagne, which is added to Frezier's Relation du Voyage de la Mer du Sud, p. 577, &c.; Corcau, Voyages aux Indes Occidentales, tome ii. p. 67, 43, &c. See also Marnachius, Origines et Antiquités Chrétiennes, tom. ii. p. 337, &c. Respecting the Jesuits occupying the province of Paraguará or Paraguay, see Ulloa, Voyage d'Amérique, tome i. p. 540, &c. and Muratori's Tract published in 1743, in which he pleads their cause against their accusers. [A full and very favourable history of the Jesuit republic of Paraguay to A.D. 1747, with numerous documents and vouchers, may be found in the Jesuit Charlevoix's Histoire du Paraguay, Paris, 1757, 6 tomes, 12mo; also in English, but without the documents, London, 1769, 2 vols. 8vo. In 1752, the king of Spain having ceded a considerable part of this Jesuit republic to the king of Portugal in exchange for other territories, the Indians who dreaded the dominion of the Portuguese absolutely refused to be transferred, and resisted the commissioners of the two governments by force of arms. This revolt of the natives was ascribed to the influence of the Jesuits, their immediate rulers; and the enemies of that order seized this occasion to effect not only the subversion of this their republic, but likewise the overthrow of the order itself. The Portuguese government was the first to suppress the order; and to justify their proceeding they caused a narrative to be published which was printed at the Hague in French, in 1758, 8vo, with the title La République des Jésuites au Paraguay renversée, in which the character of the order is treated with no indulgence. From that time onward the order of Jesuits and their republic of Paraguay have been generally treated with execration. But of late many discerning writers, especially among the Protestants, defend the cause of the Jesuits and speak very favourably of their missionary labours in Paraguay.—Mur.

¹ Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 111; Böhmer's Englische Reformationshistorie, book vi. chap. v. p. 807,

&c. [Cotton Mather's Eccles. Hist. of New-England, book i. chap. ii. &c.; Prince's New-England Chronology; Holmes' American Annals, vol. i. and the other histories of the first planting of Colonies in New-England.—Mur.

² Increase Mather's History of New-England, p. 126, &c.; Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 182, &c. [Cotton Mather's Eccles. History of New-England, book i. chap. iv. &c. and the other writers mentioned in the preceding note.—Mur.

³ Hornbeck, De Conversione Indor. et Gentil. lib. ii. cap. xv. p. 260; Increase Mather's Epistola de Successu Evangelii apud Indos Occidentales ad Joh. Leusdenium, Utrecht, 1699, 8vo, [published also in English, in Cotton Mather's Eccles. History of New-England, book iii. p. 194, &c.] The Rev. John Eliot was born in England A.D. 1604. After leaving the university he taught school a few years, and then removed to New-England in 1631, in order to preach the gospel without molestation. The church in Boston would have settled him as a colleague with Mr. Wilson, but he had promised several friends in England that if they removed to America he would become their pastor. Accordingly on their arrival and settlement in Dorchester, he was ordained over them in November, 1632, and served them fifty-eight years or till his death in 1690. He early turned his attention to the Indians around him, learned their language in 1644, and two years after commenced a regular weekly lecture to them at Natick. It was in this year that the general court of Massachusetts passed an act or order to encourage the propagation of the gospel among the Indians. Eliot was countenanced and aided by the ministers around him, who frequently supplied his pulpit in his absence, and were always ready to afford him counsel, and also to aid him occasionally, so far as their ignorance of the Indian tongue would permit, in imparting religious instruction to the Indians. He not only preached regular weekly lectures at Natick, but likewise occasionally to the Indian congregations at Concord, Dorchester Mills, Watertown, and some other places. In the year 1670, he visited twelve towns or villages of Christian Indians under his care, in Massachusetts and along the Merrimack; in all of which there were Indian preachers regularly stationed, to serve them on Sundays and be their constant spiritual guides. At Natick there were two such teachers, and between forty and fifty communicants. For the use of these natives he translated into the Indian language, primers, catechisms, the Practice of Piety, Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, several of Mr. Shepherd's works, and at length the whole Bible, which happy beginnings induced the Parliament and people of England, after a few years, to resolve on extending the enterprise by public measures and public contributions. Hence originated that noble society which derives its name from its object, the propagation of the Gospel, and which in its progress having increased in numbers, dignity, privileges, and advantages of every kind, has gradually enlarged and extended its efforts for the salvation of the nations estranged from Christ, especially in America. Immensely more, as all must admit, remains still to be done; yet any one must be uncandid or ignorant of such things, who can deny that much has been done and with greater success than was to be anticipated. We shall hereafter have occasion to speak of Pennsylvania, in which people of all sects and religions now live intermingled and worship God in the manner they see fit. The Hollanders began to diffuse the knowledge of Christianity with great success in those provinces of Portuguese America, which they had conquered under the conduct of Maurice prince of Orange;¹ but all these prospects were intercepted by the Portuguese recovering their lost pos-was first published at Cambridge in 1661, and again just after his death. He set up schools in his Indian villages, introduced a regular form of civil government, and to some extent industry and the useful arts; and was the fountain from which the Indian preachers under him drew all their knowledge. See Cotton Mather's Life of Eliot, in his Eccles. Hist. of New-England, book iii. p. 170, &c.; Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, vol. iii. p. 361, 411; vol. iv. p. 181, 161. Brown's Hist. of the Propag. of Christianity, vol. i. p. 29, &c.—The state of Christianity among the Indians of New-England in 1687, was thus described by Increase Mather in his letter to Leusden:—"There are six churches of baptized Indians in New-England, and eighteen assemblies of catechumens professing the name of Christ. Of the Indians there are four-and-twenty who are preachers of the word of God; and besides these, there are four English ministers who preach the Gospel in the Indian tongue."—Mur.

¹ Hottinger's Topographia Ecclesiastica, p. 47; Janisson's État Présent des Provinces Unies, tome i. p. 336, &c. He also treats of Surinam and the state of religion there, in chap. xiv. p. 407. [According to the testimony of Nieuhoff, who resided in Brazil from 1610 to 1649, there were in 1643 or the year before the revolt of the Portuguese, five Protestant churches along the coast south of the Recife or Pernambuco; namely, at San Antonio, at Cap San Agostinho, at Serinhem, at Porto Calvo, and at Rio San Francisco. But these churches were not always supplied with ministers, as they came out only for limited periods. North of the Recife, there was in 1643 one Dutch minister at the Island Tamaraca and Fort Orange, another at Rio Grande, and two at Parayba. At Recife or Pernambuco and in its vicinity, there were about 400 Protestants, Dutch, French, and English, and three Dutch ministers, besides one who served on board the fleet and on inland expeditions, and likewise one French and one English minister. In 1646, there were but seven Dutch ministers in Brazil. The churches were regulated according to the synod of Dort. The minister and the churchwardens constituted the church session. The deacons visited the sick to provide for them. The children were catechized on Sundays, and the sacrament was administered four times a year. See Nieuhoff's Voyages, in Churchill's Collection, London, 1730, vol. II. p. 32.—Mur.

sessions after the year 1644. Nor did the Dutch, so far as I know, expend much labour and effort in improving the minds of the Indians who inhabited Surinam and the adjacent regions.

21. The opponents of all religion, and especially of Christianity, are represented by some as more numerous in this century, and by others as less so, according to the party and the views which they embraced. The English complain that from the time of Charles II. their nation was contaminated with the grossest of vices and profligacy, that this state of things gave rise to unbridled licentiousness of speculation and disputation on religious subjects, and that both united produced a multitude of persons who prostituted their talents and ingenuity to extinguish all sense of religion and piety. And that these complaints were not groundless, appears from the numerous examples of Englishmen of this period, who either declared war against all religion or who maintained that the religion of nature and reason was alone to be followed; and likewise from the many excellent treatises by which the most solid writers of the nation defended the divinity and excellence of Christianity against their hostile assaults. The strongest evidence however is the noble institution of the very learned gentleman, Robert Boyle, who by his will in 1691 bequeathed a splendid portion of his estate to religion, the income of which was to be annually paid over to acute and eloquent men, who should oppose the progress of impiety and demonstrate and confirm the truth of natural and revealed religion in eight public discourses each year.² Down to our own times, men of the greatest talents and genius have undertaken this service, and their discussions or discourses have been laid before the public to the great advantage of all Europe.³

² See Ricotter's Preface to his French translation of Clark's Discourses on the Being and Attributes of God, p. xlv. &c. Of Boyle himself and his merits, Edw. Budgell has treated very fully in his Memoirs of the Lives and Characters of the Illustrious Family of the Boyles, London, 1737, 8vo. See the Bibliothèque Britannique, tome xii. part i. p. 144, &c. [But above all, the late learned Dr. Birch's Life of Boyle, published in 8vo, in the year 1744; and that very valuable collection of Lives, the Biographia Britannica, Article Boyle, Robert, note (z). See also Article Hobbes, in the same collection.—Mac.

³ A catalogue of these discourses is given in the Bibliothèque Angloise, tome xv. part ii. p. 416, &c. A learned and neatly digested summary of all the discourses of this nature thus far delivered, was published not long since in English by Gilbert Burnet, which the French and the Germans have begun to translate into their languages. [This abridgment comprehends the discourses of Bentley, Kidder, Williams, Gastrell, Harris, Bradford, Blackhall, Stanhope, Clarke, Hancock, Whiston, Turner, Butler, Woodward, Derham, Boscawen, Leng, J. Clarke, Gurdon, Burnet, Berriman.—Mur.] [All these discourses were, two years afterwards, pub-

22. By the English generally Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury is represented as the leader and standard-bearer of the impious company, who from the accession of Charles II. set themselves in opposition to God and to things sacred. He was a man daring, crafty, acute, and perspicacious, but of more genius than erudition or knowledge either sacred or human.¹ He has however found some advocates out of Great Britain, who maintain that he erred indeed, yet not so culpably as to subvert the being of a God and the worship of him.² Those who shall read attentively the books he has left, must admit that if he was not himself destitute of all regard for God and religion, it is manifest his principles naturally lead to an utter disregard for all things sacred; and his writings betray not obscurely a mind most unfriendly to Christ and to the Christian religion. It is said however that in his old age he became more rational, and publicly condemned the sentiments he had formerly published;³ but whether he was sincere in this is uncertain. With more truth it may be said of John Wilmot, earl of Rochester, who attacked God and religion with even more fury than Hobbes, that he became a penitent. He was a man of great discernment and brilliancy of genius but of astonishing levity; and while his bodily powers were subservient to his will, he was libidinous and debauched.⁴ Yet it was his happy lot in the last years of his short life, through the admonition especially of Gilbert Burnet, to betake himself to the mercy of God and Jesus Christ, and he met death religiously, A.D. 1680, penitently lamenting and detesting his former wickedness.⁵ In this list may be placed Anthony Ashley Cooper, earl of Shaftesbury, who died of a consumption at Naples, A.D. 1703; not that he was an open enemy of Christianity, but his pungent wit, the elegance of his style, and the charms of his genius, rendered him the more dangerous foe to religion in proportion to the concealment he practised. Several of his works are extant and have been often published; all exquisitely fine, from the native charms of his diction and thoughts, yet exceedingly dangerous to young and inexperienced minds.⁶ Unpolished and dull lished, without abridgment, under the title of, The Boyle Lectures, a Defence of Natural and Revealed Religion, being the Sermons of the Boyle Lecture from 1691 to 1732, Lond. 1739, 3 vols. folio. A list of all the works which have been published in connexion with this Lecture down to the year 1822, may be seen in Lowndes' British Librarian, col. 838—840. The latest series which has been published is not unworthy of its predecessors; I allude to Maurice's Religions of the World and their Relations to Christianity, London, 1847, 8vo.—R.

¹ See Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome ii. p. 478; Wood's Athenæ Oxonienses, vol. ii. p. 461, of the late edition. [Add Brucker's Historia Crit. Philos. Appendix, Leipsic, 1767, 4to, p. 880, &c. where his life and character are described with impartiality and accuracy. In Cromwell's time he was a zealous adherent of the royalist party, and a defender of their rights with servile submission. Yet he lost the favour of the court and died in 1679, in his 91st year, a private country gentleman. Two of his works, namely, De Cive, Paris, 1642, 4to, and his Leviathan, 1651, folio, are most worthy of notice. In them he recommends monarchic despotism, represents the human soul as material and mortal, discards all natural distinction between moral actions, and makes morality depend wholly on the enactments of monarchs.—Schl. [The whole of the moral and political works of Hobbes, with a life of the author prefixed, were elegantly printed, probably under the eye of Warburton, London, 1750, folio. See Henke, Kirchengeschichte, vol. iv. p. 399, note.—Mur. [A fuller edition containing both the Latin and English works of Hobbes, has been just completed by Sir Wm. Molesworth, Bart. in 14 vols. 8vo, London, 1839—43. The student will see a full exposition of Hobbes' peculiar views in Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 269, &c. where there is an entire section on The Metaphysical Philosophy of Hobbes. See also Tennemann's Manual of the History of Philosophy, Johnson's translation, Oxford, 1832, p. 303, &c.—R.]

² In defence of Hobbes appeared, besides others, Gundling, Observ. Selectæ, tom. i. n. ii. p. 30, and in the Gundlingiana, par. xiv. p. 304. Add Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xvii. chap. xvi. sec. xxv. p. 1082, &c. Against these appeared Budeus, Theses de Atheismo et Superstitione, cap. i. p. 187, &c.

³ This rests on the authority of Wood, who states in his Athenæ Oxon. vol. ii. p. 646, that Hobbes wrote an Apology for himself and his writings, in which he professes never to have embraced the opinions he proposed in his Leviathan, but to have brought them forward

merely to try his ingenuity; that after writing the book he never defended those opinions either publicly or privately, but submitted them to the judgment of the church; that those positions of his book in particular which seemed to militate against the received notions of God and religion were published not as true and incontrovertible, but only as plausible and for the purpose of drawing forth the judgment of theologians concerning them. Wood does not tell us in what year this Apology appeared, which is evidence that he had not been able to examine the book. Neither does he state whether Hobbes was alive or dead when it was published. But its being placed in the list of Hobbes' writings posterior to 1682, leads to the conjecture that it was published after his death, for he died in 1672. It does not therefore yet appear what we are to think of this change of opinion in Hobbes. I can believe that such an Apology for Hobbes exists; but perhaps it was drawn up by one of his friends to shield his reputation after he was dead. Yet if it was written and published by himself, it can afford but little support to those who would defend his character. For the method Hobbes takes to excuse himself is that in which all try to clear themselves when they have incurred odium and indignation by advancing corrupt and pernicious opinions, and yet wish to live quietly though continuing to be just what they were before.

⁴ See an account of his life and writings in Wood's Athenæ Oxon. vol. ii. p. 651. On his poetic talents, Voltaire treats, Mélange de Littérature et de Philosophie, chap. xxxiv. in his Works, tome iv. p. 303.

⁵ This scene is described by Bishop Burnet in a special tract entitled, Some Passages of the Life and Death of John Earl of Rochester, written at his desire on his Deathbed, by Gilbert Burnet, D.D. It is extant also in German, French, and Latin.

⁶ His works were first published collectively, London, 1711, in three vols. 8vo, and often subsequently. They are called Characteristicks [of Men, Manners, and Opinions], from the title of the greater part of them. See Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Chinoise, tome xxiii. Some notes of Leibnitz upon them were published by Peter des Malzeaux, Recueil des diverses Pièces sur la Philosophie, tome ii. p. 245. There are some who maintain that this otherwise great and illustrious man has been as compared with these, was John Toland, an Irishman, who at the close of this century was not ashamed to disgrace himself and his country by several tracts reproachful to Christianity. But as those who pamper the vicious propensities of men seldom lack admirers, so this man who was not destitute of learning, though vainglorious and of abandoned morals, was thought something of by the undiscerning.¹ The other Englishmen of less notoriety belonging to this class need not be enumerated; yet if any one is disposed, he may add to the list Edward Henry [Herbert, baron] of Cherbury, a nobleman and philosopher, who if he did not deny the divinity of the Christian religion, yet maintained that the knowledge of it was not necessary to salvation;² and Charles Blount, the author of the Oracles of Reason, who committed suicide in 1693.³

rashly accused by clergymen of contemning religion. I wish they could clearly prove that it is so. But if I do not wholly mistake, whoever shall read but a moderate portion of his writings or only his noted Letter on Enthusiasm, which in French bears the title Essai sur la Raillerie, will readily fall in with the judgment which Bishop Berkeley passes upon him in his Alciphron or the Minute Philosopher, vol. i. dial. iii. p. 200, &c. This very ingenious man employs ridicule when seeming to speak the most gravely on sacred subjects; and divests the arguments, derived from the sacred Scriptures in support of a devout and virtuous life, of all their power and influence; nay, by recommending an indescribable and sublime kind of virtue far above the conceptions of common people, and which rests satisfied with itself, he appears to extinguish all zeal for the pursuit of virtue in the minds of common people.

¹ In my younger years I treated largely of this man in a Commentatio de Vita et Scriptis ejus, prefixed to a Confutation of his invidious book entitled Nazarenus. The deficiencies, if any occur in that Commentatio, may be supplied from the Life of Toland prefixed to his Posthumous Works published at London, 1726, 2 vols. 8vo. The author of that Life is Peter des Malzeaux, well known for various literary labours.

² Lord Herbert is sufficiently known to the learned by his book De Causis Errorum, and other writings, but especially by his work De Religione Gentilium. And not less known are the confutations of the sentiments he advances in these books, written by Musæus, Kortholt, and other celebrated divines. He is commonly considered the father of the family of Naturalists [or Deists]. See Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, par. ii. book xviii. cap. xvi. p. 1083, &c. [Cherbury is properly the founder of the modern religious indifférentism. If we may believe him, the divine origin of Christianity cannot be proved but only be rendered very probable. The whole of religion, according to him, consists in five articles: I. There is a God. II. He is to be worshipped. III. And this by the practice of virtue. IV. Repentance and reformation will procure us pardon from God. V. After this life the virtuous will be rewarded and the vicious punished.—Schl. [See more of him in Hallam's Introd. to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 132, and from p. 155, &c. and in Tennemann's Manuel, p. 309.—R.]

³ See Chaussepé's Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique et Crit. tom. i. par. ii. p. 328. He however omits his tragical death from a regard undoubtedly to the feelings of the illustrious family of Blounts, still living in England. [Concerning all the English deists mentioned in this section, their works, their opinions, and the confutation of them, see Leland's View of the principal Deistical Writers that have appeared in England in the last and present Century, with Observations, &c. first published in 1754, and since often, in 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur.]

23. In France, adjacent to England, Julius Cæsar Vanini, an Italian, author of the Amphitheatre of Providence and of Dialogues concerning Nature, was publicly burned at Toulouse in 1629 [1619], as a perverse enemy of God and of all religion. But some respectable and learned writers think that he fell a victim to personal resentment, and that he neither wrote nor lived and acted so stupidly and impiously, as to be justly chargeable with contemning God.⁴ But the character of Cosmo Ruggieri, a Florentine and a profligate, who died at Paris in 1615, no honest man will readily undertake to defend. For when about to die, he boldly declared that he regarded all that we are taught respecting a supreme Deity and evil spirits as idle tales.⁵ Whether justice or injustice was done to Casimir Leszynsky, a Polish knight who was punished capitally at Warsaw in 1689 for denying a God and divine providence, cannot easily be determined without inspection of the record of his trial.⁶ In Germany, a senseless and frantic man, Matthew Knutzen of Holstein, wished to establish a new sect of the Conscientiaries, that is, of persons who disregarding God followed only the dictates of conscience or right reason; but he was easily checked and compelled to abandon his mad project.⁷

24. Benedict de Spinoza, a Portuguese Jew who died at the Hague in 1677, is accounted the first and the most acute of

⁴ See the compilations of Budeus concerning him in his Theses de Atheismo et Superstitione, cap. i. p. 120, &c. The author of the Apology for Vanini, which was published in Holland, 1712, 8vo, was Arp, a lawyer of extensive learning, who promised a new and much enlarged edition of this little book in his Feriae Estivales seu Scriptorum suorum Historia, par. i. sec. xi. p. 28, &c. This coadjutor in vindicating the character of Vanini was Heister, Apologia pro Medicis, rec. xviii. p. 93, &c. [Vanini was a physician and a wild, enthusiastic naturalist. He travelled in England, the Netherlands, Germany, France, and Switzerland, professed himself a Catholic, but he advanced particularly in his last book, his Dialogues, such mystical and delusive opinions concerning God, whom he seemed to confound with nature, that he was burned as a heretic at Toulouse, A.D. 1619. See Schroëckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformat. vol. v. p. 646, &c.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. tom. v. p. 670; tom. vi. p. 922; Chaussepé's Dictionnaire, art. Vanini, and Stäudlin's Beiträge zur Philos. u. Gesch. vol. i. p. 147.—Mur. [Consult also Hallam, ubi supra, vol. iii. p. 123, &c. who calls him Lucilio Vanini.—R.]

⁵ Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2526. [According to Bayle, he was a great astrologer and soothsayer and openly vicious.—Mur.]

⁶ See Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xviii. chap. xvi. sec. xiv. p. 1074. The records of the trial of Leszynsky were formerly kept in the very rich library of Zuch. Conr. Uffenbach; but where they are since removed to, I do not know. [Yet from what Arnold has brought forward, it is more probable that he was innocent than that he was guilty.—Schl.]

⁷ See Müller's Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 304, &c.; and his Inaugural ad Historiam Chersones. Cimbr. par. ii. cap. vi. sec. viii. p. 164, &c.; La Croze, Entretiens sur divers Sujets d'Histoire, p. 400, &c.

all those in this century who transformed the Author of all things into a substance manacled by the eternal laws of necessity and fate. He indeed personally led a more discreet and commendable life than an immense number of Christians and others do, who have never suffered a doubt to enter their minds respecting God and the duties men owe to him; neither did he seek to seduce others into a contempt for the Supreme Being or into corrupt morals.¹ But in his books, especially those published after his death, it is manifestly his aim to prove that the whole universe and God himself are precisely one and the same thing; and that whatever takes place arises out of the eternal and immutable laws of that nature which necessarily existed and was active from all eternity. And if these things were so, it would follow that every individual is himself God and cannot possibly commit sin.² Beyond all controversy it was the Cartesian philosophy to which he entirely resigned himself that led Spinoza into these opinions. For having adopted the common maxim of all philosophers, that all things which truly exist (all realities), exist superlatively in God; and then assuming as indubitable that opinion of Des Cartes that there are only two realities, thought and extension, the one peculiar to minds and the other to matter, it was natural and even necessary that he should ascribe to God both these realities, extension and thought, without limitation or modification. And this done, it was unavoidable for him to confound God and the universe as being one and the same nature, and to maintain that there is only one real substance from which all others originate and to which all return. Moreover Spinoza's system of doctrine, as even his friends will admit, was by no means such as to captivate by its lucidity and the clearness of its evidence. For they tell us that it is to be comprehended by a kind of feeling rather than by the understanding, and that even the greatest geniuses are in danger of misunderstanding it.³ Among the disciples of Spinoza (who choose to be called Pantheists,⁴ from the principal doctrine they

¹ His life accurately written by Colerus, was published at the Hague in the year 1706, 8vo. Yet a more full and circumstantial life of him was composed by Lenglet du Fresnoy, and prefixed to Boulainvilliers' Exposition of the Doctrines of Spinoza, published at Brussels or rather at Amsterdam, 1731, 12mo. Add Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2631. [He was born at Amsterdam in 1632, where his father, a Portuguese Jew, then resided as a trader. Educated among Jews, he early manifested talent and also a propensity towards infidelity. He became a great admirer of Cartesian principles, and associated with men of education and philosophers. He was by trade a glass-grinder, and much famed for all kinds of optical glasses. His most noted works were, his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, Hamburg (Amsterdam), 1670, 4to, and Ethica ordine Geometrico Demonstrata, published soon after his death, 1677, 4to. His style is dry, argumentative, and rather obscure. Towards the close of the 18th century some of the German theologians began to admire his writings; and at this time (1831) it is said that a large number of the most pious divines of Germany are Spinozists in philosophy.—Mur.]

² A pretty long list of those who have confuted Spinoza is given by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, lib. v. par. iii. p. 119, &c. and by Jenichen, Historia Spinozismi Lehnhoferani, p. 58—72. His real opinions concerning God must be learned from his Ethics which was published after his death, and not from his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus which he published in his lifetime. For in the latter, he argues just as if he believed in an eternal deity distinct from nature and matter, who had caused a system of religion to be promulgated for imbuing men's minds with benevolence and equity, and had confirmed it by events, marvellous indeed but not supernatural. But in his Ethics he more clearly explains his views, and labours to prove that nature itself is God by its inherent powers necessarily producing movements. And this aids the confutation of those who contend that Spinoza was not so bad a man as he is generally represented, and who adduce their proofs from his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. Whether he gradually proceeded from bad to worse, or whether he cautiously concealed his real sentiments while he lived, from prudential reasons, it is difficult to say. This however is attested by the most credible witnesses, that so long as he was alive he did not publicly influence any one to think lightly of God and his worship; and he always expressed himself seriously and piously when the conversation turned upon such subjects. See Maillezeux, Vie de M. de S. Eremond, p. 118, &c. tome i. of the works of the latter. This may also be easily gathered from his Letters, which are extant among his Posthumous Works.

³ Bayle, who, no one will say, was naturally obtuse and dull of apprehension, is charged by the followers of Spinoza with not having well understood the sentiments of their master, and therefore with not having solidly refuted them. See his Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 1641, note. Meier bitterly complains in his Preface to the Posthumous Works of Spinoza, p. 21, &c. that there was a general misapprehension of the views of this extraordinary man, whose opinions all harmonised with the Christian religion. Boulainvilliers also, the expositor of Spinoza, declares in the preface to a book soon to be mentioned, p. 153, that all his opposers had either maliciously perverted his meaning or misunderstood it. "Les réfutations de Spinoza m'ont induit à Jurer, ou que leurs Auteurs n'avoient pas voulu mettre la doctrine, qu'ils combattent, dans une évidence suffisante, ou qu'ils l'avoient mal entendue." If this system of doctrine is so difficult, so far above common comprehension that even men of the greatest and most acute minds may easily mistake in stating it, what conclusion shall we make but that the greater part of the Spinozists (who are said to be very numerous all over Europe), have adopted it, not so much from any natural superiority of their genius as from the hope of indulging their lusts with impunity? For no rational and well-informed man will believe that in so great a multitude of persons, many of whom never once thought of improving their intellectual powers, all can see through that which puzzles the most perspicacious. [See also Hallam, Introduct. to the Literature of Europe, vol. iv. p. 155, 243, 263; and Tennemann's Manuel, &c. p. 322, &c. containing full references to the several works which have appeared on Spinoza and his doctrines.—R.]

⁴ To relieve his poverty and satisfy his hunger, John Toland composed and published at Cosmopolis (London), in 1720, 8vo, an infamous and corrupting book entitled Pantheisticon, in which he exhibits the Formula celebranda Societatis Socraticæ seu Pantheistice; that is, the mode of conducting meetings among the Pantheists whom he represents as scattered everywhere, and the morals of this faction are here graphically depicted. In this book—than which none can be more pernicious to honest but unguarded minds—the President and the members of the society of Pantheists confer with each other. He earnestly recommends to his associates and fellows attention to truth, liberty, and health, and dissuades them from embrace rather than bear the name of their master), the first rank was held by Lewis Meier, a physician and a familiar friend of Spinoza,¹ also one Lucas,² the count Boulainvilliers,³ and some others.

superstition, that is religion; and sometimes he reads to the brethren select passages from Cicero and Seneca, in which there is something favourable to irreligion. They solemnly promise that they will obey his injunctions. Sometimes the whole company becomes so animated that they simultaneously raise their voices, and sing merrily some verses from the ancient Latin poets suited to their morals and principles. See Maitzeaux, Life of John Toland, p. 77; Bibliothèque Angloise, tome viii. par. ii. p. 285. If the Pantheists are such as they are here represented, it is not for wise men to dispute with them, but for good magistrates to see to it that such impudent geniuses do not creep into society and seduce the minds of citizens from their duty.

¹ Spinoza employed this Meier as an interpreter to translate into Latin what he wrote in Dutch. Meier also attended his dying master and in vain attempted to heal his disease. And he moreover published the Posthumous Works of Spinoza with a Preface, in which he endeavours without success to demonstrate that Spinoza's doctrine contains nothing at variance with Christianity. He was also the author of the well-known book entitled Philosophia Scripturae Interpretes, Eleutheropoli, 1699, 4to, in which the dignity and authority of the sacred books are subjected entirely to the decisions of philosophy.

² Lucas was a physician at the Hague noted for his panaceas and for the obliquity of his morals. This flagitious man left a Life of Spinoza from which Du Fresnoy drew the additions that he made to the Life of Spinoza composed by Colerus. There is also in circulation and sold at a high price to those who can relish such writings, his Marrow of Spinoza's doctrine, L'Esprit de Spinoza. Compared with this, what Spinoza himself wrote will appear quite tolerable and religious, so greatly has the wretched writer overleaped the bounds of all modesty, discretion, and good sense.

³ This man of a prolific but singular and unchastened genius, well known by his various works relating to the political history of France, by his Life or rather fable of Mohammed, by his misfortunes, and by other things, was so inconsistent with himself as to allow to both superstition and Atheism nearly an equal place in his ill-arranged mind. For while he believed that there was no God but nature or the universe, he still had no hesitation to record Mohammed as one whom God raised up to instruct mankind; and he believed that the future fortunes of individuals and of nations might be learned from the stars. This man, from his great solicitude for the public good, was much troubled that the excellent doctrines of Spinoza were misunderstood by almost everybody; and therefore he voluntarily assumed the task of expounding and stating them in a plain and lucid manner, suited to the comprehension of ordinary minds. His attempt succeeded; but it produced only this effect, that all now perceived more clearly than before that Bayle, and the others who regarded the opinions of Spinoza as irrational in themselves and subversive of all religion and virtue, did not mistake them. His work merited eternal oblivion. But Du Fresnoy brought it before the public; and that it might be bought and read with less suspicion he gave it the false title of a Confutation of Spinoza's Doctrine, and added some tracts really deserving that character, together with a Life of Spinoza. The whole title of this dangerous book is this: Réfutation des Erreurs de Bénédict de Spinoza, par M. de Bénédict, Archevêque de Cambrai, par le P. Lami, Bénédictin, et par M. le Comte de Boulainvilliers, avec la Vie de Spinoza, écrite par M. Jean Colerus, augmentée de beaucoup de particularités tirées d'une Vie manuscrite de ce Philosophe, faite par un de ses Amis. (This was Lucas of whom we spoke before.) A Bruxelles, chez François Foppens, 1731, 12mo. Thus the wolf was penned among the sheep. Boulainvilliers' exposition and defence of Spinoza's doctrine, which to deceive people is called a Refutation, constitutes the greatest part of the book; nor is it placed last, as in the titlepage, but occupies the foreground. The book also contains more than the

25. How much and how happily all branches of literature and the arts and sciences, as well those which belong to the province of reason and the intellect as those which belong to the empire of invention, memory, and the imagination, were cultivated and advanced throughout Christendom in this century, appears from innumerable proofs which need not here be detailed. The minds of men already awake were farther excited near the beginning of this century, and they were sagaciously shown the path they should pursue by that very great man, Francis Bacon Lord Verulam, the Apollo of the English; and particularly in his books On the Dignity and the Advantages of the Sciences, and his New Organ of the Sciences (De Dignitate et Augmentis Scientiarum and Novum Organum Scientiarum).⁴ It would be vain indeed to expect that mankind who are beset with a thousand obstructions to their seeing things nakedly and as they really are, should do all that he requires of the cultivators of science and literature; for this extraordinary man was sometimes borne away by his vast and intuitive genius, and required of men not what they are able to do but what he could wish might be done. Yet it would be injustice to deny that a great part of the advances which the Europeans made in every species of knowledge in this century is ascribable to his counsels and admonitions; and especially that those who had treated of physical and philosophical subjects almost like blind men, by his assistance began gradually to open their eyes and to philosophise in a wiser manner. And through his influence it was, I apprehend, that while most people in the preceding age supposed all human knowledge was carried to its perfection by the study of the Greek and Latin classics, and by an acquaintance with the liberal and elegant arts, many gradually ceased to think so and saw that there were more wholesome aliments for the mind of a wise man.

26. That the mathematical, physical, and title specifies. For the motley collection is closed by a work of Isaac Orobio, a Jewish philosopher and physician (who held not the lowest place among the friends and disciples of Spinoza), entitled Certamen Philosophicum Propugnatum Veritatis Divinæ ac Naturalis adversus Jo. Bredenburgii principia. This work was printed at Amsterdam, 1703, 8vo.

⁴ See his life prefixed to the late edition of his entire works, Lond. 1740, fol. and the extracts from it in the Bibliothèque Britannique, tome xv. par. i. p. 128. &c.; Mallet's Vie de François Bacon, Amsterd. 1742. 8vo, where, see especially his efforts to introduce a better mode of philosophising, p. 6, 12, 50, 102. &c.; add Voltaire's Mélanges de Littérature et de Philosophie, chap. xiv. p. 125, &c. [and especially Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. sec. ii. On the Philosophy of Lord Bacon, p. 166, &c.—R.]

astronomical sciences in particular were carried to so great perfection among most of the nations of Europe, that those who lived before this period were comparatively but children in these sciences, is most manifest. In Italy Galileo Galilei, supported by the grand dukes of Tuscany, led the way;¹ and there followed among the French René des Cartes, Peter Gassendi, and innumerable others; among the Danes Tycho Brahe; among the English, besides others of less fame, Robert Boyle and Isaac Newton; among the Germans John Kepler, John Hevelius, Godfr. Wm. Leibnitz; and among the Swiss the Bernoulli.² To these men of the first order so many others eagerly joined themselves that there was no nation of Europe, except those which had not yet become civilized, which could not boast itself of some excellent and renowned geometrician, natural philosopher, or astronomer. Their ardour was stimulated not only by the grand dukes of Tuscany, those hereditary patrons of all learning and especially of these branches, but also by the very powerful monarchs of France and Great Britain, Charles II. and Louis XIV. The former established in London, as the latter did in Paris, an academy or society of learned and inquisitive men, guarded against the contempt of the vulgar and the insidious influences of sloth by very ample honours and rewards; whose business it was to examine nature most critically, and to cultivate all those arts by which the human mind is rendered acute in discerning the truth, and in promoting the convenience and comfort of mankind.³ This advance of learning has been exceedingly useful, not only to civil society but also to the Christian church. For by it the dominion of superstition, than which nothing can be more injurious to true religion or more dangerous to the safety of the state, has been greatly narrowed; the strongest bulwarks have been erected against fictitious prodigies, by which people were formerly greatly affrighted, and the boundless perfections of the Supreme Being, especially his wisdom and power, have been most solidly demonstrated from the character and structure both of the universe at large and of its individual parts.

27. Much darkness was removed from the minds of Christians by the knowledge of history and especially of early church history, which men of deep research in many places acquired and disseminated. For the origin and causes of a great number of opinions which antiquity and custom had rendered as it were sacred, being now historically exposed, numerous errors which before had occupied and enslaved men's minds of course lost their authority, light and peace arose upon many minds, and the lives of many were rendered more blameless and happy. This better knowledge of history likewise restored very many persons to a fair reputation whom the ignorance or the malice of former ages had branded with the name of heretics; and this served to protect many pious and good men from being misled by the malignant and the ill-informed. History also showed that various religious disputes, which formerly embroiled nations and involved them in bloodshed, rebellion, and crimes, arose from very trivial causes, from the ambiguity of terms, from ignorance, superstition, envy and emulation, or from the love of pre-eminence. It traced back many rites and ceremonies which were once regarded as of divine origin to polluted sources, to the customs of barbarous nations, to a disposition to practice imposition, to the irrational fancies of half-educated men, and to a foolish desire of imitating others. It taught that the rulers of the church by base arts had possessed themselves of no small share of the civil power; and by binding kings with religious terrors, had divested them of their wealth. It evinced that the ecclesiastical councils, whose decrees were once regarded as divine oracles, were often conventions of very ignorant men, nay sometimes of arrant knaves. Several other things of the like nature might be mentioned. How salutary all this must have been to the cause of Christianity, how much gentleness towards those of different sentiments, how much caution and prudence in deciding upon the opinions of others, how much relief to the innocent and the good against the ill-disposed grew out of it, and how many pernicious artifices, frauds, and errors it has banished from human society, we may learn from our own daily experience of our happy condition.

¹ See Heumann's Acta Philosophorum, written in German, part xiv. p. 261; part xv. p. 467; part xvii. p. 803.

² See most of these eminent men noticed in chapter viii. vol. iv. of Hallam, ubi supra.—R.

³ A History of the Royal Society of London was published by Thomas Spratt, London, 1722, 4to. See Bibliothèque Angloise, tome xi. part i. p. 1, &c. [A much more interesting and ample history of this respectable society has lately been composed and published by Dr. Birch, its learned secretary.—MacL.] A History of the Parisian Academy of Sciences has been published by Fontenelle. A comparison between the two academies is made by Voltaire, Mélanges de Littérature et de Philosophie, chap. xxvi. in Œuvres, tome iv. p. 317. [Of the origin of these two national societies, see also Hallam, ubi supra, vol. iv. p. 562, &c. A more recent account of the Royal Society and of its contributions to science, has been compiled by Dr. Thos. Thomson, professor of chemistry in the Univ. of Glasgow, entitled History of the Royal Society from its Institution to the end of the Eighteenth Century, Lond. 1812, 4to, and one more recent by C. R. Weld, Lond. 1818.—R.]

28. Those Christians who gave attention to Hebrew and Greek literature and to the languages and antiquities of the eastern nations (and very many prosecuted these studies with great success), threw much light on numerous passages of the holy Scriptures which were before either dark and obscure, or misunderstood and erroneously adduced in support of opinions rashly taken up, nay made to teach error and false doctrine. And the consequence was, that the patrons of many vulgar errors and groundless opinions were deprived of the best part of their armour. Nor will the wise and the good maintain that there was no advantage to religion from the labours of those who either kept Latin eloquence from becoming extinct, or in imitation of the French laboured to polish and improve the vernacular languages of their respective nations. For it is of great importance to the welfare and progress of the Christian community, that it should not lack men who are able to write and to speak properly, fluently, and elegantly on all religious subjects, so that they may bring the ignorant and those opposed to religion to listen with pleasure to what they ought to learn, and readily to comprehend what they ought to know.

29. The moral doctrines inculcated by Christ and his apostles received a better form and more support against various abuses and perversions, after the law of nature or of right reason had been more critically investigated and better explained. The incomparable Hugo Grotius [or De Groot] stood forth a guide to others in this department, by his work On the Rights of War and Peace (De Jure Belli et Pacis); and the excellence and importance of the subject induced a number of the best geniuses to follow him with alacrity.¹ How much aid the labours of these men afforded to all those who afterwards treated of the life and duties of a Christian, will be manifest to any one who shall take the trouble to compare the treatises on this subject composed after their times, with those which were previously in estimation. It is certain that the boundaries of Christian and natural morality were more accurately determined; some Christian duties, the nature of which was not well understood by the ancients, were more clearly defined; the great superiority of the divine laws to the dictates of mere reason was more lucidly shown; those general principles and solid grounds, by which all the Christian's doubts and conflicts respecting right and wrong in action may be easily settled, were established; and finally, the folly of those who audaciously maintained that the precepts of Christianity were at variance with the dictates of sound reason, that they subverted nature, were calculated to undermine the prosperity of nations, rendered men effeminate, diverted them from the proper business of life, and the like, was vigorously chastised and refuted.

30. But it is proper to make some particular remarks on the state of philosophy among Christians. At the commencement of this century, nearly all the philosophers were distributed into two sects, namely, that of the Peripatetics and that of the Fire-Philosophers or the Chemists. And during many years, these two sects contended for pre-eminence with very great warmth, and in a great number of publications. The Peripatetics held nearly all the professorial chairs both in the universities and the inferior schools, and they were furious against all who thought Aristotle should either be corrected or abandoned; as if all such had been traitors to their country and public enemies of mankind. Most of this class however if we except the professors at Tübingen, Helmstadt, Altorf, and Leipsic, did not follow Aristotle himself, but rather his modern expositors. The Chemical or Fire-Philosophers roamed over nearly every country of Europe, assumed the obscure and deceptive title of Rosacruzian Brethren (Rosacruziani Fratres),² which had some apparent respecta-

² It is abundantly attested that the title of Rosacruzians was given to the Chemists, who united the study of religion with the search after chemical secrets. The term itself is chemical, nor can its import be understood without a knowledge of the style used by the chemists. It is compounded, not as many think, of rosa and crux (a rose and the cross), but of ros (dew) and crux. Dew is the most powerful of all natural substances to dissolve gold. And a cross in the language of the fire-philosophers is the same as Lux (light); because the figure of a cross exhibits all the three letters of the word Lux at one view. Moreover, this sect applied the term Lux to the seed or Menstruum of the Red Dragon, or to that crude and corporeal light which being properly concocted and digested produces gold. A Rosacruzian therefore is a philosopher who by means of dew seeks for light, that is, for the substance of the philosopher's stone. The other interpretations of this name are false and deceptive; and were invented and given out by the chemists themselves, who were exceedingly fond of concealment, for the sake of imposing on others who were hostile to their religious views. The true import of this title was perceived by the sagacity of Peter Gassendi, Examen Philosophiæ Fluddianæ, sec. xv. in his Opp. tom. iii. p. 261. But it was more lucidly explained by the celebrated French physician, Eusebius Renaudot, Conférences Publiques, tome iv. p. 87. Very much, though ill arranged, respecting these Rosacruzian brethren who made so much noise in this century, their society, institutes, and writings, may be found in Arnold's bility, as it seemed to be derived from the arms of Luther, which were a cross upon a rose; and in numerous publications, some of them more and some of them less able and severe, they charged the Peripatetics with corrupting and perverting both reason and religion. The leaders of the band were Robert Fludd,¹ an Englishman of a singular genius, Jacob Boehme, a shoemaker of Gorlitz, and Michael Mayer.² These were afterwards succeeded by John Baptist Helmont and his son, Francis Mercurius,³ Christian Knorr of Rosenroth,⁴ Quirin Kuhlmann,⁵ Henry Noll,⁶ Julius Sperber,⁷ and numerous others, but of unequal rank and fame. Harmony of opinion among this sort of people no one would expect. For as a great part of their system of doctrine depends on a kind of internal sense, on the imagination, and on the testimony of the eyes and the ears—than which nothing can be more fluctuating and fallacious—this sect of course had almost as many disagreeing teachers as it had writers of much note. There were however certain general principles in which they all agreed. They all held that the only way to arrive at true wisdom and a knowledge of the first principles of all things was by analyzing bodies by the agency of fire. They all imagined there was a sort of coincidence and agreement of religion with nature, and held that God operates by the same laws in the kingdom of grace as in the kingdom of nature; and hence they expressed their religious doctrines in chemical terms as being appropriate to their philosophy. They all held that there is a sort of divine energy or soul diffused through the frame of the universe, which some called Archaus, others the universal spirit, and others by various appellations. They all talked much and superstitiously about (what they called) the signatures of things, about the power and dominion of the stars over all corporeal beings and even over men, and about magic and demons of various kinds. And finally,

¹ See Glafey's History of the Law of Nature, written in German, and prefixed to a Bibliotheca Juris Nature et Gentium, Lips. 1739, 4to. [See a full account of this work and of the opinions of Grotius in Hallam's Intro. to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 384, &c.—R.]

Kirchen-und Ketzlerhistorie, part II. book xvii. chap. xviii. p. 1114, &c. [According to most of the writers on the subject, the name Rosencrucians was not assumed by all the Fire-Philosophers, nor was it first applied to men of that description; but it was the appropriate name of an imaginary association first announced about the year 1610, into which a multitude of Fire-Philosophers or alchemists eagerly sought admission. The earliest writing professedly from them was either published or republished at Frankfurt A.D. 1615, in German, and afterwards in Danish, Dutch, and Latin; and bore the title of "Fama Fraternitatis, or Discovery of the Brotherhood of the praiseworthy Order of the Rosy-cross, together with the Confession of the same Fraternity, addressed to all the learned heads in Europe; also some answers by Mr. Haselnuycer and other learned persons to the Fama, together with a Discourse concerning a general Reformation of the whole World." The next year, 1616, David Mederus wrote "that the Fama Fraternitatis and the Confession had then been, for six years, printed and dispersed in five languages." In the Fama, p. 15, &c. the founder and head of the Fraternity is said to have been one Christopher Rosencreutz, a German, born in the year 1388, who became a pilgrim, visited the holy sepulchre and Damascus, where he was instructed by the wise men, and afterwards learned magic and the Cabala at Fez and in Egypt; on his return to Germany he undertook to improve human knowledge, and received several into his fraternity in order to commence the business, and lived to the age of 100 years, a sage far in advance of the men of his age. This fraternity it was said continued down to the time of these publications. A vast excitement was produced by this publication in 1615. Some declared in favour of the fabled Rosencrucian society, as a body of orthodox and learned reformers of the world, and others charged them with errors and mischievous designs. But in the year 1619, Doctor Jo. Valentine Andreæ, a famous Lutheran divine, published his Tower of Babel, or Class of Opinions respecting the Fraternity of the Holy-Cross; in which he represents the whole history as a farce, and gave intimations that he was himself concerned in getting it up. But many enthusiastic persons, especially among the Fire-Philosophers, continued to believe the fable, and professed to know many of the secrets of the society. Much continued to be written about them for a long time, and indeed the whole subject is involved in great obscurity. See Arnold, ubi supra, vol. ii. p. 244—258, ed. Schaffhausen, 1741; Henke's Gesch. der christl. Kirche, vol. iii. p. 509—511, and the authors there cited. For the origin and character of the Theosophists or Fire-Philosophers, see above on the preceding century, p. 641, &c.—Mur.

¹ For an account of this singular man, to whom our Boehme owed all his wisdom, see Wood's Atlanæ Oxoniensis, vol. i. p. 610, and Historia et Antiq. Acad. Oxoniensis, lib. II. p. 390, &c. Concerning Helmont the father, see Witte, Memorie Philosophorum, and others. Respecting Helmont the son, see Keller, Miscellanea Leibnitiana, p. 226, and Leibnitz's Epidæla, vol. iii. p. 353, 354. Concerning Boehme, see Arnold, and various others. Respecting the rest, various writers must be consulted. [See also page 808, below.—R.

² See Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 376, &c. [He was a learned physician and a good man. He died at Magdeburg, A.D. 1622, aged 54.—Mur. [See some particulars of Fludd and Boehme, in Hallam's Introduct. to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 153, 4, and in Teuennann's Manual, &c. p. 311, 12.—R.

³ Concerning him, see Brucker's Hist. Critica Philosophiæ, tom. iv. par. i. p. 709, &c.—Schl.

⁴ As Brucker, who gives account of the preceding Fire-Philosophers, is in everybody's hands, while the history of Knorr of Rosenroth must be derived from the more rare Nama Literaria of Krause, lps. 1718, p. 191, we shall here offer the reader a brief notice of him. Christian Knorr of Rosenroth was a Silesian nobleman, who together with no ordinary knowledge of medicine, philology, and theology, possessed a particular acquaintance with chemistry and the Kabbala, and was privy counsellor and chancellor to Christian Augustus, the palatine of Sulzbach. He was born in 1636, and died in 1689. His most important work was his Kabbala Denudata, in 2 vols. 4to. printed, vol. i. Sulzb. 1678, and vol. II. Frankfurt-on-Mayn, 1684. He also aided the publication of many Rabbinical works, and particularly of the book Sohar, at the Hebrew press in Sulzbach, 1684, fol.—Schl.

⁵ See concerning him, Brucker, ubi supra, p. 706; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzlerhist. part III. chap. xix. p. 197, &c.; and Bayle's Dictionnaire, article Kuhlmann.—Schl.

⁶ He belonged to the gymnasium of Steinfurt in Westphalia, was afterwards professor of philosophy at Giessen, and at last preacher at Darmstadt. He applied himself also to chemistry and medicine, and was a follower of Paracelsus. He wrote, among other things, Systema Hermæuticæ Medicinæ, and Physica Hermæutica, in which there are very many paradoxical propositions.—Schl.

⁷ This man also belonged to the Rosencrucians. He was a counsellor at Anhalt-Dessau, and composed many Theosophic tracts which were published at Amsterdam in 1660 and 1662, 8vo. He died A.D. 1616.—Schl.

they all expressed their very obscure and inexplicable ideas in unusual and most obscure phraseology.

31. This contest between the chemical and the Peripatetic philosophers was moderated, and a new method of philosophising was introduced by two great men of France, namely, Peter Gassendi, professor of mathematics at Paris and canon of the church at Digne, a man of erudition, well acquainted with the belles lettres, eloquent also and deeply versed in all branches of mathematics, astronomy, and other sciences; and René des Cartes, a French chevalier and soldier, a man of an acute and subtle genius, but much inferior to Gassendi in literary and scientific acquirements. Gassendi in the year 1624 forcibly and ingeniously attacked Aristotle and the Aristotelians, by publishing some Exercitations against Aristotle; but the work excited so much resentment and was procuring him so many enemies, that from his strong love of peace and tranquillity he desisted from continuing the publication. Hence only two books of the work which he projected against Aristotle were published; the other five (for he intended to embrace the whole subject in seven books) were suppressed in their birth.¹ He likewise in an appropriate work attacked Fludd, and through him the Rosacruzian Brethren,² which was not unacceptable to the Aristotelians. At length he pointed out to others, though cautiously and discreetly, and he himself entered upon that mode of philosophising, which ascends by slow and timid steps from what strikes the senses to what lies beyond their reach, and prosecutes the knowledge of truth by observation, attention, experiment, and reflection on the movements and the laws of nature; that is, from the contemplation of particular events and changes in nature, endeavours gradually to elicit some general ideas. In these inquiries he called in the aid especially of the mathematics, as being the most certain of all sciences; and neglected metaphysics, the precepts of which he regarded as so dubious that a man desirous to know truth can safely confide in but very few of them.³

32. Des Cartes philosophised in a very different manner. For he abandoned the mathematics, which he at first had made his chief dependence, and betook himself to general ideas or to metaphysics, in order to come at that truth which was the object of his pursuit. Calling in the aid therefore of a few very simple positions, which the very nature of man seems almost to dictate to him spontaneously, he first endeavoured to form in his own mind distinct ideas of souls, bodies, God, matter, the universe, space, and of the principal objects of which the universe is composed. Combining these ideas together and reducing them to a scientific form or system, he applied them to the correction, improvement, and solid establishment of the other parts of philosophy; always taking care that what followed or was brought out last should coincide with what went before and appear to rise spontaneously from it. Scarcely had he brought his reflections before the public, when a considerable number of discerning men in most countries of Europe, who had been long dissatisfied with the dust and darkness of the schools, approved and embraced his views, and wished to see Des Cartes recommended to the studious youth and the Peripatetics set aside. On the other hand, the whole tribe of Peripatetics, aided by the clergy who feared that religion was in danger from some secret plot, raised a prodigious dust to prevent the new philosophy from supplanting the old; and to carry on the war with better success, they bitterly taxed the author of it, not only with the grossest errors but also with downright Atheism. This will appear the less surprising, if we consider that the Aristotelians fought, not so much for their system of philosophy as for their personal interests, their honours and emoluments. The Theosophists, Rosacruzians, and Chemists seemed to enter into the contest with more calmness; and yet there was not one of them who did not regard the doctrines of the Peripatetics, vain and injurious to piety as they were, as far more tolerable than the Cartesian discoveries.⁴

derived by them from the precepts of metaphysics, have little of certainty and solidity. [Further information respecting the philosophical views of Gassendi may be seen in Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iv. p. 194, &c.—R.]

⁴ Here should be read, besides the others who have written the history of Des Cartes and his philosophy, Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, in French, printed at Paris, 1691, 2 vols. 4to. Add the Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. et Crit. tome ii. p. 39. [The student should refer to Hallam, ubi supra, vol. iii. p. 229, &c. for an able summary of the philosophical views of Des Cartes. See also respecting his principles and his followers, and the works which treat of this system, Tennemann's Manual, &c. p. 314, &c.—R.]

¹ See Bougerell, Vie de Gassendi, p. 17, 23.

² The title of his book was, Examen Philosophiæ Fluddianæ, sive Exercitatio Epistolica, in qua Principia Philosophiæ Roberti Fluddi releguntur, et ad recentiores illius libros adversus Marinum Mersennium (a friend of Gassendi) scriptus Respondetur, cum aliquot Observationibus Cælestibus, Paris, 1630, 8vo.—S.H.

³ Those who wish for farther information on this subject may consult his Institutiones Philosophiæ, a diffuse performance, which fills the two first volumes of his works [published by Siorbierre in 6 vols. fol. A.N. 1658]. Throughout these Institutiones it seems to be his main object to show that the opinions of the philosophers, both ancient and modern, on most subjects,

The result of this long contest finally was, that the wiser part of Europe would not indeed give themselves up entirely to the philosophy of Des Cartes alone, yet in conformity with his example, they resolved to philosophise more freely than before and to renounce their servitude to Aristotle.

33. The great men contemporary with Des Cartes very generally applauded his plan and purpose of philosophising without subjecting himself to a guide or master, of proceeding circumspectly and slowly from the first dictates of nature and reason to things more complex and difficult, and of admitting nothing till it was well examined and understood. Nor was there an individual who did not acknowledge that he was the author of many brilliant and very useful discoveries and demonstrations. But some of them looked upon his positions respecting the causes and principles of natural things as resting for the most part on mere conjectures; and considered the groundwork of his whole system, namely, his definitions or ideas of God, the first cause of matter and spirit, of the essential nature of things, of motion and its laws, and of other similar subjects, as either uncertain or leading to dangerous errors or contrary to experience. At the head of these was his countryman, Peter Gassendi, who had attempted to lower the credit of the Aristotelians and the Chemists before Des Cartes, and who was his equal in genius, much his superior in learning, and most expert in all the branches of mathematics. He endeavoured to overthrow those metaphysical principles which Des Cartes had made the foundation of his whole system; and in opposition to his natural philosophy, he set up another which was not unlike the old Epicurean, but far better, more perfect, and more solid, and founded not on mental conceptions, but on experience and the testimony of the senses.¹ The followers of this new and very sagacious teacher were not numerous, and were far outnumbered by the Cartesian host; yet it was a select band, and pre-eminent for attainments and ardour in mathematical and physical knowledge. Among his countrymen Gassendi had few admirers; but among their neighbours, the English, who at that time were much devoted to physical and mathematical studies, he had a larger number of adherents. Even those English philosophers and theologians who combated Hobbes (whose doctrines more resembled those of Gassendi than they did those of Des Cartes), and who, in order to confute Hobbes, revived the Platonic philosophy, such as William [Benjamin] Whichcote, Theophilus Gale, Ralph Cudworth, Henry Moore, and others, did not hesitate to associate Plato with Gassendi, and to put such a construction upon the latter as would make him appear the friend of the former.²

34. From this time Christendom was divided by two distinguished sects of philosophers, who, though they had little dispute about things of most practical utility in human life, were much at variance respecting the starting points in all philosophical reasoning, or the foundations of all human knowledge. The one may not improperly be called the metaphysical sect, and the other the mathematical; nor would the leaders in these schools probably reject these appellations. The former trod in the footsteps of Des Cartes, the latter preferred the method of Gassendi. That supposed truth was to be discovered by reasoning; this, rather by experiments and observation. That placed little dependence on the senses, and trusted more to reflection and ratiocination; this placed less dependence on reasoning, and relied more on the senses and the actual inspection of things. That deduced from a few metaphysical principles a long list of dogmas, by which it affirmed a way was opened for acquiring a certain and precise knowledge of the nature of God, of souls, of bodies, and of the entire universe; this did not indeed reject the principles of metaphysics, but it denied their sufficiency for constructing an entire system of philosophy, and contended that long experience, a careful inspection of things, and experiments often repeated, were the best helps to the attainment of solid and useful knowledge. That boldly soars aloft to examine the first cause and source of truth, and the natures and causes of all things, and returning with these discoveries, de-

¹ See in particular his Disquisitio Metaphysica, seu Dubitationes et Instantiæ adversus Cartesii Metaphysicam et Responsa, which was first published in 1641, and is inserted in the third volume of his works, p. 283, &c. A neat compendium of his whole system of philosophy was drawn up by Bernier, a celebrated French physician, Abrégé de la Philosophie de Gassendi, Lyons, 1684, 8 vols. 12mo. From this compendium, the views of this great man may be more easily learned than from his own writings, which are not unfrequently designedly ambiguous and equivocal, and likewise overloaded with various learning. The Life of Gassendi was not long since carefully written by Bougerel, one of the Fathers of the Oratory, Paris, 1737, 12mo. concerning which, see Biblioth. Française, tome xxvii. part ii. p. 353, &c.

² See the remarks we have made in the Preface to Cudworth's Intellectual System, g. 2 a. and in many places of our Notes to that work [in the Latin translation, by Mosheim.—Mur. [The English reader will find all these notes translated into English in Harrison's edition of Mosheim's Cudworth; of which see note 1, p. 29, above.—R.

scends to explain by them the changes which take place in nature, the purposes and the attributes of God, the character and duties of men, and the constitution and fabric of the universe; this, more timid and modest, first inspects most attentively the objects which meet the eye and which lie as it were at our feet, and then ascends to inquiries into the nature and causes of things. That supposes very much to be perfectly well understood, and therefore is very ready to attempt reducing its knowledge into the form of a regular and complete system; this supposes innumerable things to elude our grasp, and instructs its followers to suspend all judgment on numerous points, until time and experience shall throw more light upon them; and lastly, it supposes that the business of making out complete systems, as they are called, either entirely exceeds human ability, or must be left to future generations who shall have learned far more from experience than we have. This disagreement respecting the first principles of all human knowledge has produced much dissension upon subjects of the greatest importance, such as the character of God, the nature of matter, the elements of bodies, the laws of motion, the mode of the divine government or providence, the constitution of the universe, the nature and mutual relation of souls and bodies; and the wise who reflect upon the subject of these disputes, and upon the habits and dispositions of human minds, are fearful that these controversies will be perpetual.¹ At the same time, good men would be less troubled about these contests if the parties would show more moderation, and would not each arraign the other as chargeable with a grievous offence against God, and as subverting the foundations of all religion.²

¹ Voltaire published a few years since, La Métaphysique de Newton, ou Parallèle des Sentimens de Newton et de Leibnitz, Amsterd. 1740, 8vo, which little book, though not so accurately written as it should be, nor a complete treatise on the subject, will yet be not a little serviceable to those who wish to know how much these philosophical schools disagree.

² It is well known that Des Cartes and his followers, the metaphysical philosophers, were formerly accused by vast numbers and they are still accused of subverting all religion and piety. In the list of Atheists Unmasked, by Harduin (Œuvres Mêlées, p. 200, &c.), Des Cartes, with his principal and most noble followers, Anthony le Grand and Sylvanus Regis, hold a conspicuous place. Nor is the name of Malebranche, though many think nearer allied to the fanatics, excluded from this black catalogue. (See p. 43.) It is true that Harduin very often talks like one delirious; yet he does not here follow his own genius, but adopts the views of the Porriatetic and Mathematical sects, who more fiercely than others assailed the Cartesian philosophy. And even very recently Voltaire, though he is much more moderate, yet not obscurely assents to these accusations. (Métaphysique de Newton, chap. l. p. 3, &c.)

35. All those who either embraced the sentiments of Des Cartes or adopted his rules of philosophising endeavoured to elucidate, confirm, amend, and perfect the metaphysical method in philosophy. And these persons were very numerous in this century, especially in Holland and France. But as some of this class not obscurely undermined religion and the belief of a God, of whom Benedict de Spinoza was the ringleader, and as others of them abused the precepts of their master to pervert and overthrow certain doctrines of religion, as Balthazar Becker, hence in various places the whole school became extremely odious. There were none who pursued the metaphysical method more wisely and at the same time more acutely than Francis Nicholas Malebranche and Godfrey William Leibnitz; the former, a Frenchman and one of the Fathers of the Oratory, a man equally eloquent and acute; the latter, a German, to be ranked with the first genius of any age.³ Neither of them indeed received all the dicta of Des Cartes, but they adopted his general method of philosophising, added many opinions of their own, improved many things, and confirmed others with more solid arguments. Malebranche yielded too much to his very fertile imagination; and therefore he often inclined towards those who are agreeably deceived by the visions of their own creation. Leibnitz depended entirely on his reason and judgment.

36. The mathematical philosophy already mentioned had a much smaller number of followers and friends, the causes of which

Nor were the Metaphysical philosophers more temperate towards their adversaries. Long since, Anthony Arnauld considered Gassendi in his dispute against Des Cartes as subverting the immortality of the soul. And Leibnitz added that the whole of natural religion was corrupted and shaken by him. See Matzeaux, Recueil des Diverses Pièces sur la Philosophie, tome II. p. 166. Nor does Leibnitz hesitate to declare that Isaac Newton and his adherents rob God of his best attributes and perfections, and rip up the foundations of natural religion. And most of the writings of both parties even down to our times are full of such criminalities.

³ Concerning Malebranche, the author of the interesting work entitled, Search after Truth [Recherche de la Vérité, Paris, 1673, 3 vols. 12mo, also translated into English, in one vol. fol.—Mur.], and of other metaphysical works, see Fontenelle, Éloges des Académiciens de l'Académie Royale des Sciences, tome I. p. 317, &c. For what is reprehensible in his philosophy, see Harduin's Atheists Unmasked, in his Œuvres Mêlées, p. 43, &c. The life and doctrines of Leibnitz are described by the same Fontenelle, ubi supra, tome II. p. 9. But his history and his philosophy are the most copiously described by Ludovick, in his History of the Leibnizian Philosophy, written in German, 2 vols. Lips. 1737, 8vo. The genius of this great man may be most satisfactorily learned by reading his Epistola, published by Kortholt, in 3 vols. 8vo, Leipzig, and afterwards by others. Nor is it necessary I should here draw his portrait. [Of these two eminent men see also Hallam, ubi supra.—R.]

will readily occur to those disposed to inquire for them. But it found a new domicile in Great Britain, the philosophers of which perceiving in its infantile and immature features a resemblance of the great Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, took it into their arms, cherished it, and to our times have given it fame. The whole Royal Society of London, which is almost the public school of the nation, approved of it, and with no less expense than pains and patience improved and extended it. In particular, it is very much indebted for its progress to those immortal men, Isaac Barrow, John Wallis, John Locke, and Robert Boyle, who should have been named first, a very religious gentleman, much noted among other things for his very learned works. The theologians also of that country, a class of men whom philosophers are wont to charge with violently opposing their measures, deemed it not only sound and harmless, but most useful to awaken and cherish feelings of reverence for the Deity and to defend religion, and most consonant with the decisions of the Holy Scriptures and the primitive church. And hence all those who publicly assailed the enemies of God and religion in the Boyle Lectures, descended into the arena clad in its armour and wielding its weapons. But by the ingenuity and diligence of no one have its increase and progress been more aided than by those of Isaac Newton, a man of the highest excellence, and venerable even in the estimation of his opposers; for he spent the whole of his long life in digesting, correcting, amplifying, and demonstrating it, both by experiments and by computations; and with so much success, that from only silver it seemed to become gold in his hands.¹ The English say that the excellence and the superior value of this philosophy may be learned from this fact, that all those who have devoted themselves wholly to it have left behind them bright examples of sanctity and solid piety; while, on the other hand, many of the metaphysical philosophers have been entirely estranged from God and his worship, and were teachers and promoters of the greatest impiety.

37. But although these two illustrious schools had deprived the ancient ones of their pupils and their reputation, yet all the philosophers would not join themselves to the one or the other of them. For liberty of thinking for themselves being obtained, some men of superior genius and acumen, and some also whose imaginations were stronger than their judgments, ventured to point out new ways for discovering latent truths. But nearly all of them failed of obtaining many followers, so that it will be sufficient just to glance at the subject. There were some whose mediocrity of talents or whose native indolence deterred them from the difficult and laborious task of investigating truth by the efforts of their own minds; and who therefore attempt to collect and form into a kind of system the best and most satisfactory principles admitted by all the schools. These are commonly denominated Eclectics. And finally, from these very contests of the philosophers, some very acute men took occasion to despair of finding the truth, and again to open the long-closed school of the Sceptics. Among these, the more distinguished were Francis Sanches, a physician of Toulouse,² Francis de la Mothe le Vayer,³ Peter Daniel Huet, bishop of Avranches,⁴ and some others. It is usual and not without reason to place among this class Peter Bayle,⁵ who acquired high reputation in the latter part of this century by various works rich in matter and elegant in style.

² There is a celebrated work of his entitled, De eo, quod nihil scitur; which, with his other tracts and his Life, was published at Toulouse, 1636, 4to. See Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2530, and Peter de Villemandy's Skepticismus Debellatus, cap. iv. p. 32.

³ See Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome iv. art. Vayer, p. 2780, &c.

⁴ His book on the Weakness of Human Reason was published after his death, both in French, Amsterdam, 1723, 8vo, and recently in Latin. But it appears that long before this book was either published or written, Huet had recommended the mode of philosophising adopted by the sceptics, and thought this alone best suited to establish the Christian religion. See his Commentarius de Rebus ad eum pertinentibus, lib. iv. p. 230, and his Demonstratio Evangelica, prefaco, sec. iv. p. 9, where he approves of the measures of those who first enervate all philosophy and expel it from the mind by sceptical arguments, before they prove to the doubting the truth of Christianity. We are aware that the Jesuits, to whom Huet was much inclined, formerly adopted with success and do still adopt this very hazardous artifice, in order to draw over Protestants to the Romish community.

⁵ Who at this day can be unacquainted with Bayle? His Life, copiously written in two volumes 8vo, by Des Maizeaux, was published at the Hague in 1732 [and is prefixed to the fifth edition of his Dictionnaire Hist. et Critique, Basil, 1738, 4 tomes, fol.] His scepticism was most clearly shown and confuted with great dexterity by De Crousaz, in a very copious French work (Examen du Pyrrhonisme), a neat abridgment of which was made by Sam. Formey [Le Triomphe de l'Évidence], and translated from French into German, by Haller, Götting, 1750, 8vo. [See also Bayle's own answer to this and other charges brought against him, subjoined to the fifth edition of his Dictionnaire, tome iv. p. 616; &c.—Mur.]

¹ This great man's Elementa Philosophiæ Mathematicæ, often printed, and his other writings, philosophical and mathematical and also theological, are of great notoriety. His life and merits are elegantly described by Fontenelle, Elogé des Académiciens de l'Académie Royale des Sciences, tome ii. p. 293-323. Add Biblioth. Anglois. tome xv. part ii. p. 545, and Biblioth. Raisonnée, tome vi. part ii. p. 478.

SECTION II.

THE PARTICULAR HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

PART I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ROMISH OR LATIN CHURCH.

I. AT the commencement of this century, the Romish church was governed by Clement VIII. [A.D. 1592-1605] whose former name was Aldobrandini, and who reigned in the close of the preceding century. That he possessed genius and cunning, and was very zealous for suppressing Protestantism and extending the Romish church, all admit; but whether he had all the prudence necessary for a sovereign pontiff, many have questioned. He was succeeded [during 27 days] in the year 1605 by Leo XI. of the family of Medici, who died at an advanced age in the very year of his elevation and left the Romish chair to Paul V. of the family of Borghese [1605-1621], who was a man of violent passions and frequently a most insolent asserter of his prerogatives, as appears, among other things, from his rash and unsuccessful conflict with the Venetians. In Gregory XV. [1621-1623] of the family of Ludovici, who was elected in 1621, there was more moderation than in Paul V. but no more gentleness towards those who forsook the Romish church. This however is the common and almost necessary fault of all the Roman pontiffs, who without it could scarcely fulfil the high duties of their office. Urban VIII. of the family of Barberini [1623-1644], whom the favour of the cardinals placed in the Romish chair in 1623, showed himself very favourable and liberal to learned and literary men, being himself well versed in literature and an excellent writer both in prose and verse;¹ but towards the Protestants he was extremely cruel and harsh. Yet Urban will appear kind and good, if compared with Innocent X. [1644-1655] of the family of Pamphili, who succeeded him in 1644. For he was ignorant of all those things of which ignorance is least excusable in heads of the church, and surrendered up himself and all public affairs civil and sacred to the control of Olympia his kinswoman, a most vicious creature, avaricious and insolent.² His very zealous efforts to prevent the peace of Westphalia, I do not think we should reckon among his peculiar crimes, because, if I am not greatly mistaken, the best of pontiffs would have done the same. His successor in 1655, Alexander VII. previously Fabius Chigi [A.D. 1655-1667], is deserving of a little more commendation. Yet he was not lacking in any of those stains which the pontiffs cannot wash off and yet preserve their rank and authority; and discerning and distinguished men even in the Romish church have described him as possessing slender talents, inadequate to the manage-ferred the title of Eminence on the cardinals and on all cardinal-legates, on the three clerical German electors, and on the grand master of the order of Malta.—Schl.

² Mémoires du Cardinal de Retz, tome iii. p. 102, &c. newest edition. Add tome iv. p. 12. Respecting his contests with the French, see Bougeant's Histoire de la Paix de Westphalie, tome iv. p. 56, &c. [Respecting Olympia, see La Vie d'Olympe Mالدوحيني Princesse Pamphili, trad. de l'Italien de l'Abbé Guadoli, avec des notes par M. I. Geneva (or rather Paris), 1770, 12mo. The original was published in 1666, 12mo. Innocent before his election had lived in free intercourse with Olympia, which was continued after his elevation, and was carried to such lengths that the Donna, under the reign of her dear brother-in-law, possessed all power, sold all offices and prebends, gathered money in a thousand ways, opened the despatches of the envoys, and guided and controlled all state affairs. She suppressed nearly 2,000 minor cloisters, and thereby obtained vast sums; and other cloisters threatened with the same fate had to purchase their freedom. She was for some time excluded from the palace and removed from the court by cardinal Pancirolla and his creature, the pretended cardinal Pamphili, whose proper name was Astaldi and who had no connexion with the pope. But she soon after returned to her old place and was the absolute mistress of the Vatican, where she at last took up her residence; indeed the unfriendly chroniclers say that one of her earrings was found in the pope's bed. And such was the pontiff who persuaded Ferdinand III. to hold the sword always drawn over the Protestants, who condemned Janseuius, and who entered his dissent against the peace of Westphalia.—Schl.

¹ See Leo Allatius, Apes Urbanae, which little book was republished by Fabricius at Hanburg. It is a full catalogue of the learned and excellent men who adorned Rome in the pontificate of Urban VIII. and who experienced the liberality of that pontiff. The neat and elegant Latin poems of this pontiff have been often printed. [These poems were written while he was a cardinal. Under him nepotism greatly prevailed, and the political transactions of his court are ascribable more to his nephews and family than to him. He procured a very distinguished edition of the Romish Breviary, suppressed the order of female Jesuits, con-

ment of great affairs, an insidious disposition, and the basest instability.¹ The two Clements IX. and X. who were elected, the one in 1668 and the other in 1669 [1670-1676], performed little worth recording for posterity. The former was of the family of Rospigliosi, and the latter of that of Altieri.² Innocent XI. previously Benedict Odescalchi, who ascended the papal throne in 1677 [1676-1689], acquired a high and permanent reputation by the strictness of his morals, his uniform consistency, his abhorrence of gross superstition, his zeal to purge religion of fables and reform the clergy, and by other virtues. But his example most clearly shows that much may be attempted and but little accomplished by pontiffs, although they possess perfectly sound views and upright intentions; and that the wisest regulations cannot long resist the machinations of such a multitude of persons, fostered and raised to power and influence by licentiousness of morals, pious frauds, fables, errors, and worthless institutions.³ At least, nearly all the praiseworthy regulations and enactments of Innocent fell to the ground and were overthrown by the indolence and the yielding temper of Alexander VIII. of the Ottoboni family, who was created pope in the year 1689 [A.D. 1689-1691].⁴ Innocent XII. of the family of Pignatelli, a good man and possessed of fine talents, who succeeded Alexander in the year 1691 [A.D. 1691-1700], wished to restore the regulations of Innocent XI. to their authority, and he did partially restore them. But he too had to learn that the wisest and most vigorous pontiffs are inadequate to cure the maladies of the court and church of Rome; nor did posterity long enjoy the benefits he had provided for them.⁵ At the very end of the century, 1699 [A.D. 1700-1721], Clement XI. of the family of Albani was placed at the head of the Romish church. He was clearly the most learned of the cardinals, and not inferior to any of the preceding pontiffs in wisdom, mildness, and the desire to reign well. Yet he was so far from strenuously opposing the inveterate maladies and the unseemly regulations of the Romish church, that indiscreetly and as he supposed for the glory and security of the church, i.e. of the head of it, he rather admitted many things which conduce to its dishonour, and which show that even the better sort of pontiffs, through their zeal to preserve or to augment their dignity and honour, may easily fall into the greatest errors and faults.⁶

¹ See the Mémoires du Card. de Retz, tome iv. p. 16, &c. p. 77, who very sagaciously decides many points respecting him; also Mémoires de M. Joly, tome ii. p. 186, 210, 237, who speaks equally ill of Alexander; and the celebrated Arckenholz, Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome ii. p. 125, &c. [The craft and dissimulation attributed to this pontiff really constituted an essential part of his character; but it is not strictly true that he was a man of a mean genius, or unequal to great and difficult undertakings. He was a man of learning, and discovered very eminent abilities at the treaty of Munster, where he was sent in the character of nuncio. Some writers relate that while he was in Germany he had formed the design of abjuring popery and embracing the Protestant religion, but was deterred from the execution of his purpose by the example of his cousin count Pompey, who was poisoned at Lyons on his way to Germany after he had abjured the Romish faith. These writers add that Clift was confirmed in his religion by his elevation to the cardinalship. See Bayle, Nouvelles de la Répub. des Lettres, Octob. 1688.—Mach.]

² Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome ii. p. 126, 131. [Clement IX. was a ruler fond of peace and splendour, a foe to nepotism, and a benevolent friend to his subjects. Clement X. was no less fond of peace than his predecessor, but he introduced a peculiar kind of nepotism by adopting as his son the cardinal Paolucci. Yet his six years' reign exhibited nothing remarkable.—Schl.]

³ See the Journal Universel, tome i. p. 441, &c. tome vi. p. 306. The present pontiff, Benedict XIV. attempted in the year 1743 to enrol Innocent XI. among the saints. But Louis XV. king of France, influenced it is said by the Jesuits, resisted the measure because Louis XIV. had had much controversy with this pontiff, as we shall state hereafter. [It is a remarkable circumstance in his life, that in the Thirty Years' War he served in Germany as a soldier; and there is still shown at Wolfenbüttele the house in which as an officer he is said to have resided. This circumstance indeed the count Turresonico has called in question, in his work De Supplicitatibus Stipendibus Militariibus Benedicti Odescalchi, Como, 1742, fol. But Heumann has placed the fact beyond all doubt in the Hannoversch. nützlichen Sammlungen, 1755, p. 1185; and in the Beiträge von alten u. neuen theologischen Sachen, 1755, p. 882. He however afterwards assumed the sacred office; and even on the papal throne exhibited the virtues of a military commander, courage, strictness, and inflexibility of purpose. He sought to diminish the voluptuousness and splendid extravagance of his court, to correct all abuses among the clergy, and to extirpate nepotism. But he often went too far, and his reforming zeal frequently extended to things indifferent. For instance, he wished to prohibit the clergy from taking snuff, and the ladies from learning music and the like. And in this way he would have hindered the good effects of his zeal for reformation if he had met with no obstructions to be overcome. To canonization and to the reading of the bull In Cœna Domini he was no friend. He actually canonized no one; and on Maunday Thursdays, on which this bull was to be read, he always gave out that he was sick. His Life was written by Philip Bonamici, the papal secretary of the Latin Briefs, with design probably to favour his canonization, in which business he was the Postulator; and it was entitled Commentar. de Vita et Rebus Gestis Venerab. Servi Dei Innocentii XI. Pont. Max. Rome, 1776, 8vo.—Schl.]

⁴ Alexander VIII. restored nepotism, condemned the Jesuitical error of philosophical sin, and benefited the Vatican library by purchasing the library of queen Christina.—Schl.

⁵ Cardinal Henry Norris says much respecting Innocent XII. his election, character, and morals. In his Epistles, published in his Opera, tom. v. p. 362, 365, 370, 373, 380. [His hostility to nepotism, and his inflexibility, his strictness, and his frugality, were as great as those of Innocent XI. His strictness he manifested in particular by forbidding the clergy to wear wigs, and by requiring the monks to live according to their rules. He was so little disposed to burn heretics that the Inquisition began to doubt his orthodoxy; and when he wished to protect Molinos, they by commissioners put this question to him, "What did Aloysius Pignatelli believe?"—Schl.]

⁶ There were published the last year [A.D. 1752], in French, two biographies of Clement XI. the one composed by the celebrated Laflau, bishop of Sisteron in

2. The great pains taken by the Romish church to extend their power among the barbarous nations which were ignorant of Christianity have been already noticed. We have therefore now only to describe their care and efforts to recover their lost possessions, or to bring the Protestants under subjection. And for this their efforts were astonishingly great and various. In the struggle they resorted to the powers of genius, to arms and violence, to promises, to flatteries, to disputations, and to wiles and fallacies, but for the most part with little success. In the first place, in order to demonstrate the justice of that war which they had long been preparing to carry on by means of the house of Austria against the followers of the purer faith, they in part suffered and in part caused the peace settled with the Protestants by Charles V. to be assailed by Casper Scioppius, a perfidious but learned man, by the Jesuits, Adam Tanner, Anthony Possevin, Balthazar Hager, Thomas Hederick, and Lawrence Forer, the jurists of Dillingen and others. For they wished to have it believed that this treaty of peace was unjust, that it had no legitimate force, and that it was violated and rendered null by the Protestants themselves, because they had either corrupted or forsaken the Augsburg Confession.¹ This malicious charge was repelled privately by many Lutheran divines, and publicly in 1628 and 1631, by order of John George, elector of Saxony, in two volumes accurately drawn up by Matthias Hoe, which were called the Lutherans' Defence of the Apple of their Eye (Defensio Pupillæ Lutheranae), to indicate the importance of the subject. The assailants however did not retreat, but continued to dress up their bad cause in numerous books written for the most part in an uncouth and sarcastic style. And on the other hand, many of the Lutherans exposed their sophisms and invectives.

3. The religious war which the pontiffs had for a long time been projecting to be carried on by the Austrians and Spaniards commenced near the beginning of the century in the Austrian territories, where those citizens who had renounced the Romish religion were oppressed in numberless ways with impunity by their adversaries, and were divested of all their rights.² Most of them had neither resolution nor ability to defend their cause, though guaranteed by the most solemn treaties and laws. The Bohemians alone, when they perceived it to be the fixed purpose of the adherents of the pope, by gradual encroachments to deprive them of all liberty of worshipping God according to the dictates of their consciences, though purchased with immense expense of blood by their fathers and but recently confirmed to them by royal charter, resolved to resist the enemies of their souls with force and arms. Therefore having entered into a league, they ventured courageously to avenge the wrongs done to them and to their religion. And that they sometimes went farther than either discretion or the precepts of that religion which they defended would justify, no one will deny. This boldness terrified their adversaries, but it did not entirely dismay them. The Bohemians therefore in order to pluck up the very roots of the evil, when the emperor Matthias died in 1619, thought it their duty to elect for their sovereign one who was not a Roman Catholic. This they supposed they had a right to do by the ancient privileges of the nation, which had been accustomed to elect their sovereigns by a free suffrage, and not to receive them by any natural or hereditary right. The consequence was that Frederick V. the electoral prince Palatine, who professed the Reformed religion, was chosen and solemnly crowned this very year at Prague.³

4. But this step, from which the Bohemians anticipated security to their cause, brought ruin upon their new king and upon themselves various calamities, including that which they most dreaded, the loss of a religion purged of Romish corruptions. Frederick, being vanquished by the imperial forces at Prague in the year 1620, lost not

France, Vie de Clement XI. Padua, 1752, 2 tomes, 8vo; the other composed by Reboullet, chancellor of Avignon, Histoire de Clement XI. Avignon, 1752, 2 tomes, 4to. Both (but especially the latter) are written with elegance; both contain many historical errors which French historians are commonly not duly careful to avoid; both are not so much histories as panegyrics, yet are such that discerning readers can easily discover that though very discreet, Clement from a desire to confirm and exalt the pontifical majesty did many things very imprudently, and by his own fault brought much vexation on himself. [On the characters and policy of these pontiffs, see especially Ranke's Popes of Rome, vols. ii. and iii. Mrs. Austin's translation.—R.]

¹ Respecting these writings see, besides others, Salig's Histoire des Augab. Confession, vol. i. book iv. chap. iii. p. 458, &c. [See also Schlegel's notes to this paragraph —Mur.]

² What occurred in Austria itself is laboriously narrated by Raupach, in his Austria Evangelica, written in German. The sufferings of the friends of a purer faith in Styria, Moravia, and Carinthia, and the arts by which they were utterly suppressed, the same diligent and pious writer intended to have described from published and unpublished documents, but death prevented him. [Something on the subject, as far down as the year 1664, to which date Raupach had arrived when death overtook him, Winkler has left us in his Anecdota Hist. Eccles. par. vii. p. 233, &c.—Schl.]

³ Here, in addition to the writers of the ecclesiastical history of this century, Carolus, and Jäger, see Struve's Synagma Hist. German. p. 1487, 1510, 1523, 1538, &c. and the authors he cites. Add the accurate Le Vassor's Histoire de Louis XIII. tome iii. page 223, &c.

only the kingdom he had occupied, but also his hereditary dominions; and now an exile, he had to give up his very flourishing territories, together with his treasures, to be depopulated and plundered by the Bavarians. Many of the Bohemians were punished with imprisonment, exile, confiscation of their property, and death; and the whole nation from that time onward was compelled to follow the religion of the conqueror, and to obey the decrees of the Roman pontiff. The Austrians would have obtained a much less easy victory, or would have at least been obliged to give better terms to the Bohemians, if they had not been aided and assisted by John George I. the elector of Saxony, who was influenced both by his hatred of the Reformed religion and by other motives of a political nature.¹ This overthrow of the prince Palatine was the commencement of the Thirty Years' War which was so disastrous to Germany. For some of the German princes, entering into a league with the king of Denmark, took up arms against the emperor in support of the prince Palatine, who, they maintained, was unjustly deprived of his hereditary dominions. For they contended that this prince, by invading Bohemia, had not injured the German emperor but only the house of Austria; and that the emperor had no right to avenge the wrongs of that house by inflicting the penalties decreed against princes who should rebel against the Roman empire. But this war was not attended with success.*

5. The papists therefore, being elated with the success of the emperor, were confident that the period most earnestly longed for had now arrived, when they could either destroy the whole mass of heretics or bring them again under subjection to the church. The emperor giving way too much to this impression, fearlessly carried his arms through a great part of Germany; and he not only suffered his generals to harass with impunity those princes and states which manifested less docility than was agreeable to the Romish court, but also showed by no doubtful indications that the destruction of all Germanic liberty, civil and religious, was determined upon. And the fidelity of the elector of Saxony to the emperor, which he had abundantly evinced by his conduct towards the elector Palatine, and the disunion among the princes of Germany, encouraged the belief that the apparent obstructions to the accomplishment of this great object might be overcome with but moderate efforts. Hence in the year 1629, the emperor Ferdinand II. to give some colour of justice to this religious war, issued that terrible decree called from its object the Restitution Edict, by which the Protestants were commanded to deliver up and restore to the Romish church all ecclesiastical property which had fallen into their hands since the religious peace established in the preceding century.³ The Jesuits especially are said to have procured from the emperor this decree; and it is indeed ascertained that this sect had purposed to claim a great part of the property demanded as due to them in reward of their great services to the cause of religion; and hence arose a violent contest between them and the ancient possessors of that pro-

¹ Here may be consulted the Commentarii de Bello Bohemico Germanico ab anno Chr. 1617, ad ann. 1630, 4to; Le Vassor's Histoire de Louis XIII. tome iii. p. 411, &c. Compare also on many points in these affairs Scultetus' Narratio Apologetica de curricula Vitæ suæ, p. 86, &c. It is a matter of notoriety that the Roman Catholics, and particularly the Jesuit Martin Hecan, induced Matthias Hœ, who was an Austrian by birth and chaplain to the elector of Saxony, to make it appear to his master that the cause of the Palatinate, as being that of the Reformed religion, was both unrighteous and injurious to the Lutheran religion, and to persuade him to espouse the cause of Austria. See the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1747, p. 858. [This Scultetus was the known court preacher to the unfortunate king of Bohemia; and he is said to have contributed much to his resolving to accept the Bohemian crown. Yet this last fact Scultetus denied, though he admitted that he subsequently commended the king for having taken that resolution, and that in one of his sermons he exhorted him to manly courage. Matthias Hœ of Hoeneg, of noble Austrian birth, burned with the most terrible religious hatred against the Reformed, and actually abhorred them more than he did the Catholics. To be convinced of this we need only to read his Manifest Proofs that the Calvinists harmonize with the Arians and the Turks, or his Thoughts respecting the Heilbron League of the Protestant States with Sweden; which last piece is in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, vol. xxxiv. p. 570—581. These traits in his character were known, and perhaps also the susceptibility of his heart in respect to gold. And hence the Jesuitical emissaries, and particularly Becan, were able (by their unassuming and flattering letters, in which they represented the misfortune it would be to have the Bohemians fall under the dominion of a Reformed prince) to give such a direction to his mind that he exerted himself against the Reformed, and hindered his master from entering into a league with them. His master was attached to the Evangelical Lutheran faith, was very conscientious, and believed simply whatever his confessor said, by whom (as it is expressed in the above-cited Thoughts, &c.) he inquired of the Lord. The Austrian gold at the same time may also have had considerable influence on the court preacher's eloquence. At least it is openly stated that the court preacher afterwards received 10,000 dollars from the imperial court, to divert the elector of those scruples of conscience which might cause him [to oppose] the peace of Prague so injurious to the common cause. See Puffendorf, Rerum Suevicar. lib. vii. p. 193.—Schl.

* The principal historians of this war are Kevenhüller, Annales Ferdinandæ; Von Chemnitz, Swedish War; Puffendorf, De Robus Suecicis; and the Histories of the Thirty Years' War, by Bougeant, Krause, Schiller, &c. See Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 321, note.—Mur. [On all these transactions see especially Ranke's Popes of Rome, volume ii. full of original and authentic information not elsewhere accessible.—R.

³ This subject will be found illustrated by the authors mentioned in Scrive's Synagma Histor. German. p. 1553, &c. and by the others mentioned above. [See note 1, p. 596, above.—Mur.

party.¹ The soldiers forthwith gave weight and authority to the imperial mandate wherever they had power; for whatever the Romish priests and monks claimed as theirs—and they set up false claims to many things which by no right belonged to them—the soldiers without any previous investigation wrested at once from the possessors, often with intolerable ferocity; nor did they hesitate to treat innocent persons with various and most exquisite cruelty.

6. Unhappy Germany amid these commotions was in trepidation, nor did she see among her sons any one sufficiently powerful to resist the enemy now rushing upon her on every side; for the councils of her princes were exceedingly distracted, partly by religious considerations, partly by eagerness for personal aggrandizement, and partly by fear. But very opportunely Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, the great hero of his age, whom even envy could celebrate after his death, came forward and opposed himself to the Austrian forces. At the instigation especially of the French, who were jealous of the growing power of Austria, he landed in Germany in 1629 with a few forces, and his victories in a short time destroyed in a great measure the very confident expectations of soon triumphing over our religion, entertained by the emperor and the pope. But their extinguished hopes seemed to revive again in 1632, when this great assertor of Germanic liberty fell victorious in the battle of Lützen.² Time however in some measure repaired this immense loss; and the war was protracted to the great misfortune of Germany, amid various vicissitudes, through many years, until the exhausted resources of the parties in it and the policy of Christina, the daughter of Gustavus and queen of Sweden, who desired a peace, put an end to these evils and sufferings.

7. After a violent conflict of thirty years, the celebrated peace called the Peace of Westphalia, because it was concluded at Munster and Osnaburg, cities of Westphalia, in the year 1648, gave repose to exhausted Europe. It did not indeed procure for the Protestants all the advantages and privileges which they wished for, because the emperor would not be induced by any consideration to reinstate perfectly the Bohemians and the Austrians in their former privileges, nor restore the Upper Palatinate to its former sovereign, nor to mention other difficulties of less moment which it was necessary to leave untouched; yet the peace procured much greater advantages to the adversaries of the Romish see than its patrons could well brook, and it established firmly the great interests of the Lutheran and Reformed churches. In the first place, the peace of Augsburg which the Lutherans obtained of Charles V. in the preceding century, was placed beyond the reach of all machinations and stratagems; and moreover the edict which required them to restore the ecclesiastical property of which they had obtained possession since that peace was annulled; and it was determined that each party should for ever possess all that was in its hands at the commencement of the year 1624. The advantages acquired by each of the Protestant princes (and to many of them they were not inconsiderable) it would detain us too long to enumerate.³ The Roman pontiff in the mean time clamoured loudly, and left no means untried to interrupt the pacification; but neither the emperor nor any one who favoured his cause was daring enough to venture again upon that perfidious sea, on which they had with difficulty escaped shipwreck. The compact was therefore signed without delay, and all the stipulations made in Westphalia were ratified and executed at Nuremberg in the year 1650.⁴

8. After this period, the Roman pontiffs and their confederates did not venture to attack the professors of the Reformed religion by public war; for they found no opportunity to attempt so perilous a measure with any good prospects. But wherever it could be done without fear of the consequences, they exerted themselves to the utmost to abridge the Protestants very much of their rights, advantages, and privileges, though confirmed by oaths and the

³ Whoever wishes for circumstantial information on this whole subject will find abundant satisfaction in the Acta Pacis Westphalica et Executionis ejus Norimbergensis, an immortal work of immense labour, compiled by Von Meyern. As a shorter history, instead of all others may be consulted the work of Adam Adam, bishop of Hierapolis, entitled Relatio Historica de Pacificatione Osnaburgico-Monasteriensis, which the illustrious author republished, improved, and rendered more accurate than before, Lelps. 1737, 4to. Very elegant also, and composed for the most part from the documents of the French envoys, is the very eloquent Jesuit Bougeant's Histoire de la Paix de Westphalie, Paris, 1746, 6 volumes, 8vo. Nor is this Jesuit's history only neat and beautiful; it is likewise in general true and impartial.

⁴ Innocent X. assailed this peace in a warm epistle or bull, A.D. 1651. On this epistle there is extant a long and learned commentary of Hornbeck, entitled Examen Bullæ Papalis, qua P. Innocentius X. abrogare nititur Pacem Germanicam, Utrecht, 1652, 4to. Perhaps the pontiff's epistle would have found the emperor and his associates ready to listen to it, if it had been backed by gold to give it weight.

¹ See Salig's Histoire der Augsb. Confession, vol. i. book iv. chap. iii. sec. xxv. p. 810, &c.

² Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome i. p. 7—20, where much is said of Gustavus, his achievements, and his death. The author of this book also illustrates, in various respects, the history of the peace.

most sacred enactments. In Hungary for instance the Protestant citizens, both Lutheran and Reformed, were tormented with innumerable vexations for ten years together, from 1671 to 1681.¹ Of the lesser evils which they suffered, both before and after this storm, from men of various classes but especially from the Jesuits, there was neither measure nor end. In Poland, all who dissented from the Roman pontiff experienced nearly throughout the century, to their very great sorrow and distress, that no compact limiting the power of the [Papal] church was accounted sacred and inviolable at Rome. For they were deprived of their schools and of very many of their churches, dispossessed of their property by various artifices, and often visited though innocent with the severest punishments.² The posterity of the Waldenses living enclosed in the valleys of Piedmont were sometimes exposed to the most exquisite sufferings on account of their perseverance in maintaining the religion of their fathers, and especially in the years 1632, 1655, and 1685, when the Savoyards cruelly attacked that unhappy people with fire and sword.³ The infractions of the treaty of Westphalia and of the Germanic liberties secured by that treaty, arising from this preposterous zeal for the welfare and extension of the Romish church, were so many and so great in many parts of Germany as to supply matter enough for large volumes.⁴ And so long as it shall remain the established belief at Rome, that God has given to the Romish church and to its head dominion over the whole Christian world, it can never be expected that those can live in security and safety who renounce subjection to it. For they will always be looked upon as rebellious citizens, whom their legitimate sovereign has a right to punish according to his pleasure.

9. The faithful servants of the Roman pontiff at length succeeded in this century in completely purging both Spain and France of the last remains of heresy. In Spain, the descendants of the Moors or Saracens, who once held the sovereignty over a considerable part of that country, had long lived intermingled with the other citizens and were considerably numerous. They were indeed Christians at least in profession and outward behaviour, and industrious, useful to the country, and injurious to no one; but they were not a little suspected of a secret inclination towards Mohammedanism, the religion of their fathers. The clergy therefore did not cease to importune the king till he had delivered the country from this pest, and expelled from his territories the whole multitude of Saracens, whose numbers were immense. By this measure the Spanish commonwealth indeed suffered a great loss, the sad effects of which are felt to the present time; but the church, which is far more important and excellent than the civil state, deemed herself so much the more benefited by it.⁵ The Reformed in France, commonly called Huguenots, having been long borne down by various oppressions and well nigh destroyed, sometimes by crafty and concealed plots and at other times by open and violent attacks, were at last most cruelly compelled either secretly to flee their country or to embrace, most reluctantly and against their consciences, the Romish religion. This long persecution, than which a greater or more cruel has not occurred in modern times, will more suitably be explained in the history of the Reformed church.

10. All the efforts, devices, and plans which the boldest and most versatile geniuses could originate, were employed to bring Great Britain and Ireland again under the Romish yoke. But all these attempts

¹ See the Historia Diplomatica de Statu Religionis Evangelicæ in Hungaria, p. 69, &c.; Debrezennus, Historia Ecclesiæ Reformate in Hungaria, lib. ii. p. 447, &c.; Schelehorn, in the Museum Helveticum, tom. viii. p. 46—90. [After some previous events which occurred in the year 1670, a conspiracy of some Hungarian nobles against the emperor in 1671 gave the Catholics a favourable opportunity to gratify their thirst for persecution. The noblemen were put to death as we learn from civil history; but at the same time, for three successive years nearly all the evangelical churches were taken from them by force, and the Lutheran and Reformed ministers and schoolmasters, as participants in the conspiracy and insurrection, were summoned a part of them to Tirnau and others to Presburg. When they appeared, a paper was presented to them to sign, which was very injurious to their ecclesiastical rights. And as they refused to sign it, they were thrown into noisome prisons where they fared hard enough. From these in 1675 many of them were condemned to the galleys and were sent to Naples, where however the intercession of the Dutch admiral De Ruyter procured them freedom. The other prisoners, at the intercession of the republic of Holland, were also set at liberty.—Schl.]

² See Regenvolsius, Historia Ecclesiastica Slavoniae, lib. ii. cap. xv. p. 216, 235, 253. What was undertaken against the Polish dissidents (as they were called) after the times of Regenvolsius [after A.D. 1652] may be learned from various writings published in our times. See Erskine's Sketches of Church Hist. vol. ii. p. 147, &c.—Mur.

³ See Gilles' Histoire Ecclesiastique des Eglises Vaudoises, chap. xlviii. &c. p. 339, Geneva, 1656, 4to [also Leger's Histoire des Eglises Vaudoises, part ii. chap. 6—22, and Boyer's Abregé de l'Histoire des Vaudois, chap. x.—xxvi. p. 64—235, of the English translation, Lond. 1693. The dukes of Savoy and the kings of France made open war upon these unfortunate Protestants, and actually expelled them from the country in 1686. Three years after, most of them returned, but whole congregations remained permanently in foreign lands, and particularly in the territory of Wurtemberg.—Mur.

⁴ The Histories of religious grievances by the learned Struve and Hoffmann, composed in German, are in everybody's hands.

⁵ Geddes, History of the Expulsion of the Moriscos out of Spain, in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. i. p. 59, &c.

failed. In the beginning of the century, some nefarious miscreants, burning with hatred of what they regarded as a new and false religion and prompted by the counsel of three Jesuits, of whom Henry Garnet was the chief, determined to destroy at a stroke king James I. with his son and the whole British parliament, by means of gunpowder which they had concealed under the house where the parliament usually met. For they had no doubt if these could be destroyed, means would occur for reinstating the old religion and giving it its former ascendancy. The English call this horrid conspiracy the Gunpowder Plot. But Divine Providence caused it to be wonderfully discovered and frustrated when it was ripe for execution.¹ More gentle and cautious was the procedure during the reign of Charles I. the son of James. For the king being of a mild and effeminate character and apparently not far removed from Romish sentiments, having also a French wife who was devoted to the Romish worship, and being guided chiefly by the counsels of William Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, an honest man undoubtedly and not unlearned, but immoderately attached to what was ancient in ecclesiastical matters, it seemed probable that England might become reconciled with the Roman pontiff more easily by caresses and promises than by commotions and bloodshed.² But this expectation was frustrated by that lamentable civil war, in which Laud as well as Charles were beheaded, and Oliver Cromwell, a man of energy, foresight, and cunning, and one who dreaded even the shadow of the Romish religion, was placed at the head of the government with the title of Protector of the commonwealth of England. The expectation was revived when Charles II. was raised to the throne of his father to the immoderate joy of the people; and it revived with increased confidence and satisfaction. For the king himself, as appears now from very abundant testimony,³ had already been secretly initiated in the Romish worship during his exile; and his only brother James II. the heir to the crown, had openly apostatized from the religion of the English nation to that of Rome. But Charles was prevented from doing anything in favour of popery by his native indolence, extreme fondness for dissipation, and an indifference to all religion tending to extreme impiety; and James by his immoderate eagerness to consult the wishes of the Romanists, and to follow the rash counsels of the Jesuits whom he kept about him, inflicted an incurable wound both upon the Romish religion and upon himself. For being created king after his brother's death, he in the most open manner and therefore most injudiciously, supported the languishing cause of popery in England and Ireland; and to do this more effectually, he fearlessly trampled upon those rights and liberties of the nation which were held most sacred and precious. Exasperated by these measures of the king, the people of England in the year 1688 invited over from Holland his son-in-law, William prince of Orange; and his valour obliged his father-in-law to flee an exile into France, and deprived the friends and promoters of the Romish religion of all hope of recovering England to the Romish church.⁴

11. When the wiser patrons and promoters of the Romish cause perceived that little success attended violence and war, they concluded that the reluctant minds of the Protestants must be overcome by milder measures and by covert artifices. But all of them were not disposed to adopt precisely the same course. Some resorted to public disputations between distinguished men of the two communities, indulging an expectation which the numerous vain attempts of the preceding age could not but weaken, that in such colloquies the more strenuous adversaries of the papal supremacy could either be vanquished or at least softened. Others thought that contests should be avoided, and consultations rather should be held by the dissidents in order to agree upon a compromise, and therefore that less weight and importance should be attributed to the points of disagreement than had before been usual. Lastly, there were others who, believing that the former disputants on the side of the Romish church possessed

¹ Rapin, Histoire d'Angleterre, livr. xviii. tome vii. p. 40, &c.; Heidegger, Historia Papatus, Period. vii. p. 211, 291, &c. [Hume's Hist. of England, chap. xlv. vol. v. p. 60, &c.—Mur.]

² See Corri's Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 315, &c.; Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 194, &c.

³ Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. i. book iii. p. 603, &c. 606, &c. [and book i. p. 73, 74.—Mur.] Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 233, 237, 534 [ed. Boston, 1817, vol. iv. chap. iv. p. 255, &c.—Mur.] Rapin, Histoire d'Angleterre, livr. xxiii. tome ix. p. 160. [Hume's Hist. of Eng. chap. lxiii. vol. vi. p. 374; and especially chap. lxvi. vol. vii. p. 3, note, where it is proved that Charles II. entered into a treaty with the king of France in the close of the year 1659 or the beginning of 1670, for the purpose of overthrowing the Protestant religion in England and establishing popery on its ruins.—Mur.]

⁴ These events are very accurately described by Burnet and Rapin; by the former in the second volume of the History of His Own Times (which has been translated from English into both French and German), and by the latter in his Histoire d'Angleterre, tome x. Add Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. chap. xi. p. 536, &c. [And Hume's History of England, vol. vii. chap. lxx. lxxi.—Mur.]

vigour and spirit enough but were deficient in skill, judged that new attacks should be made; and these of course invented new modes of reasoning against heretics.

12. At the very commencement of the century, A.D. 1601, some distinguished Lutheran divines, by authority of Maximilian of Bavaria and Philip Lewis, elector Palatine, disputed at Ratisbon with three Jesuits of great fame, respecting the rule of faith and practice and the judge of religious controversies, subjects which embrace nearly the whole controversy between the Protestants and Roman Catholics. In the year 1615, Wolfgang William, prince Palatine, who had apostatised to the Romish faith, held a disputation at Newburg between James Keller, a Jesuit, and James Heilbronn, a Lutheran. In the year 1645, Uladislau, king of Poland, called the more distinguished theologians, papists as well as Lutherans and Reformed, to a meeting at Thorn in Prussia, to deliberate amicably on the means of putting an end to the existing religious controversies; which design of the king procured for this discussion the name of the Charitable Conference. A little after, in 1651, Ernest, landgrave of Hesse, in order to give a plausible air to that apostacy to the Romish camp which he had before resolved on, ordered Valerianus Magnus, a celebrated Capuchin divine, to hold a discussion particularly with Peter Haberkorn, a divine of Giessen, in the castle of Rheinfels. Among the private disputes of this kind the most noted of all was that of John Claude, a very learned divine of the French Reformed church, with that superior man of the Catholic church, James Benigne Bossuet, in the year 1685. All these conferences had one and the same result. Neither party could convince the other, but each exasperated and alienated the other from itself more than before.¹

¹ Whoever wishes for a fuller account of these conferences may consult the writers mentioned by Sagittarius, Introduc. in Historiam Eccles. tom. ii. p. 1569, 1581, 1592, 1598. Claude and Bossuet each published the history of the dispute between them. Bossuet's book is entitled, Conférence avec M. Claude sur la matière de l'Eglise, Paris, 1683, 12mo. In answer to this, Claude published his, Réponse au livre de M. de Meaux, intitulé Conférence avec M. Claude, à la Haye, 1683, 8vo. [The conference at Ratisbon was between seven Lutheran and three Catholic divines, and occupied fourteen sessions, ending Nov. 28. Both parties afterwards published the Acts of this Conference, which produced farther controversy, each party accusing the other of misrepresentation. See Schmidt's Continuation of Sagittarius' Introduction, p. 1569, &c. There was a conference appointed at Durlach in 1612, by order of Geo. Frederick margrave of Baden, and Francis duke of Lorrain. The latter at the request of the Jesuits forbade the Protestants to draw inferences from Scripture, and required them to cite only direct categorical declarations of the Bible against the Catholics. These terms the Protestant divines refused, and

13. The whole plan and method of those who attempted a reconciliation between the Protestants and the Papists consisted in efforts to make it appear that the parties did not disagree so much as they supposed; and that there was not so much need of a discussion [of the points at issue] as of a careful and perspicuous explanation of those doctrines of the Romish community which were offensive to their opponents, in order to remove entirely all controversy and unite the minds of both in bonds of harmony. But in pursuing this general plan they varied so much from each other, that it was apparent they needed to come to some agreement among themselves, before there could be ground for listening to the counsels and advice they gave. The principal man among those who exerted their ingenuity in this way was Armand Richelieu, that very powerful French minister of state, who spared neither promises nor threatenings, nor arguments nor persuasions, in order to bring the French Reformed Christians to unite with the Catholics.² The the conference ended. Its Acts were published, Strasburg, 1614, 4to.—The conference at Newburg embraced but two sessions, as Heilbronn, by advice of his friends, refused to appear at the third. It related wholly to the correctness of the citations from the fathers in a book published by Heilbronn, entitled Unecatholice Papery. Keller published his account of the conference, Ingolst. 1615, 4to, and Heilbronn his account, Ulm, 1616, 4to. The conference at Thorn was occasioned by the Reformed preacher at Dantzic, Bartholomew Nigrinus, who had become a Catholic, and persuaded the king that such a conference would be attended by good consequences. But the result did not answer the expectations from it. The history of the conference and of the subsequent written discussions is given by Hartknoch, in Die Preussisch. Kirchenhistorie, vol. iv. chap. iv.—See Schlegel's note here.—Mer. [On these and other attempts towards effecting a union among various sections of the church catholic, see Tabaraud, Histoire Critique des Projets formés depuis Trois Cent Ans pour la Réunion des Communions Chrétiennes, Paris, 1824. This work is from the pen of a Romanist, and accordingly the whole subject is viewed through a distorted medium. It contains, however, much useful information.—R.

² Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome i. p. 31, 32, &c. new edit.; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. art. Amyraut, note i. p. 183; art. Beaulieu, note c. p. 484; tome ii. art. Ferri, note d. p. 1169; tome iii. art. Milicrière, p. 1982, and elsewhere. [To Amyraut, an eminent French Protestant divine and professor at Saumur, Richelieu commissioned a Jesuit named Audebert to offer a negotiation for a union of the Protestants and Calvinists. The Jesuit stated that for the sake of peace, the king and his minister were willing to give up the invocation of creatures, purgatory, and the merit of good works; that they would limit the power of the pope; and if the court of Rome would consent to it, they would create a patriarch; that the cup should be allowed to the laity; and that some other relaxations might be made. Amyraut mentioned the eucharist. The Jesuit said no change in that was proposed. Amyraut said then nothing can be done. Here the conference of four hours' length terminated. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Beaulieu, a Protestant professor of theology at Sedan, was suspected but without grounds of a willingness to sacrifice some doctrines in order to produce a union. He had only maintained that many of the disputes of theologians were about words rather than things. Yet it appears that Marshal Turenne sounded Beaulieu on the subject of a union. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Paul Ferri was an eloquent French course pursued by this illustrious man was followed, yet with unequal steps and with less influence, by the German Jesuit James Masenius,¹ by Adolphus Godfred Volusius a divine of Mentz,² by Matthew Prætorius a Prussian,³ by Augustin Gibbon de Burgo, an Irishman who was a professor at Erfurth,⁴ by Henry Marcellus a Jesuit,⁵ and by some others of less fame. In more recent times, no one has entered upon such an attempt with more foresight and sagacity than James Benigne Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, a man, of uncommon genius and extraordinary prudence, whose Exposition of the Catholic Faith aims exclusively to show, that a short and easy way of return to the Romish religion would be open to the Protestants, if they would only judge of its nature and principles, not according to the views entertained of it by their teachers, but as it really is.⁶ After him, John Dezius, Protestant preacher at Mentz. His enemies circulated the false report that he was one of the Protestant ministers whom Cardinal Richelieu had persuaded to agree to a union of the Protestant and Catholic churches. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Theophilus Bræchet Sieur de la Milletière was a Protestant minister in France, who turned Catholic in 1645, after being silenced for attempts to unite the Protestant and Catholic churches on terms dishonourable to the former. He wrote and published much on the subject. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Mur. [See also Tabaraud, Histoire des Projets pour la Réunion des Communions Chrétiennes, for the proceedings of Richelieu, p. 200, and for an account of La Milletière, p. 375, &c.—R.]

¹ See Spanheim's Strictiæ ad Bossueti Expositionem Fidei Catholice, in his Opp. Theol. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 1012. [Masenius published some books on the subject of a union, which were answered by the Protestants.—Mur.]

² He published Aurora Pacis Religiosæ Divinæ Veritatis Amica, Mentz, 1665, 4to.

³ In his Tuba Pacis, concerning which, see Bayle's Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, A.D. 1685, p. 1369. [He was a Lutheran minister when he wrote the book, but he soon after became a Roman Catholic.—Schl.]

⁴ In his Luthero-Calvinianus Schismaticus quidem, sed Reconciliabilis. [He was an Augustinian Eremita, who after long wandering about settled in Germany, and died at Erfurth in 1676, as ex-provincial of his order and professor of theology.—Schl.]

⁵ The Sapientia Pacifica of Marcellus was, by order of the duke of Gotha, confuted by Seldius.

⁶ Of this little book and its fortunes, very much might be said and not without profit. Among many others, see Pfaff, Historia Literar. Theologicæ, tom. ii. p. 102; Le Clerc, Biblioth. Universelle et Histor. tome xi. p. 438. [It is remarkable that nine years passed before this book could obtain the pope's approbation. Clement X. refused it positively. Nay, several Roman Catholic priests were rigorously treated and severely persecuted for preaching the doctrine contained in the Exposition of Bossuet, which was moreover formally condemned by the university of Louvain in the year 1685, and declared to be scandalous and pernicious. The Sorbonne also disavowed the doctrine contained in that book; though by a late edict we learn that the fathers of that theological seminary have changed their opinion on that head, and thus given a new instance of the variations which reign in the Romish church, that boasts so much of its uniformity in doctrinal matters. The artifice which was employed in the composition of this book, and the tricks which were used in the suppression and alteration of the first edition that was given of it, have been detected with great sagacity and evidence by the learned and excellent archbishop Wake, in the introduction to his Exposition of the Doctrines of the Church of England, &c. See a Jesuit of Strasburg, undertook to demonstrate the same thing though with less success, in a book in which he endeavours to prove that there is no disagreement or but very little between the Council of Trent and the Augsburg Confession, than which no two systems can be more unlike.⁷ All these and some others undertook upon their own responsibility alone to remove the difficulties which prevented our ancestors from uniting with the pontiff; but Christopher de Roxas, bishop of Tina in Bosnia, came forward clothed with public authority or at least professing to be so; and in the year 1686 and onward he visited the principal Protestant courts in Germany, not only holding out the prospect of a new and more free council than that of Trent, but also giving assurance that the pontiff would freely grant to his returning children, the Protestants, whatever privileges and immunities they might demand, if they would only cease to decline the very mild government of the common father of Christians. But it was not difficult for theologians nor for the more discerning statesmen also to discover that this was only a snare, and that the Romish bishops aimed not so much to bring about an honourable and stable peace, as to introduce again the ancient system of slavery.⁸

also his two Defences of that Exposition, in which the perfidious sophistry of Bossuet is unmasked and refuted in the most satisfactory manner. There was an excellent answer to Bossuet's book published by M. de la Bastide, one of the most eminent Protestant ministers in France. This answer the French prelate took no notice of during eight years, at the end of which he published an advertisement in a new edition of his Exposition, which was designed to remove the objections of La Bastide. The latter replied in such a demonstrative and victorious manner, that the learned bishop, notwithstanding all his eloquence and art, was obliged to quit the field of controversy. See a very interesting account of this insidious work of Bossuet, and the controversies it occasioned, in the Bibliothèque des Sciences, published at the Hague, tome xviii. p. 20. This account, which is curious, accurate, ample, and learned, was given partly on occasion of a new edition of the Exposition printed at Paris in 1761, and accompanied with a Latin translation done by Fleury, and partly on occasion of Burigny's Vie de Bossuet, published the same year at Paris.—Macf.]

⁷ The book is entitled, La Réunion des Protestans de Strasburg à l'Eglise Romaine, Strasb. 1689, 8vo. See Spener's Theological Reflections (in German), vol. i. p. 95.

⁸ See the collections in Jäger's Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvii. and in Welsinn's Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvii. p. 735. There are also extant other proposals for union made known at the German courts in the year 1660 by the elector of Mentz, by order and authority (as it is said) of the Roman pontiff, and which Gruber has published in the Commercium Epistolicum Leibnitianum, tom. i. p. 411-415; add p. 426, &c.—[Christopher Rojas (Roxas, Rohas, or Rorhas) de Spinola was a native Spaniard, and first came to Vienna in 1666 as confessor to the Infanta Margaretha Theresia, the first wife of the emperor Leopold. In the year 1668, he was made bishop of Tina in Croatia, and in 1685, bishop of Neustadt Wienerisch in Lower Austria. While bishop of Tina, his bishopric affording him little employment, he travelled about Germany with the approbation of pope Innocent XI. as a negotiator with the Protestants for their return to the church of

14. These Romish peacemakers found among the Protestants, especially among the Reformed, some divines whose natural dislike of contention, or whose hope of obtaining fame and making their fortune, induced them to listen to these overtures, and to assert that the points in controversy between the two communities were not of such magnitude as to forbid all union. Among the French Reformed, Lewis le Blanc, a man otherwise possessed of discernment, together with his disciples, fell under a suspicion of this fault.¹ It is more certain, that Theophilus Brachet de la Milletière, and Huisseaux a divine of Saumur, Tanaquil Faber, and some others, were chargeable with this conduct.² Among

Rome. The emperor Leopold also employed him in civil negotiations, and in 1691 empowered him to negotiate a reconciliation with Rome with his Protestant subjects in Hungary and Transylvania. The terms he offered the Protestants were: I. The suspension of the decrees of Trent, and the assembling a new council in which the Protestants and Catholics should each have an equal number of voters, and the decisions of Trent undergo a new and impartial investigation. II. The acquittal of the Protestants from the charge of heresy, provided they would cease to call the pope Antichrist. III. Communion in both kinds, marriage of priests, continuance in their possession of church property, abolition of auricular confession, and public worship in the vernacular tongue. In respect to the authority of the pope and traditions, he did not express himself clearly.—The archbishop of Mentz who had been active in promoting the Peace of Westphalia, after sending an envoy to Rome and consulting the electors of Treves and Cologne, held several meetings with the German Catholics who were solicitous for the peace of the country, at Mentz, Treves, Darmstadt, Rome, and elsewhere; and then made the following proposals to the Protestants at Ratibon: I. That twelve Lutheran and twelve Catholic divines should meet together, swear to act honestly and in good faith, without fraud or subterfuge, as they should answer it to God. II. That they should examine the religious disputes, and decide them according to the Bible only. III. That to enable them to agree, they should first make a new translation of the Bible. IV. That whatever a majority of them agreed to should be considered as valid articles of faith. V. That both the decrees of the council of Trent and the Augsburg Confession should be examined, article by article, and judged of according to the Scriptures. As preliminary articles, it was proposed to yield: I. Worship in the German language. II. Marriage of bishops and the secular clergy, but not of monks and nuns. III. The abolition of auricular confession in Germany and the other Protestant countries, but not in Spain and Italy, where for certain reasons it was esteemed necessary. IV. Every one to be at liberty to pray to the saints or not. V. Purgatory no longer to be an article of faith. VI. Communion in both kinds to be allowed. VII. The pope no longer to be regarded as universal judge, but only as 1st priest and bishop of the church. Difficult questions of conscience may be laid before him, but none shall be compelled to follow his decisions. VIII. Christians to be hereafter divided into two classes, the Ancient Catholics and the Reformed Catholics, who should regard each other as brethren. Cardinals to be taken from both classes, and an equal number from each.—To these propositions the Lutheran courts raised many objections, and the whole project was soon abandoned. See Schroock's Kirchen-gesch. seit der Reform. vol. vii. p. 98, &c. and Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

¹ See Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 484, &c. [art. Beaulieu. See also note 2, p. 745, above. His whole name was Louis le Blanc Sieur de Beaulieu.—Mur.

² Concerning Milletière, see Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome

the English, William Forbes especially showed himself ready to compromise a great part of the controversies which separate us from the Romanists.³ Among the Dutch, no man of information can well be ignorant how much Hugo Grotius was disposed to unite all sects of Christians together, and especially to excuse and give favourable views of the papists.⁴ But these and the others (whom we omit to mention) obtained only this reward for their well-intended labours, that they offended both parties and drew upon themselves a great weight of odium. In this class of divines who burned with a preposterous zeal for union with the Romanists, many reckon George Calixtus, a very learned professor in the university of Helmstadt; that is, the very man than whom no one perhaps in this century more learnedly and lucidly demonstrated the errors and defects of the papal church, and no one more uniformly affirmed that the decrees and the denunciations of the Council of Trent destroyed all hope of healing the division. The reason why he was thought to lean towards this class was, that he used softer language than was customary respecting some controversies, and that he believed the first principles of the Christian religion were not absolutely subverted by the Romanists. but

iii. p. 1982 [and note in p. 746. above.] Concerning Huisseaux and his pacific propositions, see Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome ii. p. 14, and Aymon, Synodes Nationaux de l'Eglise Réformée en France, tome ii. p. 765, [Quick's Synodicon in Gallia Reformata, vol. ii. p. 511, &c.—Mur.] On Faber's attempt, see Morhoff, Polyhistor, tom. i. p. 295.

³ His Considerationes Modeste et Pacificæ Controuersiarum de Justificatione, Purgatorio, &c. were published Lond. 1638, 8vo, and in Germany, with corrections by Fabricius, a divine of Helmstadt. He is highly extolled by Grabe, in his notes to Bull's Harmonia Apologica, p. 19. Nor were his probity and very exemplary life unworthy of praise. Yet the wiser among the English cannot but admit that he favoured the Romish party too much. See Burnet's History of his Own Times, vol. i. p. 22. He was of course much commended by the papists. See Simon's Lettres Choisies, tome iii. lett. xviii. p. 119. He was undoubtedly one of those who did most to persuade the English (whether right or wrong), that king Charles I. and William Laud had designs of again restoring the Romish religion in England. [William Forbes was by Charles I. under the direction of Laud, appointed the first bishop of Edinburgh, on the 26th of January, 1634, and he died on the 1st of April following, having occupied the see only nine weeks. When principal of the Marischal College, Aberdeen, he had delivered the substance of the work above mentioned in his lectures, and it was not till twenty-four years after his death that it was published from notes taken at the time. It is therefore difficult to say how far it may be depended on as conveying his sentiments fully and accurately. What would Mosheim have said of the present Puseyite party in the Church of England, who have gone far beyond Forbes in their attempts to bring that church into closer conformity with the Roman?—R.

⁴ Here may be consulted with advantage, though he is partial to Grotius, the author of the book, Grotii Mores ab Iniquis Obtruncatoribus Fudicati, tom. ii. p. 542, 826, &c.

only loaded and deformed by a great multitude of intolerable opinions.

15. This band of pacificators, which was badly marshalled and weak from its own discords, was easily put to flight by a moderate effort; but stronger forces were necessary to withstand those among the papists who devised new modes of warfare. These have usually been called Methodists; and they were chiefly of that ingenious nation the French, whom perpetual conflicts with the very learned Huguenots (as the Protestants of France are called) had rendered extremely fond of disputation and expert in it for that age. They may very suitably be divided into two classes. The first class imposed hard and unreasonable laws of argumentation upon the Protestants, and resembled those generals who concentrate their troops in fortresses and surround themselves with ramparts, to enable them more easily to resist the assaults of their foes. Of this class was Francis Veron, a Jesuit, who was of opinion that the enemies of the Romish religion ought to prove their doctrines by explicit declarations of the Holy Scriptures, and therefore preposterously forbade their resorting to any inferences, necessary consequences, or argumentation;¹ Barthold Nihusius, an apostate;² the brothers named Walenburg and others, who deeming it easier to defend their cause against attacks than to demonstrate its justice, threw the whole burden of proof on their adversaries, assuming the ground of mere respondents and defendants; Armand Richelieu, who recommended neglecting the various objections and complaints of their adversaries, reducing the whole controversy to the single article of the church, and placing the divine majesty and authority of that beyond all cavils by means of conclusive arguments; and some others.³ The other class preferred the plan of those generals who, to avoid a protracted war, resolve to stake all upon the issue of a general battle, instead of wasting time in sieges and a series of skirmishes; that is, they thought best not to weigh one point after another and answer in detail all the arguments of opponents, but to overwhelm the Protestants at once by certain great principles or general arguments involving the whole subject, or by what are technically called pra-judicia. The glory, if not of inventing yet of perfecting this method, and of displaying it with great eloquence, is enjoyed by Peter Nicole, a Jansenist, who was neither a bad man nor an obtuse reasoner.⁴ After him, many others supposed there was so much power in this method, that they believed a single argument of this kind, if wisely and properly managed, was sufficient to overthrow the whole cause of the Protestants. Hence, some opposed the Protestants with the single principle of prescription; others supposed our case would be desperate, if it could be made to appear that the principal Reformers were vicious men and destitute of virtue; many believed they should divest their antagonists of all means of defence, on the ground that religious sepa-

¹ Musæus, De Usa Principiorum Rationis in Contronerasis Theologicis, lib. i. cap. iv. p. 22; Calixtus, Digressio de Arte Nova, p. 125, &c.; Simon, Lettres Choisies, tome i. p. 276. [The famous controversial preacher Veron, who under the protection of the French court travelled about challenging the Huguenots to public disputation and conference, from the year 1622 onward, composed a book with the Thrasionic title: Methodus nova, faciliis et solida, Hæresin ex Fundamento destruendi, et refutandi Confessionem Gallicam, Augustinam, Sacerdotium, Libros denique omnes Theologicos Protestantium, &c.—Schl.]

² Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2086, &c. [art. Nihusius.] This vain and half-learned man was formerly confuted by Calixtus, in his Digressio de Arte Nova contra Nihusium, a book very well worth reading; Helmst. 1634, 4to. [Nihusius was a Lutheran divine, educated under Calixtus at Helmstadt. But he turned Catholic about the year 1611, after which he became an abbot and a bishop, and wrote numerous letters and tracts in support of popery. He died in 1657. His principal work was entitled, Arx nova dictio Sacre Scripture unico luerandi & Pontificis plurimos in partes Lutheranorum, detecta nonnulli et suggesta Theologus Helmsleinthus, Georgio Calixto præsertim et Conradio Hornicio. Nihusius assumed that the church of Rome was an ancient church, and in possession of a system of doctrines which she had held unmolested for ages; of course she was not to be ousted of her possession by any new claimant, unless that claimant could make good his title. In this way, he threw all the burden of proof on the Protestants, or upon the innovators on the established religion. At the same time, he forbade their reasoning from Scripture by way of inference, and required them to bring direct and positive proofs. Reasonings he said were human; positive declarations of the Bible were divine. Moreover in reasoning from the Bible, men differed so widely that there was no knowing what to believe, unless we admitted and confided in an infallible interpreter, namely the pope. When it was objected that the popes had for centuries been such dissolute and base characters, that it could not be supposed they were the mouth of God to men, he replied that the same might be said of some of the writers of the Bible, David for instance, &c. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Mur.]

³ For a somewhat fuller account of these matters, see Spanheim, Strictures ad Expositionem Fidei Bossueti, in his Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 1037. Heidegger, Historia Papatus, perod vii. sec. cxviii. p. 316; Walch, Einführung in die Religionsstreit. vol. ii. p. 191, &c.; Weismann, Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvii. p. 726, and various others. [Peter and Adrian von Walenburg were two brothers, born at Rotterdam, who abandoned their country and their religion, and lived at Cologne. The first was a titular bishop in Mysia, and suffragan to Cologne; the other was the titular bishop of Adrianople, and suffragan to Mentz. Their works, consisting chiefly of controversial pieces against the Protestants, were printed together under the title of Prætrium Walenburgianum Opera, 1670, 2 vols. fol.—Schl.]

⁴ He is generally supposed to be the author of that book confuted by vast numbers, entitled Préjugés Lévites contre les Calvinistes, Paris, 1671, 8vo, and afterwards reprinted several times. This method certainly was not the invention of Nicole, for it seems to differ little if at all from the method of cardinal Richelieu. We may observe farther, that Richelieu seems rather to belong to the second class of Methodists than to the first, where Mosheim has placed him.—Macl.

ration or schism is the greatest of all evils, if they made it appear that the fathers of the Reformed churches were the authors of so great a calamity.¹ Pre-eminent among these for the felicity of his genius and the copiousness of his eloquence, but not for his discernment, was James Benigne Bossuet, who endeavoured to demonstrate from the disagreements among the Protestant teachers, and from the frequent changes their church and doctrines had undergone, that the church established by Luther was not a true church; and from the perpetual uniformity of the Romish church, that it was the true church and of divine origin.² This appears very surprising as coming from a learned man, who could not be ignorant that the pontiffs are very subservient to times and places and to the opinions of men; and still more as coming from a Frenchman, whose fellow-citizens contend with so much zeal, that modern Rome differs as much from ancient and primitive Rome as lead does from gold.

16. These efforts of the patrons of the Romish church, so many and various, occasioned indeed the Protestant doctors not a little labour, but produced very slender effects. Some of the princes and a few learned men were induced to embrace again the Romish religion which their fathers had renounced, but no one nation or province could be persuaded to follow their example. Of the highest order of persons, Christina, queen of Sweden, a lady of great spirit and genius but precipitate, and one who preferred her ease, pleasure, and liberty, to all other considerations;³ Wolfgang William, count Palatine of the Rhine,⁴ Christian William, marquis of Brandenburg,⁵ Ernest, prince of Hesse,⁶ John Frederick, duke of Brunswick,⁷ and Frederick Augustus, king of Poland,⁸ subjected themselves to the Roman pontiff. Of the men of genius and erudition, the illustrious John Christian, baron of Boisneburg, privy counsellor to the elector of Mentz and a noted Mæcenas in that age,⁹ Christ. Ronzovius, a knight of Holstein,¹⁰ Caspar Scioppius,¹¹ Peter Bertius,¹² Chris-crown in 1654, and retired to Italy to enjoy the refined society of that country. As a preparatory step to a comfortable residence at Rome, while on her way thither she changed her religion.—Mur. [See an admirable sketch of this remarkable woman, of her apostasy, and of her residence at Rome, in Ranko's Popes of Rome, vol. iii. p. 82, &c.—H.]

⁴ This prince at his solemn renunciation of Protestantism in the year 1614 assigned as his reasons the common arguments used by Catholics to prove the truth of their religion and the falsehood of the Protestant. But it was believed at the time and even by Catholic historians, that a principal motive with him was to secure the favour of the emperor and of the Spanish court in order to make sure his heirship to the duchy of Julian-Cleves. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. s. der Reform. vol. iv. p. 370, and Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

⁵ At the capture of Magdeburg by the Imperial troops in 1630, he was taken prisoner and carried to Vienna, where his conversion took place. The grounds of it, which he published, were chiefly that the Protestants had no legitimate priesthood. See Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

⁶ This very learned and good prince was converted in 1651, by the celebrated Capuchin monk Valerius Magnus. See Gruber's Commercium Epistol. Leibnitianum, tom. i. p. 27, 35; Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome i. p. 216. But it is manifest from the writings of Ernest himself, that he, as well as Anthony Ulric duke of Brunswick and many others, did not go over to such a Romish church as actually exists, but to a very different one, which has long since ceased to be and of which his imagination formed an idea.

⁷ He put entire confidence in his favourite preacher, Henry Julius Blum; and when solicited to apostatize, refused unless the Catholics could first convert Blum. The Jesuits then applied themselves to Blum, and offered him an income of 2,000 dollars annually if he would turn Catholic. Blum consented. A dispute was held between them in presence of the duke. For a considerable time Blum answered all the arguments of the Jesuits triumphantly; but at length they adduced a new argument which Blum could not withstand, and which he told the duke was unanswerable. Of course he now openly yielded to popery, and the duke followed his example. This was in 1654. Blum obtained his pension, and at length was made vice-president of the supreme court of appeals at Prague. See Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

⁸ He was the elector of Saxony, and to qualify himself for the throne of Poland made profession of the Catholic religion in the year 1697. See Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. s. d. Reform. vol. vii. p. 74, and Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 559.—Mur.

⁹ He apostatized to the Romish church in 1653, following the example of Ernest, prince of Hesse, and was indeed a man of great distinction, but rather a man of letters than a sound reasoner or philosopher. See Gruber's Commercium Epistol. Leibnitianum, containing his and Conring's Epistles, tom. i. p. 35, 37, 39, 48, 56, 60, 70, 76, 93, &c.

¹⁰ See Müller, Cynhria Literata, tom. i. p. 520. [He defended Lutheranism at Helmstadt in 1649. But the next year at Rome, the splendor of the jubilee and the arguments of Lucas Holstenius overcame him. See Henke, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 300, &c.—Mur.]

¹¹ He was a German, learned, ardent, restless. He became a papist about A.D. 1600, fell out with the Jesuits, and fought much against the Protestants. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iv. art. Scioppius.—Mur.

¹² Bertius was rector of the theological college of

¹ Spanheim, Diss. de Præscriptione in Rebus Fidei adversus Novos Methodistas, in his Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 1079.

² His Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes, Paris, 1688, 8vo, is very generally known. To this day the papists confide in it, and place it among their strongest bulwarks. And they may continue to exult in this their great champion and defender if they choose; but if they are not beside themselves and wish to preserve the head of their church safe, they must be exceedingly desirous that Bossuet's great principle, that whatever church frequently modifies and changes its doctrines has not the Holy Spirit, may never be believed true by any one who is acquainted with the course of events at Rome. [Against Bossuet, Basnage wrote his famous Histoire des Fugitifs Réformés, Rotterdam, 1690, 2 vols. 8vo. And as Bossuet replied to this in his Défense de l'Histoire des Variations, Basnage composed his great work, Histoire de l'Eglise depuis J. C. jusqu'à Présent, Rotterdam, 1699, 2 vols. fol.—Schl. [The student should consult a late work, elaborately compiled as a counterpart to that of Bossuet, by the Rev. S. Edgar, one of the ministers of the Presbyterian church in Armagh, entitled The Variations of Popery, Dub. 1831, 2d ed. enlarged, Lond. 1837, 8vo.—R.]

³ Of this queen and the causes of her defection to the Romish church, there is a very full account in Arckenholz, Mémoires de la Reine Christine, which is a very interesting and useful book. [This vain and rash woman, who probably had no fixed religious principles, became weary of the cares of government, resigned her

topher Besold,¹ Helfr. Ulric Hunnius,² Nicholas Stenonius, a celebrated Danish physician,³ John Philip Pfeiffer, a professor at Königsberg,⁴ Lucas Holstenius,⁵ with his kinsman, Peter Lambecius,⁶ Henry Julius Blum, professor at Helmstadt, a learned but vain man,⁷ Daniel Nessel,⁸ Andrew Fromm,⁹ Bartholt Nihusius, Christ. Hellwig, Matthew Prætorius,¹⁰ and some others

Leyden. Being an Arminian, he was censured by the synod of Dort and afterwards excommunicated. He retired to France, became a Catholic, was a professor at Paris, historiographer to the king, and died in 1629. See Rees's Cyclopædia, article Bertius.—Mur.

¹ Besold was a learned and excellent man, professor of law at Tübingen, and after his conversion to the Romish church in 1635, professor at Ingolstadt. He published his motives, and appears to have been sincere, though the timidity of his character and the troubled state of the times seem to have had an influence. His revolt was a serious loss to the Protestants. See Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iii. p. 517, and Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

² He was the son of the famous Egldius Hunnius, brother to Nicholas. He was professor of law at Giessen and Marpurg, turned Catholic in 1631, was made counsellor and vice-chancellor at Treves, and died in 1636. See Henke and Schlegel, ubi supra.—Mur.

³ This celebrated anatomist travelled for improvement as far as Italy. On his return he was made professor of anatomy at Copenhagen. But preferring Italy, he soon removed to that country. There, at the age of thirty-seven, in the year 1675 he became a real Catholic, and sent as papal legate into Germany, where he died in 1686. He was first a great anatomist, and then a very sincere Catholic and a man of blameless life. He wrote many tracts in defence of popery. See Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 867, &c.—Mur.

⁴ For a notice of Pfeiffer, see Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 305. He apostatized in 1694, published his apology for it, and died the next year.—Mur.

⁵ This distinguished literary man was born at Hamburg in 1596, first studied medicine, but afterwards devoted himself to Latin and Greek literature and to ecclesiastical antiquities. He early travelled to Italy and Sicily. Returning, he pursued study in Holland. Being denied a scholarship at Leyden he left that place in disgust, and after travelling a year or two settled in Paris, A.D. 1624. Here he was promoted, became a Catholic and an author. He next went to Italy, where he was in high esteem, was made librarian to the pope, and came near to being a cardinal. He died 1661, aged 65. He was one of the most learned men of his age and a sincere Catholic, but not bigoted. See Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 257, and tom. iii. p. 321-342.—Mur.

⁶ Lambecius was a countryman and nephew of Holstenius, and a rector at Hamburg. But he had a bad wife, and besides fell also into ill fame as a teacher of false doctrine. He therefore abandoned his country, office, wife, and religion, and became a librarian at Vienna.—Schl. [This very learned man and voluminous writer and editor died in 1680, aged 52. See Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 323, and tom. iii. p. 391-414.—Mur.

⁷ He apostatized in 1654. [See above, note 7, p. 749. See Burckard's Historia Bibloth. Augustæ, par. iii. p. 223, 233; Gruber's Commercium Epistol. Leibnizianum, tom. i. p. 41, 95, 135, 137, 379, 388, 410, &c. In these Epistles he is usually called Florus.—Mur.

⁸ He was the son of Martin Nessel, a rector of Bremen, and studied law. He and his father both turned Catholics in 1667. Daniel succeeded Lambecius as librarian at Vienna, and died A.D. 1700. See Henke's Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 302.—Mur.

⁹ He was a provost at Hurlin, and from the year 1662 laboured much to unite the Protestants and Catholics. His apostacy took place at Prague, in 1667. See Henke, ubi supra, iv. p. 303, and Schlegel's note here.—Mur.

¹⁰ Concerning Nihusius, see above, note 2, p. 748. Prætorius was noticed also, note 3, p. 746. Hellwig was a physician, and son-in-law to J. P. Pfeiffer, mentioned of inferior note and standing, revolted to the Romish party. But if you except from among them all those who, we are abundantly assured, were led to this change by their domestic misfortunes, by their desire to advance their rank and reputation, by their inordinate love of wealth and worldly advantages, by their fickleness of mind, by their imbecility of intellect, or by other causes of no better character, you will reduce the whole number to a few persons whom no one will greatly envy the Roman Catholics.¹¹

17. Those Christians of the East who were not of the Romish communion, opposed the papal envoys no less firmly than the Europeans. Nor do the more ingenuous Catholics themselves deny, that those who give us splendid accounts of the great extension of the papal authority among the Nestorians and Monophysites, and of the favourable disposition of several of the prelates of these sects towards the Romish church, deceive us with fictitious statements.¹² On the other hand, the sovereign pontiffs suffered two severe losses in the East during this century: the one was in Japan, the other in Abyssinia. What occurred in Japan has already been stated, among the evils which the Christian cause in general experienced. It therefore remains only to give some account of the occurrence in Abyssinia or Ethiopia. In the beginning of the century, the mission to the Abyssinians which had been interrupted in the preceding century was renewed by the Portuguese Jesuits with very favourable auspices. For the emperor Susneius, who assumed the name of Seltam Segned at his coronation, after his victories over his enemies, influenced partly by the eloquence of the Jesuits and partly by the hope of confirming his authority by the aid of Portuguese troops, committed the direction of all religious affairs in the year 1625 to Alphonso Mendez, a missionary from Portugal; or, in other words, created in note 4. He apostatized with his father-in-law, A.D. 1694.—Mur.

¹¹ Of these men and others of a similar character, an account is given by Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xvii. chap. iii. p. 912, &c.; Weismann's Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvii. p. 738; Walch's Einführung in die Religions-Streitigkeiten, vol. ii. p. 728, &c. [Henke's Kirchengeschichte, vol. iii. and iv.] With these may be joined the best writers on civil and literary history.

¹² See the express declarations of Chardin, in various parts of the latest edition of his travels. Add, respecting the Armenians, Cerri, Etat Présent de l'Église Romaine, p. 170; also concerning the Copts, p. 216, 222, &c. That some small but poor congregations were collected among those sects no one denies. Thus, near the middle of the century, the Capuchins collected a very small company of popish converts among the Asiatic Monophysites, whose prelate resides at Aleppo. See Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. ii. p. 1408.

him patriarch of the nation. The next year, he not only himself publicly swore obedience to the authority of the Roman pontiff, but also required all his people to forsake the religion of their fathers and to embrace that of Rome. But that new prelate with his associates by his ill-timed zeal himself subverted the foundations of the papal authority, which appeared to be so well established. For in the first place, he resolved to subdue the people (the greatest part of whom together with their ministers held their ancient religion more dear than life itself) by means of terror, wars, and very severe punishments, in the manner of the Portuguese Inquisition. In the next place, the prelate ordered those who yielded obedience to the commands of the emperor to be baptized and consecrated anew after the Roman form, as if they had previously been entirely without the true Christian ordinances, which was an injury to the religion of their fathers that the clergy regarded with more horror than they did the tortures and violence inflicted on recusants. And lastly, he did not hesitate to rend the commonwealth into factions, and to encroach even upon the authority and the prerogatives of the emperor. Hence arose first, civil commotions and formidable insurrections; then, the indignation of the emperor himself and a general abhorrence of the Jesuits; and finally, a public edict of the emperor in 1631, which gave the citizens full liberty to embrace which of the two religions they preferred. The son of Seltam, Basilides, who succeeded to the throne on the death of his father in 1632, thought proper to clear the country of these troublesome strangers; and therefore in the year 1634 he drove Mendez and the whole body of Jesuits and Portuguese from Abyssinia with no kind of indulgence or tenderness.¹ From this time onward, such an abhorrence of the Roman name became firmly rooted in the breasts of the Abyssinians, that they most cautiously guarded their frontiers lest some Jesuit or other priest of the Romish communion should creep into the country, and again embroil their commonwealth. The Roman pontiffs at first sought to repair the damage done by the Jesuits by sending out two French Capuchin monks, and these being stoned to death by the Abyssinians, as soon as they were discovered, recourse was had to more secret methods; and at last the authority of Lewis XIV. king of France was resorted to, in order to open a door for the access of their missionaries to Ethiopia.² But to the present time they have not been able, so far as we know, to calm the wakeful indignation of that highly-incensed nation.³

18. We have thus far spoken of the external prosperity or adversity of the Romish church, and of the zeal of the pontiffs to extend the limits of their empire; we now proceed to examine its internal state. The ancient form of government was in no respects changed; yet the officers of the church were in most countries gradually abridged of no small part of their ancient power by the civil authorities. For that happy age was everywhere gone by when the clergy might excite public commotions, engage in civil affairs at their pleasure, terrify with their sacred denunciations, and impose contributions and other burdens upon the citizens. The supreme pontiff himself, though saluted with the same appellations and titles as formerly, often experienced with vast regret that names had lost much of their ancient power and import, and were still losing more and more. The principle formerly held only by the French, that the power of the Roman pontiff was wholly and exclusively confined to sacred and ecclesiastical affairs, and by no means extended to secular things, to the property, the persons, and the business of the citizens, had now become almost the universal opinion of all kings and princes. The schools indeed in most parts of the Romish world, with the public writers, extolled the majesty of the pontiff to the utmost of their ability; and the Jesuits who wished to be thought among the first defenders of the Romish see and power, did the same; and even the courts of princes sometimes used magnificent language respecting the dignity and authority of the head and father of the church. But the misfortune was, that in this as in other cases men's actions did not accord with their language; and the sovereign princes, when any question or controversy arose with the court of Rome, measured the rights and prerogatives of the pontiff, not as formerly by the decisions of the schools, but by their own convenience and interests.

¹ These projects are mentioned by Corri, Etat Présent de l'Eglise Romaine, p. 217, &c.; Le Grand, Supplément à Lobo's Itinéraire Ethiopique, tom. i. p. 181, &c.; tom. ii. p. 108, &c. [Father Lobo, who resided nine years in Ethiopia, has given an elegant and lively though simple and succinct description of that vast empire, in his Itinéraire Ethiopique. This Itinerary was translated into French by M. le Grand, and enriched by him with several curious anecdotes and dissertations. Hence Moshelm sometimes quotes the Itinéraire under the title of Voyage d'Abyssinie, referring to Le Grand's French translation of it.—Mack.] I wish the reader to compare the statements made from these documents which are above all suspicion, by this papist (Le Grand) who was not unfriendly to the Jesuits, with the Voyage of that French physician, Poncet, who travelled into Ethiopia in the year 1698, in company with the Jesuit Brevedent who died on the way; which Voyage was published by the Jesuits in the fourth volume of the Lettres Curieuses et Edifiantes des Missions Etrangères, Paris, 1713, 8vo [in the ed. Lyons, tome ii. p. 238, &c.—Mur.] The discerning reader may thus learn how much reliance is to be put on the statements which the Jesuits give us of the friendly disposition of the Asiatic and African Christians towards the see of Rome. After ingenuously and candidly making this comparison, he will perhaps declare that Grecian and even Punic faith is more to be trusted than that of the Jesuits.

² The biographers of Clement XI. and especially Laftau and Kéroulet, amuse us with fables (invented perhaps by the Jesuits and their friends), when they tell us of the Abyssinian emperor's embracing the Romish religion in the year 1712; or of his petitioning the Roman pontiff in 1703 to send him teachers to instruct him and his people. On the contrary, it is fully ascertained that but a few years ago the Abyssinians most rigorously denied not only to all Europeans, but also to the Turks, all access to their country; nay, they would not allow Egyptian Monophysites who entered Ethiopia to return again. This is confirmed by the best possible testimony in such a case, that of Benedict Maillet, who long filled the office of French consul in Egypt, and was appointed by Louis XIV. ambassador to the emperor of Abyssinia, in his Description de l'Egypte, part i. p. 325, Paris, 1735, 4to. To him we add Le Grand, who in his Additions to Lobo's Itinéraire, part 4. p. 222 (published in 1728), after faithfully detailing all the projects of the French and the popes in our age for introducing Romish priests into Abyssinia, subjoins, that all such projects must necessarily appear vain and chimerical to persons acquainted with the state of things in Ethiopia: "Toutes ces entreprises paroîtront chimériques à ceux qui connoissent l'Abyssinie et les Abyssiniens." Perhaps the mission which is now fitting out at Rome to the Abyssinians, will add new confirmation to this opinion.

³ See Ludolf's Historia Ethiopia, lib. iii. cap. xli.; Godeus, Church History of Ethiopia, p. 233, &c.; La Croze's Histoire du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, p. 79, &c.; Lobo's Voyage d'Abyssinie, p. 116, 130, 144, and Le Grand's Additions to it. p. 173, and his fourth Dissertation subjoined to vol. ii. p. 32. The judgment of this learned man respecting the Jesuit Mendez, in this Dissertation (iv. p. 36) is worth transcribing: "Il eût été à souhaiter que le Patriarche ne se fut pas chargé de tant d'affaires" (thus cautiously does he speak of Mendez's lust of power and intrusion into the affairs of the civil government), "et qu'il n'eût pas fait tant valoir son autorité en se conduisant en Abyssinie comme dans un pays d'Inquisition. Il révolta tout le monde, et rendit les Catholiques, et en particulier les Jésuites, si odieux, que la haine qu'on a conçue contre eux dure encore aujourd'hui." [The third Book of La Croze's History, which relates to the progress and ruin of this mission, is translated by Mr. Lockman into English, and inserted in The Travels of the Jesuits, vol. i. p. 308, &c. as also is Poncet's Voyage, mentioned in the following note.—Mack.]

19. This the sovereign pontiffs experienced to their great detriment, as often as they ventured in this age to resume their former pretensions and to encroach upon the jurisdiction of sovereign states. In the year 1606, Paul V. a haughty pontiff, laid the Venetians under an interdict, because they presumed to punish certain priests who had committed crimes, and forbade the erection of any more sacred edifices in their territories without the consent of the senate, and prohibited all farther transfers of estates to the clergy without permission from the government. But the senate of Venice most firmly and vigorously resisted this wrong. For in the first place they would not allow the priests to intermit the sacred services as the pontiff commanded; and the Jesuits and Capuchins, who chose to obey the pontiff rather than the senate, were banished the country. In the next place, they ordered Paolo Sarpi, a theologian of the republic who was a monk of the order of the Servites and a man of very great genius, and other persons deeply learned in civil and ecclesiastical law, to demonstrate the justice of their cause in several treatises, and to inquire with great freedom into the true limits of the papal power; and their attacks were so powerful, that Caesar Baronius and the other writers, to whom the Roman pontiff trusted the defence of his cause, could with difficulty stand up against them. When at length Paul V. prepared for war against the Venetians, Henry IV. king of France, interposed and brought about a peace, but on terms which were not very honourable to the pontiff.¹ For the Venetians could not be induced to rescind entirely those decrees which had given offence to the Romish bishop, nor to allow the banished Jesuits to return to their country.² The senate of Venice at that time contemplated a secession from the ¹ Besides Thuanus (de Thou), and other historians, see Daniel's Histoire de France, tome x. p. 358, &c. of the recent edit.; Heidegger's Historia Papatus, period vii. sec. cxxx. p. 322, &c.; Jäger's Historia Eccles. Sacul. xvii. decenn. i. p. 108. But especially the writings of the celebrated Paolo Sarpi and of the other Venetian theologians deserve a careful perusal. For being written with no less solidity than erudition and elegance, these works contributed most to open the eyes of kings and magistrates, and to lead them no longer to yield implicit obedience to the will of the pontiffs, as had formerly been done. Pre-eminent among these writings is the istoria delle cose passate entre Paul V. et la Republ. di Venetia, composed by Sarpi, who is usually called Fra Paolo, i.e. Brother (or rather Friar) Paul, printed Mirandol. 1624, 4to., and the Historia Interdicti Veneti, by the same author, which was printed at Cambridge, 1626, 4to., by William Bedell, at that time chaplain to the English embassy at Venice and afterwards a bishop in Ireland. Paul V. therefore, whose rashness and imprudence led the Venetians to publish these books, was himself the cause of those very great perplexities which the Romish see afterwards often experienced.

² The Venetians indeed, a long time afterwards, in the year 1667 when Alexander VII. governed the Romish church, being wearied with the importunities of several princes and especially of Louis XIV. king of France, suffered the Jesuits to return to their territories. Yet down even to our age, nowhere is this very powerful society under more restraint than among the Venetians; to its own loss, it finds the old grudge remaining deeply fixed in the public mind. See the Voyage Historique en Italie, Allemagne, Suisse; Amsterd. 1736, 8vo, tome i. p. 291. To this day, the pontifical rescripts and bulls have just so much power among the Venetians as the interests of the republic and the judgment of the senate will allow them to have. I adduce as a most credible witness cardinal Noris, who (in the Epistolis de Famosis Venetianis to Magliabechi, vol. i. p. 67) thus wrote in the year 1676: "Poche Bulle passavano quelle acque verso le parte del Adriatico, per lo massime lasciate nel testamento di Fra Paolo." That is: "Few bulls of the pontiffs pass the waters of the Po and reach the shores of the Adriatic; they are prohibited by the maxims which Brother Paul laid down in his last testament." [See a full account of this collision between Rome and Venice in Ranke's Popes of Rome, vol. ii. p. 339-364.—R.]

Romish church, and the English and Dutch ambassadors endeavoured to persuade them to such a step. But many causes of great weight prevented the measure; nor did the sagacious and circumspect Sarpi himself, though he was no friend to the Romish court, appear to approve of it.¹

20. If the Portuguese had possessed as much wisdom and courage as the Venetians, equally unsuccessful would have been the contest which Urban VIII. commenced against them in 1641, and which continued till the year 1666. The Portuguese having driven out the Spaniards, made John, duke of Braganza, their king. Urban and his successors pertinaciously refused either to acknowledge John as king of Portugal or to confirm the bishops appointed by him, though urged to it in a thousand ways both by the Portuguese and the French. The consequence was that the greatest part of the Portuguese territories was for a long time without bishops. The vicar of Christ, who above all things should have no fear of man, had such a dread of Spanish resentment, that rather than offend the king of Spain he chose to violate his most sacred duty and leave great numbers of churches without pastors. The king of Portugal was advised from various quarters, and especially by the French, to imitate the example of the Venetians, and to cause his bishops to be consecrated by a national council of Portugal in despite of the pontiff; and he seemed at times disposed to act with vigour. But the ascendancy of the Inquisition, the amazing superstition of the people and their devotion to the will of the pontiff, prevented his adopting energetic measures. Thus it was not till after the lapse of twenty-five years and the conclusion of a peace with the Spaniards, that Clement IX. confirmed the bishops appointed by the king. Yet the Portuguese showed themselves men in strenuously resisting the pontiff when he endeavoured to take advantage of this contest to extend his power in Portugal; nor would they suffer the ancient prerogative of their kings to designate the bishops of the country, to be at all abridged.²

21. For many centuries there had been almost perpetual controversy between the French nation and the popes, which as in other periods so also in this century, sometimes came to an open rupture. If the pontiffs ever employed cunning and perseverance in any cause, they certainly did so throughout this century in their endeavours to subdue the hostility of the French to the Romish power, and to destroy or gradually undermine what are called the liberties of the Gallic church; and their principal coadjutors in this business were the Jesuits. But to these machinations very strong opposition was constantly made both by the parliament of Paris, and by the very able writers, Edmund Richer, John Launois, Peter de Marca, Natalis Alexander, Louis Ellies du Pin, and others, who had the courage to bring forward the opinions of their ancestors, some with more spirit and erudition and others with less, and to confirm them with new arguments and authorities. The court indeed did not always reward these protectors of their country according to their merits, nay, frequently showed itself opposed to them, with a view to please the angry and menacing pontiff; yet this afforded little advantage to the papal cause. The French kings, it seems, would rather have their rights silently maintained than publicly defended with noise and war, in open declarations and disputations; nor did they esteem it below their dignity to temporize occasionally and to pretend great reverence for the mandates and edicts of the pontiffs, in order more easily to obtain from them the objects of their wishes.³ But if they perceived the Romish prelates taking advantage of this complaisance to extend their authority, they remembered that they were kings of the French, that is, of a nation for a long time most impatient of Romish servitude. This is abundantly confirmed by the contests of Lewis XIV. with the pontiffs.⁴

¹ This project of the Venetians is expressly treated of by Barneï in his Life of William Bedell, p. 18, &c. of the French edit. and by Le Courayer, Défense de la Nouvelle Traduction de l'Histoire du Concile de Trente, p. 35, &c. Amsterd. 1742, 8vo, who shows very clearly that Sarpi departed indeed in many respects from the opinions of the Romish church, yet that he did not approve of all the doctrines of the Protestants; nor would he recommend to the Venetians to separate from the Romish church. (From the account of the agent for a union, Jo. Bapt. Lenke, to the elector Palatine, which the keeper of the records, Gattler, has given in an appendix to the Hist. of the Duchy of Würtemberg, vol. vi. No. 10, p. 57, it appears that in the year 1609 a Protestant congregation of more than 1,000 persons, among whom were about 300 gentry of the principal families, then actually existed at Venice, which Sarpi and his friend Fulgenzio had collected and which contemplated under favourable circumstances to abandon popery. The substance of this account is also in Le Bret's Magazin zum Gebrauch der Staaten- und Kirchengesch. vol. ii. p. 235, &c.—Schl.)

² See Geddes, History of the Pope's Behaviour towards Portugal from 1641 to 1666, which is in his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. ii. p. 73-186. The cause of the Portuguese in this contest was learnedly defended among the French, by Bullialdus (Bouillau), whose Libelli duo pro Ecclesiâ Lusitanâ ad Clerum Gallicanum were reprinted at Helmstadt, 1700, 4to.

³ It was with a view to this that Voltaire, speaking of the manner in which the court of France maintains its prerogatives against the Roman pontiff, says pleasantly that "the king of France kisses the pope's feet and ties up his hands."—Much.

⁴ Many both of the Lutherans and Reformed, of

22. The first of these contests occurred in the time of Alexander VII. and originated from the temerity of the pontiff's great merit and learning, lament the augmentation of the Romish power in France during this century and the gradual corruption of the minds of both the nobility and the clergy, by the prevalence of Italian notions respecting the papal power which the ancient French people viewed with abhorrence; and from this they infer that the famous liberties of the Gallic church were much abridged in this century by the influence principally of the Jesuits. Into these views they are led, partly by certain measures of the French monarchs which have the appearance of greatly subserving the wishes of the pontiffs, and partly by the numerous representations of the Jansenists and other recent French writers, who lament that the ancient glory has departed from the French nation, that the edicts of the popes are held in immense veneration, that the Jesuits have imbued the minds of the monarchs and of the leading men in the government with excessive attachment to the Romish views, that vigilance is used against all those who wish to see the opinions of their ancestors prevail, that the tribunal of the Inquisition is gradually introduced, and other things of this sort. But I am persuaded that more reliance is placed on these representations than ought to be, and that the rights of the French people are still in the same state as formerly; nor am I able at all to discern those triumphs of the pontiffs over the French, which many excellent men as well as the French themselves who are too indignant, especially the Jansenists and the Appellants, think they can clearly see. As the general policy of the French government is much more artful and crafty in the present century, so the machinations of the pontiffs are thwarted by more silent and artful methods than in the preceding less civilized age. The same conflict is kept up as before, but it is now managed in a very different way. And this new and politic course does not meet the views of many of the French, who are of an ardent temperament, and who think they ought to contend, as their ancestors did, in open manly warfare. Hence those sighs and lamentations over the rights of the nation, alleged to be invaded and almost annihilated by the craftiness of the Jesuits. If these persons could check those passions with which Frenchmen are so prone to be agitated, and would carefully examine the history of their country, they would certainly learn that their liberties are not extinct; nor are they neglected by their monarchs, but are only maintained with more caution and foresight. France, I am aware, is full of persons who basely flatter the pontiffs, and seem inclined to become slaves for the sake of gain or of honours. But the number of these was no less formerly than it is now, as might be proved by numerous examples. Nor is it common for states to be ruled and governed by such characters. The Jesuits are in high authority, and they sometimes cause things to be done which cannot but be grievous to the friends of the ancient Gallic liberties, although things of this sort occurred also in those times when there were no Jesuits; and on the other hand, very many things occur continually which are most adverse to the wishes of the Jesuits, and which undoubtedly give much disquietude to the pontiffs. Those who contend with the aid of learning for the opinions of their ancestors, sometimes scarcely escape without punishment; those who dispute with warmth not unfrequently suffer for it, and are either imprisoned or sent into exile; and the most modest writers receive no reward for their labours. True, it is so. Yet the cause which these men defend is neither disapproved of nor deserted, but their manner of supporting it is disliked. For the monarchs and their friends in reality choose to have the machinations of the pontiffs resisted without noise and clamour, rather than by publications and disputation which often produce parties in a nation, excite the passions of men, disturb the public peace, exasperate the pontiffs, and alienate them from the French nation. At the same time, the public teachers are at full liberty to instil into their pupils the ancient principles of the nation, and to explain fully in the schools those views by which the Romish lust of power has usually been for ages repressed. Some things take place which are inconsistent with these principles, and restraint is laid upon those Corsican guards, who in the year 1662 ventured to insult the king's ambassador, the Marquis Crequi and his lady, at the instigation as it is reported of Alexander's nephew. The French monarch determined to avenge the insult by a war; but on the pope's imploring his mercy, he granted him peace in 1664 at Pisa on the following conditions among others—that he should send his nephew to Paris to ask pardon, that he should brand the Corsican nation with infamy by a public edict, and erect a pillar in the Farnesian market on which this crime and the punishment of it should be inscribed for future generations. But this contest of the king was not so much with the pontiff as head of the church, as with Alexander considered as a prince and a temporal sovereign.¹ With the pontiff in his proper character the monarch had a controversy in 1678 and the following years, when Innocent XI. filled the Romish see. The subject of this controversy was the right which the French call Régale; according to which when a bishop dies, the king is allowed to collect and enjoy the revenues of the see, and in some respects to act in the place of bishop, until the see is filled by the accession of a new prelate. Lewis wished to subject all the sees in his kingdom to this right; but Innocent would not permit it, determining that the king's power in this particular should extend to no more sees than formerly. This contest was carried on with great passion on both sides. To the many admonitions and epistles of the pontiff, the king opposed severe laws and mandates, who think it very hard to depart from the customs and practices of their fathers; yet this is almost never done, unless either necessity or the prospect of some great advantage warrants it. Besides, the public authorities take good care that the pontiffs shall derive no great benefit from such condescensions to them. That this was the fact in the affair of the bull, Unigenitus, in which many things occurred not agreeing with the ancient customs and opinions of the French, will be readily seen by those who will examine carefully the whole transaction, and compare the public decisions with the actual state of the country. It was judged best frequently to admit a less evil in order to avoid a greater. In short, the kings of France are wont to treat the sovereign pontiff as the ancient heroes who descended into the infernal regions treated the dog Cerberus that guarded the gate of that dark world (no offence is intended by this comparison), sometimes throwing him a cake when he growled, and sometimes awing him with their brandished swords as occasion and circumstances demanded; and both for the same object, namely, that they might freely march on in their chosen way.—These remarks I thought proper to extend thus far, lest those who read the bitter complaints and declamations of the Jansenists and Appellants should put entire confidence in them, which many Protestants have done and particularly those who are not well acquainted with the world.

¹ See Jäger's Historia Eccles. sæcul. xvii. decenn. vii. lib. ii. cap. li. p. 180, &c.; Voltaire's Siècle de Louis XIV. tome I. p. 131, &c. The French also published some tracts in which the history of this contest was related. Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome ii. p. 72, &c. [Gifford's History of France, vol. iv. p. 379.—Mur.]

and when the pope refused his approbation to the bishops appointed by the king, the latter by his regal authority caused them to be inducted into office, thus showing publicly that the Gallic church could get along without a pope. On the other hand, the high-spirited and persevering pontiff denounced the vengeance of Heaven against the king, and omitted nothing which might show that the ancient power of the pontiffs was not yet extinct.¹ The king offended by this resolute behaviour, in the year 1682 assembled at Paris that famous convention of his bishops, in which the ancient opinions of the French respecting the power of the pontiff as being exclusively spiritual and inferior to that of councils, were stated in four propositions, unanimously adopted, confirmed, and set forth as the perpetual rule for all the clergy as well as for the schools.²

¹ See Heidegger's Historia Panatus, period vii. sec. cccxli. &c. p. 555; Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV. tome li. p. 210, and numerous others, who either professedly or incidentally treat of the right of the Régale and of the disputes which grew out of it. Henry Noris discusses very copiously the history of the origin and progress of this right, in his Storia delle Investiture Ecclesiastiche, p. 547, &c. In his Opp. vol. v. [See also Burnet, in his History of the Rights of Princes in the Disposing of Ecclesiastical Benefices and Church Lands, relating chiefly to the Pretensions of the Crown of France to the Régale, and the late Contests with the Court of Rome, Lond., 1682, 8vo.—Mur.]

² This convention was composed of eight archbishops, twenty-six bishops, and thirty-eight other clergymen, who all set their names to the four following propositions:—

I. That God has given to St. Peter and to his successors, the vicars of Christ, and to the church itself, power in spiritual things and things pertaining to salvation; but not power in civil and temporal things: our Lord having said, "My kingdom is not of this world;" and again, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's." And therefore that injunction of the apostle stands firm: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. There is no power but is from God; and the powers that be are ordained of God." Therefore, in temporal things kings and princes are subject to no ecclesiastical power of God's appointment; neither can they either directly or indirectly be deposed by authority of the keys of the church, nor can their subjects be exempted from fidelity and obedience, nor be absolved from their oath of allegiance. And this principle, which is necessary to the public tranquillity, and no less useful to the church than to the state, ought by all means to be held fast, as being consonant to the word of God, to the tradition of the fathers, and to the example of the saints.

II. That plenary power in spiritual things so exists in the apostolic see and in the successors of Peter, the vicars of Christ, that at the same time the decrees of the holy œcumenical council of Constance, approved by the apostolic see, and confirmed by the practice of the Roman pontiffs and of the whole church, and observed by the Gallican church with perpetual veneration, respecting the authority of general councils, as contained in the fourth and fifth sessions, must also be valid and remain immovable. Nor does the Gallican church approve of those who infringe upon the force of these decrees, as if they were of dubious authority or not fully approved; or who pervert the words of the council by referring them solely to a time of schism.

III. Hence the exercise of the apostolic power is to be tempered by the canons, which the Spirit of God dictated and which the reverence of the whole world has consecrated. The rules, customs, and regulations received by the Gallic realm and church are also valid,

But Innocent received this blow also with manly courage.³ This violent contest was soon after followed by another. In the year 1687, Innocent deprived the ambassadors resident at Rome and among others the French ambassador Lavardin, of the right of asylum, because it often rendered criminals secure from impunity. The king employed all the means his angry feelings could suggest to induce the pontiff to restore the right he had taken away, but the latter met the king with a bold front and could by no means be persuaded to put on even the semblance of yielding.⁴ This long conflict which was injurious to both the parties, was at length closed by the death of Innocent. The subsequent pontiffs were more pliable, and therefore more ready to remove the principal causes of contention; yet they were not so careless as to forget the dignity of the Romish see. The right of asylum was abrogated with the consent of the king; the controversy respecting the right of Régale was adjusted by a compromise.⁵ The four celebrated propositions respecting the power of the pontiff, without objection from the king were gilded over and the terms of the fathers remain immovable; and it concerns the majesty of the apostolic see that statutes and usages confirmed by the consent of so great a see and of such churches should retain their appropriate validity.

IV. In questions of faith likewise, the supreme pontiff has a principal part, and his decrees have reference to all and singular churches; yet his judgment is not incapable of correction, unless it have the assent of the church.

These propositions, approved by Lewis XIV. and registered by the parliament of Paris on the 23d of March, 1682, were ordered to be publicly read and expounded in the schools from year to year, and to be subscribed to by all clergymen and professors in the universities. See Bossuet's Defensio Declarationis Clari Gallicani; the documents at the beginning of vol. i.—Mur.

³ These four propositions which were extremely adverse to his wishes, the pontiff caused to be opposed both publicly and privately. The most distinguished person who defended the cause of the pontiff was cardinal Celestino Sfondrati, who under the assumed name of Eugene Lombard, published Regule Sacerdotum Romano Pontifici assertum et quatuor Propositionibus explicatum, 1684, 4to. The form of the types shows that the book was printed in Switzerland. Next to him among the multitude of Italians, Spaniards, and Germans who supported the tottering majesty of the pontiff against the French, Nicholas du Bois, a doctor of Louvain, stood conspicuous. He published some books on the subject which are mentioned by Bossuet. But all these were confuted by the very eloquent bishop of Meaux, Jacques Benigne Bossuet, in a learned work composed by order of the king but which was not published till long after his death, entitled, Defensio Declarationis Celeberrimæ, quam de Potestate Ecclesiastica sanxit Clerus Gallicanus, xix. Martii, 1682, Luxemburg, 2 vols. 1730, 4to. For the king forbade the publication of the Defence, because after the death of Innocent there seemed to be a great prospect of peace, which in fact soon followed.

⁴ See Jäger, ubi supra, decenn. ix. p. 19, &c.; the Legatio Lavardin, which was published, 1688, 12mo. But especially, Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome ii. p. 243, &c. For Christina engaged in this contest, and sided with the king of France.

⁵ See Fleury, Institutio Juris Eccles. Gallici, p. 454, &c. of the Latin translation.

by some bishops in private letters to the pope, but they were by no means given up. To the present day they maintain their place among the laws of the realm.¹

23. That the faults which had long characterized the bishops and some of the inferior clergy in the Romish church were rather increased than diminished, no good man even of that community will deny. The bishops everywhere owed their elevation rarely to their piety and merit, generally to personal friendships, to services rendered to individuals, to simony, to consanguinity and relationship, and often even to their vices. And the greater part of them lived, as if they had been hired with their great salaries expressly to exhibit before the people examples of those very vices which the Christian religion condemns.² If there were some (as there doubtless were) who endeavoured to benefit their flocks, and who set themselves against both ignorance and wickedness, they were either put down by the enmity and hatred of the others, or at least fell under neglect and were hindered from effecting anything great and laudable. And nearly the same things were experienced by those clergymen of inferior rank who exerted all their powers in behalf of truth and piety. These however, if compared with those whom voluptuousness, ambition, and lust for wealth drove headlong, were exceedingly few. Some indeed of the pontiffs of this century should not be defrauded of their just praise, for attempting to correct the morals of the clergy by wholesome laws, and to bring them to exhibit at least common decency in their lives. Yet it is strange that these sagacious men should not see, that the very constitution of the Romish church and its whole interior structure were insuperable obstacles to all such good designs; and that a pontiff, even if he were inspired, unless he also possessed more than human power and could be present in many places at the same time, could never reduce such a heterogeneous mass of people to good order.

24. The monks, though in many places more decent and circumspect in their lives than formerly, yet for the most part were extremely negligent of the rules and regulations of the founders of their orders. In the beginning of the century, as learned and good monks themselves admit, the state of all the monasteries was still lamentable. But as the century advanced, some wise men, first among the Benedictines in France and then also in other countries, endeavoured to reform certain monasteries, that is, to bring them back in some degree to the rules and laws of their order.³ Their example was afterwards followed by other religious houses of the Cluniacensians, Cistercians, Regular Canons, Dominicans, and Franciscans.⁴ At this time therefore the monks of the Romish church became divided into two classes; namely, the Reformed, who abandoning their licentious and profligate manners, lived more decently and more conformably to the rules of their order; and the Unreformed, who disregarded the precepts of their founders, and chose to live as they found it convenient and pleasant, rather than austere and according to the laws by which they were bound. But the number of the Unreformed far exceeds that of the Reformed; and moreover most of the Reformed not only depart widely from the mode of living prescribed by the rule, but are also in one place and another gradually relapsing into their former negligence.

25. Among the Reformed monastic associations, certain Congregations of Benedictines surpass the others, partly in the

¹ Le Bœuf, Mémoires sur l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome ii. p. 513, &c. where there is a list of the first reforms of this century. Voyage Littéraire de Deux Bénédictins, par. ii. p. 97, &c.

² There is an account of all the convents, both Benedictines and others, which submitted to a reform of any kind, in Helyot's Histoire des Ordres, tome v. vi. vii. &c. to whose account, however, numerous additions might be made. Of the Reformed Congregation of Cluny, which commenced in the year 1621, the Benedictines have treated expressly in their Gallia Christiana, tom. vii. p. 544, &c. They also treat of the Reformed Canons Regular of St. Augustine, in tom. vii. p. 778, 787, 790. For an account of the Reformed Cisterciens in France and Germany, see Mabillon, Annal. Bénédictin, tome vi. p. 121, &c.; Voyage Littéraire de deux Bénédictins, tome i. p. 7, 8, tome ii. p. 133, 225, 269, 303. The Reformed Cistercians with great zeal attempted a reformation of their whole sect in this century, but in vain. See Meaupo, Vie de l'Abbé de la Trappe, tome i. p. 192, &c. I omit other notices as requiring too much room. I find no more suitable place to notice some abolished orders in this century. Clement XIV. in his bull for suppressing the order of Jesuits, mentions the Congregation of the Reformed Conventual Brethren, which Sixtus V. approved but which Urban VIII. abolished by his bull of February 6, 1626, because the above-named brethren did not yield spiritual fruits to the church of God; nay, very many disagreements had arisen between those Reformed Conventual Brethren and the Unreformed Conventual Brethren; and he allowed them to go over to the Capuchin Brethren of St. Francis or to the Observant Franciscans. According to the same bull, the order of Regulars of St. Ambrose and St. Barnabas ad nomen, was suppressed by the same pontiff. And in the year 1668, Clement IX. abolished the three regular orders of Canons Regular of St. Gregory in Alga, of Hieronymists de Fesulis, and of Jesuats, established by St. Jo. Columbanus, because they were of little or no use to the church, and had lent their revenues to the Venetian republic to be applied to war against the Turks.—Schl.

¹ On this significant and instructive contest, in addition to the French historians, see the remarks of Ranke in his Popes of Rome, vol. iii. p. 167, &c. and of Hallam in his Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iv. p. 123, &c.—R.

² See a multitude of proofs collected from the most celebrated doctors of the Romish church, in the Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome ii. p. 308.

excellence and utility of their regulations, and partly in the constancy with which they observe them. The most famous of these is the French Congregation of St. Maur,¹ which was formed under the authority of Gregory XV. in 1621, and endowed with various privileges and rights by Urban VIII. in 1627. This association does not indeed consist of genuine followers of St. Benedict, nor is it free from everything censurable; yet it has many excellencies which raise it above all others. Of these excellencies the first and most useful is, that it enables a certain number of persons of superior genius to devote themselves to the cultivation of learning, both sacred and civil, and particularly to the study of history and antiquities, and that it furnishes them in abundance with all the helps which they need to prosecute their business with advantage.² Those who are acquainted with the history of learning need not be informed how much this institution has benefited the literary world, or what a multitude of excellent and immortal works it has produced, illustrative of every branch of learning except philosophy.³

26. But the best and most sacred of these changes were esteemed trivial and imperfect by those whose eye was fixed on the ancient discipline, and who wished to see the lives of monks strictly conformed to their first rules. The number of these in the Romish church was not inconsiderable, though they had little influence and were odious to most persons on account of their severity. These persons taught that a monk should spend his whole life in prayers, tears, con-

¹ See the Gallia Christiana—not the old work of this name, but the new and elegant production of the Benedictines of this same Congregation of St. Maur, vol. vii. p. 474, &c.; Helyot's Histoire des Ordres, tome vi. chap. xxxvii. p. 256. The bull of Gregory XV. approving the society of St. Maur is severely criticised in all its parts by Launoï, that scourge of the monks, even the best of them, in his Examen Privilegii S. Germanii; Opp. tom. iii. part i. p. 303. He also treats of the dissensions and commotions in this order soon after its institution, (though with considerable prejudice, as is usual for him when speaking of monks), in his Assertio Inquisit. in Privileg. S. Medardi, par. i. cap. lxxvi. in his Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 227. [This Congregation consists of more than 180 Abbeys and Conventual Priors, which are divided into six provinces (extending over the greatest part of France), and it is governed by a General, two assistants, and six visitors, who are elected, as are the superiors of the several cloisters, every three years in a general chapter of the order. As it is the object of this Congregation to revive the spirit of St. Benedict in the observance of his rule, so special care is taken to train up the young religious according to it. Hence in each province one or two houses for novices are erected, from which those to be admitted to profession are removed to other cloisters, where they are trained for two years to virtue and to acts and exercises of worship. After this they study human learning and theology five years, and then spend one year in collecting their thoughts, and thus prepare themselves for orders and for more assiduity in their spiritual offices. In some cloisters there are also seminaries for the education of youth.—Schl.]

² The Benedictines talk largely of the great services done by this Congregation in various ways; and among other difficult enterprises they mention numerous cloisters of monks which had declined and become corrupt, recovered and restored to order and respectability. See Voyage de Deux Religieux Bénédictins de la Congrég. de St. Maur, tome i. p. 16, tome ii. p. 47, and nearly throughout that work. A person must indeed be much prejudiced who can look upon all these statements as fictions. There are however in the Romish community persons who for various reasons dislike this society. First, some of the bishops are unfriendly to these learned Benedictines. For after these monks had thrown great light upon ancient history and upon diplomacies by their learned works, they were able to defend their possessions, property, and rights, more learnedly and successfully in the courts against the bishops who coveted them, than when they were destitute of this literature and erudition. In the next place, the Jesuits, whose merits and glory were greatly obscured by the splendid works undertaken and accomplished by these Benedictines, endeavour to the utmost of their power to run down both them and their pursuits. See Simon's

Lettres Choisies, tome iv. p. 36, 45. Others are led by superstition to indulge hatred of them, but it is perhaps a superstition tainted with envy. For these Benedictines have substituted the pursuit of learning in place of that of manual labour, which the rule of St. Benedict prescribes for his monks. The more robust are required to labour with their hands during certain hours of the day, but the more feeble or those who possess superior genius are taxed with intellectual or mental labour or the pursuit of sacred or secular learning. This is censured by certain austere persons who are very fond of the ancient monastic discipline, and who think that literary pursuits are disreputable for monks, because they divert the mind from the contemplation of divine things. As this sentiment was advanced with excessive ardour, especially by Bouthillier de Rance, abbot of La Trappe, in his book, Des Déniers Monastiques, the most learned of the Benedictines, John Mabillon, was directed to defend the cause of his fraternity, which he did in his well-known work De l'Etude des Monastiques, which was first published, Paris, 1691, 8vo. and often afterwards, and translated also into the Latin and other languages. Hence arose that well-known controversy in France, "How far is it suitable for a monk to cultivate literature?" an elegant history of which has been given to the world by Vincent Thullier, a very learned monk of the congregation of St. Maur, published among the Opera Posthuma Mabillonii et Ruinartii, tom. i. p. 365—425.

³ A list of the writings and works with which the congregation of St. Maur have favoured the learned world is given by Le Cerf, Bibliothèque Historique et Critique des Auteurs de la Congrégation de S. Maur, Hague, 1726, 8vo. and by Pez, Bibliotheca Benedictino-Mauriana, Augsburg, 1716, 8vo. These monks are going on with great perseverance to benefit both sacred and profane learning by their elaborate and excellent productions. [A more complete catalogue of their works is in the Histoire Littéraire de la Congrégation de S. Maur, Ordre de St. Benoît, où l'on trouve la Vie et les Traux des Auteurs, qu'elle a produits depuis son Origine en 1613, jusqu'à présent, avec les Titres, Numération, l'Analyse, des différentes Editions des Livres, qu'ils ont donnés au Public, et le Jugement que les Savans en ont porté; ensemble la notice de beaucoup d' Ouvrages manuscrits, composés par des Bénédictins du même Corps, Brussels and Paris, 1770, 4to.—Schl. [by Père Tassin. Among their most valuable works are their Gallia Christiana in thirteen vols. fol. 1715—85, not yet completed; their Hist. Littér. de la France, &c. in twenty vols. 4to, Paris, 1733—1842; and their L'Art de périfier les Dates des Faits historiques, &c. Paris, 1750, frequently republished in folio, quarto, and octavo, and continued to the present time. Their celebrated editions of the fathers, commenced in this century (1642), continued to appear from time to time down to the year 1780, when the French Revolution interrupted their learned labours. They edited ten Greek and twelve Latin fathers, comprised in 59 vols. in folio, one in 4to, and one in 8vo. The student will find a chronological list of these editions in the Appendix to Dowling's Introd. to the Critical Study of Eccles. Hist. p. 286.—R.]

templation, sacred reading, and manual labour; and that whatever else might occupy him, however useful and excellent it might be in itself, was inconsistent with his vocation and therefore vain and not acceptable to God. Besides others who had not the fortune to become so celebrated, the Jansenists proposed this rigid reformation of the monks, and they exhibited some examples of it in France;¹ the most perfect and best known of which was that which took place in the convent of Sacred Virgins bearing the name of Port-Royal, and which has flourished from the year 1618 down to the present time [A.D. 1753].² Several emulated this example; but the most successful and zealous of all these was, in the year 1664, Armand John Bouthillier de Rance, abbot of La Trappe, a man of noble birth, who was so happy as to prevent the accusation of extravagant superstition which the Jansenists had incurred from being brought against his associates, although they lived in the most austere manner of the old Cistercians; nay, although they carried their austerity beyond the ancient discipline of the Cistercians. The fraternity established by this noted man still flourishes under the name of the Reformed Bernardines of La Trappe, and has been propagated among the Italians and the Spaniards; though, if credit is to be given to the testimony of many, it has gradually departed much from the very painful discipline of its founder.³

27. Of the new orders of monks which arose in this century—for that fruitful mother, the church, has never ceased to bring forth such fraternities—we shall notice only those which have acquired some celebrity. We mention, first, the French society of Fathers of the Oratory of the Holy Jesus, instituted in 1613 by John Berulle [Peter de Berulle], a man of various talents, who served the commonwealth and religion, the court and the church, with equal ability, and was at last a cardinal. This institution was in reality intended to oppose the Jesuits. It has trained and it is still training many persons eminent for piety, eloquence, and erudition. But through the influence of the Jesuits, who were its enemies, it fell under a suspicion of broaching new doctrines in certain of its publications. The priests who enter this fraternity do not divest themselves of private property; but so long as they continue in the society (and they are at liberty to retire from it whenever they please) they relinquish all prospects of admission to any sacred office which has attached to it fixed revenues or rank and honour. Yet they are required faithfully to discharge all the duties of priests, and to make it their greatest care and effort to perfect themselves and others more and more in the art of profitably discharging those duties. Their fraternities therefore may not improperly be denominated schools for pastoral theology. In more recent times however they have in fact begun to teach the liberal arts and sacred science.⁴ With

¹ See Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome ii. p. 601, 602. In particular, that most celebrated Jansenist, Martin de Barcos, introduced the austere discipline of ancient monks into the monastery of St. Cyran, of which he was abbot. See Gallia Christiana, tom. ii. p. 132; Molon, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 135, &c. But after his death the monks of St. Cyran, like those of other places, relapsed into their old habits. See Voyage de Deux Bénédictins, tome i. part i. p. 18, &c.

² Helyot, Histoire des Ordres, tome v. chap. xlv. p. 455.

³ See Marsollier, Vie de l'Abbé de la Trappe, Paris, 1702, 4to, and 1703, 2 vols. 12mo.; Meaupou (a doctor of the Sorbonne), Vie de M. l'Abbé de la Trappe, Paris, 1702, 2 vols. 8vo.; Follébin, Description de l'Abbaye de la Trappe, Paris, 1671, 12mo.; Helyot, Histoire des Ordres, tome vi. chap. i. p. 1, &c. The author of this reformation lived, as the greater part of the French abbés now do, in a thoughtless, unprincipled manner, and kept up an illicit intercourse with a French lady, Madame de Montbazou. Her sudden death by the small-pox and the unexpected sight of her mutilated corpse, brought him to the resolution of becoming a Carthusian. The common statement is this:—The abbot had received no notice of the lady's sickness, and after an absence of six weeks returned from the country to visit her. He went directly to her chamber by a secret staircase with which he was acquainted, and there found her dead and her corpse mutilated. For the leaden coffin which had been made for her was too short, and it was found necessary to cut off her head. The sight of her corpse in the coffin and her head on the table so affected him that he resolved to forsake the world and to embrace the severest monastic order. Vigneul-Marville (Mélanges d'Hist. et de Littérature, Rotterd. 1700, 8vo, tome iii. p. 126) contradicts this statement. He says the true account is:—The abbot had been a particular friend of this lady, and once on waiting on her he learned from a gentleman in her antechamber that she had the smallpox and was then wishing the attendance of a clergyman. The abbot went to call on, and on his return found her dying. He was much affected on the occasion; but it was two or three years after this event that he formed his rigorous establishment. And probably the additions and alterations of the story were invented for the sake of giving it a romantic aspect. Be this as it may, the abbot changed his life and established an order into which none would enter but melancholy people, who were weary of the whole world and constantly in fear of losing heaven. They permitted no scientific or literary pursuits, and in their library had none but devotional books. Their worship was continued day and night; and if a cloister contained so many as twenty-four monks, they were divided into three classes which interchanged continually. All these monks lived very austere and observed a rigorous silence, conversing together only once a-week and then not on worldly things. Their time was divided between manual labour, the canonical exercises, and private devotion. They lived wholly on bread, herbs, and pulse.—Schl.

⁴ See De Cerisy, Vie du Cardinal Berulle, Fondateur de l'Oratoire de Jésus, Paris, 1646, 4to; Morin's Life, prefixed to his Antiquit. Orientales, p. 3, 4, 5, 110; Simon's Lettres Choïsies, tome ii. p. 60, and his Bibliothèque Critique (which he published under the name of Sainiore), tome iii. p. 303, 324, 330, &c. On the character of Berulle, see Baillet's Vie de Richer, p. 320, 342; Le Vassor, Histoire de Louis XIII. tome iii. p. 397, &c.; Helyot, Histoire des Ordres, tome vii. chap. x. p. 53, &c.; Gallia Christiana of the Benedictines, tom. vii. p. 976, &c. [Those Fathers of the Oratory must these we join the Priests of the Missions, an order founded by Vincent de Paul, who was canonized not long since. They were constituted a regular and legitimate society in 1632 by Urban VIII. To fulfil the designs of their founder they must attend especially to three things: first, to improve and amend themselves daily by prayers, meditation, reading, and other things; secondly to perform sacred missions among the people living in the country towns and villages, eight months in the year, in order to imbue the peasantry with religious knowledge and quicken their piety (from which service they derive their name of Priests of the Missions); and lastly, to superintend seminaries in which young men are educated for the priesthood, and to train up candidates for the sacred office.¹ Under the counsel and patronage of the Priests of the Missions are the Virgins of Love or the Sisters of Charity, whose business it is to minister to the indigent in sickness. They originated with a noble lady, Louisa le Gras, and received the approbation of Clement IX. in 1660.² The Brethren and Sisters of the Pious and Christian Schools were instituted by Nicholas Barre in 1678. They are usually called Piarists, and their principal object is the education of poor children of both sexes.³ But it would be tedious to expatiate on this subject and to enumerate all the religious associations which in the various parts of the Romish jurisdiction were now set up with great expectations, and then suddenly neglected and suffered to become extinct.

28. The society of Jesuits, by which as its soul the whole body of the Romish community is governed, if it could have been oppressed and trodden to dust by hosts of enemies, by innumerable indignities, by the most horrid accusations, and by various calamities, must undoubtedly have become extinct or at least have been divested of all reputation and confidence. The French, the Belgians, the Poles, the Italians, have attacked it with fury and have boldly charged it, both publicly and privately, with every species of crime and error which the imagination can conceive as most pernicious to the souls of men and to the peace and safety of civil governments. The Jansenists especially and those who adopt altogether or in part their views, have exposed its character in numerous publications, strengthened not merely by satire and groundless declamation, but by proofs, evidences, and documents of the most credible nature.⁴ But this immense host of accusers and of most decided enemies seems not so much to have weakened and depressed this very sagacious sect, as to have exalted it and enriched it with possessions and honours of every kind. For the Jesuits, without parrying the strokes of their enemies by replies and noisy disputation, have by silence for the most part and patience, held on their course amid all these storms, and reaching their desired haven have possessed themselves, with wonderful facility, of their supremacy in the Romish church. The very countries in which the Jesuits were once viewed as horrid monsters and public pests have sometimes voluntarily, and sometimes involuntarily, surrendered not be confounded with the Italian order of the same name, established in the preceding century by Philip Nerl. (See above, p. 616). Both agree in this, that they devote themselves to learning; but the Italians pursue especially church history, while the French cultivate all branches of learning. The founder of this order, Berulle, was in so high favour with the queen of France, Anna of Austria, that Cardinal Richelieu envied him; and his death which occurred in 1629 was so sudden, that some conjectured he died of poison. The Fathers of the Oratory are not monks but secular clergymen, nor do they chant any canonical hours. They are called Fathers of the Oratory, because they have no churches in which the sacraments are administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preach.—Schl.

⁴ Here is matter for a volume, or rather for many large volumes. For there is scarcely any part of the Catholic world which does not offer for our inspection some conflict of the Jesuits with the magistrates, with other orders of monks, or with the bishops and other religious teachers; from which the Jesuits, though they might seem vanquished, yet finally came off victorious. An attempt was made to bring together all these facts which lie scattered and dispersed through numerous writers, by a man of the Jansenist party, who a few years ago undertook to write a history of the order of Jesuits, if he should be permitted to fulfil the promises in his Preface, Histoire des Religieux de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome I. Utrecht, 1741, 8vo. And no man was more competent to finish the work commenced by him than he was, unless we are to regard as fabulous all that he tells us respecting his travels and his sufferings for many years, while exploring the plans, policy, and operations of the Jesuits. But this honest man, imprudently venturing to go into France, was discovered, it is said, by his enemies and assassinated. Hence his work was carried no farther than the third volume. [MacLaine in his note here written at the Hague about the year 1764 says this man was a Frenchman named Bernard, that he was then living at the Hague, that he had not been massacred in France, but had returned in safety from his visit to that country; that he had never travelled in the manner he pretended in his preface to collect information, but had collected all his information from books in his study, and had made up the story of his travels to amuse his readers and procure credit to his book; and that no good reason was offered for his having violated his promise to continue the work. Schroech (in his Kirchen-gesch. u. d. Reformat. vol. II. p. 645) tells us on the authority of a Dutch journal, that the man's name was Peter Quænel, with the surname Menard, that he had never travelled as he pretended, that he died at the Hague in the year 1774, and that the report was that he was persuaded, a little before his death, to burn the manuscript of the residue of his work which was sufficient to fill twenty volumes.—Mur.

¹ Abely, Vie de M. Vincent de Paul, Paris, 1664, 4to; Helyot, ubi supra, tome viii. chap. xi. p. 64; Gallia Christiana, tom. vii. p. 398, &c.

² Gobillon, Vie de Madame de Gras, Fondatrice des Filles de la Charité, Paris, 1676, 12mo.

³ Helyot, Ibid. des Ordres, tome viii. chap. xxx. p. 233.

no small share of their interests and concerns to the discretion and good faith of this most potent fraternity.¹

29. Literature and the sciences, both the elegant and the useful branches, acquired additional honour and glory in the better provinces of the Romish church. Among the French, the Italians, the Spaniards, and the Catholics of the Low Countries, there were men distinguished for their genius and their knowledge of various sciences and languages. But we must not ascribe this prosperous state of learning to the influence of the public schools. For in both the higher and lower classes of these schools that ancient, jejune, tedious, and barren mode of teaching which enfeebles, embarrasses, and perplexes rather than quickens and strengthens the mind, and which loads the memory with a multitude of technical words and phrases without meaning and without use, has maintained its place down even to our times. But beyond the limits of these reputed seats of learning, certain great and excellent men guided others to a better and more profitable method of prosecuting study. In this matter the pre-eminence is justly due to the French, who being prompted by native powers of genius and encouraged by the munificence of Louis XIV. towards learning and learned men, treated nearly all branches of literature and science in the happiest manner; and rejecting the barbarism of the schools, exhibited learning in a new and elegant dress suited to captivate the mind.² And how greatly the efforts of this very refined nation tended to rescue the other nations from scholastic bondage, no person of even a moderate share of information can well be ignorant.

30. No means whatever could remove from the chairs of philosophy those misnamed Aristotelians, who were continually quoting Aristotle while they did not in reality understand him. Nor could the court of Rome, which is afraid of everything new, for a long time persuade itself to allow the new discoveries of the philosophers to be freely promulgated and explained; as is manifest from the sufferings of Galileo, a Tuscan mathematician, who was cast into prison for bringing forward the Copernican system of astronomy. Some among the French, led on by René des Cartes and Peter Gassendi,³ the former of whom by his doctrines and the latter in his writings confuted the Peripatetics, first ventured to abandon the thorny fields of the Aristotelians and to follow more liberal principles of philosophising. Among these there were some Jesuits, but a much larger number from among the Fathers of the Oratory and the disciples of Jansenius, who distinguished themselves. Here will readily occur to many minds the names of Malebranche, Anthony Arnauld, Bernard Lami, Peter Nicole, and Blaise Pascal, who acquired lasting fame by illustrating, perfecting, and adapting to common use the principles of Des Cartes.⁴ For Gassendi, who professed to understand but few things and who rather taught how to philosophise than proposed a system of philosophy, had but few followers among a people eager for knowledge, sanguine, ardent, and impatient of protracted labour. Towards the close of the century, some of the Italians as well as other nations began to imitate the French; at first indeed timidly but afterwards more confidently, as the pontiffs appeared to relax a little of that jealousy which they had entertained against the new views of the

¹ Perhaps no people have attacked the Jesuits with more animosity and energy, or done them more harm, than the French. Those who wish to learn what was said and done against them by the parliament, by the university of Paris, and by the people of France, may consult Casar Egasse de Boulay [better known by his Latin name Bulaeus], Historia Academicæ Parisiensis, tom. vi. p. 559-648, 676, 738, 742, 744, 763, 774-890, 898, 900, who has scarcely omitted anything relating to the subject. And what was the issue of all these most vehement contests? The Jesuits, after being ignominiously expelled from France, were first honourably received again under Henry IV. in the year 1604, notwithstanding the indignation of so many men of the greatest reputation and of the highest rank who were opposed to them. See the Mémoires du Duc de Sully, the late edition of Geneva, tome v. p. 83, &c. 314, &c. In the next place, they were admitted to the government both of the church and of the state, and this privilege they retain quite to our times. [So it was when Moshcim wrote; but now,—

Venit summa dies et ineluctabile tempus
Dardanæ, &c.

And even in France, where the Jesuits were caressed by the great and feared by bishops and archbishops, the conflagration began which consumed the whole fabric of the Jesuits' universal monarchy.—Schl. [But, as formerly stated, this order has not only been re-established but has returned to France, although it has been, only a few years ago, once more formally expelled or withdrawn by the pope out of that kingdom.—R.

² This will be found illustrated by Voltaire, in the noted work already quoted repeatedly, Siècle de Louis XIV. and in his Additions to that work [in the edition, Paris, 1820, tome ii. chap. xxii.—xxxiv.—Mur.

³ Gassendi's Exercitationes Paradoxæ adversus Aristotelicos is in his Opera, tom. iii. p. 95, &c. and is an accurate and elegant performance, which did great harm to the cause of the Peripatetics. See the remarks already made [in Section I. sec. 31 of this century, p. 734.—Mur.

⁴ The reward which these men had for their labours was, that they were charged with atheism by the Peripatetics; John Harduin, who was intoxicated with the Aristotelico-Scholastic philosophy, being the accuser; Athei Detecti, in his Opera Posthuma, p. 1, &c. and p. 259. Nor is the cause of this odium very difficult to be discovered. For the Cartesian philosophy, which avoids all darkness and obscurity, is much less efficacious for defending the Romish cause than the vulgar scholastic philosophy which delights in darkness. [On these Cartesian philosophers and their system, see Tennemann's Manual of the Hist. of Philos. p. 314, &c. and Hallam's Introduction to the Liter. of Europe, vol. iii. p. 214, and 229, &c.—R.

naturalists, mathematicians, and metaphysicians.

31. But it is proper to notice here more distinctly who were the persons entitled to the praise of having preserved and advanced both divine and human learning in the Romish church. During a large part of the century the Jesuits were nearly the only teachers of all branches of learning, and they alone among the monks were accounted learned men. And the man must be either ignorant or uncandid, who can deny that many renowned and very learned men have highly adorned that society. Lasting as literature itself will be the merits of Denys Petan,¹ James Sirmond,² Peter Possin,³ Philip Labbé,⁴ Nicholas Abrams,⁵ and even of John Harduin,⁶ though in many things erratic and not of a sound mind, as well as of many others. But as the century advanced, this literary glory of the Jesuits was greatly obscured by the Benedictines, especially by those belonging to the Congregation of St. Maur. For while the Jesuits immoderately vaunted of their merits and renown, and were unceasingly censuring the sloth and indolence of the Benedictines, in order to give plausibility to their designs of invading and appropriating to themselves the revenues and the goods of the Benedictines, the latter thought it necessary for them to wipe off this stain upon their character which they could not deny, and to disarm their most zealous enemies, by becoming really meritorious. Hence they not only opened schools in their convents for instructing youth in all branches of learning, but also appointed select individuals of the best talents to publish great and imperishable works, which might vindicate the ancient glory and reputation of the Benedictine family against its traducers. This task has been admirably fulfilled and with a success which baffles description for about a century past, by such superior men as John Mabillon,⁷ Luke D'Achery,⁸ René Massuet,⁹ Theodore Ruinart,¹⁰ Anthony Beaugendre,¹¹ Julian Garnier,¹² Charles de la Rue,¹³ Edmund Martene,¹⁴ Bernard Montfaucon,¹⁵ and many others, some of whom have published excellent editions of the Greek and Latin fathers; others have drawn from the obscure shelves of the libraries those old papers and documents which serve to elucidate the history and antiquities of the church; others have explained the early history of church and state, the customs and rites of former times, the chronology of the world, and other parts of polite learning; and others have executed various works worthy to be handed down to posterity. I know not how it happened but from the time these new stars appeared above the literary horizon, the splendour of Jesuit erudition began gradually to decline. For there is no one disposed to deny that for a long time past, the Jesuits in vain look around among their order to find an individual who may be compared with the Benedictines, who are constantly pursuing with ardour every branch of literature, and publishing almost every year distinguished monuments of their ⁷ Mabillon was born in 1632, and died at Paris in 1707. He travelled much for literary purposes in France, Germany, and Italy; and besides publishing the works of St. Bernard and the Lives of the Benedictine saints (Acta Sanctorum Ordinis Benedicti), and his Analecta Veterum, he composed Diplomatæ, Annals of the Benedictines, and some smaller works.—Mur.

⁸ Dacherius or D'Achery, born 1608, died 1685, collected judiciously and published numerous unprinted writings pertaining to ecclesiastical history, 13 vols. 4to, or (2d ed.) in 3 vols. fol. entitled Spicilegium, &c.—Mur.

⁹ Massuet, born 1655, died 1716, published the best edition of Irenæus.—Mur.

¹⁰ Ruinart, born 1657, died 1709, was associated with Mabillon, and published Acta martyrum sincera et selecta, the works of Gregory Turonensis and of Victor Vitensis, and some other works.—Mur.

¹¹ Beaugendre is noted only for the lives of some French bishops, and an edition of the works of Hildebert.—Mur.

¹² Garnier died 1723, aged 53, noted as editor of the works of St. Basil, 3 vols. fol.—Mur.

¹³ De la Rue, born 1685, died 1739, an associate of Montfaucon, and editor of the works of Origen, 3 vols. fol. He must not be confounded with the Jesuit of the same name who was a poet, and editor of Virgil in usum Delphini.—Mur.

¹⁴ Martene died 1759, aged 85; he travelled much to explore monasteries and libraries, and published a Commentary on the Rule of St. Benedict, on the ancient monastic rites, a Thesaurus of unpublished works, in 5 vols. fol. and with Durand, a new Thesaurus of the same kind, in 10 vols. fol.; and he and Durand were the Benedictine travellers who published the well-known Voyage Littéraire de deux Religieux de la Congrégation de St. Maur.—Mur.

¹⁵ Montfaucon, born 1655, died 1741, aged 87, a very learned antiquarian, known by his Analecta Græca, 4to, Palaographia Græca, fol. the works of Athanasius, 3 vols. fol. Origen's Hexapla, 2 vols. fol. Chrysostom's works, 13 vols. fol. Antiquité Explicquée et Représentée en Figures, 15 vols. fol. Monumens de la Monarchie Française, 5 vols. fol. a Collection of the Greek fathers, 2 vols. fol. Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, 2 vols. fol. and some other works.—Mur.

¹ Dionysius Petavius or Petau, born in 1583, died 1652, wrote largely on chronology and the history of religious doctrines, and ably edited several of the fathers, particularly Epiphanius.—Mur.

² Sirmond, confessor to Lewis XIII. died 1651, aged 92, wrote much on church history, and edited several of the fathers. His works were printed, Paris, 1696, 5 vols. fol.—Mur.

³ Possin, born in 1590, and died at Rome near the end of the 17th century, was distinguished as a Hebrew and Greek scholar, and for his editions of the fathers.—Mur.

⁴ Labbé of Bourges died in 1667, aged 60. He was a man of great learning, particularly in church history, but proud and overbearing.—Mur.

⁵ Abrams, born in 1589, died 1655, was chiefly distinguished for polite learning and for his comments on Cicero's orations and on Virgil.—Mur.

⁶ Harduin died at Paris in 1729, aged 83. He was a prodigy of learning, but he maintained that most of the Greek and Latin classics were forgeries of the monks in the middle ages. His best work is his Concilia, in 12 vols. fol.—Mur.

genius and erudition; nor have the Jesuits for many years published a single work which can compete with the labours of the Benedictines, unless it be the Acta Sanctorum now issuing from their press at Antwerp. The rivals of the Benedictines were the French Fathers of the Oratory, many of whom are acknowledged to have laboured successfully in advancing several branches of both human and divine knowledge; which, if there were no other examples, would be manifest from the works of Charles le Cointe, author of the imperishable Ecclesiastical Annals of France,¹ and of John Morin,² Lewis Thomassin,³ and Richard Simon.⁴ Lastly, the followers of the opinions of Jansenius—or, as they would say, of Augustine—have published various works, some erudite and others neatly and methodically composed, very useful both to adults and to the young. Who is such a stranger to the literature of this century as not to have heard of the works of the Messieurs de Port-Royal,⁵ and of the very elegant and useful productions of Tillemont,⁶ Arnauld,⁷ Nicole,⁸ Pascal,⁹ Lancelot,¹⁰ and others?

¹ Le Cointe, born 1611, died 1681. His Annales Ecclesiast. Francorum, in 8 vols. fol. extend from A.D. 235 to A.D. 835.—Mur.

² Morin, born 1591, educated a Protestant, became a Catholic, and died at Paris 1659. He wrote on the origin of Patriarchs and Primates, on the Samaritan Pentateuch, and published an edition of the Septuagint, 2 vols. fol. and the Samaritan Pentateuch. There were several distinguished men named Morin.—Mur.

³ Thomassin, born 1619, died 1695, published a history of religious doctrines (a feeble imitation of Petau's work) in 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1680. Voltaire says he was "a man of profound erudition, and first composed Dialogues on the fathers, on Councils, and on History."—Mur.

⁴ Simon, born 1638, died 1712, a great critic; wrote Histoire Critique du Vieux Test.; the Hist. of Ecclesiast. Remains, 2 vols. 12mo; Crit. Diss. on Du Pin's Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclés.; Hist. Critique du Nouveau Test. and various other works.—Mur.

⁵ By this title are designated all the Jansenist writers, but especially and in a stricter sense those who spent their lives in literary and devotional pursuits in the retired situation of Port-Royal, not far from Paris. Among these it is generally known there were great men who possessed first-rate talents and were very finished writers.

⁶ Sebastian le Nain de Tillemont, born at Paris 1637, died 1698, refused a bishopric, and wrote Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Ecclesiast. de six Premiers Siècles, Paris, 1693, &c. 16 vols. 4to; and Histoire des Empereurs et des autres Princes, jusqu'à l'Empereur Honorius.—Mur.

⁷ Anthony Arnauld or Arnaud was born at Paris in 1612, and died at Liege 1694. He wrote on grammar, logic, and geometry, and polemic pieces against the Jesuits and the Calvinists on moral subjects, and is supposed to have contributed Nos. 3, 9, 12, 13, 14, and 15, to the Provincial Letters.—Mur.

⁸ Peter Nicole, born 1625, died at Paris 1695. Besides controversial pieces against the Jesuits and aiding Arnaud in some works, he wrote Essai de Morale, 13 vols. 12mo. La Perpétuité de la foi de l'Eglise Catholique touchant l'Eucharistie, 3 vols. Préjugés Légitimes contre les Calvinistes, and translated the Provincial Letters into Latin with notes, under the fictitious name of William Wendrock.—Mur. (Anth. Arnaud, and not Nicole, was the author of the famous work on the perpetuity of the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist.—R.

⁹ Blaise Pascal, born at Clermont 1623, died 1662.

The other religious orders, as well as the bishops and inferior clergy in the Romish church, had also their great men. For it would be strange, if in such a multitude of men enjoying much leisure and all advantages for study, there should not be some successful scholars. Yet all who acquired fame and merited distinction as learned men and authors, out of those four orders just mentioned, would collectively scarcely form so large a body as any one of those orders alone can exhibit.

32. Hence a copious list might be drawn up of learned men in the Romish church, whose works, composed with great care and diligence, survive their authors' death. Of the monastic families and of the priests who were bound to fixed rules of living, the most distinguished were, Cæsar Baronius,¹¹ and Robert Bellarmine,¹² both cardinals, and both extremely useful to their church; the first by his elaborate Annals, and the latter by his controversial writings; also Nicholas Serrarius,¹³ Francis Feuardentius,¹⁴ Anthony Possevin,¹⁵ James Gretzer,¹⁶ Francis Combesa,¹⁷ Natalis Alexander,¹⁸ Martin Becan,¹⁹ James Sirmond, Denys Petau, Peter Possin, Lewis Cellot,²⁰ Nicholas

Besides his Pensées and some treatises on Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, he composed the famous Lettres à un Provincial. His works were printed, 5 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1799.—Mur.

¹⁰ Claude Lancelot, born 1616, died 1695, taught Greek and the mathematics at Port-Royal, and had a hand in the school-books there published.—Mur.

¹¹ Baronius, born at Sora in Naples 1538, second general of the Italian order of Fathers of the Oratory, confessor to pope Clement VIII. cardinal, and librarian of the Vatican; he wrote Annales Ecclesiasticæ, 12 vols. fol. Rome, 1588-1607, was candidate for the papal chair in 1605, and died in 1607.—Mur.

¹² Bellarmine, a Florentine, born in 1542, cardinal in 1599, died in 1621. He wrote Opus Controversiarum, 3 vols. fol. De Potestate summi Pontificis, a Commentary on the Psalmis, and an account of the ecclesiastical writers. He was learned and a giant reasoner, though in a bad cause.—Mur.

¹³ Serrarius of Lorrain, a Jesuit, died at Mentz in 1619, aged 65; a voluminous commentator on the Bible. His works fill 16 vols. fol.—Mur.

¹⁴ Feuardent, of Normandy, a Franciscan, born 1541, died 1641; edited Irenæus, wrote and preached furiously against the Protestants.—Mur.

¹⁵ Possevin was a Jesuit of Mantua, born 1533, died 1611. He was papal legate to Poland, Sweden, Germany, &c. He wrote Bibliotheca Selecta de Ratione Studiorum, 2 vols. fol.; Apparatus Sacer, 2 vols. fol. and some other things.—Mur.

¹⁶ Gretzer, a German Jesuit, born 1561, professor of theology at Ingolstadt, died 1636. He wrote much against the Protestants. His works fill 17 vols. fol.—Mur.

¹⁷ Combesa, a Dominican of Guenno, died 1679. A fine Greek scholar, and editor of several Greek fathers, and of five Greek historians.—Mur.

¹⁸ Natalis or Noel Alexandre, a Dominican of Rouen, died in 1724, aged 86. He wrote Historia Eccles. Vel. et Novi Test. selecta Capit., 8 vols. fol. in 18 vols. 4to, and 30 vols. 8vo; also a System of Theology, 2 vols. fol. His Ecclesiastical History is candid and learned, but written in a dry and argumentative manner.—Mur.

¹⁹ Decan, a Jesuit of Brabant, confessor to Ferdinand II. died at Vienna in 1624. He wrote much against the Protestants, and a Sum of Theology, in French.—Mur.

²⁰ Cellot, a Jesuit of Paris, died 1658. He wrote the land,¹⁶ Godfrey Henschenius,¹⁷ Daniel Papebroch,¹⁸ and many others. Of the other clergy, or those not of any religious order, but secular clergymen, as they are called in distinction from the regular clergy, the following acquired distinction and fame by their writings: viz. James David Perron,¹⁹ William Est (Estius),²⁰ John Launoi,²¹ Gabriel Aubespine (Albaspinius),²² Peter de Marca,²³ John Armand Richelieu,²⁴ Luke Holstein,²⁵ Stephen Baluze,²⁶ John Bona,²⁷

Caussin,¹ John Morin, Theophilus Raynard (Raynaudus),² Paul Sarpi,³ Sforza Pallavicini,⁴ Philip Labbé, Lewis Maimbourg,⁵ Lewis Thomassin, Celestine Sfondrati,⁶ Joseph Aguirre,⁷ Henry Noris,⁸ Luke D'Achery, John Mabillon, John Harduin, Richard Simon, Theodore Ruinart, Bernard de Monfaucon, Anthony Gallon,⁹ Fortunatus Scacchi,¹⁰ Cornelius à Lapide,¹¹ James Bonfrere,¹² Hugh Menard,¹³ Claude Seguenot,¹⁴ Bernard Lami,¹⁵ John Bol-

History of Gottschalk, and published the Opusculi of Hincmar of Rheims.—Mur.

¹ Caussin, a French Jesuit, died 1651, aged 71. He was confessor to Louis XIII. and wrote De Sacra et Profana Eloquutio, and some other things.—Mur.

² Raynard, an Italian Jesuit, died at Lyons, 1663, aged 80. He edited several of the fathers, and wrote Tables for sacred and profane history. His works were printed at Lyons, 1665, in 20 vols. fol.—Mur.

³ Sarpi, a Venetian monk of the order of the Servites, born 1552, died 1623; a celebrated defender of the religious liberties of his country against the pontiff. He wrote a History of the Council of Trent, folio, a History of Benefices, and various tracts in defence of his country, which fill six vols. 12mo, Venice, 1677.—Mur. [See note 5, p. 613, above.—R.

⁴ Pallavicini, a Romish Jesuit and cardinal, born at Rome, 1607, died 1667. He wrote in Italian a History of the Council of Trent, opposed to that of Sarpi, Rome, 1656, 2 vols. fol. translated into Latin, Antw. 1673, 2 vols. fol.; also a treatise on style, &c.—Mur. [See also note 5, p. 614, above.—R.

⁵ Maimbourg, a French Jesuit of Nancy, born 1610, died 1686, noted as a preacher, but more as a historian. His Histoire du Luthéranisme was refuted by Seekendorf; his Hist. du Calvinisme, by Jurieu and by Jo. Bapt. de Roccles. He also wrote Histories of Arianism, of the Iconoclasts, of the Crusades, of the schism of the Greeks, of the schism of the West, of the decay of the Empire, of the League, of the pontificate of Leo the Great. He is a sprightly writer, but a partial historian.—Mur.

⁶ Sfondrati, a Benedictine abbot of St. Gall and a cardinal, died at Rome 1696, aged 53. He wrote Gallia Findicata, and Nodus Predestinationis Dissolutus, 4to.—Mur.

⁷ Aguirre, a Spanish Benedictine, professor at Salamanca, defended the papal supremacy against the French, was made a cardinal, published Collectio Maxima Conciliorum omnium Hispan. et Novi Orbis, &c. 6 vols. fol. and died at Rome, 1669, aged 69.—Mur.

⁸ Noris, an Augustinian monk, born at Verona 1631, of Irish parentage, professor of Ecclesiastical History at Pisa, librarian of the Vatican, a cardinal in 1695, and died at Rome in 1704. He wrote a History of Pelagianism, History of Investitures, and various other learned works, printed collectively, Verona, 1729, 1730, 5 vols. fol.—Mur.

⁹ Gallonio, a Romish presbyter of the Oratory, died 1605. He wrote De Cruciatibus Martyrum, with plates, 1594, 4to, and some other things.—Mur.

¹⁰ Scacchi was an Italian Augustinian Eremit, who corrected the Romish Martyrology and Breviary, and died in 1640.—Mur.

¹¹ A Lapide was a Jesuit of Liege, who wrote Commentaries on the Bible, 10 vols. fol. and died at Rome, 1637, aged 71.—Mur.

¹² Bonfrere was a Jesuit, professor at Douay, wrote Commentaries on the Pentateuch, on Scripture names, &c. and died at Tournay, 1643, aged 70.—Mur.

¹³ Menard was a Benedictine of St. Maur, born at Paris in 1587, and died in 1644. He wrote Diatrise de uno Dionysio, and Martyrolog. ex Ord. Benedict.—Mur.

¹⁴ Seguenot was a French priest of the Oratory, wrote notes on the French translation of Augustine de Virginitate, which excited commotion; and died in 1641.—Mur.

¹⁵ Lami was also a French priest of the Oratory, born in 1645, and died in 1715. He wrote on geometry, on the sciences, on perspective, on Christian Morality, 5 vols. 12mo, Apparatus Bibliicus, 4to, De Tabernaculo, fol. Harmonia Evangelica, 2 vols. 4to, &c.—Mur.

¹⁶ Bolland, a Jesuit of Tillmont in Flanders, who commenced the Acta Sanctorum, of which he published 6 vols. fol. and died in 1665.—Mur. [The continuators of this great work are called after him the Bollandists; two of these are mentioned in the next two notes. The first volume of the Acta Sanctorum was published in 1643; at various intervals other folio volumes appeared, the fifty-third volume was published in 1794; after an interval of half a century the work has been resumed. Two volumes, the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth, were published at Brussels in 1845, 46, and I believe there is a likelihood of this gigantic undertaking being at length brought to a termination. The lives of the saints which it contains are arranged in the order of the calendar, and the work is quoted by the volumes connected with each month: for example, the last two volumes are the sixth and seventh of the month of October. Thus, although above two centuries have elapsed since the commencement of this stupendous work, and fifty-five ponderous folio volumes have appeared, yet scarcely three-quarters of the year have yet been finished; so that it may be computed it will require fifteen volumes more to complete the series, which will then amount to the unprecedented number of seventy volumes folio.—R.

¹⁷ Henschen, a Jesuit of Antwerp, continuator of the Acta Sanctorum, died 1682.—Mur.

¹⁸ Papebroch, a Jesuit of Antwerp, also a continuator of the Acta Sanctorum, died in 1714.—Mur.

¹⁹ Perron, born a French Protestant, 1556, turned Catholic, became bishop of Evreux, archbishop of Sens, almoner of France, and in 1604 a cardinal. He was very learned and eloquent, and a great reasoner; wrote on the Eucharist, against Du Plessis Mornay, &c. and died at Paris in 1618, aged 63. His works fill 3 vols. fol.—Mur.

²⁰ Estius, born at Gorcum in Holland, was divinity professor and chancellor of the university of Douay, where he died in 1613, aged 71. He wrote Commentaries on the Epistles, 2 vols. fol. Annotations on difficult passages of Scripture, fol. and the martyrdom of Edmund Campian.—Mur.

²¹ Launoi, a doctor of theology at Paris, born in 1603, and died in 1678. He was a strenuous defender of the liberties of the Gallican church, a strong opposer of legends, and a learned critic. His works were printed at Geneva, in 10 vols. folio.—Mur.

²² Aubespine, bishop of Orleans, died 1630, aged 52. He was learned in ecclesiastical antiquities, and commented on the fathers and councils.—Mur.

²³ De Marca was born at Gart in Bearne, 1594, studied law, married and became a counsellor; afterwards devoted himself to theology, was bishop of Condom, archbishop of Toulouse, and lastly of Paris, where he died in 1662. This man wrote a History of Bearne, and De Concordia Imperii et Sacerdotii.—Mur.

²⁴ Richelieu, born 1585, died 1642, a cardinal, peer, and prime minister, persecuted the French Protestants, and wrote a defence of the Catholic faith against the Protestants, a tract on the best method of confuting heretics, and several other things.—Mur.

²⁵ Holstein. See note 5, p. 750. He was a critic and editor, and wrote De Abstinentione Communione sub unica specie, on the Sacrament of Confirmation among the Greeks, on the Nicene Council, &c.—Mur.

²⁶ Baluze, professor of canon law at Paris, died 1718, aged 87. He wrote Lives of the Popes of Avignon, and was a noted editor.—Mur.

²⁷ Bona, born in Piedmont 1600, died at Rome, 1674,

Peter Daniel Huet,¹ James Benigne Bossuet,² Francis Fénelon,³ Anthony Godeau,⁴ Sebastian le Nain de Tillemont, John Baptist Thiers,⁵ Lewis Ellics du Pin,⁶ Leo Allatius,⁷ Lawrence Alexander Zaccagni,⁸ John Baptist Coteller,⁹ John Filesac,¹⁰ Joseph Visconti,¹¹ and others.¹² This list may be greatly enlarged by adding the names of those laymen, either in public or private life, who did service to sacred and secular learning.

a cardinal. He wrote Manuductio ad Celum, Principia Fidei Christianae, l'ra Compendii ad Deum, De Sacrificio Missae, De Discretione Spirituum, De Rebus Liturgicis, De Dietina Posmodum, Testamentum, and Horologium Aeternum. He was a very devout man.—Mur.

¹ Huet, born in Caen 1630, bishop of Soissons, and of Avranches, died 1721. He was very learned, and wrote De Interpretatione, Originum, Demonstratio Evangelica, Censura Philosophiae Cartesianae, Quaestiones Aetherae de Concordia Rationis et Fidei, and several other things.—Mur.

² Bossuet, born at Dijon, 1627, bishop of Meaux, counsellor of state, died 1704. This elegant writer composed a Discourse on Universal History, History of the variations among Protestant Churches, Funeral Orations, Exposition of the Catholic Faith, Disputes with Fénelon, &c. collected, Paris, 1743, in 12 vols. 4to.—Mur.

³ Fénelon, archbishop of Cambrai, born 1651, died 1715. He wrote Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la Vie Intérieure, in which he supports the views of Madame Guyon, and thus involved himself in controversy with Bossuet, and incurred censure from the pope; also Telenachius, Dialogues of the Dead, Dialogues on Eloquence, Demonstration of the Existence of God, Spiritual Works, and many other pieces; in all, 40 vols. 8vo.—Mur.

⁴ Godeau, born at Dreux, 1605, died 1671, bishop of Venice. He wrote some Commentaries on the Scriptures, and an Ecclesiastical History, 3 vols. fol. 1653.—Mur.

⁵ Thiers, born at Chartres, 1646, died 1703; professor of Belles Lettres at Paris, and then curate of Vivray in Le Mans. He wrote on Superstitions, concerning the Sacraments, on Fast Days, History of Perukes, the Crucifixion of St. Francis, &c.—Mur.

⁶ Du Pin, a doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Paris, 1637, died there 1719, aged 62. He wrote Bibliothèque Universelle des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques in 19 vols. 4to, down to A.D. 1600, Prolegomena to the Bible, Notes on the Psalms and the Pentateuch, De Antiqua Ecclesiae Disciplina, a Method of studying Divinity, and edited the works of Optatus Milevitanus and of Gerson.—Mur.

⁷ Allatius or Allazzo [his Italian name was Leone Allaccio.—R.], born at Scio in the Aegean Sea, educated at Rome, teacher in the Greek college there, librarian of the Vatican, died at Rome 1699, aged 83. Besides editing various Greek works, he wrote De Perpetua Consensu Ecclesiae Graecae et Latinae, and some other works.—Mur.

⁸ Zaccagni, keeper of the Vatican library, died at Rome in 1712. He published Collectanea Monumentorum, Vet. Ecclesiae Gr. et Lat. 1698.—Mur.

⁹ Coteller, born at Nismes 1627, died at Paris 1686, aged 59. He was professor of Greek at Paris, and published the Patres Apostolici, 1672, 2 vols. fol. and Monumenta Eccles. Graecae, 3 vols. fol.—Mur.

¹⁰ Filesac, doctor of the Sorbonne, and dean of the faculty of theology at Paris, died in 1638. His works were printed in 1621, 3 vols. 4to. The best is Notes on Vincentius Lirinensis.—Mur.

¹¹ Visconti or Vicecomes, professor of Ecclesiastical Antiquities at Milan. He wrote De Antiquis Baptismi Ritibus, and De Ritibus Confirmationis et Missae.—Mur.

¹² Whoever wishes to know more of the merits of these writers may consult, besides the common authors of literary history, Du Pin's volumes concerning the ecclesiastical writers, vols. xvii. xviii. xix.

33. That the professed religion of the Romish church, both as to articles of faith and rules of practice, was not purified in this century and made conformable to the only standard, the sacred Scriptures, and that it was occasionally corrupted and deformed either by the negligence of the popes or the zeal of the Jesuits, is the complaint not so much of those who are opposed to this church or those called heretics, as of all those members of it who are in favour of a thorough knowledge of religion and genuine piety. As to doctrines of faith, it is said that the Jesuits, with the connivance, nay, frequently with the assistance of the Romish prelates, entirely subverted such of the first principles of Christianity as the council of Trent had left untouched; for they lowered the dignity and utility of the sacred Scriptures, extolled immoderately the power of man to do good, extenuated the efficacy and necessity of divine grace, detracted from the greatness of Christ's merits, almost equalled the Roman pontiff to our Saviour, and converted Him into a terrestrial deity, and in fine brought the truth of Christianity itself into immense danger by their fallacious and sophistical reasonings. It is difficult to gainsay the abundant testimony by which the gravest men, particularly among the Jansenists, support these accusations. Yet it is easy to show that the Jesuits were not inventors of the doctrines they inculcated, but in reality taught and explained that old form of the Romish religion which was everywhere taught before Luther's time, and by which the authority, wealth, and power of the pontiffs and the church had grown during many centuries to their immense height. The Jesuits would teach otherwise if the pontiffs wished them to use all their efforts to render the church more holy and more like Christ; but they cannot teach otherwise, so long as they are instructed to make it their first care that the pontiffs may hold what they have got and recover what they have lost, and that the prelates and ministers of the church may continually become more rich and more powerful. If the Jesuits committed any error in this matter, it consisted wholly in this, that they explained more clearly and lucidly what the fathers at Trent either left imperfectly explained or wholly passed over, lest they should shock the minds of those imbued with better sentiments who attended that celebrated convention. Hence also the pontiffs, though pressed by the strongest arguments and exhortations, could never be persuaded to pass any severe censures upon the religious sentiments of the Jesuits; and on the other hand they have resisted, sometimes secretly and sometimes openly, those who opposed their doctrines with more than ordinary spirit and energy; for they looked upon the opponents of that order as indiscreet persons, who either did not or would not know what the interests of the church required.

34. That morality was not so much corrupted and vitiated in nearly all its parts as altogether subverted by the Jesuits, is the public complaint of innumerable writers of every class, and of very respectable fraternities in the Romish church. Nor does their complaint seem groundless, since they adduce from books of the Jesuits professedly treating of the right way of life, and especially from the writings of those called Casuists, many principles which are opposed to all virtue and honesty. In particular they show that these men teach the following doctrines:—That a bad man who is an entire stranger to the love of God, provided he feels some fear of the Divine wrath and from dread of punishment avoids grosser crimes, is a fit candidate for eternal salvation. That men may sin with safety, provided they have a probable reason for the sin, i.e. some argument or authority in favour of it. That actions in themselves wrong and contrary to the Divine law are allowable, provided a person can control his own mind and in his thoughts connect a good end with the criminal deed; or, as they express it, knows how to direct his intention right. That philosophical sins, that is, actions which are contrary to the law of nature and to right reason, in a person ignorant of the written law of God or dubious as to its true meaning, are light offences and do not deserve the punishments of hell. That the deeds a man commits when wholly blinded by his lusts and the paroxysms of passion, and when destitute of all sense of religion, though they be of the vilest and most execrable character, can by no means be charged to his account in the judgment of God, because such a man is like a madman. That it is right for a man, when taking an oath or forming a contract, in order to deceive the judge and subvert the validity of the covenant or oath, tacitly to add something to the words of the compact or the oath; and other sentiments of the like nature.¹ These and other doctrines, not only the Dominicans and Jansenists but also the divines of Paris, Poitiers, Louvain, and others in great numbers, so pointedly condemned in public, that Alexander VII. thought proper to condemn some part of them in his decree of the 21st of August, 1659; and Alexander VIII. on the 24th of August, 1690, condemned particularly the philosophical sin of the Jesuits.* But these numerous and important decisions and decrees against the moral principles of the Jesuits, if we may believe the common voice of learned and pious men, were more efficacious in restraining the horrid licentiousness of the writers of this society,

¹ One might make up a whole library of books exposing and censuring the corrupt moral principles of the Jesuits. The best work on the subject is the very elegant and ingenious production of Blaise Pascal, entitled, Les Provinciales; ou Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un Provincial des ses Amis, et aux Jésuites, sur la Morale et la Politique de ces Pères, 2 vols. 8vo. Peter Nicole, under the fictitious name of

William Wendrock, added to it learned and judicious notes, in which he copiously demonstrates the truth of what Pascal had stated either summarily or without giving authorities. It was also translated into Latin by Samuel Ratchels. [An English translation of the Provincial Letters was published in London in 1657, contemporaneously with their appearance in Paris; another translation was published in 1816, and a third in 1847, all anonymously. The last, which contains M. Villemain's Essay on Pascal, with additional matter, is the preferable translation. A fourth translation by the Rev. T. M'Crie of Edinburgh, appeared there in 1847.—R.] Against this terrible adversary, the Jesuits sent forth their best geniuses, and among others the very eloquent and acute Gabriel Daniel, the celebrated author of the History of France; they also caused Pascal's book to be publicly burned at Paris. See Daniel's Opuscula, vol. i. p. 363, who himself admits that most of the answers to the book by the Jesuits were unsatisfactory. But whether Pascal prevailed by the force and solidity of his arguments, or by the sweetness and elegance of his style and satire, it is certain that all these answers detracted very little from the reputation of his Letters; and edition after edition of them continued to be published. Less attractive in form but more solid, from the multitude of testimonies and citations from the approved Jesuitical writers, was, La Morale des Jésuites, extraite fidèlement de leurs livres imprimés avec la permission et l'approbation des Supérieurs de leur Compagnie par son Docteur de Sorbonne, in 3 vols. 8vo. Mous, 1702. This book also (which was written by Perault, brother of that Charles Perault who began the famous dispute, whether the moderns were inferior or superior to the ancients) was burned at Paris in 1670, through the instigation of the Jesuits. Œuvres du Père Daniel, tome i. p. 356, &c. And there was good reason; for whoever shall read this single book will there see all the faults which were charged upon the Jesuitical writers on morals. That the Jesuits actually put their moral principles in practice, especially in foreign and remote countries, Anthony Arnauld with his Jansenist associates undertook to prove in an elaborate work entitled, La Morale Pratique des Jésuites, which appeared successively during the last century, in eight volumes; and when copies of it became scarce it was republished at Amsterdam, 1742, 8 vols. 8vo. with numerous additional proofs of the charges against the Jesuits. Respecting philosophical sin in particular and the disputations concerning it, see James Hyacinth Serry (or rather Augustus le Blanc), in his Addenda ad Historiam Congregationum de Juxta, p. 82, &c. and in his Auctarium to these Addenda, p. 289, &c.

* The history of the commotions in France and in other places arising from these opinions of the Jesuits respecting morality, was neatly drawn up by the writer of the Catéchisme Historique et Dogmatique sur les Contestations qui divisent maintenant l'Eglise, 1730, 8vo. tome ii. p. 26, &c. The Bulls here mentioned are sought for in vain in the Bullarium Pontificum. But the care of the Dominicans and Jansenists to preserve everything disreputable to Jesuits would not suffer them to be lost.

than in purging the schools of these abominable principles. And the reason assigned why so many kings and princes and persons of every rank and sex committed the care of their souls especially to the Jesuits, is, that such confessors by their precepts extenuated the guilt of sin, flattered the criminal passions of men, and opened an easy and convenient way to heaven.¹

35. The Holy Scriptures were so far from receiving more reverence and authority from the pontiff, that on the contrary in most countries the friends of the papal cause, and especially the Jesuits, as appears from the best evidence, took great pains to keep them out of the hands of the people, or from being interpreted differently from what the claims of the church required. Among the French and the Belgians there were some who might not improperly be denominated learned and intelligent expositors; but the majority of those who pretended to expound the sacred writings, rather obscured and darkened the Divine oracles by their comments than elucidated them. And in this class must be placed even the Jansenists, who, though they treated the Bible with more respect than the other Catholics, yet strangely adulterated the word of God by the frigid allegories and recondite expositions of the ancient doctors.² Yet we

¹ What is here said of the very gross errors of the Jesuits should not be understood to imply that all the members of this society cherish these opinions, or that the public schools of the order are filled with them. For this fraternity embraces very many persons who are both learned and ingenious, and by no means bad men. Nor would it be difficult to fill several volumes with citations from the writings of Jesuits, in which a much purer virtue and piety are taught than that black and deformed system which Pascal and the others present to us from the Casuists, Summists, and Moralists of this order. Those who accuse the Jesuits as a body, if candid, can mean only that the leaders of the society both permit such impious sentiments to be publicly set forth by individuals, and give their approbation and countenance to the books in which such sentiments are taught; that the system of religion which is taught here and there in their schools is so lax and disjunct that it easily leads men to such pernicious conclusions; and finally, that the small select number who are initiated in the greater mysteries of the order, and who are employed in public stations and in guiding the minds of the great, commonly make use of such principles to advance the interests and augment the wealth of the society. I would also acknowledge, since ingenuousness is the prime virtue of the historian, that in exaggerating the turpitude of some Jesuitical opinions, several of their adversaries have been over eloquent and vehement, as might easily be shown if there were opportunity, in regard to the doctrines of probability, mental reservation in oaths, and some others. For in this, as in most other disputes and controversies respecting either sacred or secular subjects, the accused were charged with the consequences which their accusers deduced from their declarations, their words were made to express more than they intended, and the limitations they contemplated to their opinions were overlooked.

² Very well known even among us is the Bible of Isaac le Maître, commonly called Sacy, which comprehends nearly everything with which the heated imaginations of the ancient doctors disfigured the simplest narrations and the clearest statements of the Sacred ought to except Paschasius Quesnel, a father of the Oratory, who published the New Testament illustrated with pious meditations and observations, which has in our day been the prolific cause of so many disputes, commotions, and divisions.³

36. Nearly all the schools retained the old method of teaching theology, which was dry, repulsive, and by no means suited to men of liberal minds. Not even the decrees of the pontiffs could bring dogmatic or biblical theology to be in equal estimation with scholastic. For most of the chairs were occupied by the Scholastic doctors, and they perplexed and depressed the biblical divines who were in general not well acquainted with the arts of wrangling. The Mystics were wholly excluded from the schools, and unless very cautious and submissive to the church, they could scarcely escape the brand of heresy. Yet many of the French and among them the followers of Jansenius especially, explained the principal doctrines of Christianity in a neat and lucid style. In like manner, nearly all that was written judiciously and elegantly respecting piety and morality came from the pens either of the Messieurs de Port-Royal, as the Jansenists were usually called, or from the French Fathers of the Oratory. Of the change in the manner of conducting theological controversies we have already spoken. The Germans, the Belgians, and the French, having learned to their disadvantage that the angry, loose, and captious mode of disputing which their fathers pursued rather confirmed than weakened the faith and resolution of dissentients, and that the arguments on which their doctors formerly placed much reliance had lost nearly all their force, thought it necessary

Volume. [It is also called the Translation of Mons because it was first printed there, in 1665. It was commenced by Sacy, a very zealous Jansenist, who died in 1664, and completed by Thomas du Fossé. It is founded on the Vulgate, yet here and there deviates from it. The archbishop of Paris, Perelx, soon after it appeared, in 1667 published a severe circular forbidding it to be read. The same thing was done by Ge. Ahusson, bishop of Embrun; the Jesuits also did not remain idle; and at last, in 1688, Clement IX. condemned it as a perverse and dangerous translation, which deviated from the Vulgate and was a stone of stumbling to the simple. This censure it by no means merited; and even Mosheim's censure is applicable only to the notes, which are taken chiefly from the fathers and are very mystical.—Schl.]

³ The first part containing notes on the four Gospels was published in 1671; and being received with great applause, it was republished, enlarged and amended, together with notes on the other books of the New Testament. See Catéchisme Historique sur les Controverses de l'Eglise, tome II. p. 150; Weissmann's Historia Eccles. Saecul. xvii. p. 588, &c. and numerous others. [Quesnel in his translation followed that of Sacy, though to avoid all offence he kept closer to the Vulgate. Most of the notes relate entirely to practical religion. The contests produced by the work belong to the history of the eighteenth century.—Schl.]

for them to look out for new and apparently wiser methods of warfare.

37. The minor controversies of the schools and of the religious orders which divided the Romish church, we shall pass over; for the pontiffs for the most part disregard them, or if at any time they become too violent, a nod or a mandate from the pope easily suppresses them; neither are these skirmishes which perpetually exist of such a nature as seriously to endanger the welfare of the church. It will be sufficient to recite briefly those controversies which affected the whole church. Among these, the first place is due to the contests between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, respecting the nature of Divine grace and its necessity to salvation, the cognizance of which Clement VIII. at the close of the preceding century had committed to certain select theologians.¹ These, after some years of consultation and attention to the arguments of the parties, plainly signified to the pontiff, that the doctrines of the Dominicans respecting grace, predestination, man's ability to do good, and the inherent corruption of our nature were more consonant with the Holy Scriptures and the opinions of the fathers than the opinions of Molina, whom the Jesuits supported; that the former accorded with the sentiments of Augustine, and the latter approximated to those of Pelagius which had been condemned. Therefore in the year 1601, Clement seemed ready to pronounce sentence against the Jesuits and in favour of the Dominicans. But the Jesuits perceiving their cause to be in such imminent peril, so besieged the aged pontiff, sometimes with threats, sometimes with complaints, and now with arguments, that in the year 1602 he resolved to give the whole of this knotty controversy a rehearing, and to assume to himself the office of presiding judge. The pontiff therefore presided over this trial during three years, or from the 20th of March, 1602, till the 22d of January, 1605, having for assessors fifteen cardinals, nine theologians, and five bishops; and he held seventy-eight sessions or congregations as they are denominated at Rome,² in which he patiently listened to the arguments of the Jesuits and the Dominicans, and caused their arguments to be carefully weighed and examined. To what results he came is uncertain, for he was cut off by death on the 4th of March, 1605, when just ready to pronounce sentence. If we may believe the Dominicans, he was prepared to condemn Molina in a public decree; but if we believe the Jesuits, he would have acquitted him of all error. Which of them is to be believed no one can determine, without inspecting the records of the trial which are kept most carefully concealed at Rome.

38. Paul V. the successor of Clement, ordered the judges in the month of September, 1605, to resume their inquiries and deliberations which had been suspended. They obeyed his mandate and had frequent discussions until the month of March in the next year; debating not so much on the merits of the question which had been sufficiently examined, as on the mode of terminating the contest. For it was debated whether it would be for the interests of the church to have this decided by a public decree of the pontiff; and if it were, then what should be the form and phraseology of the decree. The issue of this protracted business was, that the whole contest came to nothing, as is frequently the case at Rome; that is, it was decided neither way, but each party was left free to retain its own sentiments. The Dominicans maintain that Paul V. and the theologians to whom he committed the investigation, equally with Clement before him, perceived the holiness and justice of their cause; and they tell us that a severe decree against the doctrines of the Jesuits was actually drawn up and sealed by his order, but that the unhappy war with the Venetians, which broke out at that time, and of which we have already given an account, prevented the publication of the decree. On the contrary, the Jesuits contend that all this is false; and that the pontiff with the wisest of the theologians, after examining the whole cause, judged the sentiments of Molina to contain nothing which much needed correction. It is far more probable that Paul was deterred from passing sentence by fear of the kings of France and Spain, of whom the former patronised the cause of the Jesuits and the latter that of the Dominicans. And if he had published a decision, it would undoubtedly have been not unlike those usually given at Rome, that is, ambiguous, and not wholly adverse to either of the contending parties.³

¹ The writers already quoted on this subject may be consulted here. Also Le Clerc, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Controverses dans l'Eglise Romaine sur la Prédestination et sur la Grâce, in the Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, tome xiv. p. 234, &c. The conduct both of the Jesuits and the Dominicans after this controversy was put to rest, affords grounds for a suspicion, that both parties were privately admonished by the pontiff to temper and regulate in some measure their respective doctrines, so that the former

¹ See the preceding century, section iii. chap. i. sec. 40, 41, p. 626, above, &c.—Mur.

² Congregaciones de Auxilios, i.e. gratia, in the Romish style.—Mur.

39. The wounds which seemed thus healed were again torn open to the great damage of the Catholic interest, when the book of Cornelius Jansenius, bishop of Ypres in the Netherlands, was published after his death in 1640, under the title of Augustinus.¹ In this book (the author of might no longer be taxed with Pelagianism, nor the latter with coinciding with the Calvinists. For Claudius Aquariva, the general of the order of Jesuits, in a circular letter addressed to the whole fraternity, Dec. 14th, 1613, very cautiously modifies the doctrine of Molina; and commands his brethren to teach everywhere, that God gratuitously and without any regard to their merits, from all eternity elected those to salvation whom he wished should be partakers of it; yet they must so teach this, as by no means to give up what the Jesuits had maintained in their disputes with the Dominicans respecting the nature of Divine grace; and these two things, which seem to clash with each other, he thinks may be reconciled by means of that Divine knowledge and which is called scientia media [foreknowledge of the free actions of men]. See Catéchisme Historique sur les Controverses de l'Eglise, tome i. p. 207. On the contrary the Dominicans, though holding substantially the same sentiments as before this controversy arose, yet greatly obscured and disfigured their opinions by using words and distinctions borrowed from the schools of the Jesuits; so that not even a Jesuit can now tax them with having the mark of Calvinism. They are also much more slow to oppose the Jesuits, recollecting doubtless their former perils and their immense labours undertaken in vain. This change of conduct the Jansenists severely charge upon them, as being a manifest and great defection from Divine truth. See Pascal's Lettres Provinciales, tome i. lettre. ii. p. 27, &c. Yet their ill-will against the Jesuits is by no means laid aside; nor can the Dominicans (among whom many are greatly dissatisfied with the cautious prudence of their order) easily keep themselves quiet, whenever a good opportunity occurs for exercising their resentments. With the Dominicans in this cause at least the Augustinians are in harmony, (for the opinions of St. Thomas in respect to grace do not much differ from those of Augustine), and the most learned man they have, Henry Noris (in his Judicium Augustinianum, cap. iv. Opp. tom. i. p. 1175) laments that he is not at liberty, in consequence of the pope's decree, to let the world know what was transacted in the Congregations de Auxiliis, against Molina and the Jesuits and in favour of Augustine. He says, "Quando, recentiori Romano decreto id vetitum est, eum dispendio causæ, quam defendo, necessariam defensionem omittito."

¹ For an account of this famous man, see Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome ii. p. 1529; Leydecker, De Vita et Moribus Jansenii, constituting the first part of his Historia Jansenismi, published at Utrecht, 1695, 8vo; Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes, tome i. p. 120, &c. and many others. This celebrated work, which gave a mortal wound to the Romish community that all the power and all the sagacity of the vicar of Jesus Christ were unable to heal, is divided into three parts. The first is historical and narrates the origination of the Pelagian contests in the fifth century; the second investigates and explains the doctrine of Augustine concerning the state and powers of human nature before the fall, as fallen, and as renewed; the third traces out his opinions concerning the assistance of Christ by his renewing grace, and the predestination of men and angels. The language is sufficiently clear and perspicuous, but not so correct as it should be. [Cornelius Jansen, in Latin Jansenius, was born at a village near Leerdam in Flanders, A.D. 1585, educated at Louvain, where he became principal of the college of St. Pulcheria, doctor of theology in 1617, and professor in ordinary. He was twice sent by the university of Louvain to the Spanish court to manage their affairs. His political work against France, entitled Mars Gallicus, procured him favour at the court of Spain; and he was appointed bishop of Ypres in 1635. He died in 1638 of a contagion taken by visiting his flock labouring under it. His Augustinus, in 3 vols. fol. cost him 20 years' labour. He also wrote against the Protestants. —Mur.

which is allowed even by the Jesuits to have been a learned and serious man, and apparently at least devout), the opinions of Augustine respecting the innate depravity of man, and the nature and influence of that grace by which alone this depravity can be cured, are stated and explained, and for the most part in the very words of Augustine. For it was not the object of Jansenius, as he tells us himself, to show what ought to be believed on these subjects, but merely what Augustine believed.² But as the doctrine of Augustine (which differed little from that of St. Thomas [Aquinas] which was embraced by the Dominicans) was accounted almost sacred and divine in the Romish church on account of the high character and merits of its author, and at the same time was almost diametrically opposite to the common sentiments of the Jesuits, this work of Jansenius could not but appear to them as a silent yet most effectual confutation of their sentiments. Hence they not only attacked it in their own writings, but they instigated the pontiff Urban VIII. to condemn it. Nor were their efforts unsuccessful. First, the inquisitors at Rome in 1641 prohibited the reading of it; and then in 1642, Urban himself in a public decree pronounced it contaminated with several errors long since rejected by the church.

40. The Jesuits and the Romish edicts were opposed by the doctors of Louvain, and by the other admirers of Augustine who were always very numerous in the Low Countries. Hence there arose a formidable and to the Belgic provinces a very troublesome controversy.³ It had scarcely commenced when it spread into the neighbouring France, where John du Verger de Hauranne, abbot of St. Cyran or Sigerran, an intimate friend of Jansenius, a man of an accomplished and elegant mind, and no less respected for the purity of his morals and the sanctity of his life than for his erudition, had already inspired great numbers with attachment to Augustine and hatred of the Jesuits.⁴ The greatest part

² Thus Jansenius in his Augustinus, tom. ii. Introductory book, cap. xxix. p. 65, says: "Non ego hic de nova aliqua sententia rependa disputo—sed de antiqua Augustini. Queritur, non quid de nature humane statibus et viribus, vel de Dei gratia et predestinatione sentiendum sit; sed quid Augustinus olim ecclesie nomine et applausu—tradiderit, predicaverit, scriptoque multipliciter consignaverit."

³ The principal adherents of Jansenius in the Netherlands were, James Boonen, the archbishop of Mechlin; Libertus Fromond, a pupil, friend, and successor of Jansenius in the professorial chair at Louvain; and Henry Calen, a canon of Mechlin and arch-priest of Brussels. —Schel.

⁴ He is esteemed by all the Jansenists as highly as Jansenius himself, and he is said to have aided Jansenius in composing his Augustinus. Those French of the learned in this most flourishing kingdom had connected themselves with the Jesuits, because their doctrines were more grateful to human nature, and better accorded with the spirit of the Romish religion and the interests of that church, than the Augustinian principles. But the opposite party embraced besides some bishops of high reputation for piety, the men of the best and most cultivated minds almost throughout France, Anthony Arnauld, Peter Nicole, Blaise Pascal, Paschasius Quesnel, and the numerous other famous and excellent men who are denominated the Port-Royalists; likewise a great number of those who looked on the vulgar piety of the Romish church which is confined to the confession of sins, frequent attendance on the Lord's Supper, and some external works, as far short of what Christ requires of his followers, and who believed that the soul of a Christian desirous of being accounted truly pious ought to be full of genuine faith and love to God. Thus as the one party had the advantage of numbers and power, and the other that of talent and pious fervour, it is not difficult to understand why this controversy is still kept up an entire century after its commencement.¹

41. The attentive reader of this pro-especially who are partial to the doctrines of Augustino reverence him as a father and an oracle, and extol him above Jansenius himself. His life and history have been duly written by Claude Lancelot, Mémoires touchant la Vie de M. S. Cyran, published at Cologne (or rather at Utrecht), 1738, 2 vols. 8vo. Add the Recueil de plusieurs pièces pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, Utrecht, 1740, 8vo; Arnauld d'Andilly, Mémoires au sujet de l'Abbé de S. Cyran, printed in the Vies des Religieuses de Port-Royal, tome i. p. 15-44; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome ii. [p. 531, art. Garasse, note D.—Mar.]; Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes, tome i. p. 133, &c. See also respecting his early studies, Liron, Singularités Historiques et Littér. tome iv. p. 507, &c. [Jo. Verger de Hauranne was born at Bayonne in 1581, became abbot of St. Cyran in 1620, was thrown into prison by Richelieu in 1633, released in 1643, and died the same year, aged 62. He held much the same sentiments with Jansenius, and spread them extensively by conversation. His works are, Somma des Fautes, &c. de Garasse (a Jesuit writer), 3 vols. 4to, Spiritual Letters, 2 vols. 4to, Apology for Roche-Hugues, &c. and Question Royale.—Mar.]

¹ The history of this controversy is to be found entire or in part in a great number of books. The following may supersede all the rest: Gerberon, Histoire Générale du Jansénisme, Amsterd. 1700, 3 vols. 8vo, and Lyons, 1708, 5 vols. 12mo; the Abbé du Mas (a senator of Paris who died 1722), Histoire des Cinq Propositions de Jansénius, Liege, 1694, 8vo. Du Mas favours the Jesuits, Gerberon favours the Jansenists. Leydecker, Historia Janseniana, Utrecht, 1693, 8vo; Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV. tome ii. p. 264, &c. Many books on this subject by both parties are mentioned in the Bibliothèque Janséniste; ou Catalogue Alphabétique des Principaux Livres; Jansénistes published in 1735, 8vo, and said to be the work of Domitius Colonia, a learned Jesuit. See Recueil des pièces pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, p. 325, &c. But as already remarked, this book much enlarged appeared under the title of Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes, Antw. 1752, 4 vols. 8vo.

tracted contest will be amused to see the artifices and stratagems with which the one party conducted their attack and the other their defence. The Jesuits came forth armed with decrees of the pontiff, mandates of the king, the most odious comparisons, the support of great men, the good-will of most of the bishops, and lastly with military force. On the other hand, the Jansenists enervated those decrees and mandates by the most subtle distinctions and interpretations, nay, by the same sophistry which they condemned in the Jesuits; odious comparisons they destroyed by other comparisons equally odious; to the menaces of great men and bishops they opposed the favour of the multitude; and physical force they vanquished by Divine power, that is, by the miracles of which they boasted. Perceiving that their adversaries were not to be overcome by the soundest arguments and proofs, they endeavoured to conciliate the favour of the pontiffs and of the people at large, by their meritorious and splendid deeds and by their great industry. Hence they attacked those enemies of the church, the Protestants, and endeavoured to circumvent them with artifices and sophisms which were entirely new; they applied themselves to the education of youth of all classes, and imbued them with the elements of the liberal arts and sciences; they composed very neat and elegant treatises on grammar, philosophy, and the other branches of learning; they laid all classes, from the highest to the lowest, under obligations to them, by devotional and practical treatises composed in the most elegant manner; they adopted a pure, natural, and agreeable style, and translated and explained in the very best manner not a few of the ancient writers; and lastly, they sought to persuade, and actually did persuade, very many to believe that God himself espoused their cause, and that he had by many prodigies and miracles placed the truth of the Augustinian doctrine beyond all controversy.²

² That the Jansenists or Augustinians have long resorted to miracles in support of their cause is very well known. And they themselves confess that they have been saved from ruin when nearly in despair by means of miracles. See Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome i. p. 256, tome ii. p. 107. The first of these miracles were those said to have been performed in the convent of Port-Royal from the year 1656 onward, in the cure of several afflicted persons by means of a thorn from that crown which the Roman soldiers placed on the head of our most holy Saviour. See Recueil de plusieurs pièces pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, p. 228, 448; Fontaine, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, tome ii. p. 131, &c. Other miracles followed in the year 1661; Vies des Religieuses de Port-Royal, tome i. p. 192, and in the year 1664; Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome iii. p. 252. The fame of these miracles was great and very useful to the Augustinians in the 17th century, but at present it is quite hushed. In our age therefore when hard pressed, they have resisted the fury

As all these things have great influence with mankind, they often rendered the victory of the Jesuits quite dubious; and perhaps the Jansenists would have triumphed if the cause of the Jesuits had not been the cause of the church, the safety of which depends in a great measure on those opinions which the Jesuits hold.

42. Various circumstances lead to the conclusion that Urban VIII. and afterwards Innocent X. were solicitous to suppress these dangerous commotions in their commencement, just as the former pontiffs wisely suppressed the contests between Baius and the Dominicans. But they were unable to do it in consequence of the highly excitable and fervid tempers of the French. The adversaries of the Augustinian doctrines extracted from the works of Jansenius five propositions which were thought to be the worst, and instigated especially by the Jesuits they urged Innocent incessantly to condemn them. A large part of the French clergy, by their envoys dispatched to Rome, resisted such a measure with great zeal, and wisely suggested that it was of the first importance to distinguish the different constructions which might be put upon those propositions, since they were ambiguous and would admit of a true as well as a false interpretation. But Innocent X. overcome by the incessant and importunate clamours of the Jesuits, without maturely considering the case, hastily condemned those propositions in a public edict, dated May 31, 1653.

of their enemies by new and more numerous prodigies. If we may believe them, the first occurred on the 31st of May, 1725, in the person of a certain woman named De la Posse, who was suddenly cured of a bloody flux when she had supplicated relief from a host carried by a priest of the Jansenian sect. Two years afterwards in 1727, the tomb of Gerhard Rousse, a canon of Avignon, was ennobled by very splendid miracles. Lastly, in the year 1731, the bones of Francis de Paris [commonly called Abbé de Paris], which were interred at St. Medard, were famed for numberless miracles, and every one knows what warm disputes have occurred and still continue respecting them. It is also said that Paschasius Quesnel, Levier, Desangins, and Tournus, those great ornaments of the sect, have often afforded relief to the sick who relied on their merits and intercession. See Jésus Christ sous l'Anathème et sous l'Excommunication, a celebrated Jansenist book, written against the bull Unigenitus, art. xvii. p. 61, art. xviii. p. 66, ed. Utrecht. A great part of the Jansenists contend for the reality of these miracles with good faith; for this sect abounds with persons with good faith; for this sect abounds with persons who are by no means corrupt, but whose piety is unenlightened, and to whom the truth and divinity of their cause appear so manifest that they readily believe it cannot possibly be neglected by the Deity. But it is incredible that so many persons of distinguished perspicacity as formerly were and still are followers of this sect should not know that either the powers of nature, or the operation of medicines, or the influence of the imagination, really accomplished these cures which deceivers or men blinded by party zeal have ascribed to the almighty power of God. Such persons therefore must be of the opinion that it is lawful to promote a holy and righteous cause by means of deceptions, and to take advantage of the misapprehensions of the multitude in order to confirm the truth.

The subject of the five propositions was—first, That there are some commands of God which righteous and good men are absolutely unable to obey though disposed to do it, and that God does not give them so much grace that they are able to observe them. Secondly, that no person in this corrupt state of nature can resist Divine grace operating upon the mind. Thirdly, that in order to a man's being worthy of praise or blame before God, he need not be exempt from necessity but only from coercion. Fourthly, that the Semipelagians erred greatly by supposing that the human will has the power of both admitting and of rejecting the operations of internal preventing grace. Fifthly, that whoever affirms that Jesus Christ made expiation by his sufferings and death for the sins of all mankind is a Semipelagian. The first four of these propositions Innocent pronounced to be directly heretical; but the fifth he declared to be only rash, irreligious, and injurious to God.¹

43. This sentence of the supreme ecclesiastical judge was indeed painful and perplexing to the friends of Jansenius, and grateful and agreeable to their enemies; yet it did not fully satisfy the latter nor entirely dishearten the former. For Jansenius himself had escaped condemnation, the pontiff not having declared that the heretical propositions were to be found in his Augustinus in that sense in which they were condemned. The Augustinians therefore, under the guidance of the very acute Anthony Arnould, distinguished in this controversy between the point of law and the point of fact; that is, they maintained that we ought to believe those propositions to be justly condemned by the pontiff; but that it was not necessary to believe nor had the pontiff required a belief, that those propositions were to be found in Jansenius' book in that sense in which they were condemned.² Yet they were, not allowed to enjoy this consolation long; for the pertinacious hatred of the adverse party drove Alexander VII. the successor of Clement to such a height of imprudence, that he not only declared in a new bull of the 16th of October, 1656, that the condemned propositions were those of Jansenius and were to be found in his book, but he moreover in the year 1665 sent into France the formula of an oath which was to be subscribed by all who would enjoy any office in the church, and which affirmed that the five condemned propositions were actually to be found in Jansenius' book in the very sense in which they had been condemned by the church.¹ This imprudent step, which was viewed as intolerable not only by the Jansenists but likewise by the better part of the French clergy, was followed by immense commotions and contests. The Jansenists immediately contended that the pontiff might err, especially when pronouncing an opinion without the presence of a council, in all questions of fact; and therefore that they were not under obligation to subscribe to that formula which required that they should swear to a matter of fact. The Jesuits on the contrary had the boldness to maintain publicly in the city of Paris, that the pope's infallibility was equally certain and divine in matters of fact as in contested points of ecclesiastical law. Some of the Jansenists said they would neither condemn nor approve the formula, but they promised by observing silence to show respect to the authority of the head of the church. Others appeared ready to subscribe with some explanation or distinction, oral or written, annexed, but by no means without qualification. Others attempted other modes of evasion.² But none of these courses would satisfy the impassioned mind of the Jesuits; and therefore the recusants were miserably harassed with banishments, imprisonments, and other vexations, for the Jesuits had the control and guidance of the measures of the court.³

¹ This bull is extant in the Bullarium Romanum, tom. v. p. 486. It is also published, together with many public Acts relating to this subject, by D'Argente in his Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 261, &c. [Mosheim mis-took in regard to the sentence pronounced on the several propositions. The bull says of the first, "Tenerariam, impiam, blasphemam, anathematizantem, et hereticam declaramus, et uti talem damnamus." Of the second and the third it says simply, "Hereticam declaramus, et uti talem damnamus." Of the fourth it says, "Falsam et hereticam declaramus, et uti talem damnamus." And of the fifth it says, "Falsam, temerariam, scandalosam, et intellectum eo sensu, ut Christus pro salute duntaxat prædestinatorum mortuus sit: impiam, blasphemam, contumeliosam, divine pietati derogantem, et hereticam declaramus, et uti talem damnamus." So that the sentence on the fifth proposition was the most severe, and that on the first next to it in severity.—Mur.

² Dictionnaire des Livres Jansénistes, tome i. p. 219, tome ii. p. 7, &c.

44. In consequence of the lenity or the prudence of Clement IX. the persecuted party, who to their own loss and injury defended Augustine, had some respite in the year 1669. This was procured by four French bishops—those of Angers, Beauvais, Pamiers, and Alet, who courageously declared that they could not conscientiously subscribe to the prescribed oath without adding some explanation. And when the Romish court threatened them with punishment, nineteen other bishops espoused their cause and addressed letters in their behalf both to the king and to the pontiff. These were also joined by Anne Geneviève de Bourbon, a lady of great heroism, and after her renunciation of the pleasures and allurements of the world a warm friend of the Jansenists, who very urgently besought Clement IX. to assume more moderation. Influenced by entreaties and arguments so numerous and of so much weight, Clement consented that those who chose might subscribe the oath above mentioned, annexing an exposition of their own views. Upon this liberty being allowed the former tranquillity returned, and the friends of Jansenius, now freed from all fear, lived securely in their own country. This celebrated event is usually called the Peace of Clement IX. But it was not of long continuance.⁴ For the king of France, at the instigation of the Jesuits, disturbed it by his edict of 1676, in which he represented it as granted only for a time and in condescension to the weak consciences of certain persons, and on the death of Anne de Bourbon in 1679 it was wholly subverted. From this time the Augustinian party were harassed with the same injuries and persecutions as before. Some avoided them by a voluntary exile, others endured them with fortitude and ⁴ The transactions relative to this subject under the pontificate of Clement IX. are fully narrated by cardinal Rospiigliosi in his Commentaries, which D'Argentre has subjoined to his Elements Theologici, Paris, 1716, 8vo, and which are also extant in the Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 336, where likewise are the letters of Clement IX. Among the Jansenists, the history of the peace of Clement IX. has been expressly written by Varet, the vicar of the archbishop of Sens (for the Catéchisme Historique sur les Contestations de l'Eglise, tome i. p. 352, testifies that Varet wrote this anonymous history), viz. Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans l'affaire de la Paix de l'Eglise sous le Pape Clement IX. 1706, 12mo, and by Quenée (whom Colonia among others, Biblioth. Janseniste, p. 314, declares to have been the author) in his book, La Paix de Clement IX.; ou Démonstration des deux Fautes Capitales avancées dans l'Histoire des Cinq Propositions contre la Foi des Disciples de S. Augustin, Chambrery, or rather Brussels, 1701, 2 vols. 12mo. The following work, Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans l'affaire de la Paix de l'Eglise sous le Pape Clement IX. avec les Lettres, Actes, Mémoires, et autres pièces qui y ont rapport, without mention of the place, 1706, 2 vols. 8vo, is an accurately written history. The part which Anne de Bourbon took in this business is elegantly narrated by Villefort in his Vie d'Anne Geneviève de Bourbon, Duchesse de Longueville, tome ii. livr. vi. p. 89, edited Amsterd. 1739, 8vo, which is much fuller than the Paris edition.

¹ This bull also, together with various documents, is in D'Argentre's Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 281—288, 306. The formula of the oath by Alexander VII. occurs Ibid. p. 314, together with the ordinance of the king and other papers.

² See Du Mas, Histoire des Cinq Propositions, p. 158, &c.; Gerberon, Histoire Générale du Jansenisme, part ii. p. 516, and many others.

³ On the whole of this Jansenian controversy see the chapter entitled, Historia Jansenismi, in Weismann's Memorabilia Eccles. tom. ii. p. 138, &c.; Ranke's Popes of Rome, vol. iii. p. 143, &c.; and Hallam's Intro. to the Literature of Europe, vol. iv. p. 138, &c. In Germany it has not long ago been fully treated in Reuchlin's Geschichte von Port-Royal, Hamb. 1839, only the first volume of which, tracing the history down to the year 1661, has, I believe, yet appeared.—R.

magnanimity, and others warded them off by such means as they could. The head and leader of the sect, Anthony Arnauld,¹ to avoid the fury of his enemies, fled in the year 1679 into the Low Countries, to the great injury of the Jesuits. For this man, possessing extraordinary eloquence and acuteness of mind, instilled his doctrines into the minds of the greatest part of the Belgians, and also induced that portion of the Romish church which existed among the Dutch to join the Jansenist party, through the influence of John Neercassel, bishop of Castorie, and Peter Codde, archbishop of Sebaste. This Dutch [Catholic] church remains to the present day firmly fixed in its purpose, and being safe under the powerful protection of the Dutch government, it despises the indignation of the pontiffs which it incurs in a very high degree.

45. The Jansenists, or Augustinians as they choose to be called, were so very odious to the Jesuits, not merely on account of their doctrine respecting Divine grace (which was in reality the Augustinian doctrine and almost identical with that of the followers of Calvin) when freed from the glosses with which it is usually disguised, but there were many other things in them which the defenders of the Romish church cannot approve and tolerate. For it was under Jansenist leaders that all those contests in the Romish church which we have mentioned above originated, and have been continued down to our times in countless publications printed in the Low Countries and in France.² But there is hardly anything in them which the Jesuits and the loyal subjects of the Roman pontiffs regard as more intolerable than the system of morals and of practical piety which they inculcate. For in the view of the Jansenists there is nothing entirely sound and uncorrupted in the practice and institutions of the Romish church. In the first place, they complain that the whole body of the clergy have forsaken altogether the duties of their office. They moreover assert that the monks are really apostates, and they would have them brought back to their pristine sanctity and to that strict course of life which the founders of the several orders prescribed. They would also have the people well instructed in the knowledge of religion and Christian piety. They contend that the sacred volume and the books containing the forms of public worship should be put into the hands of the people in the vernacular tongue of each nation, and should be diligently read and studied by all. And lastly, they assert that all the people should be carefully taught that true piety towards God does not consist in external acts and rites, but in purity of heart and divine love. No one can censure these things considered in a general view, unless he is himself depraved or a stranger to the principles of Christianity. But if we descend to particulars and inquire how they trained their people for heaven, it will appear that Jansenian piety leaned greatly towards insupportable superstition and the harsh and fanatical opinions of the so-called Mystics; and therefore that it is not altogether without reason when they were branded by their adversaries with the title of Rigorists.³ Their doctrine respecting penitence especially was injurious both to church and state. They made penitence to consist principally in voluntary punishments, which a sinner should inflict on himself in proportion to his offences. For they maintained that since man is by nature most corrupt and most wretched, he ought to retire from the world and from business, and to expiate as it were his inherent corruption by continual hardships and tortures of the body, by fasting, by hard labour, by prayer, and by meditation; and the more depravity any one has, either by nature or contracted by habit, the more distress and anguish of body he should impose on himself. And in this matter they were so extravagant that they did not hesitate to call those the greatest saints and the sacred victims of penitence consumed by the fire of divine love, who intentionally pined away and died under these various kinds of sufferings and hardships; nay, they taught that this class of suicides were able to appease the wrath of God, and to merit much for the church and for their friends before God, by means of their pains and sufferings. This appears from numerous examples, but especially from that of Francis de Paris [or the Abbé de Paris], the worker of so many miracles in the Jansenist school, porel et des biens du monde, qui lui appartiennent, quo par cette petite portion qu'en tient l'Eglise par les bénéfices de ses Clercs, qui ne sont que les fermiers et les dépositaires de Jésus Christ." So then, if we believe him, a golden age is coming in which Jesus Christ will dethrone all kings and princes, and seizing upon the whole world will transfer it entire to his church, of which the leaders are the priests and monks. Will the Jansenists now come forth and proclaim that they make it their greatest care to secure civil governments against the machinations of the Roman pontiffs? Respecting prayer, he philosophises entirely in the spirit of those who are called Mystics. For he denies that those who would pray should consider beforehand what they would ask of God, because prayer does not consist in the thoughts and conceptions of the mind but in a sort of blind impulse of divine love. Lancelot, Mémoires touchant la Vie de M. l'Abbé de S. Cyran, tome II. p. 44, says:—"Il ne croyoit pas, que l'on dût faire quelque effort pour s'appliquer à quelque point ou à quelque pensée particulière—par ce que la véritable prière est plutôt un attrait de son amour qui emporte notre cœur vers lui et nous enlève comme hors de nous-mêmes, que non pas une occupation de notre Esprit qui se remplit de l'idée de quelque objet quelque divin." He therefore prays best who asks for nothing, and excludes all thoughts from his mind. Jesus Christ and his disciples knew nothing of this sublime philosophy, for he directs us to pray in a set form of words; and the apostles frequently acquaint us with the subject matter of their prayers. But of all his errors this unquestionably was the worst, that he had no doubt he was an instrument of God by which the Divine Being operates and works, and that he held generally that a pious man should follow the impulses of his mind, suspending all exercise of his judgment. And the opinion was most deeply fixed in the minds of all the Jansenists, that God himself acts and operates on the mind and reveals to it his pleasure, when all movements of the understanding and the will are restrained and hushed. Hence, whatever thoughts, opinions, or purposes occur to them in that state of quietude, they unhesitatingly regard as oracular manifestations and instructions from God. See Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome III. p. 246, &c.

¹ Those who wish for a fuller knowledge of that gloomy piety which the Jansenists commonly prescribed to their people, and which was indeed coincident with the patterns set by those who anciently inhabited the desert parts of Egypt, Lybia, and Syria, but was equally remote from the injunctions of Christ and of right reason, may read only the Letters and the other writings of the abbot of St. Cyran, whom the Jansenists regard almost as an oracle. He may be called a frank, ingenious man, sincere in his intercourse with God, superior to most teachers of piety among the Romanists; he may also be called a learned man, and very well acquainted with the opinions and the affairs of the ancients; but to declare him, as the Jansenists do, to be the greatest and best, the perfect pattern of holiness and the most correct teacher of true piety, is what no one can do, unless he affixes new meanings to these terms and meanings unknown in the sacred writings. That we may not seem to do injustice to so great a man, we will confirm these remarks by some specimens of his wisdom and virtue. This honest man undertook in a long work to confute the heretics, that is, the Protestants. And for this purpose it was necessary for him to examine the books written by this wicked class of men. But before he proceeded to read any of them with Martin de Barcos his nephew, a man very like to his uncle, he was accustomed to expel the devil out of them by the sign of the cross. What weakness did this manifest? This very holy man forthwith was persuaded that the enemy of mankind had taken up his residence in these writings of the heretics; but it is difficult to tell where he supposed the arch-fiend to lie concealed, whether in the paper or in the letters, or between the leaves, or lastly in the sentiments themselves. Let us hear Lancelot, in his Mémoires touchant la Vie de M. l'Abbé de St. Cyran, tome i. p. 226. He says:—"Il lisait ces livres avec tant de piété, qu'en les prenant il les exorcisoit toujours en faisant le signe de la croix dessus, ne doutant point que le Démon n'y résidât actuellement." He was so charmed with Augustine as to receive for divine all his sentiments without discrimination, and even those which all good men among the Catholics themselves regard as faults in that father. Among others may be mentioned that dangerous doctrine, that the saints are the legitimate proprietors of the whole world, and that the wicked unjustly possess according to the divine law those things of which they are lawful proprietors according to human laws. Thus, in Fontaine's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Louis-Royal, tome i. p. 201, he says:—"Jésus Christ n'est encore entré dans la possession de son royaume tem-

¹ For an account of this great man see Bayle, Dictionnaire [art. Arnauld], tome i. p. 337, and Histoire Abrégée de la Vie et des Ouvrages de M. Arnauld, Cologne, 1695, 8vo. On the transition of the Dutch church to the Jansenist party, see Lafitau, Vie de Clément IX. tome i. p. 123, &c. Respecting Codde, Neercassel, Varlet, and other defenders of the Jansenist cause in Holland, see Dictionnaire des Livres Jansenistes, tome i. p. 48, 121, 353; tome ii. p. 406; tome iv. p. 119, &c. and in many other places.

² See above, Century xvi. History of the Romish Church, sec. 32, &c. [p. 562, above.—R.]

who brought on himself a most cruel death in order to appease the wrath of God.¹

46. A striking example of this gloomy and extravagant devotion was exhibited in the celebrated female convent called Port-Royal-in-the-Fields [Port-Royal des Champs], situated in a deep and narrow valley not far from Paris. King Henry IV. in the very commencement of this century gave the superintendence of it to Jacqueline (one of the daughters of the celebrated jurist, Anthony Arnauld), who afterwards bore the name of Maria Angelica de S. Magdalena. She at first led a very dissolute life, such as was common at that time in the French nunneries; but in the year 1609 the fear of God came upon her, and she entered upon a very different course of life; and afterwards becoming intimate first with Francis de Sales and then in 1623 with the abbot of St. Cyran, she conformed both herself and her convent to their views and injunctions. The consequence was, that this religious house for nearly a century excited in the Jesuits the highest disgust, and in the Jansenists the highest admiration; and its fame spread over all Europe. The consecrated virgins inhabiting it followed with the utmost strictness the ancient, severe, and almost everywhere abrogated rule of the Cistercians; nay, they imposed on themselves more rigours and burdens than even that rule prescribed.² A great proportion of

¹ See Morin's Comment. de Penitentia, Praef. p. III. &c. in which there is a tacit censure of the Jansenian notions of penitence. On the other hand, see the Abbé de S. Cyran, in the Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome III. p. 483. The Jansenists reckon the restoration of true penance among the principal merits of S. Cyran, and they call him the second father of the doctrine of penance. See Mémoires de Port-Royal, tome III. p. 445, 504, &c. Yet this very penitence of his was not the least of the causes for which he was thrown into prison by order of cardinal Richelieu. See Ibid. tome I. p. 233, &c. 452, &c.

² There are extant a multitude of books of various kinds in which the Jansenists describe and deplore the fortunes, the holiness, the regulations, and the destruction of this celebrated seat. We shall mention only those which are at hand, and more recent as well as more full than the others. First, the Benedictees of St. Maur present a correct but dry history of the convent in their Gallia Christiana, tom. viii. p. 910, &c. A much neater and more pleasing history, though imperfect and somewhat chargeable with partiality, is that of the noted French poet, Racine, Abbrégé de l'Histoire de Port-Royal, which is printed among the works of his son, Lewis Racine, sixth edition, Amsterdam. 1750. 6 vols. 8vo. and is in vol. II. p. 275-366. The external state and form of this convent are formally described by Moleau, Voyages Liturgiques, p. 234. To these add Fontaine's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, Cologne, (that is, Utrecht), 1738, 2 vols. 8vo.; Du Rosé's Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, Cologne, 1739, 8vo.; Recueil de plusieurs pièces pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal, Utrecht, 1740, 8vo. The editor of these papers promises in his preface more collections of the same nature; and he affords no slight indication that from these and other documents some one may compose a perfect history of the Port-Royal, which so many Jan-

the Jansenist penitents of both sexes and all ranks built for themselves cottages without the precincts of this cloister; and there they led a life not unlike that which we read of in the fourth and fifth centuries, as led by those austere recluses called Fathers of the Desert who lived in the desert parts of Egypt and Syria. For it was the object of them all to efface from their souls the stains which were either innate or acquired by habits of sinning, by means of voluntary pains and sufferings inflicted on themselves, by silence, by hunger and thirst, by praying, labouring, watching, and enduring pain.¹ Yet they did not all pursue the same species of labour. The more learned applied themselves to writing books, and not a few of them did great service to the cause of both sacred and profane learning. Others instructed youth in the elements of languages and the arts. But most of them exhausted the powers of both mind and body amid rustic and servile labours, and wore themselves out, as it were, by a slow and lingering death. And many of these were illustrious personages and noblemen, who had before obtained the highest honours both in the cabinet and in the field, but who were not ashamed now to assume the place and perform the duties of the lowest servants. This celebrated retreat of Jansenian penitence experienced vicissitudes throughout this century; at one time it flourished very highly, at another time it was nearly broken up. At last, as the nuns refused to subscribe the oath proposed by Alexander VII. which has been mentioned, and as considerable injury to the commonwealth and much disgrace to distinguished families were supposed to arise from this convent and its regulations, Lewis XIV. in the year 1709, by the instigation of the Jesuits, ordered the edifice to be pulled down and entirely demolished, and the nuns to be transferred to Paris; and two years after, that nothing might remain to nourish superstition, he ordered the bodies which were buried there to be disinterred and removed to other places.

47. The other commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of the Romish church were but light clouds compared with this tempest. The old quarrel between the Dominicans and the Franciscans, whether the mother of Jesus Christ was conceived without sin or depravity (which the Dominicans denied and the Franciscans affirmed), gave considerable trouble to Paul V. Gregory XV. and Alexander VII. Not long after the commencement of the century, it began to disturb Spain very considerably and to produce parties. Therefore the kings of Spain, Philip III. and IV. sent some envoys to Rome, urgently soliciting the pontiffs to decide the question by a public decree. But the pontiffs deemed it more important to act with prudence than to gratify requests from so high an authority. For on the one hand, the splendour of the Spanish throne which inclined to the opinion of the Franciscans, and on the other, the credit and influence of the Dominican family, alarmed and distracted them. Nothing therefore could be obtained by repeated supplications, except that the pontiffs by words and by ordinances determined that the cause of the Franciscans was very plausible, and forbade the Dominicans to assail it in public; while at the same time they would not allow the Franciscans and others to charge error upon the opinion of the Dominicans.² In a king or

Jansenists regarded as the gate of heaven. Lancelot has also much that relates to this subject in his Mémoires touchant la Vie de M. l'Abbé de S. Cyran. These and other works describe only the external state and the various fortunes of this celebrated convent. The internal state, the mode of life, and numberless events which occurred among the nuns themselves and among their neighbours are described in the Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Port-Royal et à la Vie de Marie Angélique d'Arnauld, Utrecht, 1742, 5 vols. 8vo; Vies Intéressantes et Edifiantes des Religieuses de Port-Royal et des plusieurs Personnes qui leur étoient attachées. Of this work, four volumes have already been published; the first appeared, Utrecht, 1750, 8vo. They all contain various documents of no inconsiderable value. The last fortunes and overthrow of the convent are described especially in the Mémoires sur la Destruction de l'Abbaye de Port-Royal des Champs, without place, 1711, 8vo. If I do not wholly mistake, these writers add much less to the reputation and glory of this noted convent than the Jansenists suppose. When I read their writings, Anthony Arnauld, Tillemont, Nicole, Isaac le Maître, and the many others who are known by the name of the Authors of Port-Royal, appear to me great and extraordinary men. But when I lay aside their books, and turn to those just mentioned in which the private lives of these great men are described, they appear to me to be men of little minds, fanatics, and unworthy of their high reputation. I readily give to Isaac le Maître, commonly called Sacy, the praise of a most polished genius, while reading his orations or his other lucubrations; but when I meet him at Port-Royal, with a sickle in his hand, in company with rustics cutting down the corn, he makes a comical figure and seems not altogether in his right mind. [See also Reuchlin, Geschichte von Port-Royal, &c.—R.]

¹ The first who retired to Port-Royal in 1637 in order to purge away his sins was the very eloquent and highly-celebrated Parisian advocate, Isaac le Maître, whose retirement brought much odium upon the Abbot St. Cyran. See Mémoires pour l'Histoire de Port-Royal, tome 1. p. 233, &c. He was followed by many others of various classes and ranks, among whom were men of the noblest birth. See Les des Religieuses de Port-Royal, tome 1. p. 141, &c.

² See Callixtus, Historia Immaculata Conceptionis B. Virginis Mariæ, Helmst. 1696, 4to. Add Hornbeck's Comment. ad Bullum Urbani VIII. de Diebus Festis, p. 250; Launoi, Præscriptiones de Conceptu Virginis Mariæ, Opp. tom. 1. par. 1. p. 9, &c. Clement XI. a long time after this, namely in the year 1708, proceeded somewhat farther, and by a special bull commanded all Catholics to observe a festival in memory of the conception of St. Mary, a stranger to all sin. See Mémoires de Trevoux, for the year 1709, A. xxxviii. p. 614. But magistrate such reluctance to pass judgment would be commendable; but whether it was suitable in a man who claims to be the divinely constituted judge of all religious causes, and placed beyond all danger oferring by the immediate power and guidance of the Holy Spirit, those may answer who support the reputation and honour of the pontiffs.

48. Towards the close of this century, the Mystics, whose reputation and influence were formerly so great, were exposed to very severe treatment. The first sufferer was Michael de Molinos, a Spanish priest resident at Rome, in high reputation for sanctity and therefore attended by numerous disciples of both sexes. In the year 1681, he published at Rome his Way or Guide to what the Mystics call a spiritual or contemplative life,¹ that is, Institutes of Mystic Theology; in which he was thought to recall from the lower world the principal errors of the old Beghards and Beguins, and to open the door for all iniquity and wickedness. The substance of his system, which his friends interpret in one way and his enemies in another, amounted to this; that all religion consists in a certain quietude of the soul, withdrawn from external and finite objects and turned towards God, and loving him sincerely and without any hope of reward; or what if I mistake not amounts to the same thing, that the mind of a person in pursuit of the supreme good must be entirely withdrawn from intercourse with the world around him or from corporeal objects; and the efforts of the understanding and the will being all hushed, the mind must be merged wholly in God from whom it originated. Hence his followers were called Quietists; though the common appellation of Mystics would have been more proper. For the doctrine of Molinos was accounted new, only because he expressed himself in new phraseology which was not become trite by common use, and because he arranged and digested in a better form what the ancients stated confusedly. The Jesuits and others who watched for the interests of the Romish cause readily perceived that Molino's system tacitly accused the Romish church of a departure from true religion; for that church, as is well known, makes piety to consist chiefly in ceremonies and external works. But it was the French ambassador, especially, and his friends who prosecuted the man. And from this and other circumstances, it has been plausibly inferred that political considerations as well as religious had their influence in this controversy; and that this Spaniard had opposed the wishes and the projects of the French king in some difficult negotiations.² However this may be, Molinos, though he had a vast number of friends and though the pontiff himself Innocent XI. was partial to him, was thrown into prison in 1685; and after publicly renouncing the errors charged upon him, in 1687 he was delivered over to perpetual imprisonment, in which situation he died at an advanced age in 1696.³ Every honest and impartial man will be ready to grant, that the opinions of Molinos were greatly distorted and misrepresented by his enemies, the Jesuits and the French, for whose interest it was that he should be put out of the way; and that he was charged with consequences from his principles which he neither admitted nor even thought of. On the other hand, I the Dominicans most firmly deny, that the obligations of this law extend to them; and they persevere in defending their old opinion, though with more modesty than formerly. And when we consider that this opinion is by no means condemned by the pontiff, and that the Dominicans are not inolested though they do not celebrate that festival, it is evident that the language of the Romish edict is to be construed in the most liberal manner, and that the decree does not contradict the earlier decrees of the pontiffs. See Laminius Prænitens, or Muratori, De Ingeniorum Moderatione in Religionis negotio, p. 254, &c.

¹ This book was written in Spanish and first published in 1675, supported by the recommendations of the greatest and most respectable men. In 1681, it was published at Rome in Italian, though it had appeared in this language some time before in other places. Afterwards it was translated into the Dutch, French, and Latin languages; and was very often printed in Holland, France, and Italy. The Latin translation, under the title of Manuale Spirituale, was published by Francke, Halle, 1687, 8vo. In Italian, it bore the title of Guida Spirituale. Annexed to it is another tract of Molinos, De Communionis Quotidiana, which was also condemned. See Recueil de diverses pièces concernant le Quietisme et les Quietistes; ou Molinos, ses Sentimens et ses Disciples, Amsterd. 1683, 8vo. In this work, the first piece is Molinos' book in the French translation, and then various epistles relating to his affairs and his sentiments.

² Yet perhaps the whole may be ascribed to the power of the Jesuits over the French court, who had Father La Chaise, confessor to Louis XIV. on their side; and he controlled Madame Maintenon, and through her the superstitious Louis. And a king, who two years before had been induced to sacrifice to his own bigotry some millions of his loyal and industrious subjects, might easily be persuaded, from a lust for spiritual conquests, to persecute a single man who was a stranger, and to oblige the pope also to abandon for a time a man whom he loved and honoured, and to whom he had assigned a residence near his own palace, and especially as the Inquisition were suspicious of the pontiff's own soundness in the faith.—Schl.

³ He was born in the vicinity of Saragossa, in 1627; according to the testimony of Colonia, in the Bibliothèque Janseniste, p. 469. See, on this whole subject, the Narrative respecting Quietism which is subjoined to the German translation of Gilbert Burnet's Travels; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part iii. chap. vii. p. 176; Jäger's Historia Eccles. et Polit. Secul. xvii. decenn. ix. p. 26, &c.; D'Argentre's Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii. par. ii. 357, where the papal bulls are given. [The documents of the whole proceedings of the Inquisition and of the pontiff against Molinos are given us by Nicholas Terzaghi, bishop of Narni in Italy, in his Theologia Historico-Mystica adu. Vet. et Novos Pseudo-Mysticos, quorum Historia texitur, et Errores confutantur, Venice, 1764, fol. p. 8. &c.—Mur.

think it obvious that his system included most of the faults which are justly chargeable upon the Mystics; and that it was well suited to the disposition of those who obtrude upon others, as divine and oracular communications, the suggestions of their own heated imaginations, uncontrolled by reason and judgment.¹

49. It would have been very strange if a man of such a character had not had disciples and followers. It is said that a considerable portion of the inhabitants of Spain, France, and the Netherlands, eagerly entered upon the way of salvation which he pointed out. Nor will this appear incredible, if it be considered that in all the Catholic countries there is a large number of persons who have discernment enough to see that outward ceremonies and bodily mortifications cannot be the whole of religion, and yet have not light enough to be able to arrive at the truth by their own efforts and without a guide. But these nascent commotions were suppressed by the church in their commencement, in some places by threatenings and punishments, and in others by blandishments and promises; and Molinos himself being put out of the way, his disciples and friends did not appear formidable. Among the friends and avowers of Quietistic sentiments, the following persons especially have been often mentioned, namely, Peter Matthew Petrucci, a pious man and one of the Romish cardinals, Francis de la Combe, a Barnabite and instructor of Madame Guyon, who is soon to be mentioned, Francis Malavalle, Berniere de Louvigni, and some others of less note. These differed from each other and from Molinos in many particulars, as is common with Mystics who are governed more by the visions of their own minds than by fixed rules and principles. Yet if we disregard words and look only at their import, we shall find that they all set out from the same principles, and tended to the same results.²

¹ What can be said in defence of Molinos has been collected by Weismann, in his Memorabilia Hist. Eccles. Secul. xvii. p. 555.

² The writings of these persons are enumerated, with remarks upon them, by Colonia, in his Bibliotheca Quietistica, subjoined to his Biblioth. Janaeniana, p. 455, 488; Arnold, Historia et Descriptio Theol. Mystice, p. 364, and Polret, Bibliotheca Mystica, Amsterdam, 1708, 8vo. [Cardinal Petrucci, born in 1636 at Ancona, cardinal 1686, died 1791; wrote Theologia Contemplativa, Spiritual Letters and Tracts, on the Government of the Passions, Mystic Riddle, Apology for the Quietists, &c. printed collectively, Venice, 1684.—La Combe was a native of Savoy, and a zealous propagator of Quietism in France. He wrote Analysis Orationis Mentalis, and was committed to the Bastille in 1687, where he ended his days.—Malavalle was born at Marseilles, 1627, became blind in infancy, yet he composed Pratique Facile pour élever l'Âme à la Contemplation, Poésies Sacrées, &c.; and died at Marseilles in 1719.—

50. In France, the Quietistic doctrine was supposed to be disseminated by the writings of Jane Maria Bouvieres de la Mothe Guyon, a lady of distinction, of no bad intentions, and exemplary in her life, but of a fickle temper and one whose feelings measured and controlled her religious belief; than which nothing can be more fallacious.³ As her religious opinions gave offence to many, they were in the year 1687 submitted to the examination of several great and dignified men, and were finally pronounced erroneous and unsound; and in 1697 they were formally confuted by Bossuet, the bishop of Meaux. From this contest arose a greater one between the two men who at that time, as all are agreed, stood first among the French for genius and eloquence: that is, the above-named Bossuet, and Francis Salignac de Fénélon, bishop of Cambrai and highly renowned throughout Europe. Bossuet asked Fénélon to approve and recommend his book against the errors of Madame Guyon. Fénélon on the contrary not only maintained that this pious lady was groundlessly taxed by her adversary with many faults, but also, in a book which he published in 1697,⁴ himself adopted some of her opinions, and especially that mystical precept, that we ought to love God purely [or simply for what he is], and without the De Louvigni was king's counsellor and treasurer at Caen, and died 1659. He wrote Christien Intérieur, et Œuvres Spirituelles, ou Conduite assurée pour ceux qui tendent à la Perfection.—Mur.

³ This lady wrote the history of her own life, which was published in French at Cologne (as the title-page falsely states), 1720, 12mo. Her writings, full of allegories and of not very sound mystic phrases, have been translated into German. There is extant also her Bible with annotations, La Bible de Mad. Guyon avec des Explications et Reflexions, qui regardent la Vie Intérieure, Cologne (or rather Amsterdam), 1715, 20 vols. 8vo. From these notes especially, the genius of this lady may be learned, which was indeed prolific, but not very vigorous. See also concerning her, Lettres de Mad. de Maintenon, tome i. p. 249, tome ii. p. 45, 47, 49, 51, &c. [She was born in 1648, married at the age of 16, became a widow with three children at 28. Always charitable to the poor and very devotional, she now devoted her whole time to religion. She spent several years with the bishop of Geneva, and then travelled with La Combe in different parts of France, conversing everywhere upon religion. Returning to Paris in 1687, she propagated her religious views not only by conversation, but by a tract on prayer and another on the Canticles. Her persecutions soon commenced, and she was confined in monasteries and prisons much of the time till 1709, when she retired to Blois and lived in obscurity till her death, 1719.—The poet Cowper caused a selection of her poems to be translated and published in English; and her Life, with her short and easy method of prayer and a poem on the nativity, were published, Baltimore, 1812, 12mo.—Mur.] [It was not till after Cowper's death that his translations from Madame Guyon were published under the title of Poems, &c. translated from the French, by the late William Cowper; to which are added some Original Poems not inserted in his Works, Newport-Fagnel, 1801.—R.

⁴ Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la Vie Intérieure, Paris, 1697, 12mo. It is also extant in a Latin translation.

expectation of any reward; and he confirmed the principle by the suffrages of the most eminent saints. Provoked by this dissent from him, Bossuet, in whose view glory was the highest good, did not cease importuning Lewis XIV. and Innocent XII. till the pontiff in 1699 by a public decree branded as erroneous Fénelon's book, and especially twenty-three propositions extracted from it, but without mentioning the author's name. Fénelon was induced either by his timidity or prudence to approve the sentence pronounced against himself, without any exceptions, and to recommend it himself to the churches under his care.¹ Many contend that this was the magnanimous deed of a great mind, docile and disposed to prefer the peace of the church to personal honour; but others allege that it was the mark of either a pusillanimous or a treacherous man, who deems it lawful to profess with his lips what he disbelieves in his heart. Few indeed, if any, will doubt that Fénelon continued to the end of his life in those sentiments which at the command of the pontiff he had publicly rejected and condemned.

51. Besides these authors of great commotions, there were others who more slightly disturbed the public tranquillity of the Romish church by their novel and singular opinions. Of this description were the following:—Isaac la Peyrere (Peyreri), who published two small works in 1655, in which he maintained that Moses has not recorded the origin of the human race, but only that of the Jewish nation; and that other races of men inhabited our world long before Adam the father of the Jews. Although he was not a Roman Catholic when he promulgated this opinion, yet the Romish church deemed it their duty to punish an offence against religion in general; and therefore in the year 1656 cast him into prison at Brussels. And he would perhaps have been burned at the stake, had he not embraced the Romish religion and renounced that of the Reformed in which he had been educated, and also publicly confessed his error.² Thomas Albius [White] or Blacklo, better known by the name of Thomas Anglus from his native country, published numerous tracts about the middle of the century, by which he acquired much notoriety in the Netherlands, France, Portugal, and England, and not a little hatred in his own church. He undoubtedly was acute and ingenious; but relying on the principles of the Peripatetic philosophy, to which he was extravagantly devoted, he ventured to explain and elucidate by them certain articles of the Romish faith. This confidence in Aristotle betrayed him into opinions which were novel and strange to Romish ears; and his books were prohibited and condemned by the congregation of the Index at Rome, and in some other places. He is said to have died in England, and to have founded a sect among his countrymen which time has destroyed.³ Joseph Francis Burri or Borrius, a Milanese knight and deeply read in chemistry and medicine, if what is reported of him be true, was not so much an errorist as a delirious man. For the ravings attributed to him concerning the Virgin Mary, the Holy Spirit, the new celestial city which he was to found, and the destruction of the Roman pontiff, are so absurd and ridiculous, that no one can suppose him to have been of a sane mind without evincing that he himself is not so. His conduct in one place and another shows abundantly that he had a great deal of vanity, levity, and deception, but very little of sound reason and good sense. He once escaped from the snares of the Inquisition, and roamed as an exile over a considerable part of Europe, pretending to be a second Esculapius and an adept in the great mysteries of the chemists. But in the year 1672 he again imprudently fell into the hands of the papists, who condemned him to perpetual imprisonment.¹ A book of Cælestine Sfondrati, in which he attempted to explain and settle in a new way the controversies respecting predestination, disturbed in 1696 a large part of the Romish church; for it did not entirely please either the Jesuits or their adversaries. And although he had been made a cardinal in 1646 on account of his erudition, five French bishops of the highest respectability accused him before Innocent XII. of several errors, among which was contempt for the opinions of St. Augustine. But this rising contest was nipped in the bud. The pontiff indeed promised the French that he would submit the cause to the examination of eminent theologians, and then would determine it. But, as was the Romish custom, he violated his promise and did not venture to decide the cause.³

¹ The history of this controversy is given at large and with sufficient fairness by Toussaints du Plessis, a Benedictine, in his Histoire de l'Eglise de Meaux, livr. v. tome i. p. 485–523. There is more partiality in Ramsay's Histoire de la Vie de Messire F. S. de la Mothe Fénelon, Hague, 1723, 12mo, yet it is worth reading. See also Voltaire, Siecle de Louis XIV. tome ii. p. 301. The public Acts are given by D'Argente, Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iiii. par. ii. p. 402, &c. [also in Terzaghi, Theologia Historico-Mystica, diss. iii. p. 26, &c.]. It is the object of this bitter polemic to confute all the Quietists, and especially Molinos and Fénelon. Andrew Michael Ramsay, commonly called the Chevalier Ramsay, was a Scotchman, educated at Edinburgh, who went to Holland, there imbibed some notions of Quietism, went to Cambray to consult Fénelon, and was by him converted to the Catholic faith. After spending much of his life in France, he returned to Scotland in 1725, and died in 1743. He wrote much, chiefly on history and altogether in French. His Life of Fénelon betrays the partiality of a particular friend and admirer.—Mur.

² Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. p. 2215 [art. Peirere, Isaac]; Arnold, Kirchen-und Ketzehistorie, vol. iiii. chap. vii. p. 70; Menagiana, published by Monnoye, tom. ii. p. 40. [The writings of Peyrere were, Preadamita, sive Exercitatio super Veribus 12, 13, 14, cap. v. Enst. D. Pauli ad Rom. 1653, 12mo; and Systema Theologic. ex Preadamitarum Hypothesi, pars i. His recantation was contained in La Peyreri's Epistola ad Philotimum, qua exponit Rationes, propter quas ejusverit Sectam Calvinicam, quam profitebatur, et Librum de Preadamita, quem ediderat, Frankf. 1658, 12mo. He afterwards lived retired at Paris among the Fathers of the Oratory, and was supported by the prince of Condé. —Schl.

³ Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 236 [art. Anglus]; Baillet, Vie de M. des Cartes, tome ii. p. 245. [His real name was Thomas White, and he was born of a respectable family of English Catholics; but to disguise himself he assumed various names, as Albius, Candidus, Bianchi, Richworth, &c. He was best known however by the name of Anglus, i.e. English. Being a man of genius and an enthusiastic Peripatetic, but possessing little solidity of judgment, he was perpetually advancing new and singular opinions which would not bear examination. He resided in nearly every Catholic country of Europe, found reason often to change his residence, passed through various scenes, and finally died in England. He was much opposed to the philosophy of Des Cartes. See Bayle, ubi supra.—Mur.]

52. As there is little to be said of the changes or enlargement of the Romish ceremonies in this century, except that Urban VIII. published a bull in 1643 for diminishing the number of feast-days,⁴ I shall conclude the chapter with a list of those who were canonized or enrolled among the tutelar divinities, by the decision of the sovereign pontiffs, during the century.

¹ Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. p. 609 [art. Borri]; Arnold, Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part iii. chap. xviii. p. 193, and others.

² They were Pellier, archbishop of Rheims, Noailles, archbishop of Paris, Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, Guy de Seve, bishop of Arras, and Feydeau, bishop of Amiens.—Mur.

³ The book was entitled Nodus Prædestinationis dissolutus, Rome, 1696, 4to. The letter of the French bishops and the answer of the pontiff are given by D'Argentre, Collectio Judiciorum de Novis Erroribus, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 894, &c. and by Natalis Alexander, Theologia Dogmatica et Morali, p. 877, &c. The letter of the bishops is remarkable, as containing censures of the Jesuits and their doctrines, and not merely of their doctrine of philosophical sin but also of their procedure in China; indeed, they say that Sfondrati had taught worse doctrine than even the Molinists. The opinions of Sfondrati are succinctly stated and compared with those of Augustine by Basnage, Histoire de l'Eglise, livr. xii. chap. iii. sec. xi. p. 713, &c. [He taught, 1. That God sincerely and strongly desires the salvation of all men. 2. That he gives to all men gracious aid, not only sufficient but even more than sufficient for its attainment. 3. That God does not withhold his grace from the worst and most obstinate sinners, but sets before them incipient aid, by using which they might easily obtain the more powerful grace of God. 4. That still there remains something dark and unfathomable in the doctrine of election.—Schl.

⁴ This memorable bull of Urban is extant in the Novelle Bibliothéque, tome xv. p. 88, &c. [and in the Bullarium Magnum Cherubini, tom. v. p. 378, dated on the Ides of September, 1642.—Mur.

Clement VIII. in 1601 pronounced worthy of this highest honour Raymund of Penafort, the noted collector of the Decretals; also in 1608, Francisca de Pontianis, a Benedictine nun; and in 1610, Charles Borromeo, a very illustrious bishop of Milan. Gregory XV. in the year 1622, gave Theresia, a Carmelite nun of Avila in Spain, a place in this society. By the authority of Urban VIII. in 1623, Philipo Neri, founder of the Fathers of the Oratory in Italy, Ignatius Loyola, the father of the Jesuits, and Francis Xavier, one of Loyola's first disciples and the apostle of the Indies, were elevated to this high rank. Alexander VII. in 1658, added Thomas de Vilanueva, a Spanish Augustinian; and in 1665, Francis de Sales, bishop of Geneva, to the intercessors with God. Clement X. joined with them in 1670, Peter de Alcantara, a Franciscan, and Maria Magdalena de Pactis, a Florentine Carmelites; and the next year, 1671, Rose, an American nun of the third order of Dominicans, and Lewis Bertrand, a Spanish Dominican, who had been a missionary in America; and death alone prevented his adding to these, Cajetan Thienæus, a Regular Clerk of Vicenza. He was therefore enrolled among the celestial attendants in 1691 by Innocent XII. who also in the same year publicly decreed similar honours to John of Leon in Spain, an Eremit of St. Augustine, to Paschal Baylonius, a Franciscan monk of Aragon, and to John de Dieu (de Deo), a Portuguese and one of the Brethren of Hospitality, for all of whom this honour had been designed before by Alexander VIII.⁵

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE GREEK AND ORIENTAL CHURCHES.

1. MANY things probably occur among the Greek and other Oriental Christians which are neither uninteresting nor unimportant; but the transactions in those countries are rarely reported to us, and still more rarely are they reported truly, undisguised either with the colourings of party feelings or the fabulous tales of the vulgar. We have therefore not much to say here. The Greeks in this century, as in the preceding, were in a miserable state, oppressed, illiterate, and destitute of the means of acquiring a sound knowledge of religious subjects. This however is true only of the Greeks in general. For who will have the folly to deny that among an immense multitude of people, some of whom often visit Sicily, Venice, Rome, England, Holland, and Germany, and many carry on a successful commerce, and several are advanced to the highest employments in the Turkish court, there can be found individuals here and there who are neither poor, nor stupid, nor wholly illiterate, nor destitute of refinement, nor in fine sunk in superstition, vice, and profligacy?¹ Their inveterate hatred of the Latins could in no way be expelled from their minds nor even be moderated; although the Roman pontiffs and their numerous missionaries to the Greeks spared neither skill nor treasure to gain the confidence and affections of that people.² The

⁵ The bulls of the pontiffs by which these men and women were enrolled in the College of the Divi are mentioned and retailed in their order by Fontaninus, in the Codex Constitutionum, quas Summi Pontifices ediderunt in Solemni Canonizatione Sanctorum, p. 260, &c. Rome, 1729, fol. [And all of them, except that of Alexander VII. for the canonization of Francis de Sales, are given at large in the Bullarium Magnum Cherubini, tom. iii. p. 126, 262, 287, 465, tom. iv. p. 12, and Append. p. 1, tom. vi. p. 76, 288, 347, and Append. p. 3, 17, tom. vii. p. 115, 120, 125, tom. xi. p. 1, tom. xii. p. 78.—Mur.] As they recite the grounds on which the persons were judged worthy of canonization, these bulls afford very ample matter for discussion to any intelligent person. Nor would it be a vain or useless labour for such a one to examine, without superstitution yet with candour, into the justice, the piety, and the truth of those grounds.

¹ This remark is made on account of Alexander Helladius, and others who think with him. There is extant a book of Helladius entitled, Status Præsens Ecclesiæ Græcæ, Altorf, 1714, 8vo, in which he bitterly declaims against the most meritorious and learned writers on Grecian affairs; and maintains that his countrymen are much more pious, learned, wise, and happy than is commonly supposed. We by no means envy the Greeks the portion of happiness they may enjoy; nay, we wish them far more than they possess. Yet we could show, if it were necessary, from the very statements Helladius gives us, that the condition of the Greeks is no better than it is generally supposed to be, notwithstanding all persons and places are not equally sunk in barbarism, superstition, and knavery. See the remarks above on the history of the Oriental church in the sixteenth century.

² What number of missions there are in Greece and in the other countries subject to the Turkish government, and what is their present condition, is fully stated by the Jesuit Tarillon, in his letter to Ponchartrain, Sur l'Etat Présent des Missions des Pères Jésuites dans la Grèce, which is extant in the Nouveaux Mémoires des Missions de la Compagnie de Jésus, tome 1. p. 1125 [and in the Lettres Édifiantes, &c. ed. 1819, tome 1. p. 1, &c.—Mar.] On the state of the Romish religion in the islands of the Archipelago, see Portier, in a letter printed in the Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses, Ecrites des Missions Étrangères, tome x. p. 328 [ed. 1819, tome 1. p. 283, &c.—Mar.] The high colouring of these statements may be easily corrected by the many accounts of the Romish and other writers in our own age respecting the affairs of the Greeks. See, above all others, Simon or Balmori's Bibliothèque Critique, tome 1. chap. xviii. p. 340, who in p. 346 abundantly confirms among other things that which we have observed from Cerri, namely, that none oppose and resist the Latins with more vehemence than the Greeks who have been educated at Rome, or trained in other schools of the Latins. He says: "ils sont les premiers à crier contre et à médire du Pape et des Latins. Ces pélorins Orientaux qui viennent chez nous, fourbent et abusent de notre crédulité pour acheter un bénéfice et tourmenter les Missionnaires Latins." &c. The fullest and most recent testimony to the invincible hatred of the Greeks against the Latins is given by Covell, Account of the Present Greek Church, Preface, p. ix. &c.; Cambridge, 1722, fol.

Latin teachers have indeed collected some poor and small congregations in certain islands in the archipelago; but neither the Greeks nor their masters the Turks will allow the Latins to attempt anything more.

2. In the pontificate of Urban VIII. the Latins conceived great hopes, that they should find the Greek and Oriental Christians more tractable in future.³ The pontiff made it one of his most anxious cares to effect the difficult design of subjecting the Oriental Christians, and especially the Greeks, to the dominion of the Romish see; and he called in the aid of men who were best acquainted with the opinions of the Greeks and the eastern Christians, to point out to him the plainest and shortest method of accomplishing the object. The wisest of these were of opinion that those Christians should be allowed to retain nearly all their long-established peculiarities both of rites and of doctrine, which the Latin doctors had formerly deemed intolerable; for rites, said they, do not appertain to the essence of religion, and their doctrines should be so explained and understood, as to appear to differ as little as possible from the opinions and institutions of the Latins; because those Christians would feel less repugnance to union if they could be persuaded that they had long been Romanists, and that the pontiffs did not require them to abandon the principles of their fathers, but only to understand them correctly. Hence arose those erudite works, composed however with but little candour, published by Leo Allatius, John Morin, Clement Galanus, Lucas Holstenius, Abraham Echellensis,⁴ and others; in which they undertook to prove that there was little or no difference between the religion of the Greeks, Armenians, and Nestorians, and that of the Romans, provided we set aside a few rites and certain unusual words and phrases adopted by those foreign Christians. No one more firmly resisted this project of uniting the Greeks with the Latins than Cyril Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, a learned man who had travelled over a great part of Europe. For he signified clearly, indeed more clearly than was prudent, that his mind was inclined towards the religious opinions of the English and the Dutch, and that he contemplated a reformation of the ancient religion of the Greeks. The Jesuits, aided by the influence of the French ambassador and by the knavery of certain perfidious Greeks, vigorously opposed this powerful adversary for a long time and in various ways, and at length vanquished him. For they caused him to be accused before the Turkish emperor of the crimes of treason and rebellion, on which charge he was strangled in the year 1638.¹ This great man was succeeded by one who had been the principal assistant to the Jesuits in his destruction, namely, Cyril of Berrhoea, a man of a malignant and violent temper and as he apostatized to the Romish religion, the union of the Greeks and Latins seemed no longer dubious.² But the unhappy fate of Cyril suddenly dissipated this hope. For in a little more than a year, this great friend of the Roman pontiff was put to death in the same manner as his enemy before had been, and Parthenius, who bore the hereditary hostility of his nation to the Latins was placed at the head of the Greek church. From this time onward no good opportunity his election to the patriarchal chair. He retired to Alexandria, but in 1621 he was elected to the see of Constantinople in spite of the Romish opposition. But his persecutors never ceased to traduce him and to plot against him. He was, moreover, too far in advance of the Greeks to be popular with the multitude; and the Turkish government would at any time depose a patriarch and admit a new one, for a few thousand dollars. In 1622 he was banished to Rhodes, and Gregory of Amasa purchased the office for 20,000 dollars; but not having the money in hand he also was sent away, and Anthimus bishop of Adrianople, having money, purchased the office. But the Greeks would not submit to him, and he was obliged to resign to Cyril, who was restored on paying a large sum for the privilege. The Romanists still plotted against him. He sent a Greek to London to learn the art of printing and to procure a printing press. On its arrival his enemies charged him with employing it for political purposes, and caused him great trouble, though the English and Dutch ambassadors interposed in his behalf. In 1629, having a little respite, he called a council of Greeks to reform that church; and here he proposed his confession of faith which was adopted. In 1633, Cyril Contari, bishop of Berrhoea, the personal enemy of Cyril Lucaris, and supported by the Romish party bargained with the Turks for the patriarchal chair; but being unable to pay the money down, he was exiled to Tenedos and Lucaris retained the office. The next year Athanasius of Thessalonica paid the Turks 60,000 dollars for the office, and Lucaris was again banished. But at the end of a month he was recalled and reinstated on his paying 10,000 dollars. But now Cyril Contari had raised his 50,000 dollars, and Cyril Lucaris was banished to Rhodes to make way for him. After six months his friends purchased his restoration. But in 1638 he was falsely accused of treason in the absence of the emperor, who upon the representation of his vizier gave orders for his death. He was seized, conveyed on board a ship as if for banishment, and as soon as the vessel was at sea he was strangled and thrown overboard. His body drifted ashore and was buried by his friends. See Schroech, Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. v. p. 394, &c. and Unpartheiische Kirchenhistorie, Jena, 1735, vol. ii. p. 255, &c.—Mur. [There is a very full and valuable account of Cyril Lucaris in Neale's History of the Holy (?) Eastern Church, vol. ii. p. 356-455, but it is a strangely distorted one. The author, an English minister, is sadly scandalized by the partialities of Cyril towards the Anglican church; he styles him a heretic and an apostate, for expressing his dissatisfaction with the corrupt doctrines of the Greek church, and he rejoices with unmeasured delight at the overthrow of the enlightened patriarch's project for a union between the Greek and the Reformed churches!—H.]

³ See Morin's Life, prefixed to his Antiquitates Ecclesiæ Orientalis, p. 37-46.

⁴ The work of Leo Allatius, De Concordia Ecclesiæ Orientalis et Occidentalis, is well known, and the most learned men among both the Lutherans and the Reformed, with the greatest justice, charge it with bad faith. He also published his Græcæ Orthodoxæ, Rome, 1652 and 1659, 4to, which contains those tracts of the Greeks which favoured the Latins. From the pen of Holstenius, who was far superior to Allatius in learning and ingenuousness, we have only two Dissertations, De Ministris et Parna Sacramenti Cœnæ trinitatis apud Græcos, which were published after his death. Rome, 1656, 8vo.—The very learned works of John Morin, De Pascentia and De Ordinationibus, are well known by the learned, and every one who peruses them can see that the author aims to evince that there is a wonderful agreement on these subjects between the Christians of the East and the Latins, provided the thorny subtleties of the Scholastics are kept out of sight.—Clement Galanus, in a prolix and elaborate work published at Rome in 1650 [1690, 2 vols.] fol. laboured to prove that the Armenians differ but little from the Latins.—Abraham Echellensis, both elsewhere and in his Notes to Ebed Jesu's Catalogus Librorum Chaldaeorum, maintains that all the Christians throughout Asia and Africa coincide with the Latin church. Other writers on this subject are passed over. [Among these are Spanheim's Diss. de Ecclesiæ Græcæ et Orientalis a Romana Papali Perpetua Dissensione, in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 485, &c. and Elsner's Latest Account of the Greek Christians in Turkey, chap. v. (in German).—Schl.]

² See Veid's Defensio Exagorizantis de Ecclesia Græca, p. 100, &c. In which, p. 103, is a letter of Urban VIII. to this Cyril of Berrhoea, highly commending him for having successfully averted from the Greeks the pernicious errors of Lucaris, and exhorting him to depose the bishops who were opposed to the Latins, with the promise of aid both from Rome and from the Spanish government. This Cyril died a member of the Romish church. Hilarius, in his notes to Phil. Cyprii Chronicon Ecclesie Græce, p. 470.

¹ There is extant a confession of faith drawn up by Cyril Lucaris and repeatedly published, particularly in Holland, 1645, 8vo, from which it clearly appears that he favoured the Reformed religion more than that of his countrymen. It was published among Aymon's Monumens Authentiques de la Religion des Grecs, p. 237. Yet he was not averse from the Lutherans, for he addressed letters about this time to the Swedes, whose friendship he endeavoured to conciliate. See Arkenholz's Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome i. p. 486, and tome ii. Append. Documens, 113, &c. The same Aymon has published twenty-seven Letters of this prelate addressed to the Genevans and to others professing the Reformed religion, ubi supra, p. 1-199, which more fully exhibit his disposition and his religious opinions. The life and the unhappy death of this in various respects extraordinary man are described by Thomas Smith, an Englishman, in his Narratio de Vita, Studiis, Gestis, et Martyrio Cyrilli Lucaris, which is inserted in his Miscellanea, London, 1686, 8vo, p. 49-130; also by Hottinger, Annotata Historico-Theol. Appendix, diss. viii. p. 550, and by others, whom Fabricius has enumerated, Bibliotheca Græca, tom. x. p. 499. [Cyril Lucaris was born in 1572 in Candia, the ancient Crete, then subject to the Venetians. Possessing fine native talents, he first studied at Venice and Padua and then travelled over Italy and other countries. Disgusted with the Romish religion and charmed with that of the Reformed, he resided a while at Geneva. On his return to Greece he connected himself with his countryman Meletius Piga, bishop of Alexandria, who resided much at Constantinople and was often legate to the patriarch. Cyril became his chaplain, and then his Archimandrite. The efforts of the Romanists in 1595 to gain the Russian and Polish Greek churches were resisted at Constantinople, and Cyril was active in opposing the defection. His efforts in this cause exposed him to the resentments of the Polish government, and in 1600 he had to quit that country. He went to Alexandria, was there highly respected, and on the death of Meletius in 1602 he succeeded him in that see. He now kept up a correspondence with several Reformed divines, and among them with George Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury. It was at this time that he sent to England the celebrated Alexandrine Codex of the Bible, containing St. Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians. His aversion to the Romish church drew on him the hatred and persecution of the Jesuits, and of all in the East who favoured the Romish cause. In 1612 he was at Constantinople, and the Romish interest alone prevented was found by the Romans either for assailing the Greek patriarchs or for drawing them over to their interests.

3. Yet very many complain, and none more than the Reformed, that the flatteries, the sophistry, and the gold, both of the French ambassadors in Turkey and of the Jesuits, have had so much effect of late upon the ignorance and the poverty of the Greek bishops that they have departed from the religion of their fathers in several respects, and especially on the doctrine of the eucharist, and have adopted among other errors of the Latins the inexplicable doctrine of transubstantiation. And this they say was especially done in the celebrated council of Jerusalem, which Dosithius assembled in the year 1672.¹ This charge, whether it be true or false, was first advanced upon occasion of a dispute between the papists and the Reformed in France. The latter, at the head of whom was the very eloquent and erudite John Claude, maintained that many opinions of the Romanists, and especially that which asserts that the bread and the wine in the eucharist are so changed into the body and blood of Christ as still to leave the external appearance of bread and wine, were wholly unknown in ancient times, and were not found among the Latins themselves before the ninth century; on the contrary, Anthony Arnaud and his associates, in managing the cause, contended that the Romish belief respecting the Lord's Supper had been the received opinion among Christians in every age, and that it was approved by all the sects of Christians in the East, particularly by the Greeks.² This controversy required authorities and testimonies. Hence the French envoys at Constantinople, with the Jesuits on the one part and the Dutch and English ministers on the other, laboured indefatigably to collect opinions of the Greeks in favour of their respective sides. It so happened that the Romanists were superior in both the number and weight of their testimonies; but the Reformed contended that all these were of no avail, being either purchased from the starving Greeks with money, or obtained from persons either ignorant on the subject or deceived and ensnared by insidious language.³ Whoever shall bring to the decision of this controversy a good acquaintance with Greek affairs and a mind unbiassed by prejudice, will judge, I apprehend, that no small part of the Greek church had for many ages possessed some obscure idea of transubstantiation, but that they received more clear and explicit ideas of it in modern times from the Romans.⁴

4. Of the independent Greek churches or those not subject to the Byzantine patriarch, the Russian is the only one which affords any matter for history; the others lie buried in deep ignorance and darkness. About the year 1666 a certain sect showed itself among the Russians and produced no little commotion, which called itself Isbraniki or the Company of the Elect, but by its adversaries it was called Roskolskika, that is, the Seditious Faction.⁵ What these sectaries find to censure in the modern Russian church and what opinions and rites they hold is not yet fully known. It appears however in general that they distinguish themselves by a great show of piety, and represent the ancient religion of the Russians as much marred, partly by the negligence and partly by the licentiousness of the bishops.⁶ The Russians long assailed

¹ Here should be consulted, above all others, John Covell, who was resident at Constantinople when this drama was acted, and who saw by what artifices the Greeks were induced to give testimony in favour of the Latins. See his Account of the Present Greek Church, pref. p. 2, &c. and book i. chap. v. p. 136, &c.

² La Croze, who is well known to have been by no means partial to the Jesuits or to Romish opinions, supposed that the Greeks had long been infected with the doctrine of transubstantiation. See Cuiper's Epistole, edited by Beyer, p. 37, 44, 48, 51, 65. [See also Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. ix. p. 102.—Mur.]

³ Perhaps these are the very persons whom the celebrated Gmelin, in his Travels in Siberia (in German, vol. iv. p. 404), calls Sterowerzi. [They doubtless come under this denomination; for Pinkerton (Present State of the Greek Church in Russia, Ap. endix, p. 227) tells us: "The national church in Russia gives the general name of Raskolniks or Schismatics to all the sects which have at different periods renounced her communion; but these separatists uniformly style themselves Staroversts or Believers of the Old Faith."—Mur.]

⁴ See Bergius, De Statu Ecclesie et Religionis Moscovitice, sec. xl. cap. vii. p. 69. Add sec. li. cap. xvi. p. 218, and in the Append. p. 270; Heineccius On the Greek Church (written in German), part iii. p. 30, &c.; Van Haven's Travels in Russia, p. 316 of the German translation. Some Lutheran writers have supposed or suspected that these Isbraniki were a progeny of the ancient Bogomils. [Mosheim's account of the Russian dissenters is very lame. See the whole Appendix to Pinkerton's Present State of the Greek Church in Russia, p. 227-276. He tells us it is common to date the origin of sectaries in the Russian church about the middle of the 17th century, in the time of the patriarch Nikon. But according to the Russian annals there existed schismatics in the Russian church two hundred years before the days of Nikon; and the disturbances which took place in his time only proved the means of this factious multitude with councils, confutations, severe punishments, military force, and flatteries; but the effect of all these remedies was to drive them to more remote regions, and as is usual to render them more pertinacious in consequence of their calamities and sufferings. A milder treatment began to be shown them from the time that Peter I. whose achievements procured him the surname of Great, introduced a material change in both the civil and ecclesiastical government of the empire. But the schism is so far from being healed, that this revolution in the Russian affairs is said rather to have added firmness and stability to it.

¹ The proceedings of this council were published by Aymon, after an edition by a French Benedictine, in his Monumens Authentiques de la Religion des Grecs, tome i. p. 263. See Cuiper's Epistole, p. 404, 407. Notes illustrative of it may be seen, besides other places, in Basnage's Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformees, period iv. part i. chap. xxxii. &c. p. 452, and in Covell's Account of the Present Greek Church, book i. chap. v. p. 136, &c. [See also Ittig's Hauptl. Dissertat. No. v. de Synodo Hierosol.—Schl. [The Acts of this council, Gr. and Lat. are in Harduin's Concilia, tom. xii. p. 179, &c.—Mur.]

² The names and works of the principal writers on this controversy may be learned from Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, tom. x. p. 443, &c. and Pfaff, Dissertatio contra Ludovici Rogerii Opus Eucharisticum, Tubing. 1718, 4to

5. It will not be improper here to subjoin a few remarks respecting that reformation of the Russian church by Peter I. which we have just mentioned. For though it belongs to the following century, yet the foundations for it were laid in the close of this. That immortal prince suffered the Greek religion, as professed by the Russians, to remain entire; but he took vast pains to have it explained according to sound reason and the Holy Scriptures, to destroy that superstition which was diffused so extensively over the whole nation, and to dispel the amazing ignorance both of the priests and the common people. These were great and noble designs, but exceedingly difficult and such as often require ages for their accomplishment. To effect them the more readily he became the patron of all the arts and sciences, invited learned men from all quarters into the country, established new schools and purged the old ones of their barbarism, laboured to enkindle in his subjects a thirst for learning of all kinds and for literature, abolished the iniquitous practice of persecuting and punishing errorists, and granted to all Christian sects dissenting from the Greeks full liberty to worship according to their own views. Yet in the last particular he was careful to restrain the eagerness of the Romanists for extending the dominion of their pontiff. They had certain places assigned them, in which if they chose to reside among the Russians they might worship in their way. But the Jesuits were prohibited from teaching among the Russian people; and the council which controls all matters of religion was directed to see that Romish opinions were not propagated among the people. All ecclesiastical affairs are managed very differently from what they were formerly. For the emperor suppressed the splendid office of primate, because it was thought prejudicial to the sovereignty of the prince, and made himself sovereign pontiff and head of the Russian church.¹ His vicegerent [in ecclesiastical affairs] is a council established at St. Petersburg called the Holy Synod, over which some archbishop of distinguished prudence and fidelity presides.² The first who filled this office was the celebrated Stephen Javorski, well known by his work in the Russian language against heretics.³ The other ecclesiastical augmenting their numbers and of bringing them forward into public view. The earliest of these schismatics first appeared in Novogorod early in the 15th century, under the name of Strigolniks. A Jew named Horie preached a mixture of Judaism and Christianity, and proselyted two priests, Denis and Alexie, who gained a vast number of followers. This sect was so numerous that a national council was called towards the close of the 15th century to oppose it. Soon afterwards one Karp, an excommunicated deacon, joined the Strigolniks, and accused the higher clergy of selling the office of priesthood, and of so far corrupting the church that the Holy Ghost was withdrawn from it. He was a very successful propagator of this sect. But numerous as the Strigolniks were, they were few compared with the vast number and variety of sectarians produced by the attempts to correct the copies of the Russian liturgy or books used in the churches, which amount to twenty folio volumes. These having long been preserved by transcription were found to contain numerous mistakes of transcribers, and to differ greatly from each other. The higher clergy and the princes, as early as 1518, attempted to correct these books and bring them all to agreement. And the object was pursued for more than a century amid great opposition, before it was fully accomplished. The great body of the Raskolniks or dissenters, though divided into various sects, yet all agree with one another and with the national church in articles of faith, and generally in rites and modes of worship; but they consider the national church as corrupt, because it has falsified the sacred books and thus subverted religion. There are however some minor sects which differ from the establishment both in faith and worship. Pinkerton divides them into two general classes: the Popofschiks, or those who admit the national priests that apostatize to them to officiate still as priests without reordination; and the Bezpopofschiks, or those who either have no priests or have only such as they themselves ordain. Of the former class he enumerates five sects, and of the latter fifteen. But the history of these sects more properly belongs to the following century. See also Stüdtlin's Kirchliche Geographie, vol. i. p. 289, &c.—Mur.

¹ Maclaine very justly criticises the language here used by Mosheim, which implies that the emperor assumed a spiritual office and spiritual power. He only claimed the right as emperor to receive appeals from the ecclesiastical courts, and to give law to priests as well as to the rest of his subjects. He was head of the church in much the same sense as the Kings of England and the German princes are, none of whom ever presumed to administer the sacraments or to perform any appropriate functions of a clergyman or priest.—Mur.

² This is not perfectly correct. In the year 1700, Peter abolished the patriarchal office and appointed an exarch with limited powers, who could do nothing without the consent of the other bishops, and was obliged to refer all affairs of moment to the decision of the Czar himself. Such was Stephen Javorski mentioned in the next sentence. But in 1720 Peter abolished the exarchy also, and in place of it instituted the Holy Legislative Synod, consisting first of twelve, and afterwards of an indefinite number of the higher clergy selected by the emperor. At the head of this synod there is always a layman who is the representative of the Czar, and has a negative upon all its resolutions till they are laid before the emperor. This nobleman is the minister of the crown for the department of religion. See Pinkerton, ubi supra, p. 26, &c. and Stüdtlin's Kirchliche Geographie, vol. i. p. 269, &c.—Mur.

³ See Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 1295.

offices remain as before, but they are deprived of much of the authority formerly annexed to them, and of no small part of their revenues and privileges. At first it was intended to suppress all monasteries whether for men or for women. But from this design the emperor so far departed afterwards, that he himself dedicated a magnificent house of this kind to Alexander Newsky, whom the Russians number among their saints.¹

6. A part of the Asiatic Monophysites left for a time the religion of their fathers and united themselves with the Romanists. Their prompter to this measure was one Andrew Achigian, who had been educated at Rome, was appointed patriarch by the Roman pontiff, and assumed the name of Ignatius XXIV.² At his death, one Peter who took the name of Ignatius XXV. assumed the office; but at the instigation of the legitimate primate of the sect he was banished by the Turks, and the little flock of which he was the head was soon dispersed.³ Of the African Monophysites, the Copts, notwithstanding their wretchedness, ignorance, and poverty, firmly resisted the persons who so often solicited them with very advantageous offers to become united with the Romans. In what manner the Abyssinians freed themselves from the yoke of the Romish bishop, which they had indiscreetly assumed, and asserted their ancient independence, has already been stated. And it will now be proper to add that in some of the Lutherans a holy desire arose to deliver the Abyssinian nation from the darkness of ignorance and superstition, and to bring them to a better knowledge of religion. Prompted by such motives, Peter Heyling of Lubec, a very pious and learned man, visited them in the year 1634; and after spending many years in Ethiopia and being so prosperous as to become prime minister of state to the emperor, and having accomplished much for the advantage of the people, on his return to Europe he lost his life by means unknown.⁴ Afterwards,

Ernest, duke of Saxe-Gotha, whose exemplary virtue procured him the surname of Pious, at the suggestion and recommendation of that extraordinary man Job Ludolf, attempted to explore a way for teachers of the Reformed religion to go among those distant Christians, by means of Gregory, an Abyssinian who was then in Europe.⁵ But Gregory perishing by shipwreck in 1657, Ernest sent John Michael Wansleben of Erfurth in 1663, with very wise instructions to conciliate if possible the goodwill of the Abyssinians towards the Germans. Wansleben however lingered in Egypt; and upon his return, not being able to account for the moneys he had received, he revolted to the Romish church in 1667 and became a Dominican monk.⁶

Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 253, &c. [His father was a jeweller of Lubec. After a good education in his native city he went to Paris in 1627, having charge of four noble youths. There he became intimate with Grotius. From Paris he went to Italy and thence to Malta, where he disputed with the Catholic priests. He now assumed the garb of a pilgrim, intending to travel into the East and acquaint himself with Oriental literature. He proceeded to Constantinople, and thence to Palestine and Egypt. He arrived in Egypt in 1634, and so recommended himself to the Copts by his learning and his piety, that they esteemed him highly and gave him the title of Moullah. Meeting with the new primate of Ethiopia, who had come to Alexandria for ordination, he joined him; and on their way to Abyssinia they met Mendez, the Portuguese Jesuit, just banished from that country, whom Heyling encountered and confuted in a public dispute. Mendez wrote to the pope that if this Lutheran should go into Abyssinia he would involve that whole nation in extreme heresy. He arrived there in 1634, and was very popular and useful. But how long he lived and where he died is very uncertain. A letter of his to Grotius, dated at Memphis, August 28, 1634, respecting the disputes between the Melchites and the Jacobites, is extant in Ludolf's Comment. ad Hist. Ethiop. lib. iii. cap. viii. See Müller, ubi supra. — Mus. Ethio. p. 31, &c.; Junker's Vita Joh. Ludolfi, p. 68, &c. [Ludolf became acquainted with this Gregory during his tour to Rome, and invited him into Germany. He resided a while at the court of Gotha, but afterwards was desirous of returning to his country; and on his way, at Alexandretta in Syria, lost his life by shipwreck. — Schl.]

⁶ Concerning this unstable and vicious but learned man, much may be collected from Lobo's Voyage de l'Abyssinie, tome i. p. 198, 227, 233, 248; Cyprian's Catalogus MSS. Bibliothecae Gothanae, p. 64; Renaudot, Prof. ad Historiam Patriarchar. Alexandrinorum; Ehard and Quetif, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, tom. ii. p. 693. We have his Historia Ecclesiae Alexandrinae, and other works, which are not without merit. [The patriarch of Alexandria persuaded him not to prosecute his journey into Abyssinia. After changing his religion at Rome, he went to Paris, whence Colbert in the year 1672 sent him again to Egypt, to procure a fuller account of the state of that country and to purchase rare manuscripts for the king's library. But Colbert seemed dissatisfied with his proceedings. For Wansleben was not in the least respected at Paris; and from vexation he assumed in 1678 the vicarage of a village not far from Fontainebleau, and died in 1679 in the curacy of Bouron, where he was also vicar. Before his journey to Egypt, at Ludolf's request he went to London, to superintend there the printing of the first edition of his Ethiopic Grammar and Lexicon in 1661; and there he aided Edmund Castell in the preparation of his Lexicon Heptaglosson. After his return from the East, he wrote his Relatione dello Stato Presente dell'Egitto; and in 1677 his Nouvelle Relation en forme de Journal de son Voyage faite en Egypte. His History F f

¹ On these subjects much information may be obtained from Van Haver's Travels in Russia, which are extant in a German translation from the Danish.

² From the 15th century onward all the primates of the Monophysite sect chose to bear the name of Ignatius, for no other reason, if I do not mistake, than to indicate by their name that they are successors to Ignatius the bishop of Antioch in the first century, and the legitimate patriarchs of that see. A similar motive has induced the Maronite primates, who also claim the title of patriarchs of Antioch, to assume the name of Peter. For St. Peter is said to have governed the church of Antioch before Ignatius.

³ See Asseman's Biblioth. Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana, tom. ii. p. 412, and in Dis. de Monophysitismo, sec. iii. p. 6, 7.

⁴ A valuable life of this man was published in German by Michaelis, Halle, 1724, 8vo. Add Müller's

Thus the designs of this excellent duke were frustrated; yet they were attended with this advantage, that Job Ludolf by his very learned and elaborate works threw much light upon the history, the sentiments, and the literature of the Abyssinians, which before had been but little known among the Europeans.

7. A considerable change took place in the affairs of the Armenians, not long after the commencement of this century, originating from Abbas I. the king of Persia, who for his achievements was surnamed the Great. For he nearly laid waste all that part of Armenia which was contiguous to Persia, with a view to prevent the Turks from invading his territories; and he caused most of its inhabitants to migrate and settle in Persia. For what the Europeans endeavour to accomplish by erecting castles and fortresses along their borders, the kings of the East prefer to effect by depopulating the frontier parts and provinces of their kingdoms. The richest and best of these Armenians removed to Ispahan, the capital of the kingdom, and resided in the splendid suburb which the king called Julfa, where they have their own bishop. So long as Abbas lived, who was a magnanimous prince and much attached to his people, these exiles enjoyed great prosperity; but after his death they were involved in calamities and persecutions.¹ And hence not a few of them have apostatized to Mohammedanism, and it is to be feared that this portion of the Armenian church will become wholly extinct. On the other hand, the Asiatic Armenians have undoubtedly derived no little advantage from the permanent settlement of very many of their nation during this century, for commercial purposes, in most of the countries of Europe, as at Marseilles in France, and in London, Amsterdam, and Venice.² For, not to mention other things, this has afforded them an opportunity to print the Bible and many other books especially religious ones, in the Armenian character, in Holland particularly and in England; and these books, being sent to the Armenians living under the Persians and Turks, doubtless tend to prevent the nation, which is rude and inclined to superstition, from losing all knowledge of the Christian religion.

8. The disunion among the Nestorians, which rent that church in the preceding century, could not be healed at all in this. Among the patriarchs of Mosul, Elias II. sent his envoy to Rome in the year 1607, and again in the year 1610, to obtain the friendship of the pontiff; and in a letter to Paul V. he avowed himself ready to sanction a union between the Nestorians and the Romans.³ Elias III. though at first extremely averse to the Romish rites, yet in the year 1657 addressed a letter to the Congregation de Propaganda Fide, signifying his willingness to join the Romish church, provided the pontiffs would grant to the Nestorians a place of worship at Rome, and would not corrupt or disturb at all the tenets of the sect.⁴ But the Romans doubtless perceived that a union formed on the terms here stated would be of no use or advantage to their cause; for we have no information that the Nestorians were at that time received into the Romish communion, or that the prelates of Mosul were again solicitous to conciliate the Roman pontiff. The Nestorian patriarchs of Ormus, who all bore the name of Simeon, likewise made two proposals in 1619 and 1653, for renewing their former alliance with the Roman pontiffs, and sent to Rome a tract explanatory of their religious sentiments. But either these prelates did not offer satisfactory terms to the Romans,⁵ or on account of their poverty and very slender power they were despised at Rome; for it appears that from the year 1617, the prelates at Ormus were in a very low state, and no longer excited the envy of those at Mosul.⁶ There was however a small and poor congregation of Roman Catholics formed among the Nestorians about the middle of this century, whose bishops or patriarchs reside in the city of Amida or Diarbekir, and all bear the name of Joseph.⁷ The Nestorians inhabiting the coast of Malabar and who are called Christians of St. Thomas, so long as the Portuguese possessed those regions, were miserably harassed by the Romish priests, especially by the Jesuits; and yet neither vexations, of the Church of Alexandria was also published in French.—Schl.

¹ See Chardin, Voyage en Perse, tome II. p. 106, &c. Gabr. du Chilon, Nouvelle Relation du Levant, p. 206, &c.

² Of the Armenians residing at Marseilles and the books they have printed there, see Simon's Lettres Choisies, tome II. p. 137. Of their Bible printed in Holland he likewise treats, Ibid. tome IV. p. 160. So also does Schröder, in his Thesaurus Linguae Armenicae, or rather in the Dis. de Lingua Armenica, which is prefixed to this Thesaurus, cap. IV. p. 60. The other Armenian books printed at Venice, Lemberg, and especially at Amsterdam, are enumerated by this very learned man, ubi supra, cap. II. sec. XXV. &c. p. 78. &c.

³ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vaticana, tom. I. p. 543; tom. II. p. 457; tom. III. par. I. p. 650.

⁴ Asseman, ubi supra, tom. III. par. II. p. cml.

⁵ Asseman, ubi supra, tom. I. p. 531; tom. II. p. 457; tom. III. par. I. p. 622.

⁶ Strozza, Prefatio ad Librum de Chaldeenorum Dogmatibus.

⁷ See Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. II. p. 1078.

menaces, nor artifices, could bring them to prefer the Romish worship before that of their fathers.¹ But when Cochin was conquered by the Dutch in 1663, and the Portuguese were expelled from those regions,² their former liberty of worshipping God in the manner of their ancestors was restored to that oppressed people, and they continue to enjoy it to the present time. At the same time, the Dutch give no trouble to those among them who choose to continue in the Romish religion, provided they will treat kindly and peacefully those who differ from them.

PART II.

THE HISTORY OF THE MODERN CHURCHES.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH.

1. THE evils and calamities which the Roman pontiffs or the Austrians (often too obsequious to the pleasure of the pontiffs in things pertaining to religion) either brought or endeavoured to bring upon the Lutherans in various ways during this century, have been already narrated in the history of the Romish church. We shall therefore now mention only some other things, by which the Lutheran church lost something of its splendour and amplitude. Maurice, landgrave of Hesse, of the Cassel family, a very learned prince, seceded from the Lutheran church, and he not only himself went over to the Reformed, but also in the year 1624 and onward, both at the university of Marburg and throughout his province, he displaced the Lutheran teachers who firmly resisted his purpose, and commanded the people to be thoroughly taught the Reformed doctrines, and public worship to be conducted in the Genevan manner. This design was prosecuted with the greatest firmness in the year 1619, when he ordered select theologians to proceed to the Dutch council of Dort, and commanded the decrees there made to be publicly assented to by his church. The Reformed maintained formerly that nothing was done in this affair which was inconsistent with equity and the highest moderation. But perhaps all impartial men in our day will admit without difficulty, that many things would have been ordered somewhat differently if that excellent prince had been less disposed to gratify his own will and pleasure, and more attentive to those precepts which the wisest of the Reformed themselves inculcate respecting duty towards those who differ from us in matters of religion.³

2. Not long after, in the year 1614, John Sigismund also, the elector of Brandenburg, left the communion of the Lutherans and went over to the Reformed, yet with different views from those of Maurice, and with different results. For he did not embrace all the doctrines by which the followers of Calvin are distinguished from the Lutherans; but in addiwesen im Fürstenthum Hessen. 1606, 4to; Cyprian's Unterricht von kirchlicher Vereinigung der Protestanten, p. 263, and in the Appendix of Documents, p. 103, and the public Acts, which were published in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1749, p. 25, &c. Here should be consulted especially the public official writings which passed between the divines of Cassel and Darmstadt, Cassel, 1633, fol.; Marburg, 1636, fol.; Giessen, 1647, fol.; of which Salig treats, in his Historia der Augsburg. Confession, vol. I. book iv. chap. II. p. 756, &c. [Even from the time of the Reformation onward, there were individuals in Hesse who were inclined towards the doctrines of the Reformed, but the outward tranquillity was not thereby destroyed. Philip the Magnanimous and his successors, some of whom were well known to be favourable to the Reformed opinions, used all care to preserve this harmony. When the Formula of Concord produced so much disturbance in Saxony and Upper Germany, and threatened to destroy the peace which Hesse had hitherto enjoyed, the Hessian princes published an edict in 1572, by which they endeavoured to preserve the union. Also in the general Synods of Treysa in 1577, of Marburg in 1578, and of Cassel in 1579, the Hessian clergy were required to subscribe certain articles designed to preserve the union. But under the landgrave Maurice the state of things changed. He had been drawn over to the side of the Reformed by some French Reformed noblemen's sons, whom his father had procured through Beza to be his son's associates; and after the death of his father's brother, the landgrave Lewis, at Marburg in 1604, he endeavoured to introduce the Reformed religion by means of a Catechism; and in the year 1606, he dismissed all the teachers at Marburg and in half the upper principality of Hesse (which had fallen to the house of Cassel), because they would not subscribe the result of the Synod without some limitation; and he established Reformed teachers in their place. The dismissed teachers, among whom the famous Balthazar Menzer was the most distinguished, were afterwards received by Lewis the landgrave of Darmstadt; and a part of them were established in the newly-erected university of Giessen, and the rest were benefited elsewhere. As is generally the case when human passions become enlisted in religious contests, there were faults on both sides which no impartial man at the present day will approve. The Lutherans adhered too strenuously and too wilfully to certain subtle doctrines of the schools, and to external rites which are not of the essence of Christianity; and the Reformed, who had the court on their side, misused the power which was in their hands, to the injury of the ancient rights of a community whose brethren they pretended to be.

—Schl.

¹ Of these La Croze treats largely, Histoire du Christianisme des Indes, livr. v. p. 344, &c.

² Schouten, Voyage aux Indes Orientales, tome I. p. 319, &c. p. 466, &c.

³ See Garth's Historischer Bericht von dem Religions-

tion to the Genevan form of worship, he considered only the Reformed doctrines respecting the person of Christ and the presence of his body and blood in the eucharist as more correct and tenable than the Lutheran views; but what they inculcate respecting the nature and order of divine grace and the decrees of God he did not adopt. And hence he would neither send deputies to the synod of Dort, nor permit their decrees respecting these difficult points to be received. The same sentiments were so far retained by the sovereign princes of Brandenburg who reigned after him, that they never required Calvin's doctrine of absolute decrees to be taught in the Reformed churches of their dominions as the public and received doctrine. It is also justly accounted an honour to John Sigismund, that he gave his subjects full liberty either to follow the example of their prince or to deviate from it; nor did he exclude from posts of honour and power those who deemed it wrong to abandon the religion of their fathers. Yet this moderation was not satisfactory to the violent temper of that age, which was in many respects too rigid; for not a few thought it intolerable and provoking that the prince should ordain, that the professors of both religions should enjoy equal rank and rights, that odious terms and comparisons should be abstained from in disputation, that religious controversies should be either wholly omitted or explained very modestly in public discourses to the people, and lastly, that those who disagreed should live together as friends and should interchange kind offices. And from these views originated not only bitter contests, but also at times rash and seditious commotions in the state, in allaying which many years were consumed in vain. The neighbouring divines of Saxony, and particularly those of Wittenberg, undertook to defend the side of the Lutherans in these tumults, and undoubtedly with sincere and upright intentions, but, according to the customs of the times, in a style too coarse and not sufficiently temperate. And hence, not only was the Formula of Concord excluded from a place among the books by which the public religion of the Lutherans is regulated in the Brandenburg territories, but likewise the citizens of Brandenburg were forbidden to study theology in the university of Wittenberg.

¹ The laws and edicts both of John Sigismund and his successors in relation to this famous affair have been sometimes printed together. There are likewise extant a great number of books and pamphlets, from which a knowledge of these proceedings may be derived, and of which I would rather refer others to for a full

3. So many evils resulting from the discords of the Lutherans and Reformed, who with equal sincerity and fortitude had renounced papal servitude, may have induced some of the principal men and the most famous theologians of both parties to look about them anxiously for some means of uniting in bonds of mutual affection the communities rent asunder and severed by their religious sentiments. No wise man could be so ignorant of human nature as to expect that all difference of opinion between them could be removed, or that either party would go over to the sentiments of the other. And therefore those who undertook this business agreed that their only aim should be to persuade the disputants that there was little or nothing of any importance to true religion and piety in all the points controverted between the parties, that the fundamental truths on which the plan of salvation rests are safe on both sides, and that their controversies related partly to things recondite and inexplicable, and partly to things indifferent and far removed from the supreme object of a Christian. Those who could admit these things to be true must also admit that the existing difference of sentiment was no just impediment to fraternal intercourse between the dissentients. And in fact most of the Reformed were readily brought to concede that the Lutherans erred but moderately and lightly, or did not greatly corrupt any one of the primary doctrines of Christianity; but most of the Lutherans perseveringly maintained that they had the most weighty reasons for not judging in the same manner of the Reformed, and that a great part of the dispute related to the groundwork of all religion and piety. It is not strange that the opposite party should brand this perseverance of the Lutherans with the odious names of moroseness, superciliousness, arrogance, and the like. But those who were taxed with these faults brought as many charges against their accusers. For they complained that they catalogue than give an imperfect one myself. Such a catalogue is extant in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1745, p. 34, &c. and A.D. 1746, p. 326. See also Köcher, Bibliotheca Theol. Symbolica, p. 312, &c. Those who wish to understand and form an estimate of the whole transaction may consult Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part II. book xvii. chap. vii. p. 965; Cyprian's Unterricht von der Vereinigung der Protestanten, p. 75, and the Appendix of Documents, p. 225; the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1721, p. 1069, and A.D. 1732, p. 715. Those who would persuade us that the hope of extending his power and influence was not the least motive with the prince for this change, conjecture rather than demonstrate and prove; for they do not support their opinion with valid arguments. Yet it must be confessed by those who carefully inspect the history of those times, that their conjecture is not altogether without reason and plausibility.

were not treated ingenuously, that the real character of the Reformed principles was disguised under ambiguous phraseology, and that their adversaries, though cautious and guarded, evinced too plainly that the chief ground of their great inclination for peace was not so much a desire of the public good as of their private advantage.

4. Among the public transactions relative to this business of a union, we may justly give the first place to the project of James I. the king of Great Britain, who in the year 1615 attempted a reconciliation of the Lutherans and Reformed, through the instrumentality of Peter du Moulin, a very celebrated divine among the French Reformed.¹ The next place is due to the celebrated decree of the Reformed church of France passed in the synod of Charenton, A. D. 1631, by which the Lutheran religion was declared harmless, holy, and free from all gross errors, and a way was opened for all the professors of it to hold sacred and civil communion with the Reformed.² Whatever may have been the motives for this decree, its consequences were unimportant, because few of the Lutherans were disposed to use the liberty thus generously offered them. In the same year certain Saxon theologians, Matthias Hœ, Polycarp Lyser, and Henry Höffner, were ordered to hold a conference at Leipsic with certain Hessian and Brandenburg doctors of the first class, in order that the sentiments of both parties being properly explained and compared, the number and nature of the difficulties which were in the way of the much-desired union might be better understood. This deliberation was conducted without any intemperate love for disputation and controversy, but at the same time not with that mutual confidence and freedom from jealousy which would secure harmony in the result. For though the speakers on the side of the Reformed explained in the best manner the views of their church, and cheerfully conceded not a few things which the Lutherans hardly expected, yet the suspicions of the latter lest they should be entrapped so intimidated them, that they would not acknowledge themselves satisfied. Hence the disputants separated without accomplishing anything.³ Whoever wishes to learn the motives for these deliberations for peace must inspect and examine the civil history of those times.

5. The conference at Thorn in 1645, appointed by Uladislavus IV. king of Poland, for the purpose of uniting if possible not only the Reformed with the Lutherans but both also with the papists, was likewise unsuccessful. For those who were called together to make efforts, if not to terminate yet at least to diminish the existing enmities, separated more enraged than when they came together. With more success, by order of William VI. the landgrave of Hesse, Peter Musæus and John Henichius of the university of Rinteln, and Sebastian Curtius and John Heinicus, doctors of Marburg, the two former Lutherans and the latter Reformed, when directed by the landgrave to enter into a friendly discussion, compared their sentiments at Cassel in the year 1661. For having investigated the importance of the controversies which separated the two communities, they mutually shook hands, affirmed that it was far less than was commonly supposed, and ought not to prevent fraternal affection and harmony. But the divines of Rinteln were so utterly unable to persuade their Lutheran brethren to believe as they did, that on the contrary their only reward was almost universal hatred, and they were assailed with bitterness in numerous publications.⁴

¹ See Le Vassor's Histoire de Louis XIII. tome ii. part ii. p. 21, &c. [and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reform. vol. v. p. 198.—Mur.]

² Benoit's Histoire de l'Edit de Nantes, tome ii. p. 524; Aymon's Actes des Synodes Nationaux des Eglises Réformées de France, tome ii. p. 500, &c.; Ittig's Diss. de Synodo Carentoniensi Indulgentia erga Lutheranos, Lips. 1705, 4to. [Quick's Synodicon in Gallia Reformata, vol. ii. p. 297. The words of the decree were these: "The province of Burgundy demanding whether the faithful of the Augustano (Augsburg) Confession might be permitted to contract marriages in our churches and to present children in our churches unto baptism, without a precedaneous abjuration of those opinions held by them contrary to the belief of our churches, this Synod declareth that, inasmuch as the churches of the Confession of Augsburg do agree with the other Reformed churches in the principal and fundamental points of the true religion, and that there is neither superstition nor idolatry in their worship, the faithful of the said Confession who with a spirit of love and peaceableness do join themselves to the communion of our churches in this kingdom, may be, without any abjuration at all made by them, admitted unto the Lord's table with us, and as sureties may present children unto baptism, they promising the Consistory that they will never solicit them either directly or indirectly, to transgress the doctrine believed and professed in our churches, but will be content to instruct and educate them in those points and articles which are in common between us and them, and wherein both the Lutherans and we are unanimously agreed."—Mur.]

³ See Gesselius, Historia Sacra et Ecclesiastica, par. ii. the Addenda, p. 597-613, where the Acts themselves are given; Jäger's Historia Sacul. xvii. decenn. iv. p. 407, &c. [The Reformed divines were John Bergius, court preacher at Berlin, John Crocius, professor at Marburg, and Theophilus Neuberger, superintendent at Cassel. They discussed all the articles of the Augsburg Confession to which the Reformed were ready to subscribe, and also set forth a formula of union or rather an exposition of the articles in controversy, which was not expected from them.—Schl.]

⁴ The writers who treat of the conferences at Thorn and Cassel are enumerated by Sagittarius, Introduct. ad Historiam Ecclesiam. tom. ii. p. 1604. Add Jäger's Historia Sacul. xvii. decenn. v. p. 689, where the Acts of the conference of Thorn, and decenn. vii. p. 160, where those of the conference at Cassel, are extant; Tufretine, Nubes Testium pro moderato in Rebus Theo-

How much labour and effort the Brandenburg heroes, Frederick William and his son Frederick, afterwards expended in reconciling the differences of Protestants in general, and particularly in Prussia¹ and their other provinces, and what difficulties opposed and withstood those efforts, are too well known to need a long rehearsal.

6. Of those who as private individuals assumed the office of arbiters of the contests among the Protestants, a vast number might be mentioned; but many more assumed this character among the Reformed than among the Lutherans. The most noted among the Reformed, it is universally admitted, was John Duræus [or Dury], a Scotchman, who was certainly an honest man and both pious and learned, but more distinguished for genius and memory than for the power of nice discrimination and sound judgment, as might be evinced by satisfactory proofs if this were the proper place. For more than forty years, or from 1631 to 1674, he laboured with incredible fortitude and patience, by writing, persuading, admonishing, in short in every way that could be thought of, to attain the happiness of putting an end to the contests among the Protestants. Nor did he, like others, attempt this vast enterprise shut up in his study; but he travelled into nearly all the countries of Europe in which a purer religion flourished, and personally addressed and conferred with all the theologians of both parties who were of much note and influence, and made great exertions to engage in his enterprise kings, princes, and magistrates, and their friends, by displaying the importance and utility of his object. Most persons commended his designs and treated him with kindness, yet very few were found willing to help forward his plans by their personal efforts and counsels. Some persons suspecting that so great eagerness as Dury manifested must proceed from sinister designs, and that he was secretly labouring to draw the Lutherans into a snare, assailed him in writings full of acrimony, nor did all of them abstain from personal invectives and abuse. At last, neglected by his own party and repelled and rejected by ours, and discouraged by a thousand hardships, insults, and troubles, he learned that this task exceeded the power of individual efforts, and he consumed the remainder of his life in obscurity and neglect at Cassel.² This honest man, though sometimes not sufficiently explicit and ingenious, laid for the foundation of his scheme certain principles according to which, if they should be approved, not only Lutherans and the Reformed but Christians of all sects whatever might easily become associated. For first, he contended that what is called the Apostles' Creed embraced all the doctrines necessary to be believed, and the ten commandments all the laws of conduct to be observed, and the Lord's Prayer all the promises of God; and if this were true, then all Christians might unite in one family. In the next place, as appears from adequate proof, he endeavoured to attain his object by means of mystical or Quakerish sentiments. For he placed all religion in the elevation of the soul to God, or in eliciting that internal divine spark or word which dwells in the human mind; from which it would follow, that difference of opinion on divine subjects has no connexion with religion.

7. The principal Lutherans who engaged in this business were John Matthias, a Swede, bishop of Stregnas and formerly preceptor to queen Christina, whom Dury had warmed with zeal for a coalition, and George Calixtus, a divine of Helmstadt, who had few equals in that age either in learning, genius, or probity; but neither of these met with the success he desired. The Olive Branches of the former (for such was the title of his pamphlets on the subject) were publicly condemned, and by a royal edict were excluded from the territories of Sweden. And he himself at last,

² See Coler's Historia Joh. Duræi, Wittemb. 1716, 4to, to which however very much might be added from documents both printed and manuscript. Some documents of this kind were published by Hassæus, in the Bibliotheca Bremens. Theologico-Philologica, tom. i. p. 911, &c. and tom. iv. p. 683. A great number are given by Gessellus, in the Addenda Irenica, in his Hist. Sac. et Eccles. tom. ii. p. 614. His transactions with the Marburgers are in Von Schenck's Vita Professorum Theol. Marburgensium, p. 202, &c. What he attempted in Holstein may be learned from the Epistles which Lackmann has published along with the Epistles of Lossius, p. 245. How he managed in Prussia and Poland we are informed by Jablonski, Historia Consensus Sandomiriensis, p. 127. His proceedings in Denmark are stated by Von Elswich, fasciculus 1. Epistolar. Familiarum Theologicar. p. 147. His acts in the Palatinate are in Von Seelen's Delicia Epistolice, p. 353. His proceedings in Switzerland are illustrated by the Acts and Epistles published in the Museum Helveticum, tom. iii. iv. v. p. 602, &c. Many things on this subject are also brought forward by Jäger, Historia Sæcul. xvii. decenn. vii. p. 172, and elsewhere. In general, respecting Duræus the reader may consult Böhm's Englische Reformationshistorie, p. 844, and the Dissertation, derived very much from unpublished documents, which Benzell exhibited at Helmstadt under my auspices in 1744, entitled De Joh. Duræo, maxime de Actis ejus Suecicis. (See also Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Duræus ; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, part ii. book xvii. chap. xi. sec. xxiii. &c. p. 182, &c. and Brook's Lives of the Puritans, vol. iii. p. 369, &c.—Mur.

logica Judicio, p. 178; Möller, in his Life of Musæus in Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 566, &c. treats professedly of the conference at Cassel; and in p. 568 gives an accurate catalogue of all the writings published both by the friends and the enemies of that conference.

¹ Hartknoch's Preussische Kirchenhistorie, p. 599; Unschultze Nachrichten, A.D. 1731, p. 1010, &c.

in order to appease in some measure his enemies, had to relinquish his office and retire to a private life.¹ Calixtus, while he dissuaded others from contention, drew on himself an immense load of accusations and conflicts; and while he endeavoured to free the church from all sects, was thought by great numbers of his brethren to be the father and author of a new sect, that of the Syncretists; that is, the sect which pursued peace and union at the expense of divine truth.² We shall find hereafter a more convenient place for speaking of the fortunes and the opinions of this great man; for he was charged with many other offences besides that of being zealous for peace with the Reformed; and the attacks made upon him threw the whole Lutheran community into commotion.³

8. To say something of the external prosperity of the Lutheran church, the most important circumstance is, that this church, though beset with the numberless machinations and oppressions of its enemies, could nowhere be entirely extirpated and obliterated. There are to this day and it may justly excite our wonder, very many Lutherans even in those countries in which Lutheran worship is prohibited; nay (as appears from the recent emigration of the Saltzburgers,⁴ which deserves to be told to all future ages), in those countries in which even a silent and most cautious dissent from the established religion is a capital crime, there lie concealed vast numbers who regard all superstition with abhorrence, and who observe in the best manner they can the great precepts of a pure religion. The countries which are inhabited by persons of different religions yet are under the spiritual dominion of the Roman pontiff, afford us numerous examples of cruelty, inhumanity, and injustice, which the Romanists think perfectly justifiable against those who dissent from them, and whom they regard as seditious citizens; yet nowhere could either violence or fraud wrest from the Lutherans all their rights and liberties. It may be added that the Lutheran religion was transplanted by merchants and other emigrants to America, Asia, and Africa, and was introduced into various places of Europe where it was before unknown.

9. The internal condition of the Lutheran church in this century presents indeed many things to be commended, but not a few things also which deformed it. First, it was honourable to the Lutherans that they cultivated everywhere with diligence, not only sacred learning, but also every branch of human knowledge; and that they enlarged and illustrated both literature and theology with many and important accessions. This is so generally known that we need not go into a prolix enumeration of the revolutions and improvements of the several sciences. From most of them religion derived some benefit; but some of them were abused by injudicious or ill-designing men—such is the common lot of all human affairs—to corrupt and to explain away that religion which the Bible reveals. In the first part of the century those branches of learning in which intellect is chiefly concerned were the most taught in the schools, and in a method not very alluring and pleasant; but in the latter part of it more attention was paid to the branches which depend on genius and memory, and which afford more entertainment and pleasure, such as history, civil, literary, and natural, antiquities, criticism, eloquence, and the like. Moreover, both kinds of learning were treated in a more convenient, neat, and elegant manner. Yet it was unhappily the fact that while human knowledge was advanced and polished, the estimation in which learning and learned men were held was gradually lessened; which, among other causes inexpedient to mention, may be ascribed to the multitude of those who applied themselves to study, without possessing natural talents and a taste for learning.

10. During the greater part of the century no other rule of philosophising flourished in the schools except the Aristotelico-Scholastic; and for a long time those who thought

¹ See Scheffer's Succia Literata, p. 123, and Möller's Hypomnemata upon it, p. 387; Arckenholz, Mémoires de la Reine Christine, tome i. p. 320, p. 505, &c.; tome ii. p. 63. [Matthiæ published two works which gave offence to the Swedes, namely, Idea boni ordinis in Ecclesia Christi, and Ramus Olive Septentrionalis. The last was published in ten parts, Strengnas, 1661, 1662, 12mo, and in the latter year it was placed in the list of forbidden books.—Mur.]

² The views of this excellent man which many have stated incorrectly, may be learned from his tract often printed, entitled Judicium de Contronariis Theologicis inter Lutheranos et Reformatos, et de Mutua partium Fraternalitate et Tolerantia.

³ These various attempts at union, whether by the authority of public bodies or by the benevolent zeal of individuals, are more fully but not so impartially treated by Taberaud, in his Histoire des Projets pour la Réunion des Communions Chrétiennes, especially in chapters ii. and x.—R.

⁴ There was an emigration of above one thousand Saltzburgers in the years 1634, 1685, 1686; but the great emigration was in the years 1731 and onward, amounting to between 30,000 and 40,000 persons.—Mur.

[Guericke in his Handbuch der Kirchenges. vol. ii. p. 349, refers to the following, among other authorities, for an account of this emigration, which was caused by the severe measures of the archbishop of Saltzburg against the Protestants; Schellhorn, De Relig. Evang. in Provincia Saltzburgi Ortu et Fatis, 1732; Pansa, Gesch. der Auswanderung der evang. Saltzburger, Leip. 1827. The reader will see, from a reference by Ranke to the persecuting measures of an earlier archbishop in 1588, with what difficulties Protestantism had to contend from the very outset in that unfortunate district. Popes of Rome; vol. ii. p. 137.—R.]

Aristotle should either be given up or amended, were considered as threatening as much danger to the church as if they had undertaken to falsify some portion of the Bible. In this zeal for the Peripatetic philosophy, the doctors of Leipsic, Tübingen, Helmstadt, and Altorf, went beyond almost all others. Many indeed envied the Aristotelians their high prosperity. In the first place, there were certain wise and honest men among the theologians who admitted that it was proper to philosophise though sparingly, but who complained that the name of philosophy was attached to words and distinctions void of all meaning.¹ Next came the disciples of Peter Ramus, who with great diligence inculcated their master's precepts (which were of greater practical utility) in many both of the higher and inferior schools, to the exclusion of the Aristotelians.² Lastly, there were those who either condemned all philosophy, as being injurious to religion and to the community (which Daniel Hoffmann did no less unskilfully than contemptuously at Helmstadt), or who, with Robert Fludd, Jacob Böhme, and the Rosecrucians already mentioned,³ boasted of having discovered, by means of fire and divine illumination, an admirable and celestial mode of philosophising. But if there had been as much harmony among these sects as there was dissension and disagreement, they had far less power than was necessary to overthrow the empire of Aristotle, now confirmed by time and strong in the multitude of its defenders.

11. But more danger impended over Aristotle from Des Cartes and Gassendi, whose lucid and well-arranged treatises, as early as the middle of the century, pleased many of our theologians better than the many huge volumes of the Peripatetics, which exhibited the stale and insipid wisdom of the schools without taste or elegance. The Aristotelians first endeavoured to repel these new teachers of philosophy by arguments of an invidious nature, by fully exhibiting the great danger which this new mode of philosophising portended to religion and to true piety; but afterwards, when they saw these weapons unsuccessful, they drew back and defended only the citadel of their cause, abandoning the outworks. For some of them coupled elegance of diction and polite literature with their precepts; nor did they deny that though Aristotle was the prince of philosophers, there were some blemishes and faults in him, which a wise man might lawfully amend. But this very prudence made their adversaries more bold and daring; for they now contended that they had obliged them to confess guilt, and therefore they opened all their batteries upon the whole school of the Stagyrite, which the others had conceded to need amendment only in part. After Hugo Grotius, who was but a timid opposer of the Stagyrite, Samuel Puffendorf first pointed out, freely and openly, a new and very different course from the Peripatetic on the law of nature and the science of morals. He was followed with still greater zeal (although nearly overwhelmed by the multitude of his enemies) by Christian Thomasius, a jurist first of Leipsic and then at Halle; who was not indeed a man to whose protection the interests of philosophy might be intrusted with entire confidence, yet he possessed a fearless mind and very superior genius. He attempted a reformation not of a single science only, but of every branch of philosophy; and both by precept and example continually urged his fellow-citizens to burst asunder the bonds of Aristotle, whom however he had neither understood nor even read. The particular mode of philosophising which he substituted in place of that which had prevailed, was not very favourably received and soon fell into neglect. But the spirit of innovation which he diffused made so great a progress in a short time, that he may be justly accounted the subduer of philosophic tyranny or of sectarian philosophy, especially among the Germans.⁴ The Frederician university at Halle in Saxony where he taught, was the

¹ Such was Wenzel Schilling, with his associates (concerning whom, see Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part II. book xvii. chap. vi. p. 499), and likewise others of our best theologians.

See Von Elswich, De varia Aristotelis in Protestant. Scholis fortuna, sec. xxi. p. 84, &c. and Walch's Historia Logice, lib. II. cap. I. sec. III. sec. v. In his Parrerga Academica, p. 613, &c.

² See above, in the chapter on the General History of the Church, sec. 30, &c. p. 732, &c.

⁴ Concerning Christian Thomasius, see Brucker's Historia Crit. Philosophiæ, tom. v. and his Append. Hist. Crit. Philos. p. 859, &c. Yet Mosheim judged more correctly of this memorable man than Brucker did, who unjustly accounted him a reformer of philosophy. Thomasius was not properly a reformer of philosophy, though he was the occasion of a reform in it; for he improved the philosophical genius of the Germans just as Holberg did that of the Danes, without being himself a great discoverer in philosophy. Thomasius introduced more freedom of thinking. And this freedom under his guidance spread itself not only over philosophy, but likewise over ecclesiastical law. He often went too far in this matter, and his views were not always the best. The abuse he received from the divines of Leipsic inflamed him with hatred against the whole clerical order. At the same time, he must have the credit of abolishing the punishment of heretics, trials for witchcraft, and certain false principles respecting marriage and divorce, &c. See Schroeckh's Allgem. Biographie, vol. v. p. 266, &c.—Schl. [See a brief notice of him and his works in Tennemann's Manual of the Hist. of Philosophy, by Johnston, p. 363, 4.—R.]

first to fall in with his views; afterwards the other schools in Germany adopted them, one after another; and from these, the same liberty of thinking extended to the other nations that professed the Lutheran religion. Towards the end of the century therefore all among us became possessed, not by any law but in the course of events and as it were accidentally, of the liberty of philosophising, each according to his own judgment and not another man's, and of exhibiting in public those principles of philosophy which each one thought to be true and certain. This liberty was so used by the majority, that in the manner of the ancient Eclectics, they selected and combined the better and more probable dogmas of the various schools; yet there were some (among whom Godfrey William Leibnitz was undoubtedly the greatest man) who endeavoured to search for the truth by their own efforts, and to elicit from fixed and immoveable principles a new and imperishable philosophy.¹ In this conflict with Aristotle and his friends, so great was the odium against the routed foe among the Lutherans, that the science of metaphysics, which the Stagyrice regarded as the primary science and the source of all the rest, was degraded and nearly stripped of all its honours; nor could the otherwise great influence of Des Cartes, who like Aristotle commenced all his philosophy with it, afford to it any great protection. But after the first commotions had a little subsided, principally at the recommendation of Leibnitz, it was not only recalled from exile but was again honoured with the splendid title and rank of the Queen of Sciences.

12. Many persons, who have formed such an idea of the Christian church as no wise man will ever expect to see realized, are wonderfully prolix in enumerating and exaggerating the defects of the Lutheran clergy of this age. In the higher class of them, they specify arrogance, a contentious spirit, disregard of Christian simplicity, lust of domination, a carping disposition, intolerable bigotry, extreme hatred of pious and good men who may honestly deviate at all from the established rule of faith, and I know not what other things no better than these. In the lower class of ministers, they mention ignorance, an insufficient mode of teaching, and neglect of their most sacred duties; and in both classes, avarice, the want of piety, indolence, and habits unbecoming the character of ministers of Christ. One who has leisure and the means of examining the manners and condition of those times will readily grant, that there was not a small number of persons presiding over the Lutheran churches, who lacked either the ability or the disposition to point out the way of truth and salvation wisely and well. But those who are acquainted with the history of our world know that this has been a common evil in all ages. And on the other hand, no one will deny,—unless he is ignorant and ill-informed or is affected by some disease of the mind,—that there were very many learned, grave, wise, and holy men intermingled among these improper clergymen. And perhaps, if one should raise this question—whether in the time of our fathers, there were more preachers in our churches unworthy of this office than in our own time, when many think the ancient sanctity of the clergy is generally revived?—a difficult controversy would arise, in which a person of any genius might easily find arguments on both sides. Besides, many of the faults so invidiously charged upon the clergy of this age, if the subject be duly examined, will be found to be not so much the faults of the men as of the times, arising from the public calamities, from the Thirty Years' War (that fruitful source of innumerable evils to Germany), from a bad education also, and sometimes from the conduct of the supreme magistrates.

13. This last remark will be better understood if we notice some particular facts. We do not deny what many allege, that during a great part of the century the people were not well instructed, either from the pulpit or in the schools; nor shall we much resist those who maintain, that the sacred eloquence of many places was the art of declaiming boisterously by the hour, on subjects little understood or comprehended. For though the doctrines and precepts of religion were generally brought forward, yet by most preachers they were dressed out in puerile ornaments, very foreign from the spirit of divine wisdom, and thus were in a great measure deprived of their native force and beauty. Yet who can greatly wonder that those men should have amplified their discourses with adventitious matter, who had but very few examples of good speaking before them, and who brought to the sacred office heads full of philosophical terms and distinctions and quibbles, but deficient in those things which are of most use for moving the souls of men? We acknowledge that in the universities more time was spent in the study of polemic theology, and in stating and clearing the doctrines of theology with subtlety and art.

¹ No one will better illustrate these facts than Brucker, the man best informed on all these subjects, in his Historia Critica Philosophiæ.

than in explaining the Holy Scriptures, in unfolding the principles of morals, in imbu- ing the mind with pious emotions, and in other things necessary in a minister of religion. Yet this fault I think will be censured with less severity by one who has learned, from the history of those times, with what zeal and subtlety numerous adversaries attacked the Lutheran cause, and to what dangers it was exposed from those adversaries, especially from the papists. When war rages on every side, the art of war and of defending one's country, it is well known, is commonly regarded as the most valuable of all arts. I wish they had shown more mildness towards great numbers who from excessive curiosity, from ignorance, or the ardour of their imaginations, fell into errors, yet did not disturb the public peace with their opinions. But from education and from their earliest impressions (which are well known to have boundless influence), our ancestors derived the sentiment, that corrupters of divine truth ought to be restrained. And the more simplicity and attachment to the divine glory they possessed, the more difficult was it for them to discard the maxim, transfused into their minds from the ecclesiastical law of the papists, that whoever is adjudged an enemy of God should be adjudged an enemy of his country.

14. In the form of church government, the mode of worship, and other external regulations of our church, little or no change was made in most places. Yet many and great changes would have been made, if the princes had deemed it for the public good to regulate ecclesiastical matters according to the prescriptions of certain great and excellent men, who near the close of the century, led on by Christian Thomasius, attempted a reformation of our system of ecclesiastical law. These famous jurists, in the first place, set up a new fundamental principle of church polity, namely, the supreme authority and power of the civil magistrate; and then, after establishing with great care and subtlety this basis, they founded upon it a great mass of precepts, which in the judgment of many were considered, and not without reason, as tending to this point, that the sovereign of a country is also sovereign of the religion of its citizens, or is their supreme pontiff; and that the ministers of religion are not to be accounted ambassadors of God, but vicegerents of the chief magistrates. They also weakened not a little the few remaining prerogatives and advantages which were left of the vast number formerly possessed by the clergy; and maintained, that many of the maxims and regulations of our church which had come down from our fathers, were relics of popish superstition. This afforded matter for long and pernicious feuds and contests between our theologians and our jurists. I leave others to inquire with what temper and designs and with what success, these contests were managed on both sides. It will be sufficient for us to observe, what is abundantly attested, that they diminished much in various places the respect for the clergy, the reverence for religion, and the security and prosperity of the Lutheran church. And hence most unfortunately, such is the state of things among us, that those of honourable birth, or who are distinguished for strength of genius, or for noble and ingenuous feelings, look upon the study of theology as beneath them, there being neither honour nor much emolument attached to it; and every day the number of wise and erudite theologians is becoming less. This is lamented by those who see in what a perilous state the Lutheran cause now is; and perhaps those who come after us will have cause to lament it still more.

15. With the names of celebrated men among the Lutherans, whose writings have promoted their own reputations and the interests of the church, we might fill up several pages. It will be sufficient for the young theologian to acquaint himself well with the merits and the labours of the following:—Ægidius and Nicholas Hunnius, Leonard Hutter, John and John Ernest Gerhard, George and Frederick Ulric Calixtus, the Mentzers, the Oleariuses, Frederick Baldwin, Albrecht Grauer, Matthias Hoe, the Carpzovs, John and Paul Tarnovius, John Affelmann, Eilh. Lubin, the Lysers, both the Michael Walthers, Joachim Hildebrand, John Val. Andreae, Solomon Glassius, Abraham Calovius, Theodore Hackspann, John Hulsemann, James Weller, the brothers Peter and John Musæus, John Conrad Dannhauer, John George Dorschæus, John Arndt, Martin Geyer, John Adam Schertzer, Balthazar and John Meisner, Augustus Pfeiffer, Henry and John Muller, Justus Christopher Schomer, Sebastian Schmidt, Christian Kortholt, the Osianders, Philip James Spener, Gebhard Theodore Meyer, Friedemann Bechmann, and others.¹

¹ For the lives and writings of these men, see besides the common writers of literary history, Witte, in his Memoria Theologorum, and his Diarium Biographicum; Rippling and Götz, in their Memoria Theologorum, and others. [The following brief notices are abridged from Schlegel and Von Einem:—Æg. Hunnius, born 1550, professor of theology at Marburg, 1576, and at Wittenberg, 1592, where he died, 1603, was a great

16. No violence was publicly offered to the fundamental articles of religion as professed by the Lutheran church, nor would any one easily have found toleration among the Lutheran doctors if he had ventured to forsake or to invalidate the doctrines clearly defined and explained in what are called the Symbolical books. But in more modern times, from various causes, the high authority once possessed by those rules of faith and doctrine has in many places been much weakened and diminished. And hence polemical divine. His Latin works, 5 vols. folio were printed 1607-1609. His son of the same name, superintendent at Altenburg, died 1642.—Nicholas Hunnius, professor at Wittenberg and superintendent at Lubec, died 1643. He wrote against the Catholics and a plan for terminating religious controversies.—Hutter died a professor at Wittenberg in 1616. He was a bitter polemic against the Reformed.—John Gerhard, born 1582, professor at Coburg and Jena, died 1637. His Loci Communes, enlarged by Cotta, are still in repute. His Confessio Catholica confutes the Catholic theology by the fathers, councils, and schoolmen.—His son, John Ernst Gerhard, professor of theology at Jena, died 1668, and his grandson of the same name, professor of theology at Giessen, died 1707.—George Calixtus, an elegant scholar and a learned theologian, professor at Helmstadt, died 1656. His conflicts are afterwards mentioned by Mosheim.—His son, George Ulric Calixtus trod in the steps of his father, but possessed less talent.—Balthazar Mentzer, the father, professor at Marburg and Giessen, famous as a violent polemic against the Reformed, died 1627.—Balthazar Mentzer, the son, was professor at Marburg, Rinteln, and Giessen, and died 1679.—John Olearius (or Oelshläger) who died 1623, professor of Hebrew at Helmstadt and superintendent at Halle, was the parent of the others.—John Godfr. Olearius, his son, succeeded his father at Halle.—John Olearius, the grandson of John, was professor of Greek at Leipsic, wrote De Stylo N. Test. and died 1713.—Godfrey Olearius, son of the last and great-grandson of the first John, was professor of theology at Leipsic, and died 1715.—Fred. Baldwin was professor of theology at Wittenberg, wrote a commentary on Paul's Epistles, Cases of Conscience, &c. and died 1627.—Grauer, professor at Jena, and general superintendent at Welm, an angry polemic and denominated the Shield and Sword of Lutheranism, died 1617.—Hoe was nobly born at Vienna, was a court preacher, and a strenuous adversary of the Reformed, and died in 1645. John Bened. Carpov, professor of theology at Leipsic, wrote Isagoge in Libros Symbol. and died 1637. His son, John Bened. Carpov, also professor of theology at Leipsic and famed for his Rabbinic learning, died 1693. His brother, Samuel Bened. Carpov, court preacher at Dresden, died 1707.—John Tarnovius, professor of theology at Rostock, a good interpreter, died 1623.—Paul Tarnovius, a kinsman of the former and a professor at Rostock, also a biblical interpreter, died in 1633.—Affelmann (or Von Affeln) was an acute but angry disputant, professor of theology at Rostock, and died 1621.—Lubin, professor first of poetry and then of theology at Rostock, was an elegant scholar and a good interpreter of Paul's epistles, died 1621.—Polycarp Lyser, professor of theology at Wittenberg, a zealous defender of Lutheranism, died 1610.—His son, Polycarp, professor of theology at Leipsic, also an acute polemic, died 1633.—The brother of the last, William Lyser, was professor of theology at Wittenberg, died in 1649.—Walther, the father, professor of theology at Helmstadt, and then general superintendent of East Friesland, died at Zelle, 1682.—Walther, the son, was professor of mathematics and then of theology at Wittenberg, and died 1692.—Hildebrand, professor of theology and ecclesiastical antiquities at Helmstadt, and then upper superintendent in Luneburg, died 1671.—J. V. Andreae, the son of John, and grandson of the famous chancellor James Andreae of Tubingen, sustained various offices, court preacher, consistorial counsellor, &c. He was a great satirical genius as well as profoundly learned, and was supposed to be the author of the Rosencrucian comedy, died 1654, aged 68.—Solomon Glass, author of Philologia Sacra, was born 1593, became professor of Hebrew and Greek, and then of theology at Jena, and lastly general superintendent at Gotha where he died 1656. He was very learned and pious.—Calovius, professor at Königsberg, rector at Dantzic, and professor of theology at Wittenberg died 1686, aged 74. He was a learned dogmatic theologian, and severe against dissentients from Lutheranism.—Hacksppann, a learned Orientalist, professor of the Oriental languages and then of theology at Altorf, died 1659, aged 52.—Hülsemann, a scholastic divine, was professor of theology, first at Wittenberg and then at Leipsic, where he died 1661, aged 59. He strenuously opposed all union with the Reformed.—Weller, author of a famous Greek Grammar, was a good teacher of the Oriental languages and theology at Wittenberg, and then court preacher at Dresden; died 1664, aged 62.—Peter Musæus, a learned and moderate man, professor of theology at Rinteln, Helmstadt, and Kiel, where he died 1674, aged 54.—John Musæus, a judicious divine, first a professor of history and poetry and then of theology at Jena, died 1681, aged 63. Both these brothers were liberal-minded men.—Dannhauer, a poet and professor of theology at Strasburg, died 1666, aged 63.—Dorscheus of Strasburg, a professor of theology there, and at Rostock, where he died in 1659, aged 62, was very learned.—Arndt, after various changes and persecutions, died general superintendent of Zelle, in 1621, aged 66, a very pious man, though mystical. (See above, p. 612, note 5).—Geyer, a preacher and professor at Leipsic and court preacher at Dresden, a devout man, a commentator on some books of the Old Testament, died 1680, aged 66.—Schertzer, professor of theology at Leipsic, a disciple of Hülsemann, author of a system of theology, died 1683, aged 55.—Balthazar Meisner of Dresden, professor of theology at Wittenberg, a modest and liberal-minded man, died 1626, aged 39.—John Meisner, professor of theology at Wittenberg, much opposed by Calovius for his liberal views, died 1681, aged 66.—Frëffter, a good Orientalist and expositor, author of Dubia Vexata and Critica Sacra, was professor of Oriental languages and of theology, first at Wittenberg and then at Leipsic, and superintendent at Lubec, where he died 1695, aged 58.—Henry Müller, a friend of Spener, preacher and professor at Rostock, known by his practical writings, died 1675, aged 44.—John Müller, a preacher at Hanburg, and bitter opposer of Henry Müller and Jacob Böhm, died 1672, aged 74.—Schöner of Lubec, professor of theology at Rostock, died 1693, aged 45, and was a man of general knowledge.—Schmidt, a native of Alsace and professor at Strasburg, was learned in the Oriental languages and distinguished as a biblical interpreter. His Latin translation of the Bible and commentaries on several books did him much credit; he died 1696, aged 79.—Kortholt was professor of theology at Rostock and then at Kiel, where he was vice-chancellor, and died 1694, aged 61. He advanced church history, and promoted piety and religious knowledge in the country around him.—Lucas Osiander, senior (son of Andrew Osiander, senior), was court preacher and consistorial counsellor at Stutgard, and employed in promoting the reception of the Formula of Concord. He abridged and continued the Magdeburg centuries, and died 1604, aged 73.—Andrew Osiander (son of the former) became chancellor at Tubingen, and died 1617, aged 55. He published a Latin Bible with notes.—Lucas Osiander, junior (son of Lucas Osiander, senior), professor of theology and chancellor at Tubingen, a violent polemic and particularly hostile to Menzer and Arndt, died 1638, aged 67.—John Adam Osiander (son of John Balthazar Osiander, superintendent of Valhingen), was court preacher at Stutgard, professor of Greek and then of theology, and finally chancellor at Tubingen, a polemic divine, died 1697, aged 75.—Philipp James Spener, of Upper Alsace, preacher at Strasburg, Frankfurt, and at the court of Dresden, and provost of Berlin, where he died 1705, aged 76. He was learned and eloquent and a great promoter of piety, and will be noticed hereafter.—Meyer, well read in ecclesiastical antiquities, was professor of theology at Helmstadt, where he died 1693. He wrote Commentarii de recondita Veteris Eccles. Theologia, and published Justell's Codex Canonum Ecclesie Universæ.—Bechmann was professor at Jena, and died in 1703.—Mur-arises the liberty, enjoyed by those who are not professed teachers in the church, of dissenting from the symbolical books, and of expressing that dissent at pleasure both orally and in their writings. Formerly, those who opposed any article of the public religion or disseminated new opinions among the people were judicially arraigned, and they could seldom escape without some loss of honour and emoluments, unless they would abjure their opinions. But no one feared anything of this kind, after the principle which the Arminians first zealously propagated had gradually made its way among the Lutheran churches in the latter part of the seventeenth century; namely, that every man is accountable to God only for his religious opinions, and that it is wrong for the state to punish any man for his erroneous faith, provided he does nothing to disturb the public tranquillity. It were to be wished that this liberty of opinion (which every one will approve in proportion to his equity and his confidence in his own virtue) had not degenerated into the unbridled licentiousness of treating everything sacred and salutary with utter contempt, and of attacking with amazing wantonness the honour both of religion and its ministers.

17. The study of the sacred Scriptures was never intermitted among the Lutherans, nor were they at any time without skilful interpreters of the Bible and trusty guides of those interpreters. To say nothing of Tarnovius, Gerhard, Hackspann, Calixtus, Erasmus Schmidt, and the many other famous expounders of the divine books, there was published, at the very time which some tax with the greatest neglect of this kind of studies, the immortal work of Solomon Glassius entitled Philologia Sacra, than which nothing can be a more useful help for understanding the language of the sacred Scriptures. Still it must be confessed that during a large part of the century, most of the doctors in the universities were more occupied in explaining and defending with subtlety the dogmas and tenets of the church, than in expounding that volume whence all solid knowledge of them must be derived. Yet if in this there was anything reprehensible, the subsequent theologians caused the interests of the Lutheran religion to derive little injury from it. For as soon as the commotions produced by the wars and controversies, particularly with the papists, had begun to subside, great numbers applied themselves to the exposition of the Scriptures, to which they were excited and quickened very much, if I do not mistake, by the industry of those Dutch theologians who followed after Coc-ceus. At the head of these later interpreters may be placed perhaps Sebastian Schmidt, whom no one has exceeded, at least in the number of his productions. Next to him, Abraham Calovius, Martin Geyer, Schomer, and some others, most deserve to be mentioned.¹ The Pietistic controversies, though otherwise most lamentable, were at last attended with this among other consequences, that greater numbers than before applied themselves to the careful reading of the Holy Scriptures and to meditation on their contents. The merits of these expositors, as is usual, were unequal. Some investigated merely the import of the words and the sense of the text. Others besides this encountered opponents, and either confuted their false expositions or applied the true interpretation to the subversion of their erroneous opinions. Others, after exhibiting briefly the sense of an [inspired] writer, applied it to morals and to instruction in Christian duty. Some are represented and perhaps not unjustly as having, by assiduously reading the books of the Cocceians, fallen into some of their faults, and as inconsiderately turning the sacred histories into allegories, by searching after recondite and remote senses rather than the obvious sense of the words.

18. The principal divines of this century at first presented the doctrines of religion derived from the Scriptures in a loose and unconnected form, after the manner of Melancthon—that is, arranged under general heads (Loci Communes); yet this did not prevent them from employing in the explanation and statement of particular doctrines the terms, distinctions, and definitions of the then reigning and admired Peripatetic philosophy. Afterwards, George Calixtus, who was himself addicted to the Aristotelian philosophy, first clothed theology in a philosophic dress; that is, reduced it to the form of a science or a system of truths; but he was censured by many, not so much for doing such a thing, as because he did not give to this most sacred science a suitable form. For he divided the whole science into three parts—the object, the subject, and the means; which, though accordant with the precepts of Aristotle, to whom he was exclusively attached, was in the opinion of some an unsuitable distribution.² A number of the best teachers however eagerly adopted that arrangement, and even in our time there are some who commend and practise it. Some arranged religious doctrines in a different manner, but they had not many imitators. Nevertheless, there were many respectable and pious men throughout the century, who were very much displeased at this mode of teaching theology philosophically, or of combining sacred truths with the dictates of philosophy. They earnestly desired to see all human subtilities and and sophistries laid aside, and theology exhibited just as God exhibits it in the Holy Scriptures; that is, in a simple, perspicuous, popular form, free and entirely liberated from any philosophical fetters. As the century drew to a close, these persons were gratified to some extent when Philip James Spener and not a few others, animated by his exhortations and example, began to treat religious subjects with more freedom and clearness, and when the Eclectics drove the Peripatetic philosophy from the schools. Spener could not indeed persuade all to follow his method, yet he influenced a great many. Nor can there be any doubt that, from this time onward, theology acquired a more noble and agreeable aspect. Polemic theology experienced much the same fortune as dogmatic. For it was for the most part destitute of all elegance and perspicuity so long as Aristotle had dominion in the theological schools; but after his banishment, it gradually received some degree of light and polish. Yet we must acknowledge with regret that the common faults of disputants were not effaced even after those times. For if we turn over the pages of the earlier or the later religious controversialists of this century, we find few whom we can truly pronounce desirous of nothing but the advancement of truth, or not deceived and led away by their passions.

¹ The reader may here consult Buddeus, Itagoge in Theologiam, lib. II. cap. viii. p. 1686, &c.

² This distribution into the object, subject, and means in theology, may be understood by considering what parts of theology he placed under each of these heads. Under the first, he considered man's supreme good, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection, the last judgment, eternal blessedness and damnation.

19. Our theologians were tardy in cultivating moral theology. If we except a few eminent men such as John Arndt and John Gerhard, and others who treated in a popular way of the adaptation of the soul to the true and internal worship of God and of the duties of men, there was not a single excellent and accurate writer on the science of morals in all the first part of the century. And hence those who laboured to elucidate what are called cases of conscience were much esteemed, although they could not avoid falling into very frequent mistakes, as the first and fundamental principles of morals were not yet accurately laid down. George Calixtus, whose merits are so great in regard to all other branches of theology, first separated the science of morals from that of dogmatics, and gave it the form of an independent science. He was not indeed allowed to complete the design, which all admired in its commencement; but his disciples applied the materials they got from him to construct, not unsuccessfully, a proper system of moral theology. Scarcely anything, in process of time, impeded their labours more than the Peripatetic dress with which Calixtus chose to invest also this part of divine truth. Hence the moderns have torn off this dress, and calling in the aid of the law of nature, which Puffendorf and others had purified and illustrated, and collating it carefully with the sacred Scriptures, have not only more clearly laid open the sources of Christian duties, and more correctly ascertained the import of the divine laws, but have digested and arranged this whole science in a much better manner.

20. During this entire century, the Lutheran church was greatly agitated, partly by controversies among the principal doctors, to the great injury of the whole community, and partly by the extravagant zeal and plans of certain persons, who disseminated new and strange opinions, uttered prophecies, and attempted to change all our doctrines and institutions. The controversies which drew the doctors into parties may be fitly divided into the greater and the less; the former such as disturbed the whole church, and the latter such as disquieted only some part of it. Of the first kind, there were two which occupied the greatest part of the century—the Syncretistic, which from the place whence it arose was called the Helmstadian controversy, and from the man chiefly concerned in it, the Calixtine controversy; and the Pietistic, which some call the Hallensian controversy, from the university with which it was waged. Both were occasioned by principles than which nothing is more holy and lovely; the former by the love of peace and Christian forbearance, so highly commended by our Saviour; and the latter by the desire of restoring and advancing fallen piety, which every good man admits should be among the first cares of a Christian teacher. Against these two great virtues, zeal for maintaining the truth and for preserving it from all mixture of error, which is likewise an excellent and very useful virtue, engaged in open war. For so fickle and deceitful is human nature, that from the best things as their source pernicious contentions may flow, if turbulent passions obtain possession of the mind.

Under the second, he considered the doctrines concerning God, creation, man's state of innocence and apostasy with its consequences. Under the third, he considered the doctrines concerning the grace of God, the merits of Christ, his person and offices, faith and justification, the word of God, the sacraments, conversion, good works, &c.—Mur.

21. George Calixtus of Sleswick, a theologian who had few equals in this century either for learning or genius, while teaching in that university which from its first establishment granted proper liberty of thought to its professors, early intimated that in his view there were some defects in the commonly received opinions of theologians. Afterwards he went farther, and showed in various ways that he had a strong desire, not so much to establish peace and harmony among dissentient Christians, as to diminish their anger and implacable hatred to each other. Nor did his colleagues differ much from him in this matter, which will the less surprise those who know that all who are created doctors of theology in the university of Helmstadt are accustomed to make oath, that they will endeavour, according to their ability, to reconcile and settle the controversies among Christians. The first avowed attack upon them was made in 1639 by Statius Buscher, a minister of St. Giles' church in Hanover, an indiscreet man of the Ramist school, and hostile to [the prevailing] philosophy; who was much displeased because Calixtus and his associates preferred the Peripatetic philosophy before that of the sect he had embraced. He made the attack in a very malignant book entitled, Crypto-Papismus Novæ Theologiæ Helmstadiensis,¹ in which he accused Calixtus especially of numerous errors. Though Buscher made some impression on the minds of individuals, he would perhaps have incurred the reproach of being a rash and unjust accuser, if he had only led Calixtus to be more cautious. But the latter, possessing a generous spirit which disdained all dissimulation, with his colleague, Conrad Horneius, not only persevered in confidently asserting and defending the things which Buscher had brought many to regard as novelties and dangerous, but likewise in the conference at Thorn in 1645, he incurred the indignation and enmity of the Saxon divines who were present. Frederick William, the elector of Brandenburg, had made him colleague and assistant to the divines whom he sent from Königsberg to that conference, and the Saxon deputies thought it shameful that a Lutheran divine should afford any aid to the Reformed. This first cause of offence at the conference was followed by others, which occasioned the Saxons to accuse Calixtus of being too friendly to the Reformed. The story is too long to be fully stated here. But after the conference broke up, the Saxon divines, John Hülsemann, James Weller, John Scharf, Abraham Calovius, and others, attacked Calixtus in their public writings, maintaining that he had apostatised from the Lutheran doctrines to the sentiments of the Reformed and the papists. These their attacks he repelled with great vigour and uncommon erudition, being profoundly versed in philosophy and all antiquity, until the year 1656, when he passed from these scenes of discord to heavenly rest.²

¹ Whoever wishes to know merely the series of events in this controversy, the titles of the books published, the doctrines which were controverted, and similar things, may find writers enough to consult; such as Walch, Introduction to the Controversies in Our Church (in German); Weismann [Historia Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 1194]; Arnold [Kirchen-und Ketzehistorie, part ii. book xvii. chap. xl. sec. i. &c.], and many others; but especially Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 121, where he treats largely of the life, fortunes, and writings of Calixtus. But whoever wishes to understand the internal character of this controversy, the causes of the several events, the characters of the disputants, the arguments on both sides—in short, the things which are of the highest importance in the controversy—will find no writer to whose fidelity he can safely trust. This history requires a man of candour, of extensive knowledge of the world, well furnished with documents which are in a great measure not yet published, and also not a novice in court policy. And I am not certain whether even in this age, if a man could be found competent to do it, all that is important to the history of this controversy could be published to the world without exciting odium and producing harm. [The translator (says Schlegel who was a pupil of Mosheim) may be allowed here to insert the judgment of Mosheim, which he brought forward in his lectures, in which he communicated with his hearers more freely than he usually does in his writings with his readers. Calixtus by his travels became acquainted with people of various creeds, and particularly with Roman Catholics and the Reformed; and by this intercourse he acquired a kind of moderation in his judgments respecting persons of other denominations. In particular, he had resided long in England, and contracted intimacy with several bishops. Here he imbibed the fundamental principles of the English Reformation, and his partiality for the ancient churches. And hence he assumed the consent of the church in the five first centuries, as a second source of a true knowledge of the Christian faith; and was of opinion that we had gone too far in the Reformation, and that we should have done better if we had regulated the church according to the pattern of the early churches. From this source afterwards followed all his peculiarities of sentiment. Hence his attachment to ecclesiastical antiquity, hence his desire for the union of all classes of Christians, hence his inclination towards the Romish church which cannot be denied, though he acknowledged and exposed numerous faults and abuses in that church. And hence also it arose that he had a particular respect for the English church as retaining more of the usages of the ancient church, and that many of his pupils went over, some to the Romish and others to the English church. Calixtus became renowned in early life. A young lord of Klenck had been prepossessed in favour of the Catholic religion by the Jesuit, Augustine Turrianus of Hildesheim. The mother, wishing to prevent his apostasy, invited Cornelius Martini, a professor at Helmstadt and the strongest metaphysician of his age, to come to her castle at Hildesheim and dispute with the Jesuit in the presence of her son. Martini denied himself this honour, and recommended to it his pupil, the young Calixtus. He on the first day drove the Jesuit into such straits

¹ That is, The Disguised Popery of the New Theology at Helmstadt.—Mur.

22. After the death of Calixtus and the decease of those also by whom he had been most opposed, the flames of this war raged that he could say nothing, and the next morning he secretly decamped. The history of this transaction may be found in the Summa Colloquii Hemelschenburgensis. This remarkable victory led the duke of Brunswick to raise him from a master in philosophy to the rank of professor in theology. While only a master, he had published fifteen Disputationes de Præcipuis Religionis Christianæ Capitulis, in which he intimated pretty clearly that he did not believe all that was generally believed in our church, and particularly he explained the doctrine of the transfer of attributes (communicatio idiomatum) differently from the common explanation. Likewise to his Epitoma Theologiae, published in 1619, Balthazar Menzer of Giessen and Henry Höpfner of Leipzig made many exceptions. For he mixed his scholastic philosophy with theology, and taught among other things that God was the accidental cause of sin—a proposition which was liable to be very ill interpreted, and which he afterwards recalled on account of its liability to misinterpretation. Thus he was involved in contentions from the commencement of his professorship; and they were increased in 1634, when he published the first part of his Epitome Theologiae Moralis, and subjected to it a Digression, De Nova Arte, in opposition to Barthold Nihusen. In particular, the Ramists were his mortal enemies because he was an Aristotelian. One of those Ramists, Statius Buscher (who had read lectures at Helmstadt, as a master before Calixtus did), being prompted to it by some enemies of Calixtus, published his Crypto-Papiamus Nona Theologiae Helmstedensis, to which Calixtus and Hornelius made answer. The honest Buscher was summoned before the consistory, but he chose not to appear personally, and defended himself in writing. He gave up his office, retired to Stade, where he died of grief in 1641. Thus this contest faded away. Buscher's accusations were ill founded, and his patrons were afraid to expose themselves. But four years after, a very different conflict arose which lasted as long as Calixtus lived. The king of Poland, Ladislaw IV. appointed the Charitable Conference (Colloquium Charitativum) at Thorn, in which all religious parties were to appear and confer together on religion and come to an agreement. To this conference, on the side of the Lutherans, some Saxon divines of Wittenberg especially were invited from Germany, for they were regarded as standing at the head of all the German theologians. The great elector of Brandenburg, prince Frederick William, invited Calixtus of Brunswick to accompany and assist the Königsberg divines; and Calixtus not only complied, but also committed the error of going previously to Berlin and thence travelling in company with the Reformed divines to Thorn, lodging in the same house, eating at the same table, and in general having the greatest familiarity with them. As the Königsberg divines had not yet arrived, and as Calixtus had consequently nothing to do in the Conference, the magistrates of Elbing and Thorn invited him to assist them, which he engaged to do. But the Saxon and Dantzic divines (among the latter of whom Calvius was the most violent) threw in their remonstrance, alleging that he could not be admitted as a speaker in behalf of the divines of these cities, because he belonged to a university which did not embrace the Formula of Concord, and because he had rendered himself suspected by his intimacy with the Reformed. This remonstrance induced the senate of Elbing to desist from the measure. Though Calixtus could not in this way be brought to take an active part, another occurrence afforded him something to do. The Polish Reformed and the Bohemian Brethren, when they saw that the Dantzic divines would not tolerate him among the Lutheran speakers, invited him to be their speaker which he consented to, yet with the restriction that he should maintain with them only the points on which Protestants were at issue with the Catholics. He afterwards printed some notes on the Creed which were laid before the Conference, in which he made it appear that he did not in all points agree with the Reformed. But all this was insufficient to quiet the suspicions against him. The rumour spread everywhere that Calixtus was an apostate. The disaffection towards him was increased, as the Polish Roman Catholic lords of Thorn far worse than before. The Saxons, and especially Calovius, continued most bitterly to insult the dead lion; nay, they proceeded to pave the way imprudently (as many of the best men, who were by no means Calixtinians, believed), for an open schism in the Lutheran church. For a new book was drawn up, entitled Renewed Consent to the True Lutheran Faith (Consensus Repetitius Fidei Vere Lutheranae); which was to be added to those we call Symbolical books and to be consented to under oath by all public teachers, and by which Calixtus with his followers and friends was pronounced unworthy of the Lutheran community, and therefore also of the benefits of the peace granted to the Lutherans. The memory or reputation of Calixtus was modestly defended by Gerhard Titius, Joachim Hildebrand, and other theologians treated him with more attention than they did the other divines, and associated more frequently with him. If Calixtus had possessed more prudence and foresight and his opposers more candour and justice, things would not have come to such a pass. While these events were going on, the Königsberg divines arrived. But now a contest arose between them and the divines of Dantzic respecting precedence. The former claimed precedence as being envoys of the great electoral prince, and the latter because they had previously arrived and had taken their seats. In such contests the whole three months allotted to the Conference passed away, and the deputies returned home having accomplished nothing. The contest with Calixtus now became warm. The Saxon divines were obliged to justify their conduct towards him at the Conference; and they found it necessary to charge him with being a corrupter of religion, a concealed Calvinist, and a wicked heretic. Calixtus himself gave occasion for increasing the strife by a disputation on the mystery of the Trinity which Dr. Jo. Laternmann wrote and defended under him in 1645, in which it was maintained that the doctrine of the Trinity was not made known to the fathers under the Old Testament, and that it was a created angel and not the Son of God who appeared to the patriarchs. On this point he was assailed, although he had so explained himself as ought to have given satisfaction. Our whole church was, by this contest, wrought into a flame which it was difficult to extinguish. Solomon Glassius, by order of Ernesti, duke of Gotha, published his Thoughts, which aimed to restore peace and in many points did justice to Calixtus.—But the effort was fruitless. Duke Ernesti went farther; he wrote to the electoral court of Saxony and to the court of Brunswick, and urged them to lend their aid to allay these angry disputes. But the minds of men were so embittered that they could not think of peace. At length, as the Saxon divines, and particularly Calovius (who had previously been invited to Wittenberg) urged the setting forth a new symbolical book, the princes of electoral Saxony so vividly depicted the mischiefs which would thence result to our church, that in view of these representations the proposed introduction of what was called the Consensus Repetitius was laid aside. Yet the conflicts went on, and were conducted with so much bitterness and acrimony that one party commenced an action against the other for abuse, and Calovius wrote his bitter Historia Syncretistica, which was confiscated by the elector of Saxony. Finally, as the Pietistic contest commenced soon after this, so the Calixtine contest was dropped. For the Wittenbergers engaged in a new controversy with Spener, and as they were afraid that the Calixtians would all join with Spener, so they made a compromise with the divines of Helmstadt.—Schl. (See a brief notice of Calixtus in Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 67, &c. and in Tabaraud, Hist. des Projets pour la Réunion des Commun. Chrét. p. 323, &c.—R.)

of a temperate character. And the most discerning men demonstrated that the Consensus Repetitus would be a firebrand, the cause of perpetual dissension, and ruinous to the Lutheran cause, and by their efforts it was prevented from ever obtaining the least authority. It was opposed, besides others of less note, by Frederick Ulrich Calixtus, the son of George, a man not unlearned yet much inferior to his father in genius, taste, and erudition. In favour of the Consensus, appeared and fought especially Abraham Calovius and Ægidius Strauchius. An immense number of books and disputes were produced by the zeal of the two parties, in which, alas! are so many invectives, reproaches, and personal abuses, as to make it manifest that the disputants contended less for the cause of truth and of Christ Jesus than for personal glory and revenge. After long-continued altercation, the enfeebled age of those who led the two parties, the abolition of the Consensus Repetitus (which would have afforded alimnt for ruinous war), the rise of new controversies among us, with some other causes, near the end of the century silently put an end to the contest.

23. The principal of all the charges so odiously alleged against Calixtus was, his zeal for bringing the three larger communities of European Christians, not to unite together and become one body as his opposers interpreted him to mean, but to abstain from their mutual hatred and enmity, and to cultivate mutual love and good-will. And this it was which was generally condemned under the name of Syncretism.¹ The opinions which, in addition to this purpose, were charged upon him as faults and amplified according to the custom of prosecutors, respected the less clear knowledge of the doctrine of the Trinity in the time of the Old Testament, the necessity of good works to salvation, God's being accidentally the cause of sin, the visible appearances of the Son of God under the ancient dispensation, and some few others, which were such, that if he really held them, they were of no great consequence, according to the acknowledgment of those whom no one will pronounce unfit judges of such questions; nor did they vitiate the marrow (so to speak) of divine truth. But in order to recommend that harmony among disagreeing Christians which he had in view, this excellent man had to assume two things, which appeared even worse than the design which they were intended to subserve. The first was, that the groundwork of Christianity, or those first and elementary principles from which all the other truths flow, remained sound and uncontaminated in all the three denominations of Christians. This groundwork, he supposed, was contained in that ancient formula called the Apostles' Creed. The second assumption was, that whatever is supported by the constant and uniform consent and authority of the ancient Christian fathers, who were ornaments to the first five centuries, must be regarded as equally true and certain with what we find recorded in the Holy Scriptures. The first of these was the pillar which sustained the whole project he had in view; the second was of use to excuse certain papal institutions and opinions which were very dissension between us and the papists; and I wish he had omitted this altogether, or had expressed it in more fit and suitable terms. But he most constantly maintained that, upon the foundation of religion, the pontiffs and their adherents had based very many things which no wise and good man should receive. And how much this should deduct from the odium and turpitude of that opinion, is manifest. I omit other aspersions of the memory of this great man, by those who think they ought to listen rather to his accusers than to the accused himself. What then, you will say, did he mean? First, this—that if it could be that the Romish church should be recovered to the state in which it was in the first five centuries after Christ, the Protestants could then have no just grounds for refusing communion with it; and secondly, this—that among the adherents to the Roman pontiff, though as a body they were polluted with many and intolerable errors, those individuals should not be excluded from all hope of salvation nor be ranked with heretics, who honestly have imbibed what their fathers and their teachers have taught them, and who are prevented from seeing the truth either in consequence of their ignorance or their education or by their early prepossessions, provided they believe with simplicity whatever is contained in the Apostles' Creed, and study to conform their lives to the precepts of Christ. As I have already said, I do not stand forth as the patron of these opinions, they have patrons enough at the present day; but this I suppose all will concede, that these views are much more tolerable than those with which he is commonly charged.

¹ I do not espouse the cause of Calixtus, nor maintain that all he wrote and taught was faultless; but the love of truth admonishes me to say that this excellent man fell into the hands of bad interpreters, and that even those who thought they understood his meaning better than others, erred egregiously. He is commonly represented as advising to a union with the Romish pontiff and his adherents, but entirely without grounds. For he declared publicly that with the Romish church, such as it now is, we cannot possibly associate and be in harmony; and that if formerly there was any hope of healing the breach, that hope was wholly extinguished and annihilated by the denunciations of the council of Trent. He is said also to have approved or excused all the errors and superstitions which deform the Romish church, or at least very many of them. But here, not only the numerous writings in which he refutes the doctrines and opinions of the papists, but also the papists themselves, clear him of fault; for they acknowledge that Calixtus assailed their church more learnedly and ingeniously than all the other Protestant doctors. To mention no other, hear Bossuet, who in his Traité de la Communion sous les deux Espèces, part i. sec. ii. p. 12, writes thus of him: "Le fameux George Calixte, le plus habile des Luthériens de notre tems, qui a écrit le plus doctement contre nous." Calixtus taught indeed that as to the foundation of the faith, there was no disagreeable to Lutherans, and to establish harmony among disagreeing Christians.

24. These commotions and contests involved, though in different ways, the divines of Rinteln, Königsberg, and Jena, to say nothing of some others. The divines of Rinteln, especially John Henichius and Peter Musæus, gave proof by many things, but most clearly in the conference at Cassel already mentioned, that they approved of the plan of Calixtus for terminating the contests among Christians, and especially among Protestants. And hence they too were attacked in various publications by the Saxon divines and those who sided with them.¹ At Königsberg, Christian Dreyer, a very learned man, John Latermann and Michael Behm, all pupils of Calixtus, signified pretty clearly that they favoured the opinions of their instructor. Against them hostility was declared, not only by their colleagues, John Behm and Celestine Mis lenta, but likewise by the whole body of ministers at Königsberg. And the contest was protracted many years, in such a manner as brought honour to neither party in the view of posterity. This intestine war being extinguished, partly by the authority of the supreme magistrate and partly by the death of Behm and Mis lenta, Dreyer and his associates had to sustain another and a more permanent one with those foreign divines who viewed the Calixtine opinions as pernicious, and the defenders of them as enemies to the church; nor can this foreign contest be commended either for its equity or its moderation.²

25. In these commotions, the divines of Jena manifested uncommon prudence and moderation. For while they ingenuously confessed that all the opinions of Calixtus could not easily be admitted and tolerated without injury to the truth, they judged that most of his doctrines were not so very bad as the Saxons supposed them to be, and that several of them might be tolerated without the least hazard. Solomon Glas sius, a man of great mildness, by order of Ernesti the Pious, duke of Saxe-Gotha, most equitably examined the importance of the several controverted points in a work expressly on the subject.³ John Musæus, a man of superior learning and uncommon acuteness, first determined that it was allowable to say, with Calixtus and Horneius, that in a certain sense good works are necessary to salvation; afterwards he maintained among his intimate friends, that little or no importance was attached to some of the other questions. These persons, therefore, the Calixtine divines would not perhaps have refused as arbiters. But this moderation was so offensive to the Saxon divines, that they arraigned the school of Jena on suspicion of many errors, and declared that John Musæus in particular had departed in not a few things from the orthodox faith.⁴

26. These contests were succeeded and extinguished by what are called the Pietistic controversies. These originated from those who, undoubtedly with the best intentions, undertook to aid the cause of languishing piety, and to cure the faults both of the public teachers and of the multitude. But, as often happens, these contests were extended and aggravated by various sorts of persons, whose ill-informed understanding or heated imagination or some wrong bias of mind, led them to excite horrible commotions in one place and another, by their singular opinions, their pretended visions, their harsh and unintelligible rules for Christian conduct, and their very imprudent clamours about a total change of the forms and regulations of the church. The minds of slumbering Christians and also of those who bemoaned in secret the progress of irreligion, were first aroused by Philip James Spener, an excellent minister and very highly esteemed both for his great piety and his extensive learning, when he set up private meetings at Frankfort, for the purpose of exhorting and training the people to piety; and afterwards when he set forth in a special treatise his Pious Desires (Pia Desideria), that is, his views of the evils existing in our church and their remedies. Both met the approbation of very many who had good and upright dispositions. But as many of them did not apply these remedies for diseased souls with sufficient caution and skill, and as those religious meetings (or Colleges of Piety as they were denominated in terms borrowed from the Dutch), enkindled in the minds of the multitude in several

¹ See Calovius, Historia Syncretistica, p. 618, &c.; Walch, Introduction to the Controversies in the Lutheran Church [in German], vol. i. p. 286, &c.

² Hardknock's Preussische Kirchenhistorie, book ii. chap. x. p. 602, &c. and others; Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 150, &c. The Acts and Documents are in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1740, p. 144, A.D. 1742, p. 29, A.D. 1745, p. 91, and elsewhere.

³ This judgment, drawn up in German, was first published after the death of Glas sius in 1662; and again, a few years ago at Jena, in 8vo. It is an example of theological moderation, and most worthy of an attentive perusal.

⁴ With what faults the theologians of Jena and especially Musæus were charged, may be best learned from the grave and solid work of Musæus himself, entitled, Der Jenischen Theologen ausführliche Erklärung über drey und neunzig verneymte Religionsfragen, Jena, 1677 and 1704, 4to. Add Walch's Introduction to the Controversies in the Lutheran church, [in German], vol. i. p. 405, &c.

places a wild and enthusiastic spirit, rather than true love to God, several complaints were soon heard, that under the pretence of aiding and advancing piety, solid religious knowledge was neglected, and seditious and ill-balanced minds were unduly excited.¹

1 On these controversies, it is better to go back to the first causes. The long Thirty Years' War produced throughout the whole Lutheran church a very great prostration of order, neglect of discipline, and profligacy; and the preachers were incompetent to meet this disordered state of things, which continued to exist after the return of peace. Some preachers were wholly unfit for it; for the people had to choose such preachers as they could get, and among these, many were of indifferent talents and acquisitions. Others had no lack of native talent, but they had been ill instructed. For education was very differently conducted in the higher schools then, from what it is now. The chief science then taught was the dry and cloudy Aristotelian metaphysics, with which were connected scholastic dogmatics and polemics. Thus our theology was very dark and intricate, and such as was unfit for the pulpit and for common life; the heads of the preachers were full of technical terms and distinctions, and no one understood how to make the truths of Christianity intelligible to the common people. Besides, systematic and polemic theology were studied, but moral theology and biblical interpretation were almost wholly laid aside. Of course the preaching was very poor, as is manifest from the postills of those times. The clergy preached from the lectures in the schools, and therefore explained and proved the doctrines of faith artificially, which the people could not understand; or they ornamented their sermons with quotations from the fathers and from the heathen philosophers. They confuted errors and heresies, the very names of which frequently were unknown to their hearers; but they said little or nothing that was calculated to amend the hearts of their audience; and they could say the less on such subjects, as they themselves often possessed unsanctified minds or hearts in which pride, contentiousness, obstinacy, and a persecuting spirit predominated. Other clergymen who were competent to instruct the people in true godliness, had not power to correct the disorders which had broken in, because the bad habits had become too deeply rooted and the evil too inveterate. Hence there were in our church various devout and upright persons, who sighed over this state of the church, and who wished to see godliness more cultivated, and the mode of teaching both in the schools and from the pulpit reformed. Among these persons, the first and most famous was Spener. He must be ranked among the most learned and the most devout ministers of our church; and together with most of the branches of theological science, he was well versed in history and the auxiliary sciences, and had successively as a preacher at Strasburg, an elder at Frankfurt, and first court preacher at Dresden, obtained in all these offices the reputation of a discreet, modest, and peaceable theologian. At Dresden he fell under the displeasure of the electoral prince, John George IV. who was much addicted to drunkenness, and to whom Spener, who was his confessor, as he was going to confession addressed a very respectful letter, containing an earnest dissuasive from this bad habit. Spener next went to Berlin, and his migrations spread wider the Pietistic controversy. If any things are censurable in Spener, they are principally two things:—First, he was not much of a philosopher, at least theoretically; and it is not much to be wondered at that he should have little relish for the dry philosophy of those times. Besides, if he had possessed a taste for it, he would not have accomplished what he did accomplish. Still this deficiency led him sometimes to reason inconclusively, and also not to see clearly the consequences of his propositions. Secondly, he was by nature too compliant and yielding. He could not say a hard thing to any man; and when he saw in a person any marks of piety, he at once recognised him as a brother, although he might hold erroneous doctrines. And this caused him much trouble, and led him to be often deceived by hypocrites.

27. These first commotions would undoubtedly have gradually subsided, if still more violent ones had not supervened in 1689 at Leipsic. Certain pious and learned men, especially Augustus Hermann Francke,

This was manifestly a consequence of his good-natured character, which judged other men by himself; yet in some measure it obscured the greatness of his talents. Still, this weakness will hinder no impartial man from acknowledging that Spener was really a great man, to whom we stand indebted for the improvement of our mode of preaching, for more freedom in the manner of handling theological subjects, for the introduction of toleration towards other religious sects, and towards individuals who deviate from the common creed, and for the advancement of true godliness in our church. This last object he endeavoured to effect especially by his Colleges of Piety, which he set up by the advice of some friends at Frankfurt in 1670, first in his own house and afterwards also in the church; partly to produce more cordial friendship among those who were seeking to edify their souls, and partly to render the public preaching of God's word more profitable, by explaining the sermons delivered, by catechising, by lectures on the Holy Scriptures, with prayer and singing. The appellation, Colleges of Piety, was derived from Holland, where there is a party who, from their meetings for worship which they call Collegia, are denominated Collegiants. (See below, chap. vii. sec. 1.) From them the name was derived, though Spener's meetings had no resemblance to the institutions of the Dutch Collegiants. To the establishment of the meetings, must be added a circumstance which caused Spener much trouble. When Arndt's Postills were to be republished in 1675, Spener composed a new preface to them; in which, together with his favourite doctrines of better times to come, the previous general conversion of the Jews, and the great downfall of popery, he also described the defects in our own church and proposed some means for their remedy. Among these were, an improved mode of teaching in the higher schools, the better instruction of youth, the dispensing with metaphysics, and a zealous application to biblical interpretation and practical theology. This preface was afterwards printed separately in 1678, and entitled Pia Desideria. [The whole title of the book which was written in German was, Pia Desideria, or Earnest Desires for the Godly Improvement of the True Evangelical Church, with some Christian Proposals for that Object.—Mur.] It was well received by the majority, and was praised even by some who afterwards became its enemies. But after a while propositions were drawn from it which were charged upon him as errors. The first attack was made by Dilfeld, a deacon at Nordhausen, who assailed the position that a true theologian must be a regenerate man. Greater disturbances arose from the meetings. Many imitated them, but they did not possess Spener's prudence. In some there was no preacher to regulate the meeting, and there all sorts of irregularity took place. In others, every one was allowed to speak; and of course speeches were often made which contravened the standard evangelical doctrines, and ran into enthusiasm; and new visionaries and enthusiasts actually connected themselves with the followers of Spener. In small villages they went on tolerably well; but in larger places, as Hamburg for example, there were frequent commotions. And there in particular, John Fred. Mayer, a Hamburg doctor, distinguished himself in a very offensive manner, by his carnal zeal against Spener's brother-in-law, John Henry Horbius. See Köhler's Hist. Münzbelustigungen, vol. xvii. p. 363, &c. At Erfurth, Dautzic, Wolfenbüttel, Gotha, and even at Halle in Saxony, there were great commotions, which the magistrates had to still. Spener himself, when he saw the disorders which arose from these meetings, suppressed those he had set up. Others followed his example. But in many places the people would not give them up, while yet they did not exercise sufficient prudence. The people frequently began to forsake the public worship and to run only to the meetings; and the blame was cast upon Spener who was entirely innocent in this matter, and who by his preaching and his publications explicitly opposed this wrong conduct.—Schä.

John Casper Schade, and Paul Antony, who were disciples and friends of Spener, then sustaining the office of first preacher at the Saxon court, and who were teachers of philosophy, supposed that candidates for the sacred office might be and ought to be better trained for their employment than the practice of the universities allowed, and therefore they undertook to expound in the vernacular language certain books of the Holy Bible, in such a manner as at the same time to infuse a spirit of solid piety into the minds of their hearers. This new and singular course allured great numbers to their lectures, many of whom exhibited the benefits they derived from these exercises, in lives and conduct very remote from the vicious habits of that age. Whether this first fervour of both the teachers and the learners, laudable and excellent in itself, was always kept within due bounds, it is not easy for any one to say; but this is certain, that many, and these also men of great authority, maintain that it was not; and public fame reports that some things were brought forward and transacted in those Biblical Colleges, as they were called, which were in themselves indeed easy to be excused and borne with, if referred to moderate and candid judges, yet not a little opposed to common usage and ordinary prudence. When great discussion arose and the matter was brought to a judicial investigation, the learned men above named were pronounced innocent or not guilty of the errors alleged against them; yet they were ordered to desist from the labours which they had commenced. In these commotions the invidious name of Pietists was first heard of, or at least first publicly used. It was first imposed by some light-minded persons on those who attended these Biblical Colleges, and whose lives accorded with the precepts there inculcated; afterwards it was extended to all those who were supposed either to profess too rigid and austere principles of morals, or neglecting doctrinal truth to refer all religion to mere piety. But as it is apt to be the fortune of names which designate particular sects, this name was not unfrequently applied in familiar discourse to the very best of men, to those who were as careful to advance doctrinal truth as piety; and on the other hand, it was very often applied to those who might more correctly be denominated the flagitious, the delirious, and fanatical.¹

28. From Leipsic this controversy spread with incredible rapidity throughout Lu-how to discharge profitably the duties of preachers. Some of these went to Leipsic to teach theology there, in accordance with Spener's directions. Among these were Augustus Hermann Francke, and Paul Antony, both professors afterwards at Halle, John Casper Schade, afterwards a famous preacher at Berlin, and Hermann van der Hart, afterwards professor at Helmstadt. These commenced the Biblical Lectures. In these lectures there was something new, for they were given in German, Luther's translation was here and there amended, and the explanation of the Holy Scriptures was followed by religious exhortations. Concerning these Biblical Lectures, especially as the religious lectures of some of the professors were now more thinly attended, all sorts of rumours soon spread abroad, some of which were groundless and others perhaps had some foundation. It was said that not only students, but also labouring men and women were admitted to them; and that every one present was allowed to teach and to explain the Scriptures. Those who attended these lectures changed their manners and their dress, refrained from the customary amusements, and obtained the name of Pietists, (to which a severe funeral discourse of Carpov at the interment of a hearer of Francke, and the funeral Ode of Lic. Feller on the same occasion wherein the import of the word and the characteristics of a Pietist were explained, are supposed principally to have contributed). In the year 1689, the court of Dresden appointed a commission to investigate this affair; but the accused masters (especially Francke) obtained the famous Christian Thomasius for their counsellor, who defended them in a published judicial argument, and showed palpably the nullity of the criminal process commenced against them; and they were acquitted of all criminality, though at the same time their biblical lectures were prohibited. But the thing ran like lightning from Leipsic through the whole church. All who loved holiness must have also such Collegia [or Lectures; for the Germans use the word Collegia in Latin and Collegien in German, both for the lectures of professors in a university and for associate bodies of learned men, so that Collegia Biblica may here be best translated Biblical Lectures.—Mur.] Thus the learned and the unlearned held meetings, which were called seasons for prayer and for devotion. Into these meetings, fantastical persons and enthusiasts insinuated themselves and talked of the millennial kingdom and the downfall of Babylon, railed against the clergy, and brought forward prophecies, dreams, and visions. Hence there arose in almost all places Pietistic commotions, which the magistrates endeavoured to still by severe laws. During those transactions, Spener was called from Dresden to Berlin; and Thomasius, of whom the Leipsic divines complained as being a heretic and a teacher of error, was obliged to flee to Halle. He it was who projected the establishment of the university of Halle, and Spener supported him. The university was established, and the very masters who had held the biblical lectures at Leipsic were in part appointed the professors of theology in this new university. These commenced reading according to Spener's views, and abolished the old scholastic method of teaching. They spoke disparagingly of philosophy, and said that polemics made the people too disputations, that the greatest heretic was the old Adam, and that he especially must be combated. In place of polemic theology, they recommended mystic; and nearly all the mystical writings of the French and Italians were translated and printed at the Orphan House in Halle. Persons who on account of their peculiar opinions were not tolerated in other places, were received and provided for at Halle. While these things were going forward, the divines of Wittenberg, (for we pass over the attack of the Leipsic divines), in the year 1695 brought a formal accusation against Spener as a teacher of error, and against this attack Spener defended himself energetically. It is certain that the court of Dresden, in whose eye the university of Halle was a thorn, looked upon this attack with pleasure. From this time onward, our divines were divided into the Orthodox and the Spenerian. The theologians of Halle joined the party of their teachers, and thence arose a disquietude which scarcely has a parallel.—Schl.

¹ When Spener was called from Frankfurt to Dresden, he had constantly with him a number of theological students, some of whom lodged in his house and others boarded at his table, and whom he instructed

theran Germany, nay, through our whole church. For from this time onward, everywhere in cities, villages, and hamlets, people suddenly started up of all orders and classes, learned and illiterate, males and females, who pretended to be called by some divine impulse to eradicate wickedness, to encourage and to propagate neglected piety, to regulate and govern the church of Christ more wisely; and who showed partly by oral declarations, partly by their writings, and partly by their institutions, what should be done in order to effect these great objects. Nearly all who were animated with this zeal agreed that there was no more powerful and salutary means for imbuing the people with a thorough knowledge of divine things and with the love of holiness, than those private discussions and meetings which they understood were first instituted by Spener and were afterwards held at Leipsic. Meetings therefore of this kind but of a different character, some better and others worse regulated, were opened in numerous places. These unusual and unexpected movements gave the more trouble and perplexity to those who had the oversight of the church and the state; because those upright and well-meaning persons concerned in these meetings were joined by many unsteady and rash individuals, who proclaimed the impending downfall of Babel (so they chose to call the Lutheran church), alarmed and agitated the populace by fictitious visions and divine impulses, arrogated to themselves the authority of prophets of God, and not only obscured religious subjects by a gloomy jargon of I know not whose coinage, but also recalled upon the stage opinions long since condemned; asserted that the reign of a thousand years, mentioned by St. John, was at hand; and in short plotted the overthrow of our best institutions, and demanded that the privilege of teaching should be granted indiscriminately to all. Hence the Lutheran church was miserably rent into parties, to the joy of the papists; the most violent contests everywhere arose; those who disagreed more perhaps in terms and in external and indifferent things than on doctrines of high moment, were arrayed against each other; and finally, in most provinces severe laws were enacted against those denominated Pietists.⁹

29. These restorers of piety were of two classes. Some proposed to advance the cause, and yet leave in full force both the creed of the church as contained in our public formulas, and also its discipline and form of government. But others judged that holiness could not possibly flourish among us, unless both the received doctrines were modified and the whole internal organization and the customs of our church were changed. Philip James Spener who removed from Dresden to Berlin in 1691, is justly considered as standing at the head of the former class. With him agreed especially the theologians of the new university at Halle, among whom were Augustus Hermann Francke and Paul Antony, who had previously fallen under suspicion at Leipsic. The object of this class no one much censured, nor could any one censure it unless he wished to appear a bad man; yet many persons, and especially the theological faculty at Wittenberg, were of opinion that in the prosecution of this object some principles were adopted and plans formed, which were injurious to the truth and adverse to the interests of the church. And this belief led them publicly to accuse of many false and dangerous opinions, first, Spener in the year 1695, and afterwards his associates and friends who defended the reputation of this great man. The vestiges of these contests are still so recent that whoever is disposed may easily learn with what degree of good faith, modesty, and equity they were conducted on both sides.

30. The subject matter of these controversies was manifold, and therefore it cannot be reduced to one grand point or be comprehended under one term. Yet if we consider the aims of those from whom they originated, the principal questions may be brought under certain heads. Those who laboured to advance the cause of piety, in the first place were of opinion, that the most strenuous opposers of their object were the very persons whose office it was to promote piety, namely, the teachers and ministers of the church. Hence they would commence with them, and would make it their especial care that none might become pastors of Christian congregations who were various. It is therefore to be wished that some wise considerate, and impartial persons, well acquainted with human nature and civil affairs and well provided with the necessary documents, would undertake the composition of such a history. If certain persons were to collect from the public records and from various private papers the transactions in particular districts, and then deliver all these over to an individual who should arrange, combine, and impart strength to the whole, the business would thus perhaps be accomplished in the best manner it can be. Such a history written with moderation and discretion, would be exceedingly useful in very many ways.

1 For the illustration of these facts, in place of all others may be consulted Walch, Introduction to the Controversies in the Lutheran Church [in German], vols. ii. and iii. He concisely states the various acts of this tragedy, enumerates the principal disputes subjoining his own opinion, and everywhere mentions the authorities. A full and complete history hardly any one man could compose, the transactions were so numerous and not properly educated and also sanctified or full of divine love. For this purpose, I. They recommended the reformation of the theological schools. They would have the technical theology of the age, which embraced certain precise and minute questions and was wrapped up in unusual phraseology, to be laid aside; the controversies with other sects to be indeed not wholly neglected, yet less attended to; and the combination and intermixture of philosophy and human wisdom with the truths of revelation to be wholly abolished. On the other hand, they thought that the young men designed for the ministry should be led to read and meditate upon the Holy Scriptures; that a simple knowledge of the Christian religion, derived principally from the sacred volume, should be instilled into them; and that their whole education should be directed more to practical utility and the edification of Christians, and not so much for display and personal glory. As some of them perhaps disputed on these subjects without sufficient precision and prudence, a suspicion arose with many that these patrons of piety despised philosophy and the other branches of learning altogether, that they rejected all solid knowledge in theology, that they disapproved of zeal in the defence of the truth against its corrupters, and that they made theological learning to consist in a crude and vague power of declaiming about morals and practical duties. And hence arose the contests respecting the value of philosophy and human science in religion, the dignity and utility of what is called systematic theology, the necessity of controversial theology, the value of mystical theology, the best method of instructing the people, and other similar questions. II. They taught that equal solicitude should be shown that the future teachers in the churches might consecrate their hearts to God and be living examples of piety, as that they might carry away from the universities minds well fraught with useful knowledge. From this opinion, to which all good men readily assented, originated not only certain regulations suited to restrain the passions of studious youth and to awaken in them holy emotions and resolutions, but likewise that doctrine which produced so much controversy,—namely, that no one can teach others to be pious or guide them to salvation, unless he is himself pious and a friend to God. Many supposed that this doctrine both derogated from the efficacy of God's Word, which cannot be frustrated by the imperfections of its ministers, and also led to the long-exploded errors of the Donatists, especially as it was not stated with equal caution and prudence by all. And here commenced those long and difficult controversies which are not yet terminated, such as—Whether the knowledge of religion which a wicked man may acquire, can be called theology? Whether a vicious man can have a true knowledge of religion? How far may the ministrations of an irreligious minister be efficacious and salutary? Whether illumination is ever given to a bad man whose heart is averse from God? and the like.

31. These restorers of fallen piety, to render the people more obedient to their pious and properly educated teachers and more resolute in opposing their own innate depravity, deemed it necessary I. To suppress certain common expressions in the public instruction which the depravity of men leads them not unfrequently to construe in a way to favour wickedness. Such were the following—that no person can attain in the present life that perfection which the law of God demands, that good works are not necessary to salvation, that in the act of justification faith only is concerned and not also good works. But very many were afraid, if these barriers were removed, the truth would be corrupted or at least would be exposed naked and defenceless to its enemies. II. That stricter rules of conduct than are generally observed should be inculcated; and that many things which foster the internal diseases of the mind, such as dancing, pantomimes, jocular discourse, plays, dramatic exhibitions, the reading of ludicrous books, and certain kinds of amusements, should be removed from the class of indifferent things which are either good or bad according to the spirit and temper of those who engage in them, and should be classed among sinful and unlawful things. But many thought this morality too rigorous. Hence that old controversy of the schools was revived, whether there are certain actions which are neither good nor evil but indifferent, or whether everything men do is either sinful or holy. And on each of the amusements enumerated there were frequent and very warm debates, which were not always conducted with precision, temperance, and gravity. III. That in addition to the public assemblies for religious worship, there should be frequent private meetings for prayer and other religious exercises. But very many judged and experience confirmed the opinion, that these Colleges of Piety, as they were called, were attended with more danger than profit. The minor contests respecting certain terms or plaus and which did not originate from these sources, need not be mentioned.¹ But it is important to add that the indulgence of those who were so earnest to promote piety towards certain persons who were not perhaps bad men, but who either had feeble and uncultivated intellects or were chargeable with no slight errors, exceedingly displeased many of the opposite party, and afforded them no little ground for suspicion that they set a lower value upon truth and the theology contained in the symbolical books than upon practical holiness. But among so great a multitude of combatants, and these too men of various classes and tempers, it is not strange that there should have been many indiscreet persons, some over zealous and others leaning towards the opposite faults to those which they wished to avoid.

32. The other class of Pietists, or those who laboured to promote piety in a way which would lead to a change in the established doctrines of the Lutheran community, and to a modification of the whole form and constitution of the church, were men of various characters. Some of them destitute of a sound understanding, were not so much errorists as men whose reason and judgment were impaired; others modified the fictions which they either derived from the works of others or invented themselves, with some portion of sound doctrine. We shall mention only some of the better sort of them, and those who acquired a high reputation. Godfrey Arnold of Anneberg in Saxony, a man of much reading, of a good understanding, and of natural eloquence, disturbed the close of the century by various writings, but especially by his history of the church and of heresies, which certainly without just grounds he entitled an impartial history.² By nature melancholy, gloomy, and austere, he applied himself to the reading of the works of the Mystics whom he greatly resembled, till his mind was so wrought up that he regarded them as the wisest men in the world, made all religion to consist in certain indescribable internal sensations and emotions, had little regard for doctrinal theology, and expended all the powers of his genius in collecting and exaggerating the faults of our own and former times. If, as all admit, it is the first excellence of a historian to afford no ground for a suspicion of either partiality or enmity, no man was ever more unfit to be a historian than Godfrey Arnold. The man must be unable to see or feel at all, who can read his history and yet say that he does not see and feel that it is throughout dictated by passion and strong hatred of the received doctrines and institutions [of our church]. Arnold in his history assumes it as an undeniable fact, that all the evils which have crept into the Christian church since the times of the apostles have originated from the ministers and rulers of the church, who were wicked and ungodly men. On this assumption he supposes that all who made opposition to the priests and ministers of religion and who suffered persecution from them, were pious and holy men; and on the other hand, that those who pleased the clergy were eccentric and adverse to true piety. Hence he defends nearly all the heretics, even those whose doctrines he had not examined and did not well understand; and this has caused his book to give the highest offence. But the longer he lived, the more he saw the errors into which he had been betrayed by his natural temperament and by bad examples; and, as respectable persons affirm, he at last became more friendly to the truth and to moderation.³

¹ See Cöller's Life of Arnold, Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. Crit. tome i. p. 485, &c. [Mosheim does not appear to me to do justice to Arnold as a historian. At least, I have not discovered in his history that malignity and disregard for truth which Mosheim thinks every man who has eyes must see. Arnold was born at Anneberg in 1668. After passing his childhood at school in his native place, he spent three years in the gymnasium at Gera; and then in 1685 entered the University of Wittenberg, where the next year he took his master's degree. Inclined to a retired and noiseless life, he removed to Dresden in 1686, where he became a private tutor and was intimate with Spener. In 1693 he removed to Quedlinburg, and there acted as a private tutor in a family four years, declining repeated offers of a parish. In 1697, he was appointed professor of history at Glessen, but relinquished the office after two years, "because," he said, "no man can serve two masters;" and professors at that day were required to teach in a manner which did not suit his taste. He returned to Quedlinburg in 1698, where he was much admired and followed by the Pietists. In the year 1700, Sophia Charlotte, duchess of Isenach, by recommendation of professor Francke, made him her court preacher. But opposition from the orthodox obliged him to quit the place in 1706, and he was made pastor and inspector of Werben. Two years after, the king of Prussia made him pastor and inspector at Perleberg, where he died in 1713, aged 48. He was of a melancholy temperament, drank deeply into the views of the Mystics and the Pietists, and conceived high disgust with the reigning theology around him. But he appears to have been a perfectly ingenuous and upright man. As a historian he doubtless had strong prejudices which often warped his judgment. But he appears to me very far from being a passionate writer, or from attempting designedly to discolour or misrepresent facts. See the character of him drawn by Walch in his elaborate Preface to Von Einem's translation of Mosheim, vol. i. p. 88-101.—Mur. [See also the character recently drawn of him and his work, by Dowling in his Introduction to the Study of

² All these controversies were first collected and arranged, though unduly multiplied, by Schelwig, in his Synopsis Controversiarum sub Pietatis Prætextu motarum, first published, Dantzig, 1701, 8vo. But they may be better learned, together with the arguments of both parties, from Lange's Antibarbarus, and from his German work, entitled The Middle Way (Die Mittelstrasse), and also from Löscher's Timotheus Veterinus which is extant in two volumes.

³ Arnold's Unpartheyische Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, first published, 1699 and 1700, in 2 vols. fol. and then more full and complete at Schaffhausen, 1740, in three very thick vols. fol.—Mur.

33. A much worse man than Arnold was John Conrad Dippel, a Hessian, who assumed the fictitious name of Christian Democritus, and who disquieted the minds of the weak, and excited no inconsiderable commotions in the latter part of this century. This man, in my view arrogant, vainglorious, and formed by nature to be a caviller and a buffoon, did not so much bring forward a new form of religion as labour to overthrow all those which he found established. For during his whole life on nothing was he more intent than on running down every religious community, and especially that of the Lutherans in which he was born, with his sarcastic witticisms, and rendering whatever had long been viewed with reverence as ridiculous as possible by his malignant and low scurrility. If he had any clear conceptions, which I very much doubt, for invention and imagination were by far his most prominent characteristics—if, I say, he had in his own mind any clear and distinct conceptions which he thought were true, he certainly was incompetent to unfold them clearly or to express them in words; for it is only by divination that a man can draw from his various writings any coherent and uniform system of doctrine. Indeed it would seem as if the fire of his laboratory, over which he spent so much time, had produced a fever in his brain. The writings which he composed in a crude, bitter, and sarcastic style, should they be handed down to posterity, will cause people to wonder that so many of their fathers could admit for their religious teacher and guide, one who so audaciously violated every principle of good sense and piety.¹

34. Of a totally different character was John William Petersen, superintendent at Lüneburg, a man of a mild and quiet temper but of a feeble mind, and from the luxuriance of his imagination very liable to deceive both himself and others. In the first place, he contended in the year 1691 that a noble young lady, Rosamond Juliana of Asseburg, whose disordered brain made her the subject of a sort of visions, actually saw God and reported commands which she received from him; and about the same time he publicly defended the obsolete doctrine of Christ's future reign of a thousand years on the earth, for that oracle had confirmed this, among other things, by her authority. This first error, as is usual with those who have no control over their own minds, afterwards produced others. For he with his wife, Joanna Eleanora of Merlau who also professed to have very great spiritual knowledge, predicted a complete future restoration of all things, or the liberation of both wicked men and devils from hell, and their deliverance from all sin and from its punishment; and he assigned to Christ a twofold human nature, the one celestial and assumed before this world was created, and the other derived from his mother since the commencement of time. I pass over other opinions of this pair, equally groundless and very wide of the common belief. Many persons gave assent to these opinions, especially among the laity; but Petersen was also opposed by great numbers, to whom he replied very fully as he had a fruitful genius and abundance of leisure. Being removed from his office in the year 1692, he quietly passed the remainder of his life on his estate near Magdeburg, amusing himself with writing letters and books.²

¹ Petersen gave a history of his own life in German, first published in 1717, 8vo, to which his wife added her life in 1718. Those who wish to investigate the spirit, habits, and character of this well-matched pair, will find matter enough for their purpose in these autobiographies. Concerning his movements at Lüneburg, see the documents in the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1748, p. 974, A.D. 1749, p. 30, 200, and in many other places. Add Müller's Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 639, &c. [This pious and amiable enthusiast was born at Osnabruck in 1649. Nature formed him for a poet, as appears from his Urania on the mighty works of God, which Leibnitz published with his own amendments. He was made professor of poetry at Rostock in 1677. Afterwards he was superintendent at Lubeck, then court preacher at Lutin, and in 1688 superintendent at Lüneburg. He early gave way to a belief in visions and special revelations, which led him to maintain a literal reign of Christ on the earth during the millennium, and to believe in a final restoration of all things. Becoming more and more confirmed in these sentiments, he openly avowed them, both orally and in printed works. In 1692 he was cited before the consistory at Zelle; and as he could not conscientiously refrain from teaching doctrines which he supposed immediately revealed to himself and wife and lady Juliana, he was deprived of his office; and purchasing an estate not far from Magdeburg he there led a retired and religious life, chiefly occupied in defending his principles and in labouring to promote practical piety, till his death in 1727. He was undoubtedly a considerable scholar, and a very sincere and pious man. But his poetic imagination and his belief in dreams and visions led him to embrace very singular opinions. He supposed that prior to the millennium the gospel would be preached over all the world, and that all nations would be converted. The Jews, after becoming Christians, would be restored to their own land. Then the first resurrection, that of the ancient saints and martyrs, would take place; Christ would appear in the clouds of heaven, and living saints would be caught up to meet the Lord in the air and be changed. Thenceforth

Eccles. Hist. p. 171, &c. which agrees with that given by Mosheim.—R.

² All his works were printed in 5 vols. 4to, in the year 1747, but without naming the place of publication. For he was respected by many after his death, and regarded as a great teacher of true wisdom. None more readily find readers and patrons than those who abuse everybody else and immoderately extol themselves. Dippel also acquired numerous friends by his attention to chemistry, in which he is said to have been well versed, and by his medical knowledge. For as all men are fond of riches and long life, they readily set a high value on those who professedly show them a sure path to opulence and old age. The death of Dippel is related by numerous writers.

35. I know not whether I ought to associate with these, John Caspar Schade and John George Bœsius, good men and earnest to promote the salvation of others, but ignorant of the way to effect it. The former was a minister at Berlin, and among the other crude and ill-digested doctrines which he advanced, in 1697 he most strenuously opposed the confession of sins to priests which is practised among the Lutherans. His zeal on this subject produced considerable commotion both in the church and the state. The latter was a preacher at Sorau [in lower Lusatia], and in order more effectually to overcome the heedlessness and security of men, he denied that God continues to be propitious to those sinners whose obstinacy he eternally foresaw would be incurable to the end of their lives; or, what is the same thing, that beyond a certain limited time fixed from eternity, he would afford them the grace necessary for the attainment of salvation. This opinion was thought by not a few divines to be injurious to the divine mercy which is boundless, and it was therefore combated in many publications. Yet it found a learned vindicator in Adam Rechenberg, a divine of Leipsic, not to mention others of less note.¹

36. Among the minor controversies in the Lutheran church, I shall assign the first place to that which existed between the divines of Tübingen and those of Giessen from the year 1616 onward. The grand point in debate related to the true nature and circumstances of that state of Christ, which theologians usually call his state of humiliation. The parties agreed that the man Christ Jesus really possessed divine properties and perfections by virtue of the hypostatic union, even while he seemed divested of all glory and majesty and appeared to be a vile servant and malefactor. But they disputed whether he actually divested himself of the use of those perfections while executing the office of high priest, or whether he only concealed his use of them from the view of men. The divines of Tübingen accounted the latter supposition to be the fact, while those of Giessen regarded the former as more probable. To this first and great question others were added, which, if I am correct, were rather curious than necessary, respecting the mode in which God is present throughout the created universe, the origin and ground of this presence, the true cause of the omnipresence of Christ's body, and some others. On the side of the Tübingen divines there appeared and took part, Lucas Osiander, Melchior Nicolai, and Theodore Thummus; and on the side of the divines of Giessen, Balthazar Menzer and Justus Feuerborn; all of whom contended ardently and ingeniously, and I wish I could add, always with dignity and moderation. But those times permitted and sanctioned many things which subsequent times have justly required to be amended. The Saxon theologians in the year 1624, by order of their sovereign, assumed the office of arbiters of the controversy; and this office they so executed as not to approve entirely the sentiments of either party, yet they intimated that the views of the Giessen divines were nearer the truth than those of the other party.² The Tübingen divines refused to admit their interference, and perhaps the divines of Giessen would in time have done the same. But the public calamities of Germany put an end to the contest. It was therefore never settled, but each party retained its own views.

37. Not long after the rise of this contest, in the year 1621 Herman Rathmann, a pious and not unlearned minister of the Christ would reign a thousand years on the earth over a twofold church—the celestial, composed of the risen saints and those changed at his coming, and the terrestrial, embracing all true Christians. Religion would prevail very generally, but not universally. At the end of the thousand years Satan would be loosed, there would be a great apostasy, Christ would come forth and destroy the wicked, a new heaven and a new earth would appear, and gradually all things would be restored to order, and holiness and happiness. Though Petersen was first led into these doctrines by supposed revelations, and appears always to have founded his own belief chiefly on such grounds, yet he believed that the Scriptures rightly interpreted—that is, mystically explained—were full of these doctrines. And hence, in order to convince others, he argued much from the Bible, particularly from the Apocalypse, and also from the ancient Chylists, especially Origen. His writings were voluminous, consisting of mystic interpretations of Scripture, defence of his peculiar sentiments, many letters, and a history of his own life. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. viii. p. 302, &c.; Unpartheische Kirchenhistorie, Jena, 1730, vol. ii. p. 811, &c.—Mur.

¹ Those who wish to understand these controversies may consult Walch's Introduction to the Controversies in the Lutheran Church, written in German.

² Jäger's Historia Ecclesiæ, et Polit. Sæcul. xvii. decenn. iii. p. 329, &c.; Weismann's Historia Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 1173; Walch's Introduction to the Controversies, &c. [in German], part i. chap. iv. p. 206, to say nothing of Carolus, Arnold, and a hundred others. [These controversies were natural results of Luther's untenable doctrine of consubstantiation, which supposed Christ's body and blood to be always truly present with the bread and wine of the eucharist. For on that supposition, Christ's body must often be present in a great number of places at the same time, or have a kind of ubiquity. To render this at all plausible, resort was had to the hypostatic union and to a supposed transfer of divine attributes from the superior nature of Christ to the inferior. Thus the attributes of matter and of mind were confounded, and a local or material presence was ascribed to the divine nature. From such absurd doctrines, stiffly maintained by acute and ingenious men, it was unavoidable that they should feel the difficulties besetting them on every side, and therefore should start various theories with the vain hope of extricating themselves from embarrassment.—Mur.]

gospel at Dantzic, a great friend and a public recommender of John Arndt's work on True Christianity, was thought by John Corvinus his colleague, and by many others, to derogate from the authority and efficacy of the Holy Scriptures. If we may believe his opponents, he published in the year 1621 in a German work on Christ's gracious kingdom, the following sentiment: That the written word of God does not possess inherent power and efficacy to enlighten and regenerate the hearts of men and to convert them to God; that this external word merely points out the way to salvation, but does not draw men into it; that God himself by another and an internal word, so changes the disposition of men that they are enabled to please him. This opinion, Corvinus and his associates contended, was the same which Schwenkfeld formerly held and which the Mystics professed. But whoever shall compare together all the writings of Rathmann on the subject, will perceive that his adversaries either did not understand him or have perverted his meaning. He supposed—I. That the word of God as contained in the Scriptures had indeed the power of converting men to God, and of renewing their hearts. But, II. This power it could not exert at all on the minds of corrupt men who resisted it. Therefore, III. It was necessary that a divine power should either precede or accompany it and prepare the minds of men for its influence, or remove the obstacles which destroyed the efficacy of the external word. And thus, IV. By this power of the Holy Spirit or this internal word, the way was prepared for the external word to enlighten and renovate the souls of men.¹ There is indeed some difference between his views of the efficacy of the divine word and the common views of the Lutheran church; but if I do not greatly deceive myself, whoever shall carefully consider all that he has written on the subject, in his inelegant, nay, often careless manner, will be convinced that this difference is but small; and he will perceive that this honest man had not the power of communicating his thoughts with precision and clearness. The controversy spread through the whole Lutheran church, the majority following the example of the Saxons and condemning Rathmann, but others excusing that pious and good man. But as he died just as the contest was at its height, in the year 1628, these great commotions gradually subsided.

38. The private dissensions of some of the doctors respecting certain propositions and opinions, I do not presume to place in the list of Lutheran controversies, though I perceive some do it; not so much however, if I do not mistake, for the purpose of illustrating and adorning the history of the Lutheran church, as to create a prejudice against it, and to lower the reputation of good men. For no age is so happy and no community so well regulated, but that one individual is sometimes deemed by another to be indiscreet and erroneous. Nor is it estimating human nature correctly, to measure the state of things throughout a whole church by such private opinions of individuals. In the writings of John Tarnovius and John Affelmann of Rostock, in other respects two very meritorious theologians, certain modes of expression and some opinions were censured by their colleagues and others. Nor will this excite much surprise in one who considers, that the latter might misunderstand what was itself well said, and that the former might not have known how to express correctly what they clearly understood.—Joachim Lütkeemann, in many respects a man of worth, denied that Christ remained a true man during the three days that he was dead, while others affirmed the contrary. This was a controversy about words, such as we see continually arising and disappearing among men. Of the same kind was the dispute between Henry Boetius, a theologian of Helmstadt, and Frederick Baldwin, a divine of Wittemberg, whether it is in consequence of the merits of Christ that the wicked will be restored to life hereafter.—John Reinboth, superintendent in Holstein, like Calixtus, circumscribed the essentials of religion within narrower limits than usual, and supposed that the Greeks did not err essentially in denying that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son. In both respects many were satisfied with him, but others were not; and especially John Conrad Dannhauer, a very learned divine of Strasburg. Hence a controversy arose between those excellent men, which was more vehement than the nature of the case demanded.² But let us not refer disputes of this character to the class of those which show the internal state of our church in this century.

39. Of somewhat greater importance in this respect were some controversies which did not relate so much to things as to persons, or respected the soundness and correctness of certain teachers. Men who undertake to plead the cause of piety and holiness are often carried, by the fervour which actuates them, to some extravagance, and therefore do not always confine their statements to the rigid rules of theological accuracy as prescribed by learned divines; and they sometimes borrow the strong and splendid, yet figurative and often obscure, words and phrases of those who treat of the genuine worship of God and of practical duties, with good intentions indeed, yet in a rude and uncouth style. Hence scarcely any fall under the suspicion of despising and marring the truth more readily than these do. Many such examples occurred in this century, and particularly in the case of Stephen Prætorius, a preacher at Salswedel, and of that most excellent man, John Arndt. The former had published in the preceding century some tracts calculated to arouse the minds of men to solicitude about their salvation, and these were repeatedly republished in this century and commended by many; yet they were thought by others to abound in expressions and sentiments either directly false or calculated to lead to error. And there certainly are some unsuitable expressions in those tracts which might easily mislead the ignorant, and some also which indicate too great credulity. Yet whoever will read his works with an ingenuous mind will easily believe that the writer wrote nothing deceitfully or with an evil design. The celebrated work of Arndt on True Christianity, the perusal of which affords delight to so many persons even in our own times, was too bitterly taxed by Lucas Osiander, George Rost, and many others, among other faults, with being written in a style that was debased by Weigelian, Paracelsic, and the like phraseology. It is certain that this extraordinary man disliked the philosophy which prevailed in the schools of that age, and on the other hand ascribed much—I had almost said, too much—to the doctrines and pretensions of the chemists; and hence he sometimes used the language of those who tell us that fire throws light on both religion and nature. But he has been absolved from all great errors by the most respectable men, especially by Paul Egard, Daniel Dilger, Melchior Bræler, John Gerhard, Dorschæus, and numerous others; and indeed he appears to have derived reputation and renown rather than disgrace from those numerous accusations.¹

¹ See Hartknoch's Preussische Kirchengeschichte, book iii. chap. viii. p. 812, &c.; Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzehist. part iii. chap. xii. p. 115, &c.; Müller's Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 559, &c.

² See on these controversies generally Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzehist. part ii. book xvii. chap. vi. p. 957, &c. and concerning that of Reinboth in particular, see Müller's Introduct. ad Historiam Chersonesus Cimbrica, par. ii. p. 190, &c. and Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 692.

To the class of which we here treat, belongs also Valentine Weigel, minister of Tschöpan in Meissen. For though he died in the preceding century, yet a great part of his writings were first published in this, and were attacked by great numbers. I regard him as by no means a corrupt man; but he also was injured by his attachment to the chemistry which at that time hovered about Germany, and by his dislike or neglect of the precepts of sound reason.²

40. It remains that we notice the chief persons among the Lutherans who felt themselves strong enough to re-model the whole system of theology, or to draw forth a new one from their own resources. At the head of the list stands Jacob Behme, a shoemaker of Gorlitz, famous for his vast number of both friends and foes, and whom his patrons call the German Theosophist. Being naturally inclined to search after abstruse things, and having learned partly from certain books and partly from intercourse with some physicians (Tobias Kober, Balthazar Walther, and others), the doctrines of Robert Fludd and the Rosecrucians, which were then everywhere circulated and talked of, he discovered, by means of fire and with the aid of his imagination, a kind of theology which was more obscure than the numbers of Pythagoras or the characters of Heraclitus. Those who would commend the man for ingenuity, piety, veracity, and honesty, may do it without contradiction from us; but those who would honour him with the title of a man taught by God, or even of a sound and wise philosopher, must themselves lack knowledge; for he so confuses every subject with chemical metaphors and with such a profusion of obscure terms, that it would seem as if he aimed to produce jargon. The heat of his exuberant fancy, if I do not mistake, led him to believe that divine grace operates by the same laws which prevail in the physical world, and that men's souls are purified from their pollution and vices in the same way in which metals are purged from dross. He formerly had, and he still has, a very great number of followers, among whom the most noted and famous in this century were John Lewis Gifftheil, John Angelus von Werdenhagen, Abraham von Franckenberg, Theodore von Tzetsch, Paul Felgenhauer, Quirinus Kuhlmann, John James Zimmermann, and others. Some of these were not altogether destitute of litique Arndtiana, Wittemb. 1727, 8vo, and very many others.

² Arnold treats largely of Weigel, yet as usual not impartially, in his Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part II. book xvii. chap. xvii. p. 1088.

¹ See Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhist., part II. book xvii. chap. vi. p. 940, &c.; Weismann's Historia Eccles. Sæculi xvii. p. 1174, 1189; Scharf's Supplementum Hist.

modesty and good sense, but others were entirely beside themselves and excited the compassion of intelligent men; as, e.g. Kuhlmann, who was burned in Muscovy, A.D. 1684, and afterwards Gichtel; while not one of them managed their affairs so laudably or prudently, as to procure for the sect or its founders any degree of respect and commendation from persons of the slightest discernment.¹

41. Next after Böhme it appears should be mentioned those whom disordered minds rendered so presumptuous, that they claimed to be prophets divinely raised up and endowed with the power of foretelling future events. A large number of such persons existed in this age, and particularly during the times when the Austrians were contending for supremacy against the Germans, the Swedes, and the French; for long experience shows, that there is never a greater number of diviners or prophets than when great revolutions seem about to take place, or when great and unexpected calamities occur. The most noted of these were, Nicholas Drabiz, Christopher Kotter, and Christina Poniatowsky, who have found an eloquent patron in John Amos Comenius; also Joachim Greulich, Anna Vetteria, Eva Maria Frölich, George Reichard, and some others. But as no one of them was the cause of any great commotions, and as the progress of events very soon divested their predictions of all their authority, it is sufficient to have shown generally, that there were among the Lutherans of this century some disordered minds who affected the honours and the authority of ambassadors of heaven.²

¹ It is not necessary here to cite authorities, for the works of Böhme are in everybody's hands, and the books which confute him are nowhere scarce. What can be said in favour of the man and his followers may be seen in Arnold, who is always most full in extolling and lauding those whom others censure. Concerning Kuhlmann and his execution, see the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1748, p. 905, and in many other places.—[Böhme however had the good fortune to meet, in our days, with a warm advocate and an industrious disciple in the late well-meaning but gloomy and visionary Mr. William Law, who was for many years preparing a new edition and translation of Böhme's works, which he left behind him ready for the press, and which have been published in two vols. 4to, since his death.—Mac. [See also the references in the addition to Note 2, page 733, above.—R.]

² Arnold has done the world service by accurately collecting the visions and acts of these people, in the second and third parts of his Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie. For now those who have occasion to investigate the subject have the ready means of ascertaining with certainty, what was in itself most probable beforehand, that what these persons deemed divine communications were the fictions of their own minds led away by their imaginations. There was an honest, illiterate man at Amsterdam, in the middle of the seventeenth century, Benedict Bahnsen of Holstein, who was so captivated with such writings and prophecies, that he carefully collected and published them all. His Index Bibliothecæ was printed after his death, Amsterd. 1670, 4to,

42. I would give a somewhat more distinct account of some who were not indeed so wholly beside themselves as to claim to be prophets of God, yet sadly deceived themselves and others by marvellous and strange opinions. Essaias Stiefel and Ezeziel Meth, both of Thuringia, not long after the commencement of the century, expressed themselves so unusually and so improperly that they were thought by many to arrogate to themselves divine glory and majesty, to the great dishonour of God and our Saviour. I can believe that though they greatly lacked sound sense, yet they were not so far beside themselves, and that they only foolishly imitated the lofty and swollen phraseology of the mystical writers. Thus they may serve as examples to show how much cloudiness and folly the constant reading of mystical books may spread over uncultivated and feeble minds.³ Paul Nagel, a professor at Leipsic, who had some tincture of mathematical knowledge, conjectured from the indications of the stars future occurrences both in church and state; and among other things professed to be certain, from their indications, that a very holy and heavenly kingdom of Christ was to be set up on the earth.⁴

43. Christian Hoburg of Lüneburg, a man of an unstable and restless spirit, under the assumed names of Elias Prætorius and Bernard Baumann, published a vast number of invectives against the whole Lutheran church, and thereby involved himself in various troubles. Yet for a long time, by dissimulation and deception, which he doubtless supposed to be lawful, he led the more charitable to regard him as less culpable than he actually was; and he was accounted an acrimonious assailant, not so much of religion itself as of the licentiousness and vices of those especially who ministered in holy things. At length however he rendered himself universally odious, and went over to the Mennonites.⁵ Very similar to him though superior in petulance and acrimony, was Frederick Breckling, who being rejected from the ministry which he first exercised in Holstein and afterwards at Zwoll in Holland, continued to extreme old embracing a great number of chemical, fanatical, and prophetic writings.

³ See Thomasius, Historie der Weisheit und Narrheit, vol. i. part iii. p. 150; Arnold's Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, part iii. chap. iv. p. 32.

⁴ Arnold, ubi supra, part iii. chap. v. p. 53; Carolus, Memorabilia Eccles. Sæc. xvii. par. i. lib. iii. cap. iv p. 513.

⁵ Arnold, ubi supra, part iii. chap. xiii. p. 130; Carolus, ubi supra, tom. i. p. 1065; Hornbeck, Summa Controvers. p. 636; Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 337, &c.

age in Holland connected with no religious sect. Several of his tracts are extant which, although they vehemently urge and recommend the cultivation of piety, and display implacable hatred against both vice and the vicious, yet show the writer to have been destitute of the primary virtues of a truly pious man—charity, wisdom, the love of truth, meekness, and patience.¹ It is strange that such vehement and heated declaimers against the defects of the public religion and its ministers, as they profess to be more discerning than all others, should fail of discovering, what the most simple daily learn by common observation, that nothing is more odious and disgusting than an angry reformer, who is always laying about him with sword and dagger; and that they should not perceive that it is scarcely possible for any one successfully to cure in others the faults with which he is himself chargeable. The expectation of the millennial kingdom, which seldom exists in well-informed minds and which generally produces extravagant opinions, was embraced and propagated by George Lawrence Seidenbecher, a preacher in the Saxon region of Eichsfeld, and on this account he was deprived of his office.²

44. We shall close the list of this sickly family (for it is not necessary to name a great number, since they all pursued much the same course) with the most odious and the worst of them all, Martin Seidelius, a Silesian of Ohlau, who laboured to establish a sect in Poland and the neighbouring countries, near the close of the preceding century and the commencement of this, but whose extreme absurdities prevented his meeting with success even among the Socinians. This most daring of men supposed that God had indeed promised a Saviour or a Messiah to the Jewish nation, but that this Messiah had never appeared nor ever would appear, because the Jews by their sins had rendered themselves unworthy of so great a deliverer as this, promised of old to their fathers; that of course Christ was erroneously regarded as the Messiah; that it was his only business and office to explain the law of nature, which had been greatly obscured by the fault of men; and therefore, that whoever shall obey this law as expounded by Jesus Christ will fulfil all the religious duties which God requires of him. To render these monstrous opinions more defensible and specious, he audaciously assailed and discarded all the books of the New Testament. The few persons whom he brought over to his views were called Semi-Judaizers.³ If this rash man had lived at the present day he would have appeared much less odious than he did in that age. For if we except his singular ideas concerning the Messiah, all the rest of his system would be highly approved by many at the present day, among the English, the Dutch, and other nations.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMED CHURCH.

1. THE Reformed church, as has been already remarked, being united not so much by the bonds of a common faith and discipline as by principles of moderation and candour, it will be proper to consider, first, whatever relates to this very extensive community as a whole, and then the events worthy of notice in the several Reformed countries. The principal enlargements of this community in the seventeenth century have already been mentioned in our account of the Hessian and Brandenburg commotions, in the chapter on the Lutheran church. We here add that John Adolphus, duke of Holstein, in the beginning of this century also went over to the side of the Reformed, and much hope was indulged that his subjects would be led gradually to follow his example; but the prince dying in the year 1616, this hope was frustrated.⁴ Henry, duke of Saxony, in the year 1688 at Dessau exchanged the Lutheran religion in which he had been educated for that of the Reformed, at the instigation it is said of his wife.⁵ In the beginning of the century there were many in Denmark who secretly leaned towards the doctrines of the Reformed, and especially in regard to the doctrine of the Lord's Supper; and who had

¹ See Zeltner's Historia Crypto-Socinismi Altorfani, tom. i. p. 268, 335. [His Fundamenta Religionis Christianæ and his Epistola Tres ad Cæterum Unitariorum, are to be found in the Bibliotheca Fratrum Unitariorum. —Schl. [A sect still exists in Russia holding much the same doctrines, and bearing the name of Selenewtchinski. See Pinkerton's Present State of the Greek Church, p. 273, compare p. 228.—Mur.

² Möller's Introduct. ad Historiam Chersonensis Cimbricæ, par. ii. p. 101, &c.; Pontoppidan's Annales Ecclesiæ Danicæ diplomaticæ, tom. iii. p. 691, &c.

³ See Mœbius, Selecta Disputat. Theolog. p. 1137. This prince published a Confession of his Faith, which being attacked by the Lapsic divines by public authority, Isaac de Beausobre, who was then pastor of the church of Magdeburg, composed a vindication of it, Défense de la Doctrine des Réformés, et en particulier de la Confession de Foy de S. A. Monseigneur le Duc Henry de Saxe, contre un Livre composé par la Faculté de Théologie de Leipzig, Magdeb. 1694, 8vo.

¹ Arnold treats of this man in his work so often cited, part iii. chap. xiii. p. 148, &c. and likewise gives us some of his tracts which abundantly show the extreme fertility of his genius, Ibid. p. 1110. A formal account of him is given by Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 72, &c.

² He is fully described by Verpoorten, in his Comment. de Vita et Institutis G. L. Seidenbecheri, Dantzig, 1739, 4to.

received their instruction from Nicholas Hemming and other friends of Melancthon. But this class of persons lost all hope, courage, and influence, after the year 1614, when John Canute, a bishop who had too openly avowed his good-will towards Calvinistic opinions, was deprived of his office.¹ It is well known moreover that the Reformed religion was transplanted by the Dutch and the English into Africa, Asia, and America; and in various parts of those continents very flourishing Reformed churches were established; and among the Lutherans also, in various places, liberty was granted to the French, German, and English Reformed freely to set up their worship.

2. Of all the public calamities which diminished the splendour and the prosperity of the Reformed community, the greatest and most lamentable was the subversion of the French church, renowned for so many distinguished men. From the time of Henry IV. the Reformed church in France constituted a kind of state or commonwealth within the commonwealth, being fortified by great privileges and rights and possessing among other things for its security towns and castles, and especially the very strong fortress of Rochelle, all which places were garrisoned with their own troops. This community was not always under leaders of sufficient foresight and attachment to the crown. Hence sometimes (for the truth should not be concealed), when civil wars or commotions broke out, this community took the side of those who were opposed to the king, engaged at times in enterprises which the king disliked, too openly sought alliance and friendship with the Dutch and the English, and undertook or aimed at other things inconsistent, apparently at least, with the public peace and the supreme authority of the king. Hence king Lewis XIII. from the year 1621, waged war with the Reformed party; and the prime minister of France, cardinal Richelieu, was persuaded that France would never be safe and enjoy peace until this community was prostrated, and deprived of its fortifications, castles, strong towns, and high privileges. Richelieu, after various conflicts and numerous efforts, at last obtained his object. For in the year 1628, after a long and difficult siege, he took Rochelle, the chief fortress of the Reformed community, and reduced it to subjection to the king; and this city being captured, the Reformed community in France was prostrate, and being deprived of its fortresses, could depend upon nothing but the king's clemency and good pleasure.* Those who judge of this transaction by the principles of state policy deny that it was a violation of all justice and equity, because such communities in the bosom of a kingdom or state are pernicious and most hazardous to the public peace and safety. And if the French court had stopped here, and had left safe and inviolate to the Reformed their liberties of conscience and religion, purchased with so much blood and by such great achievements, perhaps the Reformed could and would have borne the immense loss of their liberties and rights with equanimity.

3. But the French court was not content with this measure of success; having destroyed that species or form of civil polity which had been annexed to the Reformed church, and which afterwards was deemed adverse to the regal power, the court next attacked the church itself and its religion, contrary to the plighted faith of the kings. At first milder measures were resorted to, promises, caresses, conciliatory expositions of the doctrines most offensive to the Reformed, and similar measures, both with the chief men of the Reformed community and with the more learned and eminent of their ministers; and Richelieu especially spared neither pains nor artifices which he thought might have any influence to draw the Reformed insidiously into the Romish church. But as little or nothing was effected by all these measures, the Catholic bishops especially resorted to sophistry, persecution, the most unrighteous laws, and all the means which either blind passion or ingenious malice could invent, in order gradually to exhaust the people who were so hateful to them, and compel them against their choice reluctantly to join the standard of the Roman pontiff. Many, being overcome by their troubles and their grievous sufferings, yielded, others left the country, but the greatest part firmly persisted in the religion of their fathers.

4. At length under Lewis XIV. after all artifices, snares, and projects had been exhausted in vain, the prelates of the Gallic church and the Jesuits, to whom the king was accustomed to listen, determined that this most resolute body of people must be extirpated by violence and war, and be crushed as it were by a single stroke. Overcome by their arguments and importu-

¹ Pontoppidan's Annales Eccles. Danicæ, tom. iii. p. 696, &c.

* See Le Clerc's Vie du Cardinal Richelieu, tome i. p. 69, 77, 177, 199, 269; Le Vassor's Histoire de Louis XIII. tome iii. p. 676, &c.; tome iv. p. i, &c. and the subsequent volumes. Add the duke of Sully (a friend to Henry IV. himself one of the Reformed, but not disposed to conceal the errors of his church), Mémoires, tome iii. iv. v.

nate supplications, Louis, in the year 1685, with the approbation and applause of the Roman pontiff, in violation of all laws human and divine, repealed the edict of Nantes, by which his grandfather had granted to the Reformed the liberty of worshipping God according to their own consciences, and commanded his Reformed subjects to return to the religion of their progenitors. The consequence of this most lamentable decree was that a vast multitude of French people abandoned their country to the immense detriment of France,¹ and sought new residences in various parts of Europe, in which they might freely serve God; and others, whom the extreme vigilance of their enemies prevented from acquiring safety by flight, the soldiers compelled by a thousand modes of torture, vexation, and suffering, to profess with their lips and to exhibit in their outward conduct that Romish religion which they abhorred in their hearts.² From this unrighteous act of the king (on other occasions so magnanimous) it may be seen how the Roman pontiffs and their adherents stand affected towards those whom they call heretics; and that they regard no treaty and no oath too sacred and too solemn to be violated, if the safety or the interests of their church demand it.

5. The Waldenses inhabiting the valleys of Piedmont, who have been already mentioned as entering into a union with the church of Geneva, were harassed nearly throughout this century by the very cruel devices and machinations of the instruments of the Roman pontiff; but especially in the years 1653, 1686, and 1696, they were so oppressed and persecuted that with difficulty they escaped being exterminated.³ Those who survived these frequent butcheries owed their precarious and dubious safety to the assiduous intercessions of the Dutch, the English, and the Swiss, with the duke of Savoy. In Germany the church of the Palatinate, which was once a principal branch of the Reformed community, gradually suffered so much diminution from the year 1683, when the government passed into the hands of a Catholic prince, that from holding the first rank it was depressed to almost the lowest among the Reformed churches of Germany.⁴

6. The distinguished merits of the Reformed in regard to every species of useful knowledge are so well known to all, that we shall not dwell upon them. We shall also omit the names of the great and distinguished authors whose works procured permanent fame for themselves and great advantage to others, because it is difficult amid so great a number to select the best.⁵

¹ Leger, Histoire Générale des Eglises Vaudoises, part ii. chap. vi. p. 72, &c.; Gilles, Histoire Ecclésiastique des Eglises Vaudoises, chap. xlix. p. 353, &c. There is extant a particular history of the calamities sustained by the Waldenses, in the year 1686, printed at Rotterdam, 1688, 12mo. [See also an Account of the late persecutions of the Waldenses by the duke of Savoy and the French king, in 1686, printed, Oxford, 1688, 4to; and Boyer's History of the Vaudois, chap. xii.-xxi. p. 72, &c.—Mur.] (Still more useful is the History of the Evangelical Churches in the Valleys of Piedmont, Lond. 1658, fol. compiled by Sir Samuel Morland, Cromwell's commissioner to the duke of Savoy in behalf of this oppressed people—one of the noblest enterprises of the Protector. For the amount collected for their relief in England and Ireland at this period, see Reid's Hist. of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, vol. ii. p. 304, note 27.)

² See Struve's Pfälzische Kirchenhistorie, chap. xiii. sec. 23-72. The Palatinate, so long as its princes possessed the Reformed religion, was to the Reformed churches what Saxony formerly was to the Lutheran, that is, the bond of their external union; and the Palatine church was the most respectable among the German Reformed, as the Saxon church was among the Lutherans. It kept up a constant intercourse with England and Holland. But after the death of the electoral prince Charles Lewis, when the electoral dignity passed to the Catholic branch of the family, this church lost a great part of its pre-eminence. On the other hand, the Brandenburg church rose in respectability as the power of the house of Brandenburg increased, so that at the present day the church of Brandenburg holds the rank which was once held by that of the Palatinate.—Schä.

³ The list of the eminent divines and men of learning who were ornaments to the Reformed church in the seventeenth century is indeed extremely ample. Among those who adorned Great Britain, we shall always remember with peculiar veneration the immortal names of Newton, Barrow, Cudworth, Boyle, Chillingworth, Ussher, Bedell, Hall, Pocock, Fell, Lightfoot, Hammond, Calamy, Walton, Baxter, Pearson, Stillington, Mede, Parker, Oughtred, Burnet, Tillotson, and many others well known in the literary world. In Germany we find Pareus, Scultetus, Fabricius, Aitting, Pelargius, and Bergius. In Switzerland and Geneva, Hospinian, the two Buxtorfs, Hottinger, Heidegger, and Turretin.

¹ See the excellent remarks and observations of Armand de la Chapelle on this subject, in his Life of Isaac de Beausobre, subjoined to the posthumous notes of the latter on the New Testament, p. 299, &c. [The edict of Nantes, which gave free toleration to the Protestants, was drawn up and sanctioned by Henry IV. in the year 1598, and confirmed by Lewis XIII. the year after he assumed the sceptre, A.D. 1613. Its revocation in 1685 was preceded by the despatch of soldiers into all the provinces to compel the Protestants to abandon their religion. Notwithstanding the great pains taken to prevent their escape from the kingdom, some say half a million and others say eight hundred thousand Protestants found their way to foreign countries. Nearly forty thousand are said to have passed over to England, whence many of them came to the United States of America. Vast numbers settled in Holland, and large numbers in the Protestant states of Germany, particularly in Prussia and in Switzerland and Denmark. See Gifford's History of France, vol. iv. p. 35, 92, 421, &c.; Schroechh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. viii. p. 470, &c.—Mur.]

² No one has illustrated these events more fully than Benoit, Histoire de l'Edit de Nantes, a noble work, published at Delft, 1693, &c. in 5 vols. 4to. See also Voltaire, Siècle de Louis XIV. tome ii. p. 229. [The first two volumes of Benoit's Histoire, &c. have been translated into English. See also Browning's History of the Huguenots, chap. 59, 60, and 61; and Smedley's History of the Reformed Religion in France, vol. iii. chap. 24 and 25; but especially Rühlhère, Eclaircissements hist. sur les Causes de la Révocation de l'Edit de Nantes, 1788. This valuable work has been translated into English by Mr. D. D. Scott, with additional contributions, under the title of The Suppression of the Reformation in France, Lond. 1840.—R.]

In philosophy, Aristotle was everywhere the sole guide and lawgiver for a long time, just as among the Lutherans; still the very same Aristotle that is portrayed to us by the Scholastic writers. But his authority gradually became very much diminished from the times of Gassendi and Des Cartes. For many of the French and Dutch adopted the Cartesian philosophy upon its first appearance, and a large part of the English chose Gassendi for their guide and teacher. This was exceedingly offensive to the Aristotelians, who everywhere, but most pugnaciously in Holland, laboured to persuade the people that immense danger to religion and the truth was to be apprehended from the abandonment of Aristotle; nor would they suffer themselves to be ousted from the schools.¹ But the splendour of the increasing light and the influence of liberty compelled the pertinacious sect to yield and be silent, so that the Reformed doctors at the present day philosophise as freely as the Lutherans do. Yet I am not sure that Aristotle does not still exercise a secret sway in the English universities. This at least I could easily prove, that in the times of Charles II. James II. and William III. while the mathematical philosophy prevailed nearly throughout Great Britain, yet at Oxford and Cambridge the old philosophy was in higher repute with some than the new discoveries.

7. The expositors of Scripture among the Reformed who adorned the commencement of the century, all trod in the steps of Calvin; and according to his example, they did not search after recondite meanings and types, but investigated solely the import of the words of the sacred writers. But this uniformity in process of time was done away by the influence of two very distinguished interpreters, Hugo Grotius and John Cocceius. The former, departing but slightly from Calvin's manner, investigates only the literal sense in the books of both the Old Testament and the New, considers the predictions of the ancient prophets as being all fulfilled in events anterior to the coming of Christ, and therefore in the letter of them as not to be applied to Christ; yet he supposes that in some of those prophecies, especially in those which the writers of the New Testament apply to Christ, there is, besides the literal sense, a secret or mystical sense concealed under the persons, events, and things described, which relates to Christ, to his history and mediation. Very different were the principles of Cocceius. He supposed that the whole Old Testament history exhibited as in a kind of mirror the history of Christ and of the Christian church, and that the predictions of the ancient prophets in their literal import treated of Jesus Christ; and that whatever was to occur in the Christian church down to the end of time was all prefigured in the Old Testament, in some places more clearly and in others less so.² Each of these men had a multitude of followers and disciples. With the former were, besides the Arminians, those adherents to the old Calvinistic system who, from Gisbert Voet, the principal antagonist of Cocceius, were called Voetians; also many of the English, and a great number of the French. The latter were highly admired by not a few of the Dutch, the Swiss, and the Germans. Yet there are many who stand intermediate between these two classes of interpreters, agreeing with neither throughout but with each in part. Moreover, neither the Grotian interpreters nor the Cocceian are all of the same description, but each class is subdivided into various subordinate classes. No small portion of the English Episcopalians, despising these modern guides, think the first doctors of the primitive church ought to be consulted, and that the sacred books should be expounded just as the Fathers expounded them.

8. The doctrines of Christianity were disfigured among the Reformed, as among the Lutherans, by the colouring of the Peripatetic or rather the Scholastic sects.

In the churches and academies of Holland, we meet with the following learned divines, Drusus, Amama, Gomar, Rivet, Cloppenburg, Vossius, Cocceius, Voetius, Des Marets, Heidan, Momma, Burman, Wittichius, Hornbeck, the Spanheims, Le Moynes, De Mastricht; among the French doctors we may reckon Cameron, Chamier, Du Moulin, Mestrezat, Blondel, Drelincourt, Dailly, Amyraut, the two Cappels, De la Place, Gamstole, Croy, Morus, Le Blanc, Fajon, Bochart, Claude, Allix, Jurieu, Basnage, Abbadie, Beausobre, Lenfant, Martin, Des Vignoles, &c.—Mac. [MacLaine has inexcusably omitted here among the English divines, the names of Selden, Owen, Howe, Charnock, and other eminent Nonconformists; while he has not condescended to mention a single Scottish writer, though Rutherford, Baillie, Gillespie, and others among the Presbyterians, and Spotswood, Leighton, and others among the Episcopalians, were worthy of being noticed.—R.]

¹ See Baillet, Vie de M. des Cartes, in numerous passages.

² It is commonly said, Cocceius finds Christ everywhere but Grotius nowhere, in the pages of the Old Testament. The first part of the adage is most true; the last is not so true. For Grotius, as his commentaries fully show, does find Christ in many passages of the Old Testament, though in a different way from Cocceius; that is, not in the words but in the things and the persons. [See on Grotius and Cocceius, as biblical expositors, Conybeare's Bampton Lectures for 1824, p. 259, &c.—R.]

³ These are expressly refuted by the learned Daniel Whitby, in his Disertatio de Scripturarum Interpretatione secundum Patrum Commentarios, London, 1714, 8vo. [Whitby has here collected the absurd and whimsical expositions of the fathers, and placed them together in their most ridiculous attitude. See MacLaine's note.—Mur.]

The entire subjugation of these doctrines to the empire of Aristotle, and their reduction to the form of a Peripatetic science, was first resisted by the Arminians, who followed a more simple mode of teaching and inveighed loudly against those divines who subjected the doctrines relating to man's salvation to the artificial distinctions and phraseology of the schools. Next followed the Cartesians and the Cocceians; the former of whom applied the principles of their philosophy to the explication of revealed truth, while the latter supposed that the whole system of theology would appear to the best advantage if dressed up in the form and garb of a divine covenant with men. But grave and wise men among the Reformed were pleased with neither of these. For they objected that the sacred doctrines would be rendered equally obscure and intricate by the Cartesian distinctions and peculiar conceptions, as by the Peripatetic definitions and divisions; and the application of the analogy of a covenant to the whole of theology was productive of this evil among others, which no good man can approve, that it causes the phraseology and the subtle distinctions of the forum to be transferred to the schools of theology, and to produce there vain and futile disputes about things the most sacred. Most of the English and the French would not consent to be thus trammelled, but treated both doctrinal and practical theology freely after the manner of the Arminians.

9. As already observed in another place, William Ames, an Englishman, was the first among the Reformed who attempted to elucidate and arrange the science of morals as distinct from that of dogmatics.¹ But he is dry, and writes more for the schools than for common life. Afterwards the Arminians (who it appears were much more zealous to perfect that part of theology which regulates the life and the heart, than that which informs the understanding) induced great numbers to attempt something more useful and more popular in this department. The French, however, and the English excel the others in facility, acuteness, and solidity. Among the French, to mention no others, Moses Amyraut, a man of distinguished energy and acuteness of mind, first produced in French, though in a style now obsolete, a complete system of moral science, from which those who have more recently obtained much reputation by their writings, John la Placette and Benediet Pictet, appear to have profited not a little.² Among the English, during the immense convulsions of the civil wars, the Presbyterians especially and the Independents endeavoured by various works to subserve the cause of piety. Some of these (as the nation is naturally grave and inclined towards austerity) are too rigorous and regardless of man's condition, while others manifestly incline towards the precepts of the Mystics. When Hobbes subjected all religion to the sovereign will of princes, and laboured to subvert altogether the natural distinction between right and wrong, he roused up great and discerning men, Cumberland, Sharrock, Cudworth, and others,³ to lay open the primary sources of right and justice and to purify them from misrepresentations, by which they contributed very much to the illustration and confirmation of Christian holiness.

10. At the beginning of the century, the Genevan school was in such reputation throughout the Reformed world, that nearly all resorted to it who were not prevented by the narrowness of their worldly circumstances from aspiring after the best education and the highest attainments in theological knowledge.⁴ Hence the opinions of Calvin and his pupils respecting the divine decrees and grace readily spread everywhere, and were introduced into all the schools. Yet there was nowhere any public ordinance or test which compelled the religious teachers not to believe or to teach differently from the Genevans.⁵ Of course there were many

¹ Amyraut's work entitled Morale Chrétienne was printed in 1652, 6 vols. 8vo. La Placette's work was entitled, Essais de morale avec la suite, Hague, 1706, 8 vols. 12mo, and was published in a German translation, Jena, 1719 and 1728. Pictet's work was entitled, La Morale Chrétienne, ou l'Art de bien vivre, Geneva, 1710, 2 vols. 4to. This work was so satisfactory to the Catholics, that the countess of Sporck had it translated into German, omitting the passages offensive to the Catholics, and printed it at her own cost, Prague, 1711.—Schl.

² See Leland's View of the Deistical Writers, vol. 1. p. 48.—MacL.

³ The high reputation which the Genevan academy once had, gradually declined, after the establishment of the Dutch republic and the erection of the universities of Leyden, Francker, and Utrecht.

⁴ Besides Grotius, who evinces this in his Apologeticum already mentioned, see Coornhart, a Hollander, well known by the controversies he produced in his Dutch tracts written near the close of the [preceding] century, in which he assails the doctrine of absolute decrees. I have now before me his Dolinghen des Catechismi ende der Predicanten, Utrecht, 1590, 8vo; Van de toekatinghe ende decretē Godes Bedenkinghe, of de heylighe Schrift als Johan Calvin ende Beza daarvan leeren, Altona, 1572, 8vo; Oraecoen ende middelen van der Menschen saligheid ende Verdampenis, 1603, 8vo. Of this man Arnold treats in the second vol. of his Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, in several places. [Especially part III. chap. vi. vol. II. p. 377, &c. ed. 1741, where his life and controversies are stated at length.—Mur.] James Arminius, while a minister at Amsterdam, being directed by the Consistory to refute the writings of Coornhart, was converted to his doctrines by the perusal of his writings, and therefore defended them against the Reformed.—Schl.

¹ In his book, De Conscientia et ejus Jure vel Casibus, Amsterd. 1630, 4to, 1640 and 1670, 12mo. It was also published in a German translation, by Harsdörfer, Nuremberg, 1654.—Schl. [See above, notes 3 and 4, p. 681.—Mur.]

persons living here and there who either disagreed altogether with the Genevans¹ or qualified in some measure their doctrine. And even those who took the side of the Genevans had some dissension among themselves. For while most of them supposed that God only permitted the first man to sin, but did not decree his apostacy, others went farther, and were so daring as to maintain that God from all eternity, in order to place his justice and his free grace in the clearest light, had decreed the lamentable transgression of Adam, and had so disposed everything that our first parents could not avoid or escape the transgression. The latter were called Supralapsarians in distinction from the former, who were called Infralapsarians.

11. Disregarding the points in which they differed, as being of small moment, both laboured with united strength to put down those who maintained that God is most graciously disposed towards all mankind. Hence a great schism arose soon after the commencement of the century, which never could be healed. James Arminius, professor of theology at Leyden, rejected the Genevan views, and embraced the Lutheran doctrine concerning grace, which excludes no one absolutely from eternal salvation. He was joined by many persons in Holland who were distinguished both for learning and the stations they filled. On the other hand, he was most strenuously opposed by Francis Gomarus, his colleague, and by the principal teachers in the universities. The rulers of the commonwealth recommended moderation, and supposed that both opinions might be taught in a free state without injury to religion. After long altercation and violent contests, by order of Maurice, prince of Orange,² this controversy was submitted to the judgment of the whole church, and was discussed in a council held at Dort in 1618. There were present in the council, besides the best theologians of Holland, representatives of the English, the Palatines, the Swiss, the Bremensians, and the Hessians. Before this tribunal the Arminians lost their cause and were pronounced corruptors of the true religion, and those among the Genevans who are called Infralapsarians triumphed. The Supralapsarian party indeed had supporters and advocates who were neither few nor inactive, but the moderation and impartiality of the English divines especially, prevented their doctrines from obtaining the sanction of the Synod. The Infralapsarians also would not have obtained all they desired [against the Arminians] if things could have gone according to the wishes of the Bremensian divines, who for weighty reasons did not choose to be at variance with the Lutherans.³

12. Whether this victory over the Arminians was on the whole advantageous or detrimental to the doctrinal views of the Genevans and to the Reformed church, may be justly questioned. This is most certain, that after the time of the council of Dort the doctrine of absolute decrees began to decline and to sink more and more; and stern necessity obliged its defenders to recognise as brethren those who either openly coincided with the Arminians, or at least bore a near resemblance to them. The Arminians who were at first condemned, and whose leaders were men of great eloquence and of superior genius as well as learning, being irritated by banishments, legal penalties, and various other injuries, attacked their foes with so much vigour and eloquence that vast numbers became persuaded of the justice of their cause. Among the Dutch themselves, the provinces of Friesland, Zealand, Utrecht, Groningen, and Guelderland, could not be persuaded to receive the decrees of the synod of Dort. And though after the lapse of many years, in 1651 these provinces were at length prevailed upon to declare their pleasure that the Reformed religion, as it was settled at Dort, should be maintained and defended; yet the greatest jurists among the Dutch maintain that this decision cannot have the force of a real and absolute law.⁴ England, through the influence especially of William Laud, went over to the side of the Arminians immediately after the synod of Dort; and down to our times, it has not so much neglected as actually despised and condemned the decisions of that council.⁵ And

¹ For example, Henry Bullinger, a famous divine at Zurich, who clearly declared in favour of universal grace. See Turretin's Letter to Wake, archbishop of Canterbury, in the Bibliothèque Germanique, tome xlii. art. ii. p. 92, &c. and Hildebrand's Orthodoxa Declaratio Articulorum Trium, p. 295, &c.; and even in Holland, at the establishment of the university of Leyden, John Holmann, a universalist, was appointed first professor of theology. See Brandt's History of the Reformation in the Netherlands, book ix. and the Histoire Abrégée de la Réformation de Brandt, tome i. p. 229, &c.—Schl.

² It was not by the authority of prince Maurice, but by that of the States-general, that the national synod was assembled at Dort. The States were not indeed unanimous; three of the seven provinces protested against the holding of the synod, viz. Holland, Utrecht, and Overijssel.—Macl.

³ The writers on these transactions will be mentioned below in the chapter on the Arminian church.

⁴ See the illustrious Von Bynckershoek's Questionum Juris Publici Libri duo, Leyden, 1737, 4to, lib. ii. cap. xviii.

⁵ Lintrop's Dissert. de Contemptu Concilii Dordraceni in Angliā, in the Dis. Theologicae of Masius, tom. i. No. 19. [See king James's injunctions to the bishops, A.D. 1622, in Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. chap. ii. p. 163.—Murr.]

this was almost a necessary occurrence, since the English wished to conform their church to the institutions, opinions, and rules of the first centuries; and the Fathers, as they are called, before Augustine, assigned no limitation to the grace and goodwill of God. Although the French at first seemed to favour the decisions of Dort, yet because those decisions were very offensive to the papists among whom they lived, they soon after began to think and to teach very diversely from them. Among the Germans, neither the churches of Brandenburg nor those of Bremen would suffer their teachers to be tied down to the opinions of the Dutch. Hence the liberty of free thought respecting grace and predestination, which seemed to be wholly extinguished and suppressed at Dort, rather acquired life and activity from the transactions there; and the Reformed church soon became divided into Universalists and Semi-Universalists, Supralapsarians and Infralapsarians,¹ who, though they dislike each other and sometimes get into contention, yet are prevented by various causes from attacking and overpowering one another by open war. What is very remarkable, we have in our own times seen Geneva itself, the parent, nurse, and guardian of the doctrine of absolute decrees and particular grace, not only become kind and gentle towards the Arminians, but also herself almost an Arminian.²

¹ Universalists are those among the Reformed who teach the universal grace of God towards all apostate men, and consequently also a universal atonement and a call to all men. They are however divided into two classes. Some ascribe to the means of grace which God affords sufficient power to enlighten and sanctify all men, and teach that it depends on the voluntary conduct of men whether the grace of God shall produce its effects on them or not. These, who are sometimes called absolute (unconditional) Universalists, are by Mosheim denominated simply Universalists. Others maintain that God indeed wishes to make all men happy, but only on the condition of their believing; and that this faith originates from the sovereign and irresistible operation of God, or from the free, unconditional, and sovereign election of God. These, who are sometimes called hypothetical (conditional) Universalists, and who scarcely differ except in words from the Infralapsarians, are by Mosheim denominated Semi-Universalists. The Supralapsarians, to which class belonged Beza, Francis Gomarus, and Gisbert Voetius, not only teach unconditional election, but they place this election anterior to the purpose of God to create men and to their apostasy. The Infralapsarians, on the contrary, make this unconditional election to be subsequent to the foreseen apostasy. Both these last are also called [in distinction from the Universalists] Particularists. But it is to be hoped that when sound interpretation shall become prevalent in the Reformed churches, these parties, which are the unhappy offspring of a disputatious spirit and of ignorance of the original languages, will at length entirely cease.—Sch.

² The Genevan church, which in Mosheim's day had become "almost an Arminian," soon became not almost but altogether Arminian, afterwards Arrian, and ultimately Socinian; but from this extreme point of depression a reaction appears to have begun, and she seems not unlikely to revert to the profession of the truth.—H.

13. The French church while it remained inviolate thought proper to deviate in many particulars from the common rule of the Reformed; and this appears from many proofs to be owing principally to this one cause, that it might in some measure be relieved from a part of the hatred under which it laboured, and from that load of odious consequences which the papists charged upon the Genevan doctrines. Hence the books of the theologians of Sedan and Saumur, which were composed after the synod of Dort, contain many things quite similar and kindred not only to the Lutheran sentiments concerning grace, predestination, the person of Christ, and the efficacy of the sacraments, but also to some opinions of the Romanists. The commencement of this moderation may be traced back, I think, to the year 1615, when the opinion of John Piscator, a divine of Herborn, respecting the obedience of Christ, was tacitly received or at least pronounced void of error³ in the Synod of the Isle of France, although it had before been rejected and exploded in other French Synods.⁴ Piscator supposed that our Saviour did not satisfy the divine law in our stead by his obedience, but that he as a man was bound to obey the divine will, and therefore could not merit anything with God for others by keeping the law. It will be easy for those who understand the papal doctrines to see how much aid this opinion affords to the papists, in confirming the sentiments they commonly inculcate respecting the merit of good works, the power of man to obey the law, and other points.⁵

³ Aymon, Actes de tous les Synodes Nationaux des Eglises Réformées de France, tome ii. p. 275, 276.

⁴ See Aymon, ubi supra, tome i. p. 301, 400, 457, tome ii. p. 13; Bossuet, Histoire des Variations des Eglises Protestantes, livr. xii. tome ii. p. 268. To Bossuet thus tauntingly reproaching, as is his custom, the changeableness of the Reformed, Basnage appears to have made a poor reply in his Histoire de l'Eglise, tome ii. p. 1533, &c. [There manifestly was some change in the views of the French divines in regard to Piscator's sentiments; for they repeatedly and expressly condemned them in several of their synods, and afterwards yielded up the point. Hence Basnage could not deny the fact. But was this change of opinion any way reproachful to the French clergy? Bossuet thought it was, but candid men will perhaps judge otherwise.—Mur.]

⁵ Maclaine is much offended with Mosheim for intimating that Piscator's opinions afforded support to the popish doctrines of the merit of good works, man's ability to obey the law, &c. And indeed it would be difficult to maintain the connexion supposed by Mosheim. It is also true, as Maclaine states, that Piscator's doctrine, by denying that even Christ himself could perform any works of supererogation, cut up by the roots the popish doctrine that a vast number of common saints have performed such works, and thus have filled that spiritual treasury from which the pontiffs can dispense pardons and indulgences to an almost unlimited extent. Piscator held that Christ redeemed us only by his death or by his sufferings, and not as was then generally held, by both his active and his passive

This small beginning was followed by other far more important steps, among which some were so irregular that the most modest and the most averse from contention among the French themselves could not approve of them.¹

14. Two divines of Saumur, first John Cameron and afterwards Moses Amyraut, a man distinguished for perspicacity and erudition, devised a method of reconciling the doctrine of the Genevans respecting the divine decrees as expounded at Dort, with the views of those who hold that the love of God embraces the whole human race. And Amyraut, from about the year 1634, pursued this most difficult of all objects with so much zeal and with so great vigour of genius, that to gain his point he changed a great part of the received system of theology. His plan, which was too extensive to be here fully detailed, was substantially this: That God wishes the salvation of all men whatever, and that no mortal is excluded from the benefits of Christ by any divine decree, but that no one can become a partaker either of the benefits of Christ or of salvation, unless he believes in Christ. And that God, in his boundless goodness, has withheld from no one the power or ability to believe; but he by no means assists all so to use this power as to obtain salvation. Hence it is that so many thousands of men perish through their own fault and not by the fault of God.² Those who embraced this scheme were called Hypothetical Universalists, because they believed that God is disposed indeed to show mercy to all, yet only on the condition that they believe in Christ. It is the opinion of many that this doctrine does not differ from that maintained at Dort, except as Hercules' naked club differed from the same when painted and adorned with ribands, that is, very slightly. But I doubt whether such obedience. His arguments were, that Christ, as being a man, was bound to obey the will of God perfectly; so that he could not do more than he was under personal obligation to perform. Moreover, that if Christ had perfectly obeyed the law in man's stead, then men would not be under obligation to obey it themselves, because it would be unjust in God to require obedience twice over, once from our representative and then again from us. Besides, if Christ in our stead both obeyed the law and suffered the penalty of its violation, then the law had been doubly satisfied; or God had received the obedience he required, and yet inflicted the penalty for disobedience.—Mur.

1 MacLaine is here out of all patience with Mosheim, and taxes him with bringing a groundless and malignant charge against the whole body of the French Reformed church. But MacLaine appears excited beyond what the occasion required. The five following sections, namely, 14–18, detail the facts, in view of which Mosheim made the assertion contained in the close of this section. Let the reader carefully peruse them, and then judge how far Mosheim deserves rebuke.—Mur.

² See Jäger's Historia Eccles. et Politicæ sæculi xvii. decenn. iv. p. 522, &c.

persons have duly considered, both the principles from which it is derived and the consequences to which it leads. After considering and reconsidering it, it appears to me to be Arminianism, or, if you please, Pelagianism artificially dressed up and veiled in ambiguous terms; and in this opinion I feel myself greatly confirmed when I look at the more recent disciples of Amyraut, who express their views more clearly and more boldly than their master.³ The author of this doctrine was first attacked by some of the French [Protestant] Synods; but when they had examined the cause, they acquitted and dismissed him.⁴ He was assailed with greater violence by the celebrated Dutch divines, Andrew Rivet, Frederick Spanheim, Samuel des Marets (Maresius), and others; to whom Amyraut himself and afterwards the leading French divines, John Daillé (Dallæus), David Blondell, and others, made energetic replies.⁵ The vehement and long-protracted contest was productive of very little effect. For the opinions of Amyraut infected not only the Huguenot universities in France and nearly all the principal doctors, but also spread first to Geneva, and then with the French exiles through all the Reformed churches. Nor is there any one at the present day who ventures to speak against it.

15. From the same desire of softening certain Reformed doctrines, which afforded to the papists as well as to others much occasion for reproach, originated Joshua de la Place's (Placcus) opinion concerning the imputation of the sin committed by the parents of the human race. This theologian of Saumur, the colleague and intimate friend of Amyraut, in the year 1640, denied the doctrine then generally inculcated in the Reformed schools, that the sin of the first man was imputed to his posterity; and maintained on the contrary, that each person's own inherent defilement and disposition to sin is attributed to him by God as his crime, or, to use the language of theologians, he contended that original sin is imputed to men, not immediately but only mediately. This opinion was condemned as erroneous in the Synod of Charenton, A.D. 1642, and was confuted by many theologians of great respectability among the Swiss and the Dutch.¹ And De la Place, influenced by the love of peace, did not think proper to offer any public defence of it.² But neither his silence nor the condemnation of the synod could prevent this doctrine from commending itself to the minds of very many of the French as being reasonable, or from spreading through them into other countries. In the number of those who were disposed to gratify the papists at the expense of the religion of their fathers, many have placed Lewis Cappel, another divine of Saumur, who in a long and elaborate work³ attempted to prove that the Hebrew vowel points were not inserted by the inspired writers, but were added in more recent times. This indeed is certain, that his opinion pleased the Romanists, who thought it very useful to weaken the authority of the sacred Scriptures and depress them below the unwritten word [or tradition]. It was therefore the more earnestly and learnedly opposed by great numbers of the best Hebricians, both among the Lutherans and the Reformed.⁴

³ Schlegel expresses much regret that Mosheim, neither here nor in his lectures, more clearly showed how a disguised Pelagianism lies concealed under this scheme of the Hypothetical Universalists. And he refers us to his notes on cent. v. part ii. chap. v. sec. 23 and 26 [note 4, p. 208; and notes I and 2, p. 211, above.—R.] to show that this scheme of Amyraut was not in reality Pelagianism nor even Semi-pelagianism.—Mur. [The student should consult Hagenbach's Compendium of the Hist. of Doctrines, Buch's translation, vol. ii. p. 264, &c.—R.]

⁴ See Aymon's Actes des Synodes Nationaux des Eglises Réformées de France, tome ii. p. 571, &c. p. 604, &c. [Quick's Synodicon, vol. ii. p. 352, &c. 397, &c. 455.—Mur.] Blondell's Actes Authentiques des Eglises Réformées touchant la Paix et la Charité Fraternelle, p. 19, &c. p. 82, Amsterdam, 1655, 4to.

⁵ Bayle's Dictionnaire, tome i. art. Amyraut, p. 182; art. Daillé, tome ii. p. 947, &c.; art. Blondell; tome i. p. 571, &c.; Pfaff, De Formula Consensus, cap. i. p. 4 &c. and others.

16. All these divines, though they incurred much odium, yet obtained the approbation of very many, and the candour of subsequent times has pronounced them to be free from censure; but those were less fortunate who have been already mentioned as openly meditating a union of the French Reformed church with that subject to Romish sway, and likewise those who attempted so to explain or shape theology as to render a transition to the Romish party shorter and more easy. To this class belonged Lewis le Blanc, a divine of Sedan, and Claude Pajon, a minister at Orleans, both of whom were eloquent and men of great penetration. The former with great perspicuity so treated various controversies which divide the Protestants from the papists, as to show that some of them were mere contests about words, and that others were of much less importance than was commonly supposed.⁵ Hence he is much censured to this day by all those who think great care should be taken, lest by filing down and lessening too much the cause of disagreement, the truth should be exposed to danger.⁶ This acute man left behind him a sect, which however being very odious to most persons, either conceals or very cautiously states its real sentiments.

17. Claude Pajon appeared to explain and to adulterate that part of the Reformed religion which treats of the native depravity of man, his power to do good, the grace of God, and the conversion of the soul to God, by the principles and tenets of the Cartesian philosophy which he had thoroughly imbibed. But what his opinions really were, it is very difficult to determine; whether this arises from his intentional concealment of his real sentiments by the use of ambiguous phraseology, or from the negligence or the malice of his adversaries, I cannot readily decide. If we believe his adversaries, he supposed that man has more holiness and more ability to reform himself than is generally apprehended; that what is called original sin cleaves only to the understanding, and consists principally in the obscurity and defectiveness of man's views of religious subjects; that this depravity of the human understanding excites the will to evil inclinations and actions;

¹ Aymon, Synodes des Eglises Réformées de France, tome ii. p. 680. [Quick's Synodicon, vol. ii. p. 473. He maintained hereditary depravity, which he accounted criminal and a just ground of punishment, but denied the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity.—Mur.] La Place advanced his opinion in his Theses Theologicæ de Statu Hominis Lapsi ante Gratiâ, 1640, which are inserted in the Synlogma Thesium Theologicar. in Academiâ Salmuriensi disputatarum, par. i. p. 205, &c. He was understood by some to deny all imputation of Adam's sin, and was first brought into trouble on the subject in the year 1645, when Antony Garissol, a divine of Montauban, and others accused him before the national synod at Charenton. Amyraut, though he adhered to the common doctrine, defended him, but his opinion was disapproved by the synod. Many censured the decision of the synod as being hasty and unjust, because La Place was condemned uncited and unheard, his opinion being misapprehended and Garissol his accuser being allowed to preside in the synod. La Place himself was so cool, dispassionate, and peaceful, that he defended his assailed reputation by no public writing, but patiently waited for the meeting of a new synod; until at last the unceasing outcry of his opposers in 1655, compelled him to publish a new Disputation, De Imputatione primi Peccati Adami, in which he showed that the synod did not understand his doctrine, since he denied merely the immediate imputation of Adam's sin (an imputation arising from the sovereign decree of God) and not the mediate imputation or one naturally consequent on the descent of men from Adam. Yet this explanation did not satisfy his excited opponents. Andrew Rivet, Samuel des Marets, and Francis Turretin did not cease to assail him; and by instigation of the last named, the belief of immediate imputation was settled as an article of faith by the church of Geneva in the year 1678. See Weismann's Historia Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 919.—Schli.

² See Weismann's Hist. Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 817.

³ In his Aræum Punctionis Revelatum, which with his Vindiciæ may be found in his works, Amstærd. 1689, fol. and in the Critica Sacra Vet. Test. Paris, 1650, fol.

⁴ See Wolf's Bibliotheca Hebraica, par. ii. p. 27, &c.

⁵ In his Theses Theologicæ, which are well worth reading. The copy before me was printed at London, 1675, fol. but there have been a number of editions of them.

⁶ See Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome i. article Beaulieu, p. 458, &c. (His whole name was Lewis le Blanc, Sieur de Beaulieu. See the brief notice of him in note 2, p. 745, above.—Mur.) that it is to be cured, not by the powers of nature, but by the influences of the Holy Spirit acting through the medium of the divine word; that this word however does not possess any inherent divine power or any physical or hyperphysical energy, but only a moral influence; that is, it reforms the human understanding in the same manner as human truth does, namely, by exhibiting clear and correct views of religious subjects, and solid arguments which evince the agreement of the truths of Christianity with correct reason and their divinity; and therefore that every man, if his power were not weakened and prostrated by either internal or external impediments, might renew his own mind by the use of his reason and by meditation on revealed truth, without the extraordinary aid of the Holy Spirit.¹ But Pajon himself asserts, that he believed and professed all that is contained in the decisions of Dort and in the other confessions and catechisms of the Reformed. He complains that his opinions were misunderstood; and states that he does not deny all immediate operation of the Holy Spirit on the minds of those who are converted to God, but only such an immediate operation as is unconnected with the word of God; in other words, that he cannot agree with those who think that the word of God is only an external and inoperative sign of an immediate divine operation.² This last proposition is manifestly ambiguous and captious. He finally adds, that we ought not to contend about the manner in which the Holy Spirit operates on the minds of men; that it is sufficient if a person holds this one point, that the Holy Spirit is the author of all that is good in us. The sentiments of Pajon, however, were condemned, not only by the principal reformed divines, but also by some synods of the French church in 1677, and by a Dutch synod at Rotterdam in 1686.

18. This controversy, which was in a measure settled and ended by the death of Pajon, was propagated in many books and discourses throughout England, Holland, and Germany, by Isaac Papin, a Frenchman of Blois, and sister's son to Pajon. Throwing off all disguise, he ventured to express himself much more coarsely and harshly than his uncle. He declared that the opinion of his uncle was this:—That man has even more power than is necessary to enable him to understand divine truth; that for the reformation and regeneration of the soul nothing more is required than to remove an unsound state of the body by medical aid, if such a state happens to exist, and then to place before the understanding truth and error, and before the will virtue and vice clearly and distinctly, with their appropriate arguments. This and the other opinions of Papin, Peter Jurieu, among others, a celebrated divine of Rotterdam, confuted with uncommon wrath in the years 1686, 1687, and 1688. They were also condemned by the synod of Bois-le-Duc in 1687, and still more severely by the synod at the Hague in 1688, which also ejected the man from the Reformed church. Provoked by this severity, Papin who in other things manifested fine talents, returned to France in the year 1689, and the next year revolted to the Romish church in which he died in the year 1709.³ Some think he was treated unjustly, and that his opinions were misrepresented by his mortal adversary, Jurieu; but how true this may be, I cannot say. A defence of the Paionian sentiment was likewise attempted in 1684, in several tracts by Charles le Cène, a French divine of a vigorous mind who has given us a French translation of the Bible.⁴ But as he entirely discarded and denied the natural depravity of man, and taught that we can regenerate ourselves by our own power, by attentively listening to divine truth, especially if we enjoy also the advantages of a good education, good examples, &c. hence some contend that his scheme of doctrine differs in many respects from that of Pajon.⁵

19. The English church was agitated with most violent storms and tempests. When James I. king of Scotland, on the death of Elizabeth ascended the throne of England, the Puritans or friends of the Genevan dis-

¹ See Spanheim, Append. ad Elenchum Contrroversiarum, Opp. tom. iii. p. 882, &c.; Jurieu, Traité de la Nature et de la Grâce, p. 35, &c.; Lœschner, Exercit. de Claud. Pajonii ejusque Sæcutor. Doctrina et Fatis, Lips. 1692, 12mo. [Spanheim was a more candid adversary of Pajon than Jurieu. Weismann (Historia Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 942) follows Jurieu for the most part, and is too severe upon Pajon, who had no other aim than to guard against fanaticism and enthusiasm, and probably viewed the word of God with higher reverence than many of his opponents did.—Schli.

² See the tract which Pajon himself composed, and which is inserted in Chauffepié's Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. et Critique, tome ii. art. Cène, p. 164, &c.

³ See Jurieu, De la Nature et de la Grâce, and in other writings. Möller, Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 608, &c. and others. [According to Möller, ubi supra, Papin's scheme of doctrine grew out of his Cartesian philosophy. He supposed that in creating the world, God so formed and constituted all things, that he never has occasion to interpose his immediate agency, unless when a miracle is necessary. Of course, that the conversion of sinners is brought about, as well as all other events are, by the operation of natural causes.—Mur.

⁴ This translation was published after the author's death, Amsterd. 1741, fol. and was condemned by the Dutch synods.

⁵ See the Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. et Critique, art. Cène, tome ii. p. 160, &c.

cipline, indulged no little hope that their condition would be meliorated, and that they should no longer be exposed to the continual wrongs of the Episcopalians; for the king had been born and educated among the Scotch who were Puritans.¹ And his first movements corresponded well with these expectations, and seemed to announce that he would assume the character of mediator between the opposing parties.² But on a sudden everything assumed a different

¹ And had, on some occasions, made the strongest declaration of his attachment to their ecclesiastical constitution. In a General Assembly held at Edinburgh, in the year 1590, this prince is said to have made the following declaration:—"I praise God that I was born in the time of the light of the gospel, and in such a place as to be king of the sincerest (i.e. purest) kirk in the world. The kirk of Geneva keep pasche and yule (i.e. Easter and Christmas). What have they for them? They have no institution. As for our neighbour kirk of England, their service is an evil-said mass in English; they want nothing of the mass but the liftings (i.e. the elevation of the host). I charge you, my good ministers, doctors, elders, nobles, gentlemen, and barons, to stand to your purity, and to exhort your people to do the same, and I forsooth, as long as I brook my life, shall do the same." Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, fol. edit. p. 256.—MacI.

² King James professed himself attached to the Church of Scotland, until his removal to England in April, 1603. While on his journey, all religious parties in England made their court to him. To the Dutch and French Protestants settled in the country, he gave favourable answers. The bishops negotiated with him by their envoys. The Universities of Oxford and Cambridge addressed him in behalf of the establishment, and the Puritans presented their petition in favour of a reform of the church. One petition of the latter signed by about 800 Puritan ministers, was called the Millenary Petition, from the signatures to it amounting to almost a thousand. In October, 1603, the king appointed a conference at Hampton Court, to be held the January following, between the Episcopalians and the Puritans, with a view to settle their controversies. On the side of the Episcopalians were nine bishops and about as many dignitaries of the church; and on the part of the Puritans were four English divines and one from Scotland, all of whom were selected by the king himself. On the first day of the conference, Jan. 14, 1604, the Episcopalians alone were admitted to the royal presence, and the king made some few objections to the English ritual and discipline, which the bishops either vindicated or consented to modify. The second day, Jan. 16th, the Puritans were admitted, and proceeded to state their wishes. But the king treated them harshly, and allowed the Episcopalians to browbeat them. The bishops had a complete triumph; and Bancroft, falling on his knees, said, "I protest my heart melteth for joy that Almighty God, of his singular mercy, has given us such a king as since Christ's time has not been." On the third day, Jan. 18th, the bishops and deans were first called in, to settle with the king what alterations should be made in the regulations of the church. Archbishop Whitgift was so allowed to hear the king's approval of the law for the oath ex officio, that he exclaimed, "Undoubtedly, your majesty speaks by the special assistance of God's Spirit." After this, the Puritans were called in, not to discuss the points in controversy, but merely to hear what had been agreed upon by the king and the bishops. Thus ended this mock conference, in which the king showed himself exceedingly vain and insolent towards the Puritans, and wholly on the side of the Episcopalians. The next month a proclamation was issued, giving an account of the conference and requiring conformity to the liturgy and ceremonies. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. chap. i. p. 30. &c. and the authors there referred to; also Grant's History of the English Church and Sects, &c. vol. ii. chap. ix. p. 53, &c.—Mur.

aspect. King James, who was eager to grasp supreme and unlimited power, at once judged that the Presbyterian form of church government was adverse to his designs, and the Episcopal favourable to them; because Presbyterian churches form a kind of republic, which is subject to a number of leading men all possessing equal rank and power, while Episcopal churches more nearly resemble a monarchy. The very name of a republic, synod, or council, was odious to the king, and he therefore studied most earnestly to increase the power of the bishops, and publicly declared that without bishops the throne could not be safe.³ At the same time, he long wished to preserve inviolate the Genevan doctrines, especially those relating to divine grace and predestination, and he allowed the opposite doctrines of Arminius to be condemned by his theologians at the synod of Dort. This disposition of the king was studiously cherished, so long as he had power by George Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, a man of great weight of character, who was himself devoted to Calvinistic sentiments and was a great friend to English liberty, and whose gentleness towards their fathers the modern Puritans highly extol.⁴ But the English envoys had scarcely returned from Holland and made known the decisions of Dort, when the king with the majority of the clergy showed himself most averse from these decisions, and manifested a decided preference for the Arminian doctrine respecting the divine decrees.⁵ That there were various ³ It was a maxim with him, and one which he repeated at the Hampton Court conference, "No bishop, no king." See Neal, ubi supra.—Mur.

⁴ See Wood's Athena Oxonienses, tom. i. p. 583; Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. ch. iv. p. 242 [and the long note of MacIaine on the text.—Mur.] Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, vol. i. p. 114, &c.

⁵ Heylin's History of the Five Articles, p. 444, &c. in the Dutch translation of Gerh. Brandt; Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. chap. ii. p. 117, &c. Neal tells us that the Council of Dort was ridiculed in England by the following verses, among other things:

Dordrechtli Synodus, Nodus; Chorus integer, Eger; Conventus, Ventus; Sesele, Stramen; Amen.

Moreover, for ascertaining the character and conduct of king James and his inconstancy in religion, much aid is afforded by the writers of English history, and especially by Larrey and Rapin. Most of these state that in his last years James greatly favoured not only the Arminians but also the papists; and they tell us there can be doubt the king wished to unite the English church with that of Rome. But in this, I apprehend, the king is too severely accused, although I do not deny that he did many things not to be commended. It is not easy to believe that a king who aspired immediately after supreme and absolute sway, should wish to create to himself a lord in the Roman pontiff. [Yet see the following note.—Mur.] But at length he inclined more towards the Romish church than formerly, and he permitted some things which were coincident with the Romish rites and regulations; because, with most of the bishops, he was persuaded that the ancient Christian church was the exemplar after which all churches should copy; that a religious community would be the more holy and the more perfect the nearer its resem-causes for this unexpected change will readily be believed by those acquainted with the history of those times; yet the principal cause, I apprehend, is to be sought in that rule for ecclesiastical reformation which the founders of the new English church kept in sight. For they wished to render their church as similar as possible to that which flourished in the early centuries, and that church, as no one can deny, was an entire stranger to the Dordracene doctrines.¹ The king becoming alienated from the Calvinistic opinions and customs, the old hatred against the Puritans which had somewhat subsided again revived; and at last it broke out in open war. In short, James I. died in 1625, a mortal enemy of the Puritan faith which he had imbibed in his youth, a decided patron and supporter of the Arminians whose condemnation he had greatly promoted, and a very strenuous assertor of episcopal government; and he left both the church and the commonwealth in a very unsettled state, and languishing with intestine maladies.

20. Charles I. the son of James, determined to perfect what his father had undertaken. He therefore used every effort, first, to extend the regal power and to exalt it above the authority of the laws; secondly, to subject the whole church of Great Britain and Ireland to the Episcopal form of government, which he considered as of divine appointment and as affording the balance to that divine and apostolic standard; and that the Romish church retained more of the first and primitive form than the Puritan or Calvinistic church did.

¹ Perhaps also the king was influenced by the recollection of the civil commotions formerly excited in Scotland on account of the Presbyterian religion. There are some circumstances likewise which indicate that the king, even before he came into England, was not wholly averse from the Romish religion. See the Bibliothèque Raisonnée, tome xliii. p. 318, &c. [Thus far the note of our author; and whoever looks into the Historical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Brussels, from the year 1592 to 1617, extracted from the MS. State Papers of Sir Thomas Edmondes and Anthony Bacon, Esq. and published in the year 1749, by the learned and judicious Dr. Birch, will be persuaded that towards the year 1595 this fickle and unsteady prince had really formed a design to embrace the faith of Rome. See in the curious collection now mentioned, the postscript of a letter from Sir Thomas Edmondes to the lord high-treasurer, dated the 20th of December, 1595. We learn also from the Memoirs of Ralph Winwood, that in the year 1596, James sent Mr. Ogilby, a Scotch baron, into Spain, to assure his Catholic majesty that he was then ready and resolved to embrace popery, and to propose an alliance with that king and the pope against the queen of England. See State Tracts, vol. i. p. 1. See also an extract of a letter from Tobie Matthew, D.D. dean of Durham, to the lord treasurer Burleigh, containing an information of Scotch affairs, in Strype's Annals, vol. iv. p. 201. Above all, see Harris's Historical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of James I. p. 29, note (N). This last writer may be added to Larrey and Rapin who have exposed the piliblancy and inconsistency of this self-sufficient monarch.
—Macl.

best security to the civil sovereign; and thirdly, to reduce the whole religion of the country to the pattern and form of the primitive church, rejecting all the doctrines and institutions of the Genevans. The execution of these designs was principally entrusted to William Laud, then bishop of London and afterwards, from A.D. 1633, archbishop of Canterbury, who was in many respects undoubtedly a man of eminence, being a very liberal patron of learning and learned men, resolute, ingenious, and erudite, but at the same time too furious, headlong, and inconsiderate, inclined to superstition, and also bigotedly attached to the opinions, rites, and practices of the ancient Christians, and therefore a mortal enemy of the Puritans and of all Calvinists.² He prosecuted the objects of the king's wishes as well as his own without any moderation, often disregarded and trampled upon the laws of the land, persecuted the Puritans most rigorously, and eagerly strove to extirpate them altogether; rejecting Calvinistic views in relation to predestination and other points, he after the year 1625, contrary to the wishes of George Abbot, substituted Arminian sentiments in place of them;³ restored many ceremonies and rites which were indeed ancient but at the same time superstitious and on that ground previously abrogated; obtruded bishops upon the Scottish nation, which was accustomed to the Genevan discipline and extremely averse to episcopacy; and not obscurely showed that in his view the Romish church, though erroneous, was a holier and better church than those Protestant communities which had no bishops. Having by these acts excited immense odium

² See Wood's Athena Oxoniens. tom. ii. p. 55, &c.; Heylin's Cyprianus Anglicus, or the History of the Life and Death of William Laud, London, 1688, fol. Clarendon's History of the Rebellion and the Civil Wars in England, vol. i. [Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. chap. iv. &c. and vol. iii. chap. v.—Mur.

³ See Le Vassor's Histoire de Louis XIII. tome v. p. 262, &c. [Laud was then merely bishop of London, though in effect at the head of the established church. Legally, neither he nor any prelate nor even the king could abrogate or enact articles of faith, without the consent of Parliament. Nor was any such thing attempted. But the king, at the instigation (it is stated) of bishop Laud, issued a proclamation, January 24, 1626, which sets forth, "That the king will admit of no innovation in the doctrine, discipline, or government of the church, and therefore charges all his subjects, and especially the clergy, not to publish or maintain, in preaching or writing, any new inventions or opinions contrary to the said doctrine and discipline established by law." This apparently harmless proclamation was of course to be executed by Laud and his associates, and Laud was publicly accused of using it to punish and put down Calvinists, and to prevent their books from being printed and circulated, while Arminians were allowed to preach and to print their sentiments most fully. See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. chap. iii. p. 192, &c. and vol. iii. chap. v. p. 222, &c. and Maclaine's note (m) on this paragraph.—Mur.

against the king and himself and the whole order of bishops, he was arraigned by the parliament in 1644, judged guilty of betraying the liberties and the religion of the country, and beheaded.¹ After the execution of Laud, the civil conflict which had long existed between the king and the parliament attained such a height, that it could be extinguished by nothing short of the life of this excellent prince. The Parliament, inflamed by the Puritans or by the Presbyterians and Independents, wholly abolished the old form of church government by bishops, and whatever else in doctrine, discipline, or worship was contrary to the principles of the Genevans, furiously assailed the king himself, and caused him when taken prisoner to be tried for his life, and, to the astonishment of all Europe, to be put to death in the year 1648. Such are the evils resulting from zeal in religion, when it is ill understood and placed in external regulations and forms. Moreover, as is often found true, it appeared in these scenes of commotion that almost all sects while oppressed plead earnestly for charity and moderation towards dissenters, but, when elevated to power, they forget their own former precepts. For the Puritans, when they had dominion, were no more indulgent to the bishops and their patrons than these had formerly been to them.²

¹ Archbishop Laud was impeached by the House of Commons, and tried before the House of Lords. In 1641, fourteen articles of impeachment were filed, and Laud was committed to prison. In 1644, ten additional articles were brought forward, and the trial now commenced. All the articles may be reduced to three general heads:—I. That he had traitorously attempted to subvert the rights of parliament, and to exalt the king's power above law. II. That he had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the constitution and fundamental laws of the land, and to introduce arbitrary government against law and the liberties of the subjects. III. That he had traitorously endeavoured and practised to subvert the true religion established by law, and to introduce popish superstition and idolatry. Under this last head the specifications were, first, that he introduced and practised popish innovations and superstitious ceremonies not warranted by law, such as images and pictures in the churches, popish consecration of churches, converting the communion-tables into altars, bowing before the altar, &c.; and secondly, that he endeavoured to subvert the Protestant religion and encouraged Arminianism and popery, by patronising and advancing clergymen of these sentiments, by prohibiting the publication of orthodox books and allowing corrupt ones free circulation, by persecuting in the high commission court those who preached against Arminianism and popery, and by taking some direct steps towards a union with the church of Rome. The House of Lords deemed all the articles proved, but doubted for a time whether they amounted to treason. See the whole trial of Laud, in Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iii. chap. v. p. 184-255.—Mur.

² Besides Lord Clarendon, and the historians of England already mentioned, Neal has professedly treated of these events, in the 2d and 3d volumes of his History of the Puritans. [Compare also Grant's History of the English Church and Sects, vol. ii. chap. x. xl. p. 127-303.—Mur. (See also the historical works of Brodie, Hallam, and Mackintosh, on this period of British history.—R.

21. The Independents, who have been just mentioned among the promoters of civil discord, are represented by most of the English historians as more odious and unreasonable than even the Presbyterians or Calvinists, and are commonly charged with various enormities and crimes, and indeed with the parricide against Charles I. But I apprehend that whoever shall candidly read and consider the books and the Confessions of the sect, will cheerfully acknowledge that many crimes are unjustly charged upon them, and that perhaps the misconduct of the civil Independents (that is, of those hostile to the regal power and who strove after extravagant liberty) has been incautiously charged upon the religious Independents.³ They derived their name

³ The sect of the Independents, though a modern one and still existing among the English, is however less known than almost any Christian sect ancient or modern, and on no one are more marks of infamy branded without just cause. The best English historians heap upon it all the reproaches and slanders which can be thought of; nor is it the Episcopallians only who do this, but also those very Presbyterians with whom they are at this day associated. They are represented not only as delirious, crazy, fanatical, illiterate, rude, factious, and strangers to all religious truth and to reason, but also as criminals, seditious parricides, and the sole authors of the murder of Charles I. John Durell (whom that most strenuous vindicator of the Independents, Lewis du Moulin, commends for his ingenuities, see Wood's Athena Oxon. tom. ii. p. 732, 733), in his Historia Rituum Sanctæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, cap. i. p. 4, London, 1672, 4to, says: "Pateor, si atrocis illius tragædiæ tot actus fuerint, quot ludicrarum esse solent, postremum fere Independentium fuisse.—Adeo ut non acute inagis, quam vere, dixerit l'Estrangius noster: Regem primo a Presbyterianis interemptum, Carolum deinde ab Independentibus interfectum." Foreign writers, regarding these as the best witnesses of transactions in their own country, have of course thought proper to follow them; and hence the Independents almost everywhere appear under a horrid aspect. But as every class of men is composed of dissimilar persons, no one will deny that in this sect also there were some persons who were turbulent, factious, wicked, flagitious, and destitute of good sense. Yet if that is also true which all wise and good men inculcate, that the character and the principles of whole sects must be estimated, not from the conduct or words of a few individuals but from the customs, habits, and opinions of the sect in general, from the books and discourses of its teachers, and from its public formularies and confessions, then I am either wholly deceived or the Independents are wrongfully loaded with so many criminalities.

We pass over what has been so invidiously written against this sect by Clarendon, Echard, Parker, and many others; and to render this whole subject the more clear, we will take up only that one excellent writer, than whom, though a foreigner, no one, as the English themselves admit, has written more accurately and neatly concerning the affairs of England, namely, Rapin. In the twenty-first book of his immortal work, the Histoire d'Angleterre, vol. viii. p. 535, second ed. [Tindal's translation, vol. ii. p. 514, fol.] he so depicts the Independents, that, if they were truly what he represents them, they would not deserve to enjoy the light in their country which they still do enjoy freely, and much less to share in the kind offices and love of any good man. Let us particularly survey and briefly comment on the declarations of this great man concerning them. In the first place, he tells us that, after the utmost pains, he could not ascertain the origin of the sect: "Quelque recherche que j'ai faite, je n'ai jamais pu découvrir exactement la première origine de la secte ou faction des Independents." That a man who had from the fact, that with the Brownists they believed that individual churches are all Independent or subject to no foreign jurisspent seventeen years in composing a History of England and consulted so many libraries filled with the rarest books, should have written thus, is very strange. If he had only looked into that well-known book, Hornbeck's Summa controversiarum, lib. x. p. 775, &c. he might easily have learned what he was ignorant of, after so much research. He proceeds to the doctrines of the sect, and says of them in general that nothing could be better suited to throw all England into confusion:—"Ce qu'il y a de certain c'est qu'ils avoient des principes tout à fait propres à mettre l'Angleterre en combustion, comme ils le firent effectivement." How true this declaration is will appear from what follows. He adds, first, respecting politics they held very pernicious sentiments. For they would not have a single man preside over the whole state, but thought the government of the nation should be entrusted to the representatives of the people:—"Par rapport au gouvernement de l'état, ils abhorroient la monarchie, et n'approuvoient qu'un gouvernement républicain." I can readily believe that there were persons among the Independents unfriendly to monarchy. Such were to be found among the Presbyterians, the Anabaptists, and all the sects which then flourished in England. But I wish to see decisive testimony adduced, if it can be, to prove that this was the common sentiment of this whole sect. Such testimony is in vain sought for in their public writings. On the contrary, in the year 1647 they publicly declared, "that they do not disapprove of any form of civil government, but do freely acknowledge that a kingly government, bounded by just and wholesome laws, is both allowed by God and a good accommodation unto men." See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iii. p. 146. I pass over other proofs, equally conclusive, that they did not abhor all monarchy. Their religious opinions, according to our author, were most absurd. For if we may believe him, their sentiments were contrary to those of all other sects:—"Sur la religion, leurs principes étoient opposés à ceux de tout le reste du monde." There are extant in particular two Confessions of the Independents; the one of those in Holland, the other of those in England. The first was drawn up by John Robinson, the founder of the sect, and was published at Leyden, 1619, 4to, entitled, Apologia pro Ecclesia Angliæ, qui Brownistæ vulgo appellantur. The latter was printed, London, 1658, 4to, entitled, A Declaration of the Faith and Order owned and practised in the Congregational Churches in England [more than one hundred in number.—Mur.] agreed upon and consented unto by their elders and messengers in their meeting at the Savoy, October 12, 1658. John Hornbeck translated it into Latin in 1659, and annexed it to his Epistle to Duræus, De Independentismo. From both these, to say nothing of their other books, it is manifest that if we except the form of their church government, they differed in nothing of importance from the Calvinists or Presbyterians. But to remove all doubt, let us hear the father of the Independents, Robinson himself, explaining the views of himself and his flock, in his Apologia pro Ecclesia Angliæ, p. 7, 11:—"Profitetur coram Deo et hominibus, adeo nobis convenire cum ecclesiis Reformatis Belgicis in re religionis, ut omnibus et singulis earundem ecclesiarum fidei articulis, prout habentur in Harmonia Confessionum fidei, parati sumus subscribere.—Ecclesiæ Reformatas pro veris et genuinis habemus, cum hisdem in sacris Dei communionem profitemur et quantum in nobis est colimus." So far therefore were they from differing altogether from all other sects of Christians, that on the contrary they agreed exactly with the greatest part of the Reformed churches. To show by an example how absurd the religion of the Independents was, this eminent historian tells us that they not only rejected all ecclesiastical government and order, but also made the business of preaching and praying in public and explaining the Scriptures common to all:—"Non seulement ils ne pouvoient souffrir l'épiscopat et l'hérarchie ecclésiastique" (this is true; but it was a fault not peculiar to them, but chargeable also on the Presbyterians, the Brownists, the Anabaptists, and all the sects of the Nonconformists), "mais ils ne vouloient pas même qu'il y eut des ministres ordinaires dans diction, and that they should not be compelled to obey the authority and laws either of bishops or of councils composed l'Eglise. Ils soutenoient que chacun pouvoit prier en public, exhorter ses frères, expliquer l'Ecriture Sainte, selon les talens qu'il avoit reçus de Dieu.—Ainsi parmi eux chacun prioit, prêchoit, exhortoit, expliquoit la S. Ecriture, sans autre vocation que celle qu'il tiroit lui-même de son zèle et des talens qu'il croyoit avoir, et sans autre autorité que celle que luy donnoit l'approbation de ses auditeurs." All this is manifestly false. The Independents employ, and have employed from the first, fixed and regular teachers; nor do they allow every one to teach who may deem himself qualified for it. The excellent historian here confounds the Independents with the Brownists, who are well known to allow to all a right to teach. I pass over other assertions, notwithstanding they are equally open to censure. Now, if so great a man, after residing long among the English, pronounced so unjust a sentence upon this sect, who will not readily pardon others much his inferiors who have loaded this sect with groundless accusations? [On all these charges, see Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iii. chap. iv. p. 157, &c.—Mur.]

But this (some one may say) is certain from numerous testimonies, that the Independents put that excellent king Charles I. to death, and this single fact evinces the extreme impiety and depravity of the sect. I am aware that the best and most respectable English historians charge them alone with this regicide. And I fully agree with them, provided we are to understand by the term Independents those persons who were hostile to regal power and attached to an extravagant kind of liberty. But if the term is used to denote the ancestors of those Independents who still exist among the English, or a certain religious sect differing from the other English sects in certain religious opinions, I am not clear that their assertion is quite true. Those who represent the Independents as the sole authors of the atrocious deed committed on Charles I. must necessarily mean to say either that the nefarious parricides were excited to the deed by the suggestions and the doctrines of the Independents, or that they were all adherents of the worship and the doctrines of the Independents, neither of which is capable of solid proof. In the doctrines of the sect, as we have seen, there was nothing which could excite any one to attempt such a crime; nor does the history of those times show that there was any more hatred or malevolence towards Charles I. in the Independents than in the Presbyterians. And that all those who put the king to death were Independents is so far from being true, that, on the contrary, several of the best English historians and even the edicts of Charles II. testify, that this turbulent company was mixed and composed of persons of various religions. And I can easily admit that there were some Independents among them. After all, this matter will be best unravelled by the English themselves, who know better than we in what sense the term Independents must be used when it is applied to those who brought Charles I. to the block. [According to Neal, ubi supra, vol. iii. p. 515, &c. 521, &c. 533, no one religious denomination is chargeable with the regicide, but only the army and the House of Commons, both of which were composed of men of various religions. Only two Congregational ministers approved the putting Charles to death, and the Presbyterian clergy in a body remonstrated against it.—Mur.]

When I have carefully inquired for the reasons why the Independents are taxed with so many crimes and enormities, three reasons especially have occurred to my mind.—I. The term Independents is ambiguous and not appropriated to any one class of men. For not to mention other senses of it, the term is applied by the English to those friends of democracy who wish to have the people enact their own laws and govern themselves, and who will not suffer an individual or several individuals to bear rule in the state; or, to adhere to the letter of the name, who maintain that the people ought to be independent of all control except what arises from themselves. This faction, consisting in a great measure of mad fanatics, were the principal actors in that tragedy in England, the effects of which are still deplored. Hence whatever was said or done extravagantly or foolishly by this faction was I suspect, all charged upon of presbyters and delegates from several churches.¹ It is in this single opinion that they especially differ from the Presbyterians.² For whatever else they believe our Independents, who were not indeed altogether without faults, yet were far better than they. II. Nearly all the English sects which distracted the nation in the times of Charles I. and Oliver Cromwell, assumed the name of Independents in order to participate in that public esteem which the real Independents enjoyed on account of their upright conduct, and in order to screen themselves from reproach. This is attested, among others, by Toland in his letter to Le Clerc, inserted by the latter in his Biblioth. Universelle et Historique, tome xxiii. part ii. p. 506:—"Au commencement tous les sectaires se disoient Indépendans, par ce que ces derniers étoient fort honorez du peuple à cause de leur piété." Now, as the term was so extensively applied, who does not see that it might easily occur that the enormities of various sects should be all charged upon the genuine Independents? III. Oliver Cromwell, the usurper, gave a preference to the Independents before all the other sects in his country. For he was as much afraid of the councils or synods of the Presbyterians as he was of the bishops; but in the form of church government adopted by the Independents, there was nothing at all which he could fear. Now, as men of like character incline to associate together, this circumstance might lead many to suppose that the Independents were all of the same character with Cromwell, that is, very bad people.

¹ They undoubtedly received the name of Independents from their maintaining that all assemblies of Christians had the right of self-government, or were independent. This very term is used by Robinson, in his exposition of this doctrine in his Apologia pro Exulibus Angliæ, cap. v. p. 22, where he says: "Cœtum quælibet particulare (recte institutum et ordinatum) esse totam, integram, et perfectam ecclesiam ex suis partibus constantem immediate et independentem (quoad alias ecclesias) sub ipso Christo." And possibly from this very passage the term Independents, which was before unknown, had its origin. At first the followers of Robinson did not reject this appellation, nor has it any bad or odious import, provided it is understood in their own sense of it. In England it was entirely unknown till the year 1640. At least in the ecclesiastical canons enacted this year in the conventions held by the bishops of London and York, in which all the sects then existing in England are enumerated, there is no mention of the Independents. See the Constitutions and canons ecclesiastical treated upon by the arch-bishops of Canterbury and York; and the rest of the bishops and clergy, in their several synods, A.D. 1640, in Wilkin's Concilium Magnæ Britannię et Hiberniæ, tom. iv. cap. v. p. 548. But a little afterwards and especially after the year 1642, this appellation is of frequent occurrence in the annals of English history. Nor did the English Independents at first refuse to be called by this name, but in their apology published at London, 1644, 4to (Apologetical Narration of the Independents), they rather fearlessly assume this name. But afterwards, when as we have remarked many other sects adopted this name, and even seditious citizens who plotted the destruction of their king were commonly designated by it, they very solicitously deprecated the application of it to them, and called themselves Congregational Brethren, and their churches Congregational churches.

² There are two points of difference between the Presbyterians and the Independents or Congregationalists. The first relates to the independence of individual churches, or their exemption from any foreign jurisdiction. The second relates to the location of the legislative and judicial powers of each church. The Presbyterians assign these powers to the eldership of the church or to the pastor and the ruling elders assembled in a church session; but the Independents or Congregationalists confide them to a general meeting of all the male members of the church, or to the officers and the whole brotherhood assembled in a church meeting. From this latter principle it is that the Independents are called Congregationalists. And as in modern times they admit of a connexion or confederation of sister churches, which in some measure bounds or teach on religious subjects, with very few exceptions and those not of much importance, is almost throughout in accordance with the Genevan doctrines. The parent of the sect was John Robinson, minister of a Brownist church which was settled at Leyden in Holland, a grave and pious man. Perceiving that the discipline which Robert Brown had set up was in some respects defective, he undertook to correct it, and to give it such a form as would render it less odious than before. In two respects particularly are the Independents better than the Brownists; first, in moderation and candour, for they did not, as Brown had done, execrate and pronounce unworthy of the Christian name the churches which had adopted a different form of government; but they admitted that piety and true religion might flourish where the ecclesiastical affairs were subject to the authority of bishops or to the decrees of councils, notwithstanding they considered their own form of government as of divine institution, and as originating from Christ and his apostles. In the next place, the Independents excelled the Brownists by abolishing that liberty of teaching which Brown had allowed equally to all the brethren. For they have regular teachers, elected by the whole brotherhood, and they do not allow any one to deliver discourses to the people, unless he has been previously examined and approved by the officers of the church. This sect which began to exist in Holland in 1610, had very few adherents at first in England, and to escape the punishments decreed against Non-conformists, kept itself concealed;³ but on the decline of the power of the bishops in the time of Charles I. it took courage in the year 1640 and boldly showed itself in public. Afterwards it soon increased so much in reputation and in numbers, that it could compete for priority, not only with the Episcopalians, but also with the very powerful Presbyterians; which must be attributed, among other causes, to the erudition of its teachers and to the reformed morals of the people.⁴ During and limits the independence of the individual churches, they have discarded the name of Independents.—Mur.

³ In the year 1616, Mr. Jacob, who had adopted the religious sentiments of Robinson, set up the first Independent or Congregational church in England.—MacL.

⁴ Neal, History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 107, 391, 393, vol. iii. p. 141, 145, 276, 303, 537, 549; Böhm's Englische Reformationshistorie, book vi. chap. iv. p. 794. [A part of Mr. Robinson's congregation at Leyden removed to Plymouth in New England, in the year 1620. And during the reign of Charles I. and down even to the end of the century, great numbers of the English Independents removed to New England and there formed flourishing colonies; so that New England, for about two centuries, has contained more Independents or Congregationalists than Old England.—Mur.

the reign of Cromwell, who for various reasons was its greatest patron, it was everywhere in the highest reputation; but on the restoration of the English monarchy under Charles II. it began to decline greatly, and gradually sank into its former obscurity. At the present day it exists indeed but is timid and depressed; and in the reign of William III. A.D. 1691, it was induced by its weakness to enter into a coalition (yet without giving up its own regulations) with the Presbyterians resident in London and the vicinity.¹

¹ From this time onward they were called United Brethren. See Toland's letter, in Le Clerc's Biblioth. Universelle et Historique, tome xxiii. p. 506. [It must not be supposed that the distinction between Presbyterians and Congregationalists ceased in England from the year 1691, or that both have ever since formed but one sect. They still exist as distinct yet friendly sects. Being agreed in doctrines and anxious to hold communion with each other, notwithstanding their different modes of church government, they adopted these articles of agreement and consent, in which each sect endeavoured to come as near to the other as their different principles would admit. Moreover, these articles with very slight alterations were adopted by the Elders and Messengers of the churches of Connecticut, assembled at Saybrook in the year 1703; and they now form a part of what is called the Saybrook Platform or the ancient ecclesiastical constitution of Connecticut. See Trumbull's History of Connecticut, vol. i. p. 510, 513, 514. The Articles themselves may be seen in Toulmin's History of Dissenters, vol. ii. p. 130, &c. and in the Saybrook Platform, p. 99, &c.—Mur.] William Whiston published the articles of agreement in the Memoirs of his Life and Writings, vol. ii. p. 549, &c. They are nine in number. Article I. treats "of Churches and Church Members." Here, in sec. vi. the Presbyterians and Independents declare, "that each particular church hath right to choose their own officers, and hath authority from Christ for exercising government and of enjoying all the ordinances of worship within itself;" and sec. vii. that "in the administration of church power, it belongs to the pastors and other elders of every particular church (if such there be) to rule and govern, and to the brotherhood to consent according to the rule of the Gospel." Here both the Presbyterians and the Independents depart from their original principles. Article II. treats "of the Ministry," which they acknowledge to be an institution of Christ. They require the ministers of religion not only to be pious (sec. ii.) but also learned; and (sec. iii. iv. v.) would have them be elected by the church with the advice of the neighbouring churches, and also solemnly ordained. Article III. "of Censures," decrees that scandalous or offending members be first admonished, and if they do not reform, be excluded from the church by the pastors, but with the consent of the brethren. Article IV. "of Communion of Churches," declares all churches to be on a perfect equality and therefore independent, yet makes it the duty of the pastors and teachers to maintain a kind of communion of churches, and often to meet together and consult on the interests of the churches. Article V. "of Deacons and Ruling Elders." Here the United Brethren admit that the office of Deacon or curator of the poor is of divine appointment, and say: "Whereas divers are of opinion that there is also the office of Ruling Elders, who labour not in word and doctrine, and others think otherwise, we agree that this difference make no breach among us." Article VI. "of Synods," admits that it is useful and necessary in cases of importance, for the ministers of many churches to hold a council; and that the decisions formed in these conventions must not be rejected by the churches without the most weighty reasons. Article VII. "of our demeanour towards the civil Magistrate," promises obedience to magistrates and prayers for them. Article VIII. treats "of a Confession of Faith," and leaves the brethren free to judge whether the Thirty-nine Articles of the English church, or the Confession and Catechism

22. While Oliver Cromwell administered the government of Great Britain, all sects, even the vilest and most absurd, had full liberty to publish their opinions; the bishops alone and the friends of episcopal government were most unjustly oppressed and stripped of all their revenues and honours. By far the most numerous and influential of all were the Presbyterians and the Independents, the latter of whom were most favoured and extolled by Cromwell (who however actually belonged to no sect), and manifestly for the sake of curbing more easily the Presbyterians, who sought to acquire ascendancy.² In this period arose of the Westminster assembly, that is, of the Presbyterians, or lastly, the Confession of the Congregational Brethren published by the convention at the Savoy in 1658, be most agreeable to the Holy Scriptures. [Their words are: "As to what appertains to soundness of judgment in matters of faith, we esteem it sufficient that a church acknowledge the Scriptures to be the word of God, the perfect and only rule of faith and practice; and own either the doctrinal part of those commonly called the Articles of the church of England or the Confession or Catechism, shorter or larger, compiled by the assembly at Westminster, or the Confession agreed on at the Savoy, to be agreeable to the said rule."—Mur.] Article IX. "of our duty and deportment towards them that are not in communion with us," inculcates only love and moderation towards them. It hence appears that the Independents, induced by necessity, approached in many points towards the opinions of the Presbyterians, and departed from the principles of their ancestors. [As respects union and communion of churches, their mutual accountability, and perhaps also the powers and prerogatives of church officers, there was some change in the views of the Independents of England and also in America. But the English Presbyterians also softened considerably the rigours of Presbyterianism, as it was introduced and set up among them by the Scotch. This coalition of the two denominations tended to abate the zeal of both in maintaining the jus divinum of their respective systems of church government. For a considerable time, the Presbyterian and Congregational ministers in and near London continued to hold meetings for mutual consultation, and for regulating the licensing of candidates. And in some other counties of England similar united meetings were held. But ere long they were dropped, and the two denominations, though on friendly terms with each other, manage respectively their own ecclesiastical affairs in their own way.—Mur.]

² Mosheim's account of the Presbyterians is quite too meagre for those who are expected to read this translation of his work. It is therefore deemed necessary to introduce here a summary history, first of the Scottish church and then of the English Presbyterians, during this century [and of the Irish Presbyterians.—R.]

THE SCOTTISH CHURCH.—From his first arrival in England in 1603, king James set himself to undermine Presbyterianism in Scotland, and to establish Episcopacy on its ruins. For this purpose, he not only spoke contemptuously of the Presbyterians as being insolent men and enemies to regal power, but actually nominated bishops to the thirteen Scottish bishoprics; and in 1606 obtained from the parliament of Perth an act declaring the king to have sovereign authority over all estates, persons, and causes whatsoever in Scotland; and also an act restoring to the bishops their ancient possessions, which had been annexed to the crown. This made the new bishops peers of the realm. The General Assembly protested. But in 1608 a convention claiming to be a General Assembly declared the bishops perpetual moderators of all the Synods and Presbyteries. Another convention however was then sitting in opposition to this, and committees from both attempted a compromise. The bishops carried their point in 1609, and the next year the king, contrary to law, authorized them to hold High Commission Courts. In the same the Fifth-Monarchy-men, as they were called, delirious persons who would have turned the world upside down. They taught that Jesus Christ would personally year (1610), a corrupt assembly was held at Glasgow, which sanctioned the right of the bishops to preside personally or by their representatives in all the judicatories of the church, in all cases of discipline, ordination, and deprivation of ministers, visitation of churches, &c. All ministers at their ordination were to swear obedience to their ordinary, and all clergymen were forbidden to preach or to speak against the acts of this assembly, or to touch at all the subject of the parity of ministers. Three Scottish bishops (Spotswood, Lamb, and Hamilton) were now sent to England, there to receive episcopal consecration, and on their return they consecrated the rest. In 1617, king James made a journey into Scotland chiefly to further the cause of Episcopacy, which was advancing but slowly. The next year (1618) a convention or General Assembly, composed very much of courtiers, met at Perth and ordained kneeling at the sacrament, the administration of it in private houses and to the sick, the private baptism of children, their confirmation by bishops, and the observance of Christmas, Easter, Whitsuntide, and Ascension Day. These were called the Five Articles of Perth. They were published by royal authority, and in 1621 a Scottish parliament was persuaded, though not without difficulty, to enact them into laws, against the remonstrances of great numbers of the clergy. Persecution ensued and many ministers were fined, imprisoned, and banished, by the High Commission Court. During this reign, many Scotch Presbyterians moved to the North of Ireland, and there established flourishing churches. [See the latter part of this note.—R.] Charles I. followed up the measures pursued by his father. In 1633 he went to Scotland to be crowned, and there compelled a Scottish parliament to invest him with all the ecclesiastical powers possessed by his father, and also to confirm the laws of the last reign respecting religion. On leaving Scotland, he erected a new bishopric at Edinburgh. And Archbishop Laud drew up articles for regulating the royal chapel at Edinburgh, which was to be a pattern for all cathedrals, chapels, and parish churches. Hitherto the Scotch Episcopal church had no settled liturgy; the king therefore ordered the Scotch bishops to draw up canons and a liturgy, similar to those of the English church. These, being revised by Laud and other English bishops, were imposed upon the whole Scottish nation by royal proclamation, the canons in 1635 and the liturgy in 1636. The attempts of the bishops to enforce these, without the sanction of a General Assembly or of a Scottish parliament, threw the whole nation into commotion. The nobles, gentry, burroughs, and clergy, combined to resist these innovations, and in 1638 they solemnly revived the national covenant of 1580 and 1590. Hence the king found it necessary to relax not a little his injunctions, and he now permitted a General Assembly to be called. But his commissioners, finding this body unmanageable, dissolved it. The Assembly however would not separate, but protested; and continuing their sessions, they disannulled the acts of six preceding General Assemblies (namely, those of 1606, 1608, 1610, 1616, 1617, and 1618), abolished Episcopacy, condemned the five articles of Perth, the liturgy, canons, and high commission court, restored the Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies, and deposed all the bishops save two, whom they allowed to remain as parish ministers. The king now resorted to war, and marched an army into Scotland in 1639. But a truce was concluded, and a new Assembly and a new parliament both met and confirmed substantially the acts of the last Assembly. In 1640 the king raised another army, and renewed the war upon the Scots; but he found it necessary to agree again to a truce, and also to assemble an English parliament, which was called the long parliament because it sat twelve years, and which favoured the Scots in their controversy with the king. His English subjects were now alienated from him; and to be able to contend with the English malcontents, the king concluded a peace with the Scots, by which he agreed to the total abolition of Episcopacy and the entire restitution of Presbyterianism in that country. The peace however was of little service to him, as the English parliament and the Scots were on the most friendly terms. In 1642 the Scots offered to be mediators between the king and the English parliament, which the king resented highly. This drew closer the union between the Scots and the English parliament. The Scots now formed the design of establishing Presbyterianism as the only religion throughout Great Britain and Ireland. To this project the English parliament, in order to secure the co-operation of the Scots in their war with the king, were led to yield assent. Commissioners from the General Assembly of Scotland were now admitted to sit in the Westminster Assembly of divines, and the Scots had great influence in all the ecclesiastical affairs of England till the time of Cromwell's usurpation. At their instance in 1643, the English parliament assented to the Scotch national Covenant somewhat modified, and now denominated the Solemn League and Covenant, which the parliament recommended and at length enjoined upon the whole English nation. The Scots strenuously opposed all toleration of any but Presbyterians in either country. This alienated the Independents, Baptists, and other sectarians from them, and the English parliament found it necessary to proceed with caution. In 1646 the king surrendered himself to the Scots, and they delivered him over to the English parliament, hoping thus to induce them resolutely to enforce Presbyterianism over the three kingdoms. But the parliament were so irresolute that the Scots became jealous of them. After Charles I. was beheaded in 1649, the Scots proclaimed Charles II. king, and declared against the English Commonwealth. In 1649 they entered into negotiations with the new king in Holland, who then professedly acceded to the National Covenant. The next year the king landed in Scotland, but his army was defeated by Cromwell. In 1651 Charles II. was crowned in Scotland, and then swore to observe the Solemn League and Covenant. After this he marched an army into England, suffered a total defeat, and fled in disguise to France. General Monk, whom Cromwell had left in Scotland, soon brought that whole country to submit and to become united with the Commonwealth of England, and also to allow a free toleration to which the Presbyterians were much opposed. Commissioners were now sent into Scotland by the English parliament, to establish liberty of conscience there. Thus things remained till the Restoration. Presbyterianism was the established religion of Scotland, but dissenters were allowed to live in peace and to worship in their own way. At the Restoration in 1661, a Scottish parliament rescinded all acts and covenants relative to religion made or entered into since the commencement of the civil troubles, and empowered the king to settle the ecclesiastical establishment at his pleasure. He ordained Presbyterianism for the present, but soon after, though with some hesitation, ordered Episcopacy in its place. Sharp, Fairfoul, Leighton, and Hamilton, were consecrated bishops. Under Charles II. from 1662 to 1685, the Scotch Presbyterians suffered very much, as the English Non-conformists did; for similar laws and measures were adopted in both countries. James II. pursued the same persecuting course till the year 1687, when in order to advance popery, he granted universal toleration. On the Revolution in 1688, the Scotch Presbyterian church regained all its liberties and prerogatives, which it has enjoyed with little diminution till the present day. But the troubles it experienced during the reigns of James I. and his sons had induced many Scotch Presbyterians to emigrate to the North of Ireland, to North America, and elsewhere. See Neal's History of the Puritans; Crookshank's History of the State and Sufferings of the Church of Scotland; Burnet's History of his Own Times; Spotswood, and others.—Mur. [For the early part of this century, see Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, vols. vi. and vii. Wodrow edition, ending at the year 1625; Row's History of the Kirk of Scotland, which comes down to the year 1639, Wodrow edition, Edin. 1842; McCre's Life of Andrew Melville, 2d edit. Edin. 1824, 2 vols. 8vo; Cook's History of the Church of Scotland, Edin. 1815, 3 vols. 8vo; the second and third volumes comprise the history from 1592 to the Revolution. In addition to these works, there are a number of diaries and autobiographies of eminent ministers during this century, as James Melville, Blair, Livingston, Guthrie, &c. which illustrate the course of events. But no publication throws so much light on the most stirring portion of this troubled period as the Letters and Journals of Robert Baillie, principal of the University of Glasgow, extending from 1637 to 1662. They were first published in an imperfect manner in 1775, in 2 vols. 8vo; but they have been at length printed entire under the able editorship of David Laing, Esq. in 3 vols. small folio, Edin. 1841, 42. The general history of Scotland during this period by Malcolm Laing, and of Britain by Mr. Brodie, should also be consulted. A life of Alexander Henderson, one of the leading Presbyterian ministers from 1636 to his death in 1646, was published some years ago in one large volume, 8vo, by the Rev. J. Aiton; but it has added little to our knowledge of this period. For the latter part of this century, see Beattie's History of the Church of Scotland during the Commonwealth, 12mo, Edin. 1842; but the most authentic source of information is Wodrow's History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution, originally published in 2 vols. folio, 1721, 22, but reprinted, with notes by the Rev. Dr. Burns, in 4 vols. 8vo, Glas. 1829, 30. The Episcopal view of this period may be seen in Russell's History of the Church in Scotland, 2 vols. 12mo, Lond. 1834; Lawson's History of the Episcopal Church in Scotland to the Revolution, Edin. 1844; or Stevens' History of the Church of Scotland, 4 vols. 8vo, 1843, 45.—R.

THE ENGLISH PRESBYTERIANS.—Most of the early English Puritans, from their intercourse with the foreign Reformed churches who were all Presbyterians, were more or less attached to Presbyterian forms of worship and church government. But as the English bishops, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, generally admitted the validity of foreign or Presbyterian ordination, while the Puritans or Presbyterians on the other hand, admitted the validity of ordination by bishops and the lawfulness of bishops of some sort, hence the principal difficulty of the English Puritans or Presbyterians in those times related to the rites of worship. (Neal, Hist. of Puritans, vol. i. p. 386.) In the year 1572, several of the more strenuous Puritans, despairing of any further reformation of the English church by public authority, proceeded secretly to organize the first Presbyterian church in England, at Wandsworth five miles from London. This church, though persecuted, continued to exist, and others were formed on the model of it. But the greater part of the clergy, who were inclined to Presbyterian views, remained in connexion with the established church and bore the general appellation of Puritans. Many of them, however, kept up voluntary meetings among themselves for mutual advice and counsel, in a kind of presbyteries and synods. In the year 1586, there were more than five hundred such ministers in England. How long and how extensively these informal and voluntary meetings were maintained, it is difficult to say. But this is certain, that although persecution induced great numbers to remove to America, Ireland, and elsewhere, yet the number of Presbyterians who remained under the general appellation of Puritans was very considerable, and it greatly increased during the reigns of James I. and Charles I. prior to the year 1642, when Episcopacy was abolished by act of parliament. In 1643, the English parliament selected 121 of the ablest divines of England with 30 lay assessors, whom they commanded to meet at Westminster and aid them by their counsel in settling the government, worship, and doctrines of the church of England. This was the famous Westminster Assembly of divines, which continued to meet and to discuss such subjects as the parliament submitted to their consideration, during several years. They were men of different sentiments, Presbyterians, Erastians, and Independents, with some moderate Episcopalians; but a great majority were Presbyterians. Besides, not long after this assembly met, the General Assembly of the Scottish church, at the request of the English parliament, sent four commissioners to this body, on condition that the whole Westminster Assembly and the parliament would take the Solemn League and Covenant, and agree to establish one uniform religion throughout the three kingdoms. The parliament reluctantly assented to the condition, for the sake of securing the co-operation of the Scots in their political designs. Before the Scottish commissioners arrived, the Westminster Assembly commenced revising the Thirty-nine Articles, and went over the first fifteen making some slight alterations. After the arrival of the Scotch commissioners and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant in Feb. 1644, the Assembly by order of parliament drew up an Exhortation to the people of England to assent to the Solemn League. The November following, they were ordered to write a circular letter to the foreign Reformed churches, acquainting them with the proceedings in England. Through this Assembly, the parliament licensed preachers and directed all ecclesiastical affairs. They next drew up a Directory for public worship, which was sanctioned by the parliament in January, 1645. The same year they drew up a Directory for the ordination of ministers, and a Directory for church discipline and government. After warm debate, the majority of the Assembly declared for Presbyterianism as of divine institution; but the parliament voted for it only as "lawful and agreeable to the word of God." The Assembly also put the supreme ecclesiastical power wholly into the hands of the church judicatories, but the parliament imposed restrictions, and to the great dissatisfaction of the Scots and most of the English Presbyterians, allowed an appeal from the highest ecclesiastical judicatory to the parliament. In March, 1646, parliament ordered ruling elders to be chosen in all the churches of England, and also the erection of Presbyteries, Synods, and a General Assembly, for a trial of the system. The Scotch church objected to several imperfections in the Presbyterianism thus established by the English parliament, and particularly to the right of appeal in the last resort from the ecclesiastical court to the parliament, and the English Presbyterians and the Westminster Assembly sided with the Scotch. In May 1646, the king being now in the hands of the Scots, the English Presbyterians determined to enforce Presbyterianism jure divino on all England, and to allow no toleration of dissenters. For this purpose they caused a strong remonstrance to be presented to the parliament in the name of the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of London; and they were supported by the whole weight of the Scottish nation. On the contrary, the Independents and other sectarians in the army procured a counter petition from numerous citizens of London. The Commons were divided in sentiment and at a loss how to proceed. To gain time, they demanded of the Westminster Assembly Scripture proofs for that jus divinum in church government which they had maintained. It may be remarked that from 1641 to 1647 the Independents, who were rapidly increasing in number, uniformly pleaded for the free toleration of all sects holding the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. And the parliament was not unwilling to admit toleration, at least of the Independents, but the Presbyterians were utterly opposed to it; and their influence prevented the parliament from pursuing the course they would have done. It was this circumstance which alienated the Independents and the army from Presbyterianism and from the parliament, and finally led to the subversion of the whole Presbyterian establishment set up in England. The demand of the House of Commons for Scriptural proof of the divine authority of Presbyterianism, produced long and warm debates in the Westminster Assembly. The Erastians and Independents at length protested and withdrew. The Presbyterians, fifty-three in number, now left alone, voted with but one dissenting voice that "Christ has appointed a church government distinct from the civil magistrate." On the other points referred to them they were afraid to report their views lest the parliament should put them under a pramunire. But the Presbyterian divines of London met at Zion College, answered fully the questions of the House of Commons, and maintained in strong terms the jus divinum of Presbyterianism. Yet in a second meeting they lowered their tone somewhat, and agreed to set up the limited Presbyterianism already sanctioned by the parliament. This consisted of parochial presbyteries (or church sessions), classes (or presbyteries), provincial assemblies (or synods), and a national assembly, with an appeal to the parliament in the last resort. The province of London was now distributed into twelve classes, containing one hundred and thirty-eight parochial presbyteries. The next year (1647) provincial assemblies (synods) actually met in London and in Lancashire, and in those counties only, under the act of parliament. The provincial assembly of London continued to meet semi-annually till the end of Cromwell's reign. In the other parts of England the Presbyterians continued to meet in their voluntary conventions for ecclesiastical affairs, which had not the sanction of law. The king, though a prisoner, refused his assent to this new ecclesiastical constitution of England. At the same time, he tried to detach the Scots from the English by promising them Presbyterianism for Scotland with Episcopacy for England. But they rejected his offers, hoping still to bless England as well as Scotland with Presbyterianism jure divino. He also tried to gain over the Independents by promising them free toleration, but they would not accept it for themselves alone. The country now swarmed with sectarians, and with numerous lay preachers of every description. Thomas Edwards, in his Gangrena, mentions sixteen sects; namely, Independents, Brownists, Millenarists, Antinomians, Anabaptists, Arminians, Libertines, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectionists, Socinians, Arians, Antitrinitarians, Antiscripturists, and Sectatics. Mr. Baxter mentions the Independents, Anabaptists, and Antinomians as being the chief separatists from the established or Presbyterian church; to whom he adds Seekers, Ranters, Behemists, and Varists, which either became extinct or were merged in the Quakers. The English divines would have been satisfied with revising the Thirty-nine Articles, and therefore commenced such a revision. But the Scotch divines insisted on a new Confession. Hence the Westminster Assembly, after the arrival of the Scotch commissioners, drew up their elaborate Confession, which the House of Commons approved with some amendments in the summer of 1647 and the winter following. But the House of Lords objecting to the articles on church government, only the doctrinal part of the Confession obtained parliamentary sanction in the year 1648. The Scotch nation adopted the Confession as drawn up by the Assembly. The Assembly's Shorter Catechism was presented to parliament in 1647, and the Larger Catechism in 1648. Both were allowed to be used by authority of the English parliament. The Scotch commissioners in the Assembly now returned home; but the Assembly was continued as a sort of counsel to parliament, yet it did little else than license preachers. The army being composed chiefly of dissenters from the establishment of various descriptions, upon finding that no toleration of dissenters was allowed by the new ecclesiastical constitution, demanded of the parliament free toleration for all Protestant dissenters. This the Presbyterians vigorously opposed, and the parliament endeavoured to disband the army. But the army now rescued the king from the hands of the parliament, and became prepotent in their demands. Pressed by the Presbyterians on the one hand and by the army on the other, parliament wavered for a time, but at length fell under the control of the army, and not only allowed of dissent from the establishment but also made no vigorous efforts to set up Presbyterianism. But in May, 1648, the Scots, having made a separate treaty with the king, invaded England in order to rescue him. The war obliged the army to march in various directions, and the Presbyterians seized the opportunity in the parliament to enforce Presbyterianism. An act was proposed declaring eight specified heresies to be capital crimes, and sixteen others to be punishable with unlimited imprisonment. The act was not passed. But in June following another did pass, placing "all parishes and places whatsoever in England and Wales," except chapels of the king and peers, under the Presbyterian government, with allowance of no other worship, yet without making it penal to neglect this worship. The parliament likewise commenced a negotiation with the king for his restoration, upon the basis of a single religion with no toleration of any other. The king insisted on Episcopacy of some sort, and the parliament insisted on Presbyterianism. The army, after repelling the Scotch invasion, finding that neither the king nor the parliament intended ever to allow toleration to sectaries, again seized the king's person, and marching to London purged the House of Commons, new-modelled the government, and caused the king to be impeached and beheaded. The Commonwealth, without a king or a House of Lords, was now set up. But the Scots refused to acknowledge it, recognised Charles II. for their king, and threatened war upon England. The English Presbyterians sided with their Scottish brethren, disowned the parliament, and declared against a general toleration. All people were now required to swear fidelity to the new government, which many of the Presbyterian clergy refusing to do, were turned out. However, to conciliate the Presbyterians, the parliament continued the late Presbyterian establishment, but repealed all acts compelling uniformity. The Scots, aided by the English Presbyterians, invaded England in order to place Charles II. on the throne; but they were vanquished, and all Scotland was compelled to submit to the parliament, and moreover to allow of toleration in their own country. The Solemn League and Covenant was laid aside, and nothing but the Engagement (or oath of allegiance to government) was required of any man to qualify him civilly for any living in the kingdom. Hence many Episcopal divines, as well as those of other denominations, became parish ministers. In the year 1653, the army being offended with the parliament (which had now sat 12 years, and during the last four had ruled without a king or House of Lords) ordered them to disperse; and Cromwell with the other officers appointed a new council of state, and selected 140 men from the several counties to represent the people. After five months these new representatives resigned their power to Cromwell and the other officers, who framed a new constitution, with a single house of representatives chosen in the three kingdoms, and a Protector with ample executive powers elected for life. All sects of Christians, except papists and Episcopalians, were to have free toleration. Cromwell the Protector laboured to make persons of all religions feel easy under him; but he absolutely forbade the clergy's meddling with politics. Ministers of different denominations in the country towns now began to form associations for brotherly counsel and advice. But the more rigid Presbyterians, as well as the Episcopalians, stood aloof from such associations. The right of ordaining parish ministers had for some years been exclusively in the hands of the Presbyterians; but Cromwell, in March, 1654, appointed a board of thirty Tryers, composed of Presbyterians and Independents with two or three Baptists, to examine and license preachers throughout England. The same year he appointed lay commissioners in every county, with full power to eject scandalous, ignorant, and incompetent ministers and schoolmasters. Both these ordinances were confirmed by parliament. Such was the state of the English Presbyterians during the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell. On the accession of his son, Richard Cromwell the Presbyterians, seeing no prospect of the restoration of the Solemn League and Covenant, or of their obtaining ecclesiastical dominion over England under the existing form of government, formed a coalition with the royalists in 1659 in order to restore the king. The remains of the long parliament were resuscitated and placed over the nation. The members excluded from it in 1648 were recalled and took their seats, and thus it became more than half Presbyterian. This parliament in 1660 voted that the concessions offered by the king in the negotiations at the Isle of Wight in 1648 were satisfactory, restored Presbyterianism completely together with the solemn League and Covenant, appointed a new council of state, ordered that a new parliament should be chosen, and then dissolved. The Presbyterians, who now had the whole power of the country in their own hands, were so zealous to prevent the election of republicans to the new parliament, that when it met it was decidedly in favour of a monarchy. Parliament now recalled the king, without making any stipulations with him respecting the religion of the country. He very soon restored episcopacy, and then would grant no toleration to any class of dissenters. The Presbyterians, who had the most to lose, were the greatest sufferers. Some hundreds of their ministers were immediately displaced to make way for the old Episcopalian incumbents. And in 1662, the Act of Uniformity made it criminal to dissent from the established or Episcopal church; and of course it exposed all dissenters to persecution. A number of the Presbyterian ministers conformed in order to retain their places, but more than 2,000 ministers, most of them Presbyterians, were turned out. And during this and the succeeding reign, or till the accession of William and Mary in 1688, the Presbyterians equally with the other dissenters suffered persecution. For though the kings, after the year 1672, were inclined to give toleration to all in order to advance popery, yet parliament and the bishops resisted it. When the revolution in 1688 placed a tolerant sovereign on the throne, and thus relieved the English Presbyterians from persecution, they were comparatively an enfeebled sect; and being no longer strenuous for the Solemn League and Covenant, and for the jus divinum of Presbyterianism, they were willing to have friendly inter-descend and establish a new and heavenly kingdom on the earth.¹ Here arose the Quakers, to whom, as they have continued to the present time, we shall devote a separate chapter. Here the furious Anabaptists were allowed to utter freely whatever a disordered mind might suggest.²

course and fellowship with Independents, and soon became as catholic in their views as most of the other English dissenters. See Heylin's History of the Presbyterians, Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Bogue and Bennet's Hist. of Dissenters, Baxter's Hist. of His Own Times, Burnet's Hist. of His Own Times, Grant's Hist. of the English Church and Sects, and others.—Mur. [More recent works on the history of the Independents during this period are Haubury's Historical Memorials relating to the Independents or Congregationalists from their Rise to the Restoration, 2 vols. 8vo, 1839, 41. A third volume of this elaborate and useful work is promised. Fletcher's History of the Revival and Progress of Independency in England since the Reformation, 3 volumes, 12mo, 1846, 48; Calamy's Nonconformists' Memorial, by Palmer, 3 vols. 8vo, 1802; and Sylvester's Reliquie Baxterianæ, fol. 1696, being Baxter's autobiography. See also Orme's Lives of Owen and Baxter, prefixed to his edition of their respective works.—R.

THE IRISH PRESBYTERIANS may be briefly noticed here. They settled in Ulster in the commencement of this century, and consisted principally of colonists and of exiles on account of religion from Scotland and England, as stated in the preceding part of this note. They were generally accompanied by their ministers, who officiated in the parish churches and were comprehended within the Establishment till the year 1634, when the enactment of a book of canons and the substitution of the Thirty-nine Articles of the church of England for the Irish Articles of 1613, at the suggestion of Laud and under the arbitrary rule of Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, afforded the northern prelates the means of ejecting and silencing the Presbyterian ministers. Severe measures were now employed against them, until the overthrow of Strafford in 1640 afforded them relief from persecution. After the rebellion of 1641 they enjoyed greater freedom, and the Presbyterian church was regularly organized throughout Ulster and in some other parts of Ireland. As a body, the Irish Presbyterians sided with the Long Parliament in their struggles against the ill-advised Charles; but they loudly protested against his execution in a Declaration which brought down upon them a severe attack from the caustic pen of Milton. Under the patronage of Cromwell, the Independents were now introduced into Ireland, and succeeded in organizing churches in several of the principal towns, whose ministers, together with a few of the Presbyterian and Episcopal clergy, were salaried by the Commonwealth. At the Restoration of Charles II. all the Protestant Nonconformists were proscribed and persecuted equally in Ireland, though not so rigorously as in England or Scotland; the Independents were able to maintain only one or two churches in Dublin; but the Presbyterians succeeded in holding their ground in Ulster. In 1672, in consideration of their sufferings for the royal cause under Cromwell, they received for a few years an annual grant of money from the crown; and at the Revolution, which was consummated by the heroic defence of Derry garrisoned principally by Presbyterians, the number of their congregations amounted to nearly one hundred, under the oversight of five presbyteries and a General Synod. During this period the Presbyterian church in Ireland was, in all essential respects, identical with the national Presbyterian church of Scotland; the ministers officiated and held charges equally in either church, the same modes of worship and discipline were observed, and the same confession of faith and catechisms constituted the common standard of doctrinal teaching in both churches. See Reid's History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, 2 vols. 8vo.—R.

¹ Burnet's Hist. of His Own Times, vol. i. p. 67. [Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. chap. v. p. 113, 343, &c.—Mur.

² Mosheim seems to have taken it for granted that the English Baptists of this age, because they were

Here the Deists, who reduced all religion to a very few precepts inculcated by reason and the light of nature, gathered themselves a company with impunity, under their leaders Sidney, Henry Neville, Martin, Harrington, and others.³

23. During this period also arose among the Presbyterians the party called Antinomians, or enemies of the law as they are called by their adversaries, which has continued to our day and has caused at times no little commotion. The Antinomians are over-rigid Calvinists, who are thought by the other Presbyterians to abuse Calvin's doctrine of the absolute decrees of God to the injury of the cause of piety.⁴ Some of them (for they do not all hold the same sentiments) deny that it is necessary for ministers to exhort Christians to holiness and obedience to the law, because those whom God from all eternity elected to salvation will themselves, and without being admonished and exhorted by any one, by a divine influence or the impulse of Almighty grace, perform holy and good deeds; while those who are destined by the divine decrees to eternal punishment, though admonished and entreated ever so much, will not obey the law, nor can they obey the divine law since divine grace is denied them; and it is therefore sufficient in preaching to the people to hold up only the Gospel and faith in Jesus Christ. But others merely⁵ hold that the elect, because they cannot lose the divine favour, do not truly commit sin and break the divine law, although they should go contrary to its precepts and do wicked actions, and therefore it is not necessary that they should confess their sins or grieve for them; that adultery, for instance, in one of the elect appears to us indeed to be a sin or a violation of the law, yet it is no sin in the sight of God, because one who is elected to salvation can do nothing displeasing to God and forbidden by the law.⁶

called Anabaptists, resembled the old Anabaptists of Germany, whereas they were Montonites; and although illiterate and somewhat enthusiastic, they were people in whom was not a little Christian simplicity and piety.

—Mur.

³ Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 87.

⁴ See Toland's Letter to Le Clerc, in the Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique of the latter, tome xxiii. p. 505, &c.; Hornbeck's Summa Controversiarum, p. 800, 812, &c.

⁵ This second Antinomian opinion is so much worse than the preceding, that it is strange Mosheim should say of it, "Alii vero tantum statuunt," others "merely hold."—Mur.

⁶ Other tenets of the Antinomians kindred with this, and the more recent disputes occasioned by the posthumous works of Tobias Crisp (a distinguished Antinomian preacher), in which Tillotson, Baxter, and especially Daniel Williams (in his celebrated work, Gospel Truth Stated and Vindicated), vigorously assailed the Antinomians, are stated though with some errors

24. Certain wise and peace-loving persons, moved by the numerous calamities and sufferings of their country arising from the intemperate religious disputes, felt it to be their duty to search for a method of uniting in some measure such of the contending parties as would regard reason and religion, or at least of dissuading them from ruinous contentions. They therefore took middle ground between the more violent Episcopalians on the one part and the more stiff Presbyterians and Independents on the other, hoping that if the contentions of these could be settled, the minor parties would fall by their own arms. The contests of the former related partly to the forms of church government and public worship, and partly to certain doctrines, particularly those on which the Reformed and the Arminians were at variance. To bring both classes of contests to a close, these mediators laboured to bring the disputants off from those narrow views which they had embraced, and to exhibit a broader way of salvation. And hence they were commonly called Latitudinarians.¹ In the first place, they were attached to the form of church government and the mode of public worship established by the laws of England, and they recommended them exclusively to others, yet they would not have it believed that these were of divine institution and absolutely necessary. And hence they inferred, that those who approved other forms of church government and other modes of worship were to be tolerated and treated as brethren, unless they were chargeable with other faults. In the next place, as to religion they chose Simon Episcopius for their guide, and in imitation of him maintained that there are but few things which a Christian must know and believe in order to be saved. Hence it followed that neither the Episcopalians who embraced the sentiments of the Arminians, nor the Presbyterians and Independents who adopted the sentiments of the Genevans, had just reason for contending with so much zeal and animosity; because their disputes related to unessential points which might be explained variously without the loss of salvation. The most distinguished of the Latitudinarians were the eminent John Hales and William Chillingworth, whose names are still in veneration among the English.² With them were joined Henry More, Ralph Cudworth, Theophilus Gale, John Whitecot, archbishop Tillotson, and various others. The first reward of their labours which these men received was, to be called Atheists, Deists, and Socinians, not only by the papists but also by the English dissentists. But on the restoration of English monarchy under Charles II. they were advanced to the highest stations, and received general approbation. And it is well known that the English church at the present day [1753] is under the direction, for the most part, of such Latitudinarians. Yet there are some among the bishops and the other clergy, who, following rather in the steps of Laud, are denominated the High Church and Ecclesiastical Tories.³

25. When Charles was restored to the throne of his father in 1660, the ancient form of ecclesiastical government and public worship returned also from exile, and the bishops recovered their lost dignities. Those who preferred other forms or the Nonconformists, as they were called in England, expected that some place would be assigned to them in the church, but their hopes were quickly disappointed. For Charles again placed bishops over the Scots who were so religiously attached to the Genevan discipline, and likewise over the Irish. And afterwards in the year 1662, all those who refused to subject themselves to the rites and institutions of the English church were by a public law separated wholly from its communion.⁴ From this

² An accurately written life of the very acute John Hales was published in English by Peter des Maizeaux, London, 1719, 8vo. A more full history of the life of Hales we have ourselves prefixed in Latin to his History of the Synod of Dort, Hamb. 1724, 8vo. A French life of him, but not entirely correct, is in the first volume of Chillingworth's book, immediately to be noticed, p. lxxiii. &c.—A life of Chillingworth in English was composed by the same Des Maizeaux, and published, London, 1725, 8vo. A French translation of it is prefixed to the French version of his very noted work, The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way of Salvation, printed at Amsterdam, 1730, in 3 vols, 8vo. Those who wish to know the regulations, doctrines, and views of the Church of England in later times should acquaint themselves with these two men, and in particular should carefully study the above-named work of Chillingworth.

³ Rapin, Dissertation on the Whigs and Tories, in his History of England [French edition], vol. x. p. 234.—[See an admirable defence of the Latitudinarian divines, in a book entitled, The Principles and Practices of certain Moderate Divines of the Church of England (greatly misunderstood) truly Represented and Defended, London, 1670, 8vo. This book was written by Dr. Fowler, afterwards bishop of Gloucester.—Mack.

⁴ Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 358; Rapin, Histoire d'Angleterre, tome ix. p. 198, &c.; Wilkins, Concilia Magnæ Britannicæ et Hibernicæ, tom. iv. p. 573. [This was the famous Act of Uniformity, which by Peter Francis le Courayer, Examen des Défauts Théologiques, tome ii. p. 198, &c. Amsterd. 1744, 8vo. [See also Bogue and Bennet's Hist. of Dissenters, vol. i. p. 399, &c. and Adams' Dictionary of All Religions, art. Antinomians. One of the chief sources of Antinomian opinions was, the received doctrine of substitution. If Christ took the place of the elect and in their stead both obeyed the law perfectly and suffered its penalty, it was difficult for some to see what further demands the law could have upon them, or what more they had to do with it.—Mur.

¹ Burnet's History of his Own Times, book ii. vol. i. p. 186, &c.

period till the time of William and Mary, the Nonconformists experienced various fortune, sometimes more pleasant and sometimes more sad according to the disposition of the court and the government, but at no time were they so happy as not either to feel or to fear persecution.¹ But in the year 1689, William III. by an express act of parliament, freed all dissenters from the established church (except Socinians) from all liability to the penalties to which they were exposed.² He also permitted the Scottish nation to live under the Genevan regulations, and delivered them from the jurisdiction of bishops. This therefore may be regarded as the commencement of that liberty and freedom from molestation, which are still enjoyed by the sects that dissent from the public rites of the English church but it was also the commencement of those numerous parties and sects which spring up from year to year in that fortunate island, often as suddenly as mushrooms, and which distract the people with their new inventions and opinions.³

26. In the reign of this William III. A.D. 1689, arose a very noted schism in the English Episcopal church, which down to the present time no means have been able to remove. William Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, and seven other bishops,⁴ all men distinguished for their learning and purity of morals, declared that they could not in conscience take the oath of fidelity to the new king, William III. because James II. though expelled from the kingdom, was in their view the legitimate king of England. As no arguments could induce them to recede from this opinion, they were deprived of their offices in 1690 by an act of the English parliament, and other bishops were appointed in their places.⁵ The bishops who were deposed and turned out of their episcopal dwellings founded a new church in the bosom of the English church, differing from the rest of the church in opinions, in the form of worship, and in other respects.⁶ From the cause which produced the disunion, this church was called that of the Non-Jurors, and on account of the opinion which it maintained and continues to maintain respecting the authority of the church, it received the name of High Church, that is, one entertaining very exalted ideas of the prerogatives and authority of the church, to which is opposed the Low Church or that which has more moderate views of the power of the church.⁷ The deprived bishops with their friends and fol-

⁴ The other Non-Juring bishops were Dr. Lloyd, bishop of Norwich, Dr. Turner of Ely, Dr. Kenn of Bath and Wells, Dr. Frampton of Gloucester, Dr. Thomas of Worcester, Dr. Lake of Chichester, and Dr. White of Peterborough.—Macl.

⁵ These were Tillotson, Moore, Patrick, Kidder, Fowler, and Cumberland, names which will ever be pronounced with veneration by those who are capable of esteeming solid, well-employed learning and genuine piety, and which will always shine among the brightest ornaments of the church of England.—Macl.

⁶ The language of Mosheim here would seem to imply, that the Non-Juring bishops produced a formal secession from the established church, and erected a permanent sect which differed in doctrines and in its forms of worship from the church of England. But it was only a temporary disagreement, whether William III. or James II. was the legal sovereign, and of course whether those bishops and priests who were deprived for not taking the oath of allegiance to the former or those who were appointed to fill their places, were the legitimate bishops and parish ministers. Both parties professed the same faith, adhered to the same discipline, and used the same liturgy, except that the Non-Jurors are said to have framed and used a prayer for king James and for their party. It was rather a political than a religious schism, and one which necessarily terminated on the death of the Pretender and of the deprived bishops and clergy. Some principles indeed which were then contended for, continued to be maintained after they became little more than points of theoretical speculation, and the believing or disbelieving of these principles constituted the only difference between the two parties.—Mur. [See D'Oyley's Life of Archbishop Sancroft, 2 vols. 1821; and Lathbury's History of the Non-Jurors, their Controversies and Writings, London, 1845.—R.] required all clergymen not only to use the liturgy but also to swear to renounce and condemn the Solemn League and Covenant, Presbyterian ordination, and all efforts for changing the present establishment. In consequence of this Act, about 2,000 ministers, chiefly Presbyterians, were turned out of their churches because they could not conform to the law. At the same time, all the old laws against conventicles, neglect of the parish churches, &c. were revived, and these made all Nonconformists liable to civil prosecution.—Mur.

⁷ The name of High Church, that is, of those who have high notions of the church and its power, properly belongs to the Non-Jurors. But it is usual among the English to give it a more extensive application, and to apply it to all those who extol immoderately the authority of the church and declare it exempt from all human power, notwithstanding they do not refuse to swear allegiance to the king. And there are many such even in that church which generally goes under the name of the Low Church. [The Non-Jurors were also called Jacobites from their adherence to James II. and his son the Pretender, in opposition to the reigning sovereign and the house of Hanover. The Scottish bishops, after the year 1688, all adhered to the house of Stuart, and were called Non-Jurors because they refused the oath of allegiance to the reigning sovereign.—Mur.]

¹ Neal treats particularly of these events in the 4th volume of his History of the Puritans.

² This Act, which is called the Toleration Act, is subjoined to Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. [By it all dissenters from the Church of England, except papists and Anti-Trinitarians, by taking the oath of allegiance and subscribing to the doctrinal part of the Thirty-nine Articles (or if Quakers, making equivalent affirmations), are exempted from all the penalties prescribed by the Acts which enforce uniformity, and are allowed to erect houses of worship, have their own preachers, and to meet and worship according to their own views, provided they do not, when met, lock or bolt their doors. They are not however exempted from tithes, and other payments for the support of the established church; nor are they excused from the oaths required by the Test and Corporation Acts, which exclude Nonconformists from all civil offices.—Mur. [These last remnants of an intolerant age, the operation of which had been annually suspended by a Bill of Indemnity, have been swept away by the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828. The chief practical grievance of Nonconformists at the present time, is their exclusion from the English Universities.—R.]

³ Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. ii. p. 23, &c.

lowers contended, that the church is not subject to the civil authority and to parliaments but to God only, and that it has the power of self-government, and consequently that the decree of parliament against them was unjust and a nullity, and that an ecclesiastical council only has power by its decrees to deprive a bishop of his office. The celebrated Henry Dodwell was the first who contended fiercely for these rights and this power of the church. He was followed by several others, and hence arose this perplexing and difficult controversy respecting the church which has not yet closed, and which is renewed with zeal from time to time.¹

27. The Non-Jurors or High Church, who claimed for themselves the appellation of the Orthodox and called the Low Church the Schismatical, differed from the rest of the Episcopal church in several particulars and regulations, but especially in the following sentiments:—I. That it is never lawful for the people, under any provocation or pretext whatever, to resist their kings and sovereigns. The English call this the doctrine of passive obedience, the opposite of which is the doctrine of active obedience, held by those who deem it lawful in certain cases for the people to oppose their rulers and kings. II. That the hereditary succession of kings is of divine appointment, and therefore it can be set aside or annulled in no case whatever. III. That the church is subject to the jurisdiction not of the civil magistrate but of God only, particularly in matters of a religious nature. IV. That consequently Sancroft and the other bishops who were deposed under king William III. remained the true bishops as long as they lived, and that those substituted in their places were the unjust possessors of other men's property. V. That these unjust possessors of other men's offices were both bad citizens and bad members of the church, or were both rebels and schismatics; and therefore that such as held communion with them were chargeable with rebellion and schism. VI. That schism or splitting the church in pieces is the most heinous sin, the punishment due to which no one can escape but by returning with sincerity to the true church from which he has revolted.²

28. We now pass over to the Hollanders, the neighbours of the English. The ministers of the Dutch churches thought themselves happy when the opponents of the Calvinistic doctrine of decrees or the Arminians were vanquished and put down, but it was not their fortune to enjoy tranquillity very long. For after this victory they unfortunately fell into such contests among themselves, that during nearly the whole century Holland was the scene of very fierce animosity and strife. It is neither easy nor important to enumerate all these contentions. We shall therefore omit the disputes between individual doctors respecting certain points both of doctrine and discipline, such as the disputes between those men of high reputation, Gisbert Voet and Samuel Maresius [Des Marets]; the disputes about false hair, interest for money, stage plays, and other minute questions of morals, between Salmasius, Boxhorn, Voet, and several others; and the contests respecting the power of the magistrate in matters of religion, carried on by William Appollonius, James Trigland, Nicholas Vedel, and others, and which divided Frederick Spanheim and John Van der Wayen. For these and similar disputes rather show what were the sentiments of certain eminent divines respecting particular doctrines and points of morality, than lay open the internal state of the church. The knowledge of the latter must be derived from those controversies alone which disquieted either the whole church, or at least a large portion of it.

29. The principal controversies of this sort were those respecting the Cartesian philosophy and the new opinions of Cocceius, for these have not yet terminated, and they have produced two very powerful parties, the Cocceians and the Voëtians, which once made a prodigious noise though now they are more silent. The Cocceian theology and the Cartesian philosophy have no natural connexion, and therefore the controversies respecting them were not related to each other. Yet it so happened that the followers of these two very distinct systems of doctrine formed very nearly one and the same party, those who took Cocceius for their guide in theology adhering to Des Cartes as their master in philosophy,¹ because those who assailed the Cartesians attacked also Cocceius and his followers and opposed both with equal animosity. Hence the Cartesians and Cocceians were under a kind of necessity to unite and combine their forces, in order the better to defend their cause against such a host of adversaries. The Voëtians derived their name from Gisbert Voët, a very famous divine of Utrecht, who set up the standard, as it were, in this war, and induced great numbers to attack both Des Cartes and Cocceius.

¹ Henry Dodwell, senior, was appointed Camden professor of History at Oxford in 1688, and being deprived of the office in 1690 because he refused the oath of allegiance, he published a vindication of the non-juring principles. Several other tracts were published by him and others on the same side, none of which were suffered to go unanswered. In 1691, Dr. Humphrey Hody published his Unreasonableness of Separation; or a Treatise out of Ecclesiastical History, showing that although a Bishop was unjustly deprived, neither he nor the Church ever made a Separation, if the Successor was not a Heretic; translated out of an ancient Greek manuscript (written at Constantinople, and now among the Baroccean MSS.), in the public library at Oxford. This was answered by Dodwell the next year, in his Vindication of the Deprived Bishops, &c. Hody replied in The Case of the See Vacant, &c. In 1698, Dodwell came forth again in his Defence of the Vindication of the Deprived Bishops. Various others engaged in this controversy. See MacLaine's Notes; Calamy's Additions to Baxter's Hist. of His Own Life and Times, chap. xvii. p. 465, &c. chap. xviii. p. 484. &c. 506, &c.—Mur.

² See Whiston's Memoirs of his own Life and Writings, vol. i. p. 30, &c.; Hickeys, Memoirs of the Life of John Kettlewell, London, 1718, 8vo, who treats expressly and largely on these matters. Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. et Critique, article Collier, tome ii. p. 112; Masson's Histoire Critique de la République des Lettres, tome xiii. p. 298, &c. and elsewhere.

30. The Cartesian philosophy, which at its first appearance was viewed by many even in Holland as preferable to the Peripatetic, was first assailed by Gisbert Voët in 1639 at Utrecht, where he taught theology with very great reputation, and who not obscurely condemned this philosophy as blasphemous. Voët was a man of immense reading and multifarious knowledge, but indifferently qualified to judge correctly on metaphysical and abstract subjects. While Des Cartes resided at Utrecht, Voët censured various of his opinions, but especially the following positions which he feared were subversive of all religion, namely, that one who intends to be wise must begin by calling everything in question, even the existence of God; that the essence of spirits, and even of God himself, consists in thought; that space in reality has no existence, but is a mere fiction of the imagination, and therefore that matter is without bounds. Des Cartes first replied himself to the charges brought against him, and afterwards his disciples afforded him aid. On the other hand, Voët was joined, not only by those Dutch theologians who were then in the highest reputation for erudition and soundness in the faith, such as Andrew Rivet, Maresius, and Van Mästricht, but also by the greatest part of the clergy of inferior note.² To this flame already raised too high, new fuel was added when some of the theologians applied the precepts of Des Cartes to the illustration of theological subjects. Hence in the year 1656, the Dutch Classes as they are called, or assemblies of the clergy in certain districts, resolved that resistance ought to be made, and that this imperious philosophy ought not to be allowed to invade the territories of theology. By this decision the States of Holland were excited in the same year, sternly to forbid by a public law the philosophers from expounding the books of Des Cartes to the youth, or explaining the Scriptures according to the dictates of philosophy. In a convention at Delft the next year, it was resolved that no person should be admitted to the sacred office without first solemnly promising not to propagate Cartesian principles, nor to deform revealed theology with adventitious ornaments. Similar resolutions were afterwards passed in various places, both in the United Provinces and out of them.³ But as mankind are always eager after what is forbidden, all these prohibitions could not prevent the Cartesian philosophy from finally obtaining firm footing in the schools and universities, and from being applied sometimes preposterously by great numbers to the illustration of divine truths. Hence the Dutch became divided into the two parties above named, and the rest of the century was spent amid their perpetual contentions.

31. John Cocceius (in German Koch), a native of Bremen, professor of theology in the University of Leyden, was unquestionably a great man, if he had only been able to regulate and to temper with reason and judgment his erudition, his ingenuity, his reverence for the Holy Scriptures, and his piety, which he possessed in an eminent degree. He now introduced into theology not a little that was novel and unheard of before his time. In the first place, as has been already remarked, he interpreted the

¹ See Spanheim's Epistola de novissimis in Belgio diaditidis, Opp. tom. ii. p. 973, &c.

² Baillet, La Vie de M. Des Cartes, tome ii. chap. v. p. 33, &c.; Daniel, Voyage du Monde de M. Des Cartes, in his works, tome i. p. 84, &c.; Brucker's Historia Crit. Philosophiæ, tom. iv. par. ii. p. 222, &c.; Irenæus Philalethes (Rhenferd), Kort en opregt Verhaal van de eerste Oorsprong der Broedertuisten, Amsterd. 1708, &c. The first attack upon the philosophy of Des Cartes was made by Voët, A.D. 1639, in his Disputatio de Atheismo. Maresius at first defended the cause of Des Cartes against Voët, but afterwards he went over to the side of his adversaries. Even Cocceius was at first opposed to Des Cartes, though his friend Heiden persuaded him to treat the name of Des Cartes respectfully in his writings. Peter Van Mästricht, John Hornbeck, Andrew Essen, Melchior Leydecker, John Wayen, Gerhard Vries, James Revius, James Trigland, and Frederick Spanheim—manifestly great names—contended against Des Cartes. For him, there were among the philosophers, Henry Regius, James Golius, Claud Salmastius, Hadrian Heerebord, &c. and among the theologians, Abraham Helden, Christopher Wittich, Francis Burmann, John Braun, John Clauberg, Peter Allinge, Balthazar Becker, Stephen Curellæus, Hermann Alexander Roël, Ruard ab Andala, and others.—Schl.

³ Spanheim, De novissimis in Belgio diaditidis, Opp. tom. ii. 959, &c. Those who wish it may also consult the common historians of this century, Arnold [Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, vol. ii. book xvii. chap. x. sec. i.-vi.], Weissmann [Historia Eccles. Sæc. xvii. p. 905], Jäger, Caroli, and also Walch's Einführung in die Religions streitigkeiten ausser unser Kirche, vol. iii.

whole sacred volume in a manner very different from that of Calvin and all his followers. For he maintained that the entire history of the Old Testament presents a picture of the events which were to take place under the New Testament, down to the end of the world; nay more, that the things which Christ and his apostles did and suffered in this world were emblematic of future events. He moreover taught that the greatest part of the predictions of the Jewish prophets foretell the fortunes of Christ and of the Christian church, not by means of the persons and things mentioned [not typically], but by the direct import of the words themselves. And lastly, many of those passages in the Old Testament which seem to contain nothing but the praises of Jehovah, or moral precepts and doctrines, he with wonderful dexterity and ingenuity converted into sacred enigmas and predictions of future events. To give support and plausibility to these opinions, he first laid down this law of interpretation, that the language of the Bible must signify all that it can signify; which rule, if adopted by a man of more genius than judgment, may give birth to very strange interpretations. In the next place, he distributed the entire history of the Christian church into seven portions of time or periods, relying principally on the seven trumpets and seals of the Apocalypse.

32. Theology itself, in the opinion of Cocceius, ought to be freed from the trammels of philosophy, and to be expounded only in Scriptural phraseology. Hence, perceiving that the sacred writers denominate the method of salvation which God has prescribed, a covenant of God with men, he concluded that there could be no more suitable and pertinent analogy, according to which to adjust and arrange an entire system of theology. But while intent solely on accommodating and applying the principles of human covenants to divine subjects, he incautiously fell into some opinions which it is not easy to approve. For instance, he asserted that the covenant which God made with the Hebrew nation through the medium of Moses, did not differ in its nature from the new covenant procured by Jesus Christ. He supposed that God caused the ten commandments to be promulgated by Moses, not as a law which was to be obeyed, but as one form of the covenant of grace. But when the Hebrews had offended him by various sins and especially by the worship of the golden calf, God, being moved with just indignation, superadded to that moral law the yoke of the ceremonial law, to serve as a punishment. This yoke was in itself very burdensome, but it became much more painful in consequence of its import. For it continually admonished the Hebrews of their very imperfect, doubtful, and anxious state, and was a kind of perpetual memento that they merited the wrath of God, and that they could not anticipate a full expiation and remission of their sins till the Messiah should come. Holy men indeed under the Old Testament enjoyed eternal salvation after death; but while they lived, they were far from having that assurance of salvation which is so comforting to us under the New Testament. For no sins were then actually forgiven, but only suffered to remain unpunished, because Christ had not yet offered up himself as a sacrifice to God, and therefore could not be regarded, before the divine tribunal, as one who has actually assumed our debt, but only as our surety. I omit other opinions of Cocceius. Those who assailed the Cartesian doctrines attacked also those opinions, in a fierce war which was kept up for many years with various success. The issue was the same as in the Cartesian contest. No device and no force could prevent the disciples of Cocceius from occupying many professorial chairs, and from propagating the opinions of their master both orally and in writing, with wonderful celerity among even the Germans and the Swiss.¹

33. Nearly all the other controversies which disquieted the Dutch churches in this century, arose from an excessive attachment to the Cartesian philosophy as connected with theology. This will appear from those commotions, greater than all others, produced by Roël and Becker. Certain Cartesian divines, at the head of whom was Hermann Alexander Roël, a theologian of Franeker, a man of singular acuteness and perspicuity, were supposed in the year 1686 to attribute too much to reason in theology. Nearly the whole controversy was embraced in these two questions. I. Whether the divine origin and authority of the sacred books can be demonstrated by reason alone; or whether the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit is necessary in order to a firm belief on this subject? II. Whether the Holy Scriptures propose anything to be believed by us which is contrary to correct and sound reason? The first was affirmed and the second denied, not only by the above named Roël, but also by John Van der Wayen, Gisbert Wessel, Duker, Ruard ab Andala, and others; the contrary was maintained by Ulrich Huber, a jurist of great reputation, Gerhard de Vries, and others.¹ A great part of Belgium being now in a flame, the states of Friesland prudently interposed and enjoined silence and peace on both the contending parties. Those who shall accurately investigate this cause will I think perceive that a great part of it was a strife about words, and that the remainder of it might have been easily settled, if it had been stripped of its ambiguities.

¹ The same writers may be consulted here as were referred to in sec. 30 [note 2], for the Cartesian and Cocceian controversies were united in one. To these may be added Albertus, Διαλόγων κείμενα, Cartesianismus et Cocceianismus, descripti et refutati, Lipsæ 1678, 4to.

34. A little after this first controversy had been in some measure hushed, this same Roël in the year 1689 fell under no slight suspicion that he was plotting against sound theology, in consequence of some other singular opinions of his. He was viewed with suspicion not only by his colleagues, particularly by Campeius Vitranga, but also by very many of the Dutch divines.² For he denied that the Scriptural representations of the generation of the Son of God are to be understood literally or as denoting a kind of natural generation; and maintained that the death of holy men and the evils they suffer in this life, equally with the calamities and death of the wicked, are the penal effects of the first sin; and he advanced some things respecting the divine decrees, original sin, the divine influence in regard to the sinful acts of men, the satisfaction made by Christ, and other subjects, which either in reality or at least in form and phraseology, differed much from the received opinions.³ The magistrates of Friesland published decrees which prevented these disputes from spreading in that province; but the rest of the Dutch, and especially those of the province of Holland, could not be restrained from condemning Roël and his disciples, both privately and in their public conventions, as corruptors of divine truth.⁴ Nor did this resentment die with the excellent man who was the object of it; but even to our times the Roëlians, though they most solemnly protest their innocence, are thought by many to be infected with concealed heresies.

35. Balthazar Becker, a minister of the Gospel at Amsterdam, from the Cartesian definition of a spirit, the truth of which he held to be unquestionable, took occasion to deny absolutely all that the Scriptures teach us respecting the works, snares, and power of the prince of darkness and his satellites, and also all the vulgar reports respecting ghosts, spectres, and witchcraft. There is extant a prolix and copious work of his, entitled The World Bewitched first published in 1691, in which he perverts and explains away, with no little ingenuity indeed but with no less audacity, whatever the sacred volume relates of persons possessed by evil spirits and of the power of demons, and maintains that the miserable being whom the sacred writers call Satan and the Devil, together with his ministers, lies bound with everlasting chains in hell, so that he cannot thence go forth to terrify mortals and to plot against the righteous. Des Cartes placed the essence of spirit in thinking, but none of those acts which are ascribed to evil spirits can be effected by mere thought.⁵ Therefore lest the reputa-

¹ Le Clerc, Biblioth. Universelle et Histor. tome vi. p. 368.

² Concerning this extraordinary man, see the Bibliotheca Bremensis Theologico-Philol. tom. ii. par. vi. p. 707; Burmann's Trajectum eruditum, p. 306, &c. [Unpartheyische Kirchenhistorie, Jena, 1735, 4to, vol. ii. p. 620, &c.—Mur.]

³ These errors may be best learned from a paper of the Faculty of Theology at Leyden, in which they confirm the sentence pronounced on them by the Dutch synods, entitled, Judicium Ecclesiasticum, quo opiniones quedam Claris. H. A. Roëlii synodice damnatæ sunt, quædam a Professoribus Theologiae in Academia Lugduno-Batava, Leyden, 1713, 4to, 20 sheets. [Roël maintained that the title Son of God referred only to the human nature of Christ, and to the supernatural formation or conception of it, as also to his mediatorial office, and consequently that it afforded no proof of his divinity. Yet in his later writings, he admitted that Christ was also called the Son of God on account of his eternal generation by the Father, yet without excluding the before-mentioned ground. In order to prove that the death of believers is a just punishment, he maintained that in justification only some of the punishments of sin are remitted, and that the complete removal of them does not take place till after the resurrection.—Schl.]

⁴ It must not be inferred from this statement of Mosheim, that professor Roël was excommunicated, deprived of his office, or even declared a heretic. Some of his opinions were condemned, but not the man. After serving as a chaplain to several noblemen he was made professor, first of philosophy and then of theology, at Franeker in Friesland, in the year 1686. In the year 1704, he was removed to the professorship of theology at Utrecht, where he died in office, A.D. 1718, aged 65. The states of Friesland enjoined upon him in 1691 not to teach or preach his peculiarities of sentiment; they also enjoined upon his opponents to keep silence on the same subjects. Both obeyed, so that in Friesland there was no more contention. But in the other Dutch provinces, no such order was taken by the government, and therefore several synods, finding Roël's opinions to exist and to spread, passed orders of condemnation upon them, and decreed that candidates should be required to renounce them in order to their receiving license. He was undoubtedly a great man. Hence Mosheim calls him "vir eximius." He was also, in the main, sound in the faith. Yet on some points he carried his speculations farther than the spirit of the times would permit. But like a good man, when he found his speculations to produce alarm and commotion, at the bidding of the magistrates he forbore to urge them and expended his efforts on subjects less offensive.—Mur.

⁵ Our historian relates here, somewhat obscurely, the reasoning which Becker founded upon the Cartesian definition of mind or spirit. The tenor and amount of his argument are as follows:—"The essence of mind is thought, and the essence of matter is extension.—Now, since there is no sort of conformity or connexion tion of Des Cartes should be impaired, the narrations and decisions of the divine books must be accommodated to his opinion. This error not only disquieted all the United Provinces, but likewise induced not a few Lutheran divines to gird on their armour.¹

between a thought and extension, mind cannot act upon matter unless these two substances be united, as soul and body are in man; therefore no separate spirits, either good or evil, can act upon mankind. Such acting is miraculous, and miracles can be performed by God alone. It follows, of consequence, that the Scripture accounts of the actions and operations of good and evil spirits must be understood in an allegorical sense." This is Becker's argument, and it does in truth little honour to his acuteness and sagacity. By proving too much, it proves nothing at all; for if the want of a connexion or conformity between thought and extension renders mind incapable of acting upon matter, it is hard to see how their union should remove this incapacity since the want of conformity and connexion remains notwithstanding this union. Besides, according to this reasoning, the Supreme Being cannot act upon material beings. In vain does Becker maintain the affirmative by having recourse to a miracle, for this would imply that the whole course of nature was a series of miracles, that is to say, that there are no miracles at all. —Mur.

¹ See Lillienthal's Selecta Histor. Literar. par. 1. observ. II. p. 17, &c.; Miscellanea Lipsiens. tom. I. p. 361, 364, where there is a description of a medal struck in reference to Becker, and the other writers whom we have often quoted. Nouveau Diction. Hist. et Crit. tome I. p. 133. [Balthazar Becker, D.D. was born near Gronigen in 1634, educated there and at Franeker, made rector of the Latin school in the latter place, a preacher, a doctor of divinity, and lastly, a pastor at Amsterdam, where he died in 1718. This learned man published three Catechisms; in the last of which, 1670, he taught that Adam, if he had not sinned, would have been immortal by virtue of the fruits of the tree of life; questioned whether endless punishment (which he placed in horror and despair), was consistent with the goodness of God; and admitted Episcopacy to be the most ancient and customary form of church government. These sentiments exposed him to some animadversion. In 1680, he published a book in proof that comets are not ominous. In his sermons he had often intimated that too much was ascribed to the agency of the devil; and being frequently questioned on the subject, he concluded to give the world his full views on the whole subject. This he did in his Dutch work, entitled:—De tooverde Wereld, &c. i.e. The World Bewitched, or a Critical Investigation of the commonly received opinion respecting Spirits, their Nature, Power, and Acts, and all those extraordinary feats which men are said to perform through their Aid, in 4 Books, Amsterd. 1691, 4to. In the preface he says, "It is come to that at the present day, that it is almost regarded as a part of religion to ascribe great wonders to the devil; and those are taxed with infidelity and perverseness who hesitate to believe what thousands relate concerning his power. It is now thought essential to piety not only to fear God but also to fear the devil. Whoever does not do so is accounted an atheist, because he cannot persuade himself that there are two Gods, the one good, and the other evil." He also gives a challenge to the devil:—"If he is a God let him defend himself, let him lay hold of me, for I throw down his altars. In the name of the God of hosts, I fight with this Goliath, we will see who can deliver him." In the first book he states the opinions of the pagans concerning gods, spirits, and demons, and shows that both Jews and Christians have derived their prejudices on this subject from them. In the second, he shows what reason and scripture teach concerning spirits; and in the third, confutes the believers in witchcraft and confederacies with the devil. In the fourth book he answers the arguments alleged from experience to prove the great power of the devil. He founds his doctrine on two grand principles; that from their very nature spirits cannot act upon material beings, and that the Scriptures represent the devil and his satellites as shut up in the prison of hell. To explain away the texts which militate against Its author, although confuted by vast numbers and deprived of his ministerial office, yet on his dying bed in 1718 continued to affirm until his last breath that he believed all he had written to be true. Nor did his new doctrine die with him, for it still has very many defenders both open and concealed.

36. It is well known that various sects, some of them Christian, others semi-Christian, and others manifestly delirious, not unfrequently start up and are cherished in Holland as well as England. But it is not easy for any one who does not reside in those countries to give a correct account of them; because the books which contain the necessary information seldom find their way into foreign countries. Yet the Dutch sects of Verschorists and Hattëmists having now for some time been better known among us, I shall here give some account of them. The former derived their name from James Verschoor of Flushing, who is said to have so strangely mixed together the principles of Spinoza and Cocceius, as out of them to have produced about the year 1680 a new system of religion, which was quite absurd and impious. His followers are also called Hebrews, because they all, both men and women, bestow great attention on the Hebrew language. The latter sect arose about the same time, and had for their leader Pontianus von Hattë, a minister of the gospel at Philipsland in Zealand, who was an admirer of Spinoza and was afterwards deprived of his office on account of his errors. These two sects were kindred to each other, and yet they must have differed in some way, since Van Hattë could never persuade the Verschorites to enter into alliance with him. Neither of them wished to be looked upon as abandoning the Reformed religion, and Hattë wrote an exposition of the Heidelberg Catechism. If I understand correctly the not very lucid accounts given us of their doctrines, the founders of both sects in the first place inferred from the his system, evidently cost him much labour and perplexity. His interpretations, for the most part, are similar to those still relied on by the believers in his doctrine.—Becker was not the first writer who published such opinions. Before him were Arnold Gellinx of Leyden who died in 1669; and Dailion, a French Reformed preacher, who fled to London and there published his views in 1687. But these advanced their opinions problematically, while Becker advanced his in a positive tone. He also discussed the whole subject, and he mingled wit and sarcasm with his arguments. This difference caused his book to awaken very great attention, while theirs pass unheeded. Becker was deposed and silenced by the synods of Edam and Alkmaar, in 1692. But the senate of Amsterdam continued to him his salary till his death in 1718. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. viii. p. 712, &c.—Mur.

Reformed doctrine of the absolute decrees of God, this principle, that whatever takes place necessarily and unavoidably takes place. Assuming this as true, they denied that men are by nature wicked or corrupt, and that human actions are some of them good and others bad. Hence they concluded that men need not trouble themselves about a change of heart, nor be solicitous to obey the divine law; that religion does not consist in acting but in suffering; and that Jesus Christ inculcated this only, that we patiently and cheerfully endure whatever by the good pleasure of God occurs or befalls us, striving only to keep our minds tranquil. Hattem in particular taught that Jesus Christ did not by his death appease divine justice, nor expiate the sins of men; but that he signified to us there was nothing in us which could offend God, and in this way he made us just. These things appear to be perverse and inimical to all virtue, and yet neither of these men—unless I am wholly deceived—was so beside himself as to recommend iniquity, or to suppose that a person may safely follow his lusts. At least, the sentiment ascribed to them, that God punishes men by their sins not for them, seems to carry this import that unless a person bridle his lusts, he must suffer punishment both in this life and in that to come; yet not by a divine infliction or by the sovereign will and pleasure of God, but by some law of nature.¹ Both sects still exist, but they have discarded the names derived from their founders.

37. The churches of Switzerland from the year 1669 were in great fear lest the religion handed down to them by their fathers and confirmed at the Synod of Dort, should be contaminated with the doctrines already mentioned of the French divines, Amyraut, De la Place, and Capell. For there were at that time among the associated ministers of Geneva, certain men distinguished both for their eloquence and their erudition, who not only approved those doctrines but endeavoured against the will of their colleagues to induce others to embrace them.² To restrain the efforts of these men, the principal divines of Switzerland in the year 1675 had a book drawn up by John Henry Heidegger, a very celebrated divine of Zurich, in opposition to the new doctrines of the Frenchmen; and with no great difficulty they persuaded the magistrates to annex it by public authority to the common Helvetic formulas of religion. It is usually called the Formula Consensus. But this measure which was intended to secure peace, became rather the fruitful source of contentions and disturbance. For many declared that they could not conscientiously assent to this Formula, and hence pernicious commotions arose in several places. In consequence of these, the canton of Basil and the republic of Geneva, at the urgent solicitation of Frederick William of Brandenburg, in the year 1686 abrogated the Formula Consensus.³ In the other cantons, it with difficulty retained its authority for some time; but in our age, having given birth to the most violent quarrels, particularly in the university of Lausanne, it began to sink also in these cantons and to lose nearly all its influence.⁴

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE ARMINIANS OR REMONSTRANTS.

1. FROM the bosom of the Reformed church, to its great injury, there originated in the present century two sects, the Arminians and the Quakers, the former owing its birth to an excessive regard for human

¹ It must not be imagined from this expression of our historian, that this Form, entitled the Consensus, was abrogated at Basil by a positive edict. The case stood thus: Mr. Peter Werenfels, who was at the head of the Consistory of that city, paid such regard to the letter of the Elector as to avoid requiring a subscription to this Form from the candidates for the ministry, and his conduct in this respect was imitated by his successors. The remonstrances of the Elector do not seem to have had the same effect upon those who governed the church of Geneva; for the Consensus or Form of agreement maintained its credit and authority there until the year 1706, when, without being abrogated by any positive act, it fell into disuse. In several other parts of Switzerland it was still imposed as a rule of faith, as appears by the letters addressed by George I. king of England, as also by the king of Prussia, in the year 1723 to the Swiss Cantons, in order to procure the abrogation of this Form or Consensus, which was considered as an obstacle to the union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. See the Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Troubles arrivés en Suisse à l'Occasion du Consensus, published in 8vo, at Amsterdam, in the year 1726.—Mach.

² See Pfaff's Schrediasma de Formula Consensus Helvetica, Tubing. 1723, 4to; Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Troubles arrivés en Suisse à l'Occasion du Consensus, Amsterd. 1726, 8vo. [In this Formula Consensus (which, like the Lutheran Formula Concordiæ, might better be called Formula Disensus), four controversies which had previously disquieted the Reformed churches were decided. It condemned, I. The doctrine of Moses Amyraut respecting general grace, and established the most rigid opinion of special grace. It condemned, II. The opinion of Joshua Placcius (De la Place) respecting the imputation of Adam's sin. III. Piscator's doctrine concerning the active obedience of Christ; and IV. Lewis Capell's critical doctrine concerning the points of the Hebrew text. This Formula, so long as subscription to it was rigorously enforced, deprived the Swiss churches of many a worthy divine, who would rather quit his country than violate his conscience. Suizer of Berlin was a remarkable example.—Schl.

¹ See Hase's Dissertation in the Museum Bremens. Theol. Philol. tom. II. p. 144, &c.; Goeree, Kerkelyke und Wereldlyke Historie, Leyden, 1799, 4to; Bibliothèque Beligique, tome II. p. 203, &c.

² See Leti's Historia Generina, parte IV. lib. v. p. 448, 489, 497, &c.

reason and the latter to a neglect of it. The Arminians derived their name and their rise from James Harmensen, or, as he chose to be called in Latin, James Arminius; first a minister of the Gospel at Amsterdam and then professor of the theology at Leyden, a man whom even his enemies commend for his ingenuity, acuteness, and piety.¹ They are also called Remonstrants, from the petition they presented to the states of Holland and West Friesland in 1610 which was entitled a Remonstrance. And as the friends of Calvinism presented another petition in opposition to this, under the title of Counter Remonstrance, they obtained the name of Contra-Remonstrants.

2. Arminius, though trained from infancy in the Genevan doctrines and actually educated in the academy of Geneva, when he arrived at manhood abandoned the common doctrine of the majority in the Reformed church respecting predestination and the divine decrees, and went over to the side of those who believe that the love of God and the merits of our Saviour respect the whole human race.² Time and reflection confirmed him in his sentiments; and when called to the office of a professor at Leyden he thought duty and candour required him publicly to teach his sentiments, and to oppose the opinions of Calvin which were embraced by most of the Dutch divines. And this he was the more bold to do, because he knew that many persons besides himself, and some of them men of the highest respectability, were averse from the Genevan opinions on this subject; neither were the teachers required, either by the Belgic Confession or by any other public law, to think and teach just as Calvin did. Arminius inculcated not without effect what he deemed true, for he persuaded great numbers to adopt his sentiments. But at the same time he drew on himself immense odium from the Calvinistic school, which then flourished greatly in Holland. In particular, Francis Gomar his colleague was very hostile to him. Such was the commencement of this long and most perplexing controversy. But Arminius died in 1609, just as it began to rage and to pervade the whole United Provinces.³

3. After the death of Arminius, the controversy was carried on for several years without any decisive advantage gained by either party. The wishes of the Arminians, who sought only to have their opinions tolerated in the state or republic, were not a little favoured by the first men in the commonwealth, such as John van Oldenbarnevelt, Hugo Grotius, Rombout Hoogerbeets, and others. For these persons supposed that in their free country every one might believe what he chose on subjects not determined by the Belgic Confession, and they used every means to bring the Calvinists to bear with moderation the dissent of the opposite party. And even prince Maurice of Orange, the head of the commonwealth and who afterwards became the capital enemy of the Arminians, together with his mother and the court, was at first not averse from these views. Hence the conference between the parties at the Hague in 1611, hence also the discussion at Delft in 1613, and likewise the edict of the States of Holland in 1614 in favour of peace, and all the other efforts to reconcile the brethren whom religion had separated from each other.¹ But the suspicion of the Calvinists that the Arminians aimed at the overthrow of all religion, was so far from being allayed by these measures that it daily became more confirmed; and they spiritedly censured the zeal of the magistrates for interposing their authority in behalf of public peace.² And whoever regards truth more than every other consideration must acknowledge that the Arminians were not sufficiently cautious in regard to their intercourse and familiarity with persons disposed to advance opinions very diverse from the Reformed religion; and in this way they gave great occasion to their adversaries to suspect them of everything bad and pernicious to the public religion.

¹ The fullest account given of him is by Brandt in his Historia Vitæ Jac. Arminii, Leyden, 1724, 8vo, and republished with a preface and some notes by me, Brunswick, 1725, 8vo. Add the Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. et Crit. tome i. p. 471, &c. (and the Creed of Arminius, with a brief sketch of his life and times, by Moses Stuart, in the Eccl. Repertory, Andover, 1831, vol. i. No. ii. p. 220-308.—Mur.) The entire works of Arminius have been repeatedly published in a moderate sized quarto volume. I use the edition of Frankfurt, 1634, 4to. Those who wish to discover and estimate correctly the genius of the man, should read especially the Disputationes, both the public and the private. His manner of teaching partakes somewhat of the dark scholasticism of his age, and yet it approximates to that simplicity and perspicuity which his followers have regarded and still regard as among the primary excellencies of a theologian. The historians of the sect and its Confession are treated of by Köcher, Biblioth. Theol. Symbolica, p. 481, &c. [See also Francke's Disa. Theologica de Historia dogmatum Arminianorum, Keil, 1813, 8vo.—Mur.] Among their confessions may be reckoned, I. Their Remonstrance in 1610, which was presented to the States in vindication of Arminius and other divines accused of error, and was first printed in 1617. II. Their proper Confession of 1621, which Episcopius set forth. III. Their Apology in 1629, in reply to the confutation of their Confession by the Leyden divines, set forth also by Episcopius. IV. Their catechism of 1640 by Jo. Uytenbogaerd. V. Lastly, their Acta et Scripta Synodalia Dordracena, Harderwyck, (or rather, printed on board a ship), 1620, 4to. These are very different from the Acta Synodi Dordr. published at Dort in folio.—Schl.

² The occasion of this change is treated of by Bertius, Oratio in funus Arminii; by Brandt, Vita Arminii, p. 22, and by nearly all the historians of these events. The change took place in 1591, as appears from the famous letter of Arminius to Gryneus written in this year, (and extant in the Biblioth. Bremensis Theol. Philologica, tom. iii. p. 384), for he there states his doubts.

³ No one has more copiously treated the whole history of the controversy and the public schism which arose from it than Gerhard Brandt, in his excellent work, The History of the Reformation in Belgium, written in Dutch, volumes ii. and iii. of which there are extant concise epitomes both in English and in French. To this may be added Uytenbogaerd's Ecclesiastical History [of the United Provinces, 1647, fol.] also written in Dutch; Limborch's Historia Fidei Episcopii; and the Epistola Clarorum Virorum (commonly called Epistola Arminianorum), published by Limborch. Those who wish for a shorter narrative may consult Limborch's Relatio Historica de Origine et Progressu Controversiarum in Federato Belgio de Prædestinatione et Capitulis annexis, which is subjoined to the later editions of his Theologia Christiana. But all these were Arminians. Those who think proper to hear also the contrary party, may consult Trigland's Ecclesiastical History, written in Dutch, and some of the numerous writings which have been published against the Remonstrants.

4. The whole controversy, however, which after the synod at Dort assumed a very different form and was enlarged by many additions, was at this time confined to the doctrines of grace and predestination, and was comprehended by the Remonstrants in the five propositions, which are so well known under the name of the Five Points. For the Arminians taught:—I. That before the foundation of the world or from eternity, God decreed to bestow eternal salvation on those who, he foresaw, would maintain their faith in Christ Jesus inviolate until death; and on the other hand, to consign over to eternal punishment the unbelieving who resist the invitations of God to the end of their lives. II. That Jesus Christ by his death made expiation for the sins of all and every one of mankind, yet that none but believers can become partakers of this divine benefit. III. That no one can of himself, or by the powers of his free will, produce or generate faith in his own mind; but that man, being by nature evil and incompetent (ineptus) both to think and to do good, it is necessary he should be born again and renewed by God for Christ's sake, through the Holy Spirit. IV. That this divine grace or energy, which heals the soul of man, commences, advances, and perfects all that can be called truly good in man; and therefore all the good works [of men] are ascribable to no one except to God only and to his grace, yet that this grace compels no man against his will, though it may be repelled by his perverse will. V. That those who are united to Christ by faith are furnished with sufficient strength to overcome the snares of the devil and the allurements of sin; but whether they can fall from this state of grace and lose their faith or not, does not yet sufficiently appear and must be ascertained by a careful examination of the Holy Scriptures. The last of these propositions the Arminians afterwards so modified as to assert explicitly that it is possible a man should lose his faith and fall from a state of grace.³ At that time therefore, if we may judge of men's meaning by their statements and declarations, the Arminians very much resembled the Lutherans. The Calvinists however maintain that the opinions of the Arminians are not to be learned from their declarations, but that their language must be interpreted by their secret sentiments; for they assert that the Arminians, under these specious representations, instilled the poison of Socinianism and Pelagianism into honest and unsuspecting minds. God is the judge of men's hearts; yet if it were allowable to estimate the import of these propositions by what the leading men of the sect have taught more recently, it would be very difficult wholly to disprove that judgment of the Calvinists. For whatever the Arminians may say, the doctrines taught since the synod of Dort by their principal doctors respecting grace and the points connected with it, approach much nearer to the sentiments of those called Pelagians and Semipelagians than to those professed by the Lutherans.

5. The Arminians, supported by the friendship of the magistrates, viewed their cause as safe or at least as not desperate, when suddenly an unexpected storm entirely prostrated it. There arose first concealed ill-will, and afterwards hostility, between the principal administrators of the new Belgic republic. On the one part were John van Oldenbarnevelt, a very distinguished man, Hugo Grotius, and Rombout Hoogerbeets, and on the other the stadtholder, Maurice prince of Orange. Ac-

¹ The authors who treat particularly of these events are mentioned by the writers of the general history, and we therefore omit to name them. Yet Le Vassor, who in the 1st and 2d volumes of his Histoire de Louis XIII. has particularly treated of these troubles, deserves especially to be read. [But still more Van Wagenaar, History of the United Netherlands, vol. iv. p. 311, &c. of the German translation.—Schl.]

² The conduct of the magistrates, who sought to quiet the commotions by their interposition, and who employed not only persuasion but likewise commands, was eloquently and learnedly defended by Hugo Grotius in two treatises. The one, which is in everybody's hands and has been often printed, is a general treatise, entitled De Jure Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra; the other descends to particulars, and is entitled Ordinum Hollandiæ et Westfrisiæ Pietas a multorum Cæsummiis vindicata, Leyden, 1613, 4to.

³ The history of these Five Articles, especially among the English, was written by Heylin, and translated from English into Dutch by Brandt and published at Rotterdam in 1697, 8vo. [These Articles were exhibited by the Remonstrants in the conference at the Hague in the year 1611, or two years after the death of Arminius.—Mur.] cording to some authors, Maurice wished to be created count of Holland, a design which his father William had before entertained;¹ according to others, he only wished to obtain more authority and power than appeared consistent with the liberties of the state; at least (as no one denies), he was regarded by the leading men as seeking supreme dominion with the subversion of liberty. The head men of the republic whom we have mentioned, and who were also patrons of the Arminians, resisted these designs. The Remonstrants strenuously supported their defenders, without whom they could not remain in safety; and on the other hand, their adversaries accommodated themselves to the views and wishes of the prince, and inflamed his already irritated mind by various new suspicions. Therefore, kindling with indignation, he resolved on the destruction of those who guided the commonwealth with their counsels and of the Arminians who were their supporters, and at the same time joined himself to the party of the Calvinists. Those leading men in the republic above mentioned were therefore thrown into prison. Oldenbarnevelt, a man of great respectability and venerable both for his grey hairs and for his long and faithful public services, was consigned to a capital punishment. Grotius and Hoogerbeets were condemned to perpetual imprisonment,² under I know not what pretence.³ The cause of the Arminians could not be brought before a civil tribunal, because their alleged offence was not against the laws but the religion of the country. To procure their condemnation therefore, a more sacred tribunal or a council must be called, agreeably to the practice of the Genevans, who think all spiritual matters and controversies should be decided in ecclesiastical councils.

6. Without delay, at the instance of often done by men by no means bad, and that a good cause is often defended in an unjustifiable manner. For illustration and confirmation of the facts here concisely stated, the best authorities in addition to those already mentioned are, Le Clerc, in his Historia Provinciarum Belgii Federati, and his Bibliothèque Choisie, tome ii. p. 134, &c. and Grotius, in his Apologeticum corum, qui Hollandiæ, Westfrinque et Vicinis quibusdam Nationibus ex Legibus præfuerunt ante Mutationem quæ evenit a.d. 1618, Paris, 1640, 12mo, and often republished. The Life of John van Oldenbarnevelt, written in Dutch, was printed at the Hague, 1648, 4to. A history of the trial of the three celebrated Dutchmen above named was elegantly compiled from authentic documents by Brandt, entitled Historie van de Rechtpleginge gehouden in den Jaaren 1618 et 1619, omtrent de drie gevangene Heeren Johann van Oldenbarnevelt, Rombout Hoogerbeets, Hugo de Groot, of which I have before me the third edition with notes, Rotterdam, 1723, 4to. This whole subject receives also much light from the history of the life and actions of Hugo Grotius, very carefully compiled, chiefly from unpublished papers, by Caspar Brandt and Adrian Cattenburg. This great and noble work was published in two large volumes, entitled Historie van het Leven des Heeren Huig de Groot beschreven tot den Anfang van zyn Gezantschap wegens de Koninginne en Kroone van Zueden aan't Hof van Vranckryck, door Casp. Brandt, en vervolgt tot zyn Doodel door Adrian van Cattenburgh, Dordrecht en Amsterd. 1727, 2 vols. fol. Those who wish to get a near view and full knowledge of this great man must by all means consult this work; for all the other accounts of his life which are extant are insipid and unanimated, presenting only a shadow of this great hero. Nor is the most recent life of Grotius in French by Burligny (republished from the Paris edition in Holland, 1753, 2 vols. 8vo) much better; at least it does not satisfy one who is desirous of a thorough knowledge of the transactions. [There appeared in Holland a warm vindication of the memory of this great man, in a work published at Delft in 1757, and entitled, Grotii Manes ab Iniquis Obliterationibus vindicati; accedit Scriptorum ejus, tum Editorum tum Ineditorum, Conspectus Triplex. See the following note.—MacI.

³ Mosheim, however impartial, seems to have consulted more the authors of one side than of the other; probably because they are more numerous and more universally known. When he published this history the world was not favoured with the Letters, Memoirs, and Negotiations of Sir Dudley Carleton, which Lord Royston (now Earl of Hardwick) drew forth some years ago from his inestimable treasure of historical manuscripts, and presented to the public, or rather at first to a select number of persons, to whom he distributed a small number of copies of these Negotiations printed at his own expense. They were soon translated both into Dutch and French; and though it cannot be affirmed that the spirit of party is nowhere discoverable in them, yet they contain anecdotes with respect both to Oldenbarnevelt and Grotius, which the Arminians and the other patrons of these two great men have been studious to conceal. These anecdotes, though they may not be at all sufficient to justify the severities exercised against these eminent men, would however have prevented Mosheim from saying that he knew not under what pretext they were arrested.—MacI. [Mosheim's Latin is: "Criminum nescio quorum nomine," which Schlegel here understands to mean, upon some unimportant charges.—Mur.

¹ That Maurice aimed at the dignity of count of Holland is stated by Aubrey, from the representations of his father Benjamin de Maurier, the French ambassador to Holland, in his Mém. pour servir à l'Hist. de Hollande et des autres Provinces Unies, sec. ii. p. 216, ed. Paris, 1697, 8vo. According to Aubrey, Oldenbarnevelt disapproved and resisted this design of the prince, and Maurice revenged this temerity by the capital punishment of this great patriot. The truth of this statement is opposed at great length by Le Vassor, in his Histoire de Louis XIII. tome ii. par. ii. p. 123, &c. But Le Clerc, in his Biblioth. Choisie, tome ii. p. 134, &c. and in his Historia Provinciarum Belgii Federati, takes great pains to substantiate the truth of this statement of Aubrey, or rather of Aubrey's father; and he also shows that Maurice's father had the same designs. It is not necessary we should decide this dispute. It is sufficient for our purpose that Maurice was viewed by Oldenbarnevelt and his friends as wishing to subvert the liberties of his country and to obtain supreme power (which no one denies); and that this was the cause of Oldenbarnevelt's eagerness to weaken the influence of Maurice and to check the progress of his power; whence arose the indignation of Maurice and the calamities of the Arminians who adhered to Oldenbarnevelt and Grotius.

² That the general course of events was such as is here stated, will not be denied at the present day when the times of excitement have gone by, even by the patrons of Calvinistic sentiments who are ingenuous. And they may grant this without injury to their cause. For if their ancestors (though I wish neither to deny nor to affirm the fact), while guarding and defending their religious opinions, either from the customs of the age or from the ebullitions of passion, were not so considerate and provident as they should have been, no candid and wise man will thence infer that these their sons are bad men or their cause an iniquitous one. Because it is well known that many bad things are

Maurice,¹ delegates were assembled at Dort, a city in Holland, from the United Provinces and from Hesse, England, the Palatinate, Bremen, and Switzerland, who held in the years 1618 and 1619 what is called the Synod of Dort. Before it, appeared on citation, in defence of their cause, the leading men of the Arminian sect, at the head of whom and their chief orator was Simon Episcopius, a disciple of Arminius and professor of theology at Leyden, a man distinguished, as his enemies admit, for acuteness, learning, and fluency. But scarcely had Episcopius saluted the judges in a grave and eloquent address, when difficulties arose embarrassing the whole impending discussion. The Arminians wished to commence the defence of their cause by attacking the sentiments of their adversaries the Calvinists; this the judges disapproved, deciding that the accused must first explain and prove their own doctrines before they proceeded to confute those who differed from them. Perhaps the Arminians hoped that a full exposure of the odious consequences they could attach to the Calvinistic doctrine would enkindle a hatred of it in the minds of the people present, while the Calvinists feared lest the mighty genius and fine eloquence of Episcopius might injure their cause in the view of the multitude.² As the Arminians could by no means be persuaded to comply with the wishes of the synod they were dismissed from the council, and they complained that they had been treated unjustly. But the judges, after examining their published writings, pronounced them, though absent and unheard, guilty of corrupting theology and holding pestilential errors; and it was coincident with this sentence that they should be excluded from the communion of the church and be deprived of authority to teach. That there was fault on both sides in this matter no candid and good man will deny, but which party was most in the wrong this is not the place to decide.³

7. We cannot here discuss either the purity and virtues or the iniquities and faults of the fathers at Dort. In extolling the former the Calvinists, and in exaggerating the latter the Arminians, if I do not mistake, are over-zealous and active.⁴ That among the judges of the Arminians there were men who were not only learned but also honest and religious, who acted in great sincerity, and who had no suspicion that they were doing anything wrong, is not to be doubted at all. On the other hand, these facts were too clear and obvious to escape the notice of any one:—I. That the destruction of the Arminian sect was determined upon before the council was called;⁵ and these fathers were called toge-

¹ The writers on the synod of Dort are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, tom. xi. p. 723. The most copious of them all is Brandt, in his History of the Reformation in the Netherlands, vol. ii. and iii. But as he was himself an Arminian, with his narration should be compared the work of Leydecker, in which the purity and integrity of the synod of Dort are vindicated in answer to Brandt, Eere van de Nationale Synode van Dordrecht voorgestaan en bevestigd tegen de Beschuldigen van G. Brandt, vol. i. Amsterd. 1705, vol. ii. 1707, 4to. After formally comparing them, I did not find any very enormous errors in Brandt; nor do these two writers disagree so much about the facts as about the causes and import of the facts. John Hales, an Englishman who belonged to neither party, has related simply what he saw; and his Letters written from the scene of this council I myself published some time ago with notes, Hamburg, 1724, 8vo. [He was chaplain to the English ambassador at the Hague, Sir Dudley Carleton, and was king James's secret envoy sent to watch the movements of the Synod. His letters addressed to Carleton were published under the title of the Golden Remains of the Ever-memorable John Hales of Eton College, 1659, 4to. Mosheim translated them into Latin, prefixed a long preface and added some notes.—Mur. [See also Hallam's Introduction to the Literature of Europe, vol. iii. p. 79 and 81-89; Hagenbach's History of Doctrines, Buch's translation, vol. ii. p. 206, &c.—It.

⁴ All that the Arminians deemed faulty in this council they collected in a concise and neatly-written book, frequently printed: Nulliteyten, Mishandelighen, ende onhylicke Proceduren der nationelen Synodi ghehouden binnen Dordrecht anno 1618, 1619, in't korte ende rousse afgeleworpen, 1619, 4to.

⁵ Maclaine says: "This assertion is of too weighty a nature to be advanced without sufficient proof. Our author quotes no authority for it."—Schlegel replies: The proofs lie in the whole progress of the events. And a man must be ignorant of the human heart and wholly unacquainted with the history of ecclesiastical councils, not to draw the natural conclusion from what preceded the council, that the condemnation of the Arminians was already determined on before the council was convened at Dort. The election of Rogermann, who possessed the soul of an inquisitor, to the presidency of the synod would lead us to no other conclusion. The assessors of the president and the scribes of the council were known to be zealous Contra-Remonstrants. And so early as the year 1617, in the month of July, the

¹ Our author always forgets to mention the order issued by the States-General for the convocation of this famous synod; and by his manner of expressing himself, and particularly by the phrase Mauricio auctore, would seem to insinuate that it was by the prince that this assembly was called together.—The legitimacy of the manner of convoking this synod was questioned by Oldenbarnevelt, who maintained that the States-General had no sort of authority in matters of religion, not even the power of assembling a synod, affirming that this was an act of sovereignty which belonged to each province separately and respectively. See Carleton's Letters in Hales' Golden Remains, &c.—Macl.

² Perhaps also another reason why both parties were so stiff on this point was, that the members of the synod were not themselves of one mind in regard to the doctrine of predestination; for some of them were Supralapsarians and others Infralapsarians, and in general the doctrine of reprobation presented so many difficult points that the members of the synod deemed it advisable to prescribe to the Remonstrants the mode of confutation and defence, and thus to retain in their own hands the direction of the whole discussion; while the Remonstrants hoped perhaps that the diversity of opinion among the members of the synod would prove advantageous to them, if they could have liberty to expatiate widely on the doctrine of reprobation and divide somewhat the votes of their judges. This is the not improbable conjecture of Van Wagenaar, in his Geschiede der vereinigten Nederlanden, vol. iv. p. 461.—Schl.

ther, not to inquire whether this sect might be tolerated or not, but to promulgate a sentence long before passed with some becoming formality, with the appearance of justice, and with the consent of the foreign theologians. II. That the enemies and accusers of the Arminians were their judges, and that the president of the council, John Bogermann,¹ exceeded almost all others in hatred of this sect. III. That neither the Dutch nor the foreign divines had liberty to decide according to their own pleasure, but were obliged to decide according to the instructions which they brought with them from their princes and magistrates.² IV. That in the council itself the voice of the illustrious and very honourable men who appeared as the legates of Maurice and the States-General, had more influence than that of the theologians who sat as the judges. V. That the promise made to the Arminians when summoned before the council, that they should have liberty to state, explain, and defend their opinions as far as they were able and deemed it necessary, was violated by the council.³

8. The Arminians, being adjudged enemies of their country and of religion, were subjected to severe animadversion. First, they were all deprived both of their sacred and their civil offices, and then their preachers were ordered to refrain from preaching altogether. Those who would not submit to this order were ignominiously sent into exile, and subjected to other punishments and indignities. Hence many retired to Antwerp and others to France, and a large body of them emigrated to Holstein by the invitation of Frederick duke of Holstein, and built the handsome town of Frederickstadt in the duchy of Sleswick. In that town the Arminians still live in tranquillity, and enjoy the free exercise of their religion. The leaders of this colony were men of distinction in Holland, especially Adrian van der Wahl, the first governor of the town of Frederickstadt.⁴ Among the clergymen who accompanied this colony the most distinguished were, the famous Conrad Vorstius, who drew a great deal of odium upon the Arminians by his sentiments which were not far removed from those of the Socinians; Nicholas Grevinchovius, a man of acuteness, who had been a preacher at Rotterdam; Simon Gou-

Contra-Remonstrants declared at the Hague, "that they regarded the Remonstrants and those who embraced the sentiments of the Remonstrants to be false teachers (pro falsis doctoribus), and that they only waited for a national synod, of which there then appeared to be a bright prospect, so that in it there might be made a legitimate secession from the Remonstrants, which should be put into execution after an ecclesiastical trial." See Limborch's Relatio Historica de Origine et Progressu Controntrastiar. in Fœderato Belgio, p. 18. The provincial synods which were held before the synod of Dort so arranged everything as to give the Contra-Remonstrants the upper hand. In particular, they deposed Remonstrant ministers, as e.g. Uytenbogerd, Grevinchovius, and others. And in electing ministers to attend the national synod, the Remonstrants were wholly passed by; and only from the district of Utrecht were two Remonstrant delegates sent to Dort, and even these were excluded as soon as the cause of the Remonstrants came on. See Limborch, ubi supra, and Wagener's History of the United Netherlands (in German), vol. iv. p. 446, &c. Thus far Schlegel.—Undoubtedly, nearly or quite every minister in Holland had an opinion formed with regard to the correctness of the doctrines charged upon the Remonstrants, and the propriety of permitting their propagation. It could not be otherwise, as these opinions had been preached and published abundantly for ten years, and had been the great theme of discussion among theologians. In such circumstances, to be ignorant of the alleged Arminian doctrines or to have no opinion concerning them, would have been altogether unbecoming in a clergyman. It was therefore a thing of course and no reproach upon their characters, that the divines at Dort should come together with opinions already made up on the theological questions they were to discuss.—Mur.

¹ Bogermann was minister of Lecuwarden, an avowed enemy of the Arminians, who had already written against them, and who was so full of the persecuting spirit of Beza that he had translated into Dutch Beza's book, De Heretici a Magistratu Punientiis. And his whole behaviour at the synod showed that he was better qualified to be the papal legate at a council of Trent than the moderator of a Protestant synod.—Schl. [Bogermann was doubtless too zealous, and in several instances too severe and passionate in his speeches. But his intolerant spirit was the spirit of the age. Christian forbearance and tenderness towards the erring were then nowhere well understood and duly practised.—Mur.

² Here our author has fallen into a palpable mistake. The Dutch divines had no commission but from their respective consistories or subordinate ecclesiastical assemblies; nor are they ever the depositaries of the orders of their magistrates, who have lay deputies to represent them both in provincial and national synods. As to the English and other foreign doctors who appeared in the synod of Dort, the case perhaps may have been somewhat different.—Macl.

³ See Le Vassor's Histoire du Regne de Louis XIII. tome II. livr. xii. p. 365, 366, and my notes on Hales' Historia Concilii Dordraceni, p. 394-400. [The words of the promise were: "Liberum illis fore ut proponant, explicent, et defendant, quantum possent et necessarium judicarent, opiniones SUAS." This promise, the Arminians contended, gave them liberty to state so many of their own doctrines and in such an order as they pleased; and also to state their views of the sentiments or doctrines of their opposers, and to refute them as fully and in such a manner as they pleased. Whether this was a fair and reasonable construction of the words of the promise, and such a construction as the synod were bound to admit, the reader will judge. Yet it was the refusal of this and the requiring the Remonstrants to state and defend only their own sentiments, and to proceed in regard to them methodically, that the Remonstrants complained of as a violation of the promises made them. See the Remonstrants' views of a proper council, presented to the synod December 10th, the decree of the synod of the 29th December, and the synod's explanation of it, December 29th, and also the communication of the Remonstrants to the synod on the 21st of January; all which documents are given by the Remonstrants themselves, in their Acta et Scripta Synodalia Dordracena, par. i. p. 4, &c. 140, &c. 159, &c.—Mur.

⁴ The history of this colony may be learned from the noted Epistola præstantium et eruditiorum Virorum Ecclesiasticæ et Theologicæ, published by Limborch and Hartaecker, the latest ed. Amsterd. 1704, fol. Compare Müller's Introductio in Histor. Chersonesus Cimbrica, par. II. p. 108, &c. and Pontoppidan's Annales Ecclesiæ Danicæ diplomaticæ, tom. III. p. 714, &c.

lart, John Grevius, Marcus Walther, John Narsius, and others¹.

9. Maurice, under whose government the Arminians suffered so greatly, died in 1625. By the clemency of his brother and successor, Frederick Henry, the Arminian exiles were recalled, and restored to their former reputation and tranquillity. Accordingly those who had retired to France and to the Spanish Netherlands returned, and they established congregations distinct from the Reformed in various places, and particularly at Rotterdam and Amsterdam. In order to have a seminary for their own sect and religion, they founded a distinguished school at Amsterdam, in which two professors train up young men for the ministry, the one teaching theology, and the other history, philosophy, and the learned languages. Simon Episcopius was the first professor of Arminian theology; and since him, these offices have been filled, down to the present time, by men highly famed for learning and genius, namely, Stephen Curcellæus, Arnold Poellenburg, Philip Limborch, John le Clerc, Adrian van Cattenburg,² and John James Wetstein.

¹ Concerning Vorstius, Müller treats very fully in his Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 931, &c. He also treats expressly of the other persons here mentioned, Ibid. tom. ii. p. 242, 247, 249, 255, 576.

² Of these and the other Arminian writers, Adrian Van Cattenburg treats expressly in his Bibliotheca Scriptorum Remonstrantium, Amsterd. 1728, 4to. [Episcopius was born at Amsterdam, a pupil of Arminius, and after the deposition of Vorstius, his successor at Leyden, an eloquent and acute man, who being full of theological scepticism began to question many of the received opinions, e.g. the doctrine of original sin. He died in 1643, as professor in the Arminian Gymnasium at Amsterdam. His life written by Limborch and his writings were published by Curcellæus and Poellenburg, Amsterd. 1650, 1655, 2 vols. fol.—Curcellæus (Courcelles) was born at Geneva, of French parentage, and early showed a propensity towards Arminianism, which he defended against the decrees of Dort. He died in 1659, an Arminian professor at Amsterdam. His theological works were published collectively by Limborch, Amsterd. 1675, fol. His fine edition of the Greek New Testament with various readings is well known.—Poellenburg was born at Hoorn in the Netherlands, where he became a preacher. Thence he was removed to Amsterdam as a preacher, was made successor to Curcellæus in his professorship there, and died in 1666.—Limborch was brother's grandson to Episcopius, first a preacher at Gouda and then at Amsterdam, and lastly professor there, where he also died in 1712. He was a modest theologian, who united great learning with extraordinary clearness of style in his writings. This is manifest by his Theologia Christiana. Also his Amica collatio cum erudito Judæo de veritate Religionis Christianæ, his Historia Inquisitionis, and his collection of the Epistles of Remonstrants, are important works, as likewise his very temperately written Relatio Historica de Origine et Progressu Controversiarum in fœderato Belgio de Prædestinatione, &c.—Le Clerc was born and educated at Geneva, and professor of Hebrew, philosophy, and the fine arts, and afterwards of church history in the Arminian Gymnasium at Amsterdam, and died in 1736, aged 79. His Epistole Theologice, under the name of Liberius de S. Amore; Sentimens de quelques Théologiens d'Hollande sur l'Histoire Critique du V. T. par R. Simon; his Journals, (periodical works, containing analyses and Reviews of books, with original essays interspersed), namely, Bib-

10. The Remonstrants, as we have seen, differed at first from the Reformed in nothing except the five propositions concerning grace and predestination, and it was on this ground that they were condemned at the synod of Dort. They moreover so explained those five propositions that they seemed to teach precisely what the Lutherans do. But from the time of the synod of Dort, and still more after the exiles were allowed to return to their country, they professed an entirely new species of religion, different from the views of all other sects of Christians. For most of them not only gave such an explanation of these propositions, as seemed to differ very little from the views of those who deny that a man needs any divine aid whatever in order to his conversion and living a holy life; but they also lowered very much most of the doctrines of Christianity, by subjecting them to the modifications of reason and human ingenuity. James Arminius, the parent of the sect, undoubtedly invented this form of theology and taught it to his followers;³ but it was Simon Episcopius, Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, (1683—1693, in 26 dense volumes, 12mo), Bibliothèque Choisie (1703—1713, in 28 volumes, 12mo), Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, (1714—1727, in 29 vols. 12mo), his Commentaries on the Old Testament, Ars Critica, Harmony of the Gospels, Histoire des Provinces unies de Pays Bas (from 1560—to 1728, in 3 vols. fol. his Historia Ecclesiastica duorum Primorum a Christo Sæculorum, 1716, 4to), and his editions of classical and other authors, have procured him a great name among the learned.—Cattenburg was professor of theology in the Arminian Gymnasium at Amsterdam, till the year 1730. He wrote Bibliotheca Scriptorum Remonstrantium, Spicilegium Theologicæ Christianæ Limborchianæ, and some works explanatory of the Bible.—Wetstein succeeded Le Clerc after being deposed at Basil, and died in 1754, aged 61. His critical edition of the New Testament, (1751—2, in 2 vols. fol.), is well known.—Schl.

³ It is a common opinion that the early Arminians who flourished before the Synod of Dort, were much purer and more sound than the latter ones who lived and taught after that council; and that Arminius himself only rejected Calvin's doctrine of absolute decrees and its necessary consequences, while in everything else he agreed with the Reformed; but that his disciples, and especially Episcopius, boldly passed the limits which their master had wisely established, and went over to the camp of the Pelagians and Socinians. But it appears to me very clear, that Arminius himself revolved in his own mind and taught to his disciples that form of religion which his followers afterwards professed; and that the latter, especially Episcopius, only perfected what their master taught them, and casting off fear explained it more clearly. I have as a witness, besides others of less authority, Arminius himself, who in his Will drawn up a little before his death explicitly declares that his aim was to bring all sects of Christians, with the exception of the papists, into one community and brotherhood. We will cite his words from Bertius' Oratio funebris in Arminium, p. 15. "Ea propositio atque docui — que ad propagationem, amplificationemque veritatis, religionis Christianæ, veri Dei cultus, communis pietatis, et sanctæ inter homines conversationis, denique ad convenientem Christiano nomini tranquillitatem et pacem iuxta verbum Dei possent conferre, excludens ex his Papatum, cum quo nulla unitas fidel, nullum pietatis aut Christianæ pacis vinculum servari potest." Now what, I ask, is this but that very Arminianism of more recent times, which the first master in the Arminian school after its founder, and a very ingenious man, who digested and polished it and reduced it to a regular system.¹

11. The whole system of the Remonstrants is directed to this one simple object, to unite the hearts of Christians who are divided by a variety of sentiments and opinions, and to gather them into one fraternity or family, notwithstanding they may differ in many points of doctrine and worship. To accomplish this object, they maintain that Christ does not require of his followers to believe much but to do much, or to cultivate love and virtue; and of course they give a very broad definition of a true Christian. For according to them every person belongs to the kingdom of Christ, who I. receives the holy Scriptures and particularly the New Testament as the rule of his religion, whatever may be the interpretation he gives to those books; II. is opposed to the worship of many gods and to whatever is connected with such an abomination; III. leads an upright life, conformable to the divine law; and IV. never troubles or disturbs those who differ from him on religious subjects or who interpret the books of the New Testament in a different manner from what he does. By these principles a wide door is opened to all who honour Christ, though differing widely in sentiments, to enter into the Arminian communion. Yet the papists are excluded from it, because they think it right to persecute and put to death those who oppose the Romish prelate.² And indeed if other Christians would abide by these precepts, the great diversities of opinion among them would clearly be no obstacle to their mutual love and concord.

12. It hence appears that the Arminian community was composed of persons of various descriptions, and that it had properly no fixed and stable form of religion, or, to use a common phrase, no system of religion. They would not indeed wish to be thought destitute of a bond of union; and therefore they show us a sort of confession of faith, drawn up with sufficient neatness by Simon Episcopus, for the most part in the very words of the sacred writers, and which they represent as their formula and rule of faith.³ But as none of their teachers are so tied to this formula by oath or promise as not to be at liberty to depart from it; and on the contrary, as every one from the constitution of the sect is allowed to construe it according to his own pleasure—and it is capable of different expositions—it must be manifest that we cannot determine at all, from this confession, what they approve and what they reject. And hence their public teachers advance very different sentiments respecting the most weighty doctrines of the Christian religion.⁴ Nor do they all follow one well-defined and uniform course in almost anything, except in regard to the doctrines of predestination and grace. For they all continue to assert extends so wide the boundaries of the Christian church that all sects may live harmoniously within them, whatever opinions they may hold, except only the professors of the Romish religion? [The opinion that Arminius himself was very nearly orthodox, and not an Arminian in the common acceptation of the term, has been recently advocated by professor Stuart of Andover, in an article expressly on the Creed of Arminius, in the Biblical Repository, No. 11. Andover, 1831. See p. 293 and 301. To such a conclusion the learned professor is led, principally by an artful and imposing statement made by Arminius to the magistrates of Holland in the year 1608, one year before his death, on which Mr. Stuart puts the most favourable construction the words will bear. But from a careful comparison of this declaration of Arminius with the original Five Articles of the Arminian Creed (which were drawn up almost in the very words of Arminius, so early as the year 1610, and exhibited by the Remonstrants in the conference at the Hague in 1611, and were afterwards, together with a full explanation and vindication of each article, laid before the synod of Dort in 1619, changing however the doubting of the fifth article into a positive denial of the saints' perseverance), it will, I think, appear manifest that Arminius himself actually differed from the orthodox of that day on all the five points; and that he agreed substantially with the Remonstrants on all those doctrines for which they were condemned in the synod of Dort. And that such was the fact, appears to have been assumed without hesitation by the principal writers of that and the following age, both Remonstrants and Contra-Remonstrants.—Mr.

¹ A life of this celebrated man, which is well worth reading, was composed by Limborch, and first published in Dutch, and then more full and complete in Latin, Amsterd. 1701, 8vo.

² In place of all others, Episcopus may here be consulted in his tract, entitled, Vetus Theologus Remonstrans, sive vera Remonstrantium Theologia de Errantibus dilucida declaratio, which is extant in his Opera, tom. i. p. 508, &c. and like the rest of his productions is neatly and perspicuously written. Le Clerc sums up the doctrines of his sect in the Dedication of his Latin translation of Hammond's New Testament, which is addressed to the learned among the Remonstrants, in this manner, p. 3. "Proferri soletis—eos duntaxat a vobis excludi, qui (I.) idololatria sunt contaminati, (II.) qui minime habent Scripturam pro fidei norma, (III.) qui impuri moribus sancta Christi precepta conculcant, (IV.) aut qui denique alios religionis causa vexant." Many tell us that the Arminians regard as brethren all who merely assent to what is called the Apostles' Creed. But a very competent witness, Le Clerc, shows that this is a mistake, Bibliothèque Ancienne et Moderne, tome xxv. p. 119. "Ils se trompent. Ils (les Arminiens) offrent la communion à tous ceux qui reçoivent l'Ecriture Sainte comme la seule règle de la foi et des mœurs, et qui ne sont ni Idolâtres, ni persécuteurs."

³ This confession is extant in Latin, Dutch, and German. The Latin may be seen in the Works of Episcopus, tom. ii. par. ii. p. 69, where also, p. 97, may be seen an Apology for this Confession, by the same Episcopus, written against the Divines of the university of Leyden.

⁴ Any one may see this with his own eyes, by only comparing together the writings of Episcopus, Curcellæus, Limborch, Le Clerc, and Catenburg. (Those Arminians who agree with the Reformed in all doctrinal points, except the Five Articles contained in their remonstrance, are for distinction's sake called Quinquearticularians.—Schl.

most carefully, though in a very different manner from their fathers, the doctrine which excluded their ancestors from the pale of the Reformed church; namely, that the love of God embraces the whole human race, and that no one perishes through any eternal and insuperable decree of God, but all merely by their own fault. Whoever attacks this doctrine attacks the whole school or sect; but one who may assail any other doctrines contained in the writings of Arminians, must know that he has no controversy with the Arminian church, whose theology with few exceptions is unsettled and fluctuating, but only with some of its doctors, who do not all interpret and explain in the same manner even that one doctrine of the universal love of God to mankind, which especially separates the Arminians from the Reformed.

13. The Arminian community at the present time is very small if compared with the Reformed; and, if common report be true, it is decreasing continually. They have at present [1753] thirty-four congregations in Holland, some smaller and some larger, over which are forty-four ministers; out of Holland they have one at Frederickstadt. But the principles adopted by their founders have spread with wonderful rapidity over many nations, and gained the approbation of vast numbers. For to say nothing of the English, who adopted the Arminian doctrines concerning grace and predestination as early as the times of William Laud, and who on the restoration of Charles II. assented in great measure to the other Arminian tenets, who is so ignorant of the state of the world as not to know that in many of the courts of Protestant princes, and almost everywhere among those who pretend to be wise, this sentiment which is the basis of Arminianism is prevalent; namely, that very few things are necessary to be believed in order to salvation, and that every one is to be allowed to think as he pleases concerning God and religion, provided he lives a pious and upright life? The Hollanders, though they acknowledge that the sect which their fathers condemned is gradually declining in numbers and strength, yet publicly lament that the opinions of the sect are spreading farther and farther, and that even those to whose care the decrees of the synod of Dort were intrusted are corrupted by them. How much inclined towards them many of the Swiss, especially the Genevans are, and also many of the French, is very well known.¹ The form of church government and the mode of worship among the Arminians, are very nearly the same as among the Reformed of the Presbyterian churches. Yet the leaders of the sect, as they neglect no means tending to preserve and strengthen their communion with the English church, so they show themselves very friendly to episcopal government; and they do not hesitate to affirm that they regard it as a holy form, very ancient, and preferable to the other forms of government.²

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE QUAKERS.

1. THOSE who in English are called Quakers are in Latin called Trementes or Tremuli. This name was given them in the year 1650, by Gervas Bennet, a justice of the peace in Derbyshire;³ but whether because their whole body trembled before they began to speak on religious subjects, or because Fox and his associates said that a man ought to tremble at hearing the word of God, does not sufficiently appear. In the mean time they suffer themselves to be called by this name, provided it be correctly understood. They prefer however to be named from their primary doctrine, Children or Professors of the Light. In familiar discourse, they call each other Friends.⁴ The origin of the sect belongs to those times in English history when civil war raged universally, and when every one who had conceived in his mind a new form either of civil government or of religion, came forth with it from his obscure retreat into public view. Its parent was George Fox, a shoemaker, a man naturally very gloomy, shunning society, and peculiarly fitted to form visionary conceptions. As early as tendency of the Leibnizian and Wolfian philosophy to support Calvinism. The reasoning is ingenious and good. But the effects actually produced by this philosophy seem to be greatly overrated, when he says, "that the progress of Arminianism has been greatly retarded, nay, that its cause daily declines in Germany and several parts of Switzerland, in consequence of the ascendant which the Leibnizian and Wolfian philosophy hath gained in these countries, and particularly among the clergy and men of learning." When MacLaine wrote thus about the year 1763, the Germans were going fast into what is called German neology, and the Swiss approximating towards Socinianism, and the philosophy he speaks of was rapidly waning.—Mur.

² Hence, to omit many other things which place this beyond doubt, they have taken so much pains to show that Hugo Grotius, their hero and almost their oracle, commended the English church in the highest degree, and that he preferred it before all others. See the collection of proofs for this by Le Clerc, subjoined to his edition of Grotius's book, De Veritate Religionis Christianæ, p. 376, &c. ed. Hague, 1724, 8vo.

³ See Sewall's History of the Quakers, p. 23 [vol. i. p. 43, ed. London, 1811]; Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 32, &c. [where see Toulmin's note.—Mur.]

⁴ Sewall, ubi supra, p. 624 [vol. ii. p. 589, ed. Lond. 1811]; also Neal, Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 60, 61.—Mur.

¹ MacLaine has here a long and elaborate note on the

the year 1647, when he was twenty-three years old, he travelled over some of the counties of England, giving out that he was full of the Spirit, and exhorting the people to attend to the voice of the divine word, which lies concealed in the hearts of all. After Charles I. was beheaded, when both civil and ecclesiastical laws seemed to be extinguished together, he attempted greater things. For having acquired numerous disciples and friends of both sexes, among persons of a similar temperament with himself, in connexion with them he set all England in commotion; nay, in 1650, wherever he was able, he broke up assemblies for the public worship of God, as being useless and not truly Christian.¹ For this reason he and his associates were several times thrown into prison and chastised by the magistrates.²

2. The first association of Quakers was composed, in great measure, of delirious and infatuated persons, and therefore committed many acts which the more temperate Quakers of the present day extenuate indeed, but by no means commend or approve. For most of them, both male and female, declaimed vehemently against all other religions, assailed the public worship and the ministers of religion with insult and abuse, treated the commands of magistrates

¹ Fox and his adherents looked upon all worship of God which did not proceed immediately from the impulse of the Spirit within, as abominable in the sight of God. Hence he had no reverence for the religious worship of most of the sects of Christians around him. Yet it does not appear that he felt it to be his duty to attempt, forcibly, to interrupt or suppress such worship. But feeling bound always to obey the impulse of the Spirit, and supposing himself to have this impulse while in or near the places of worship, he sometimes was led to speak in them to the annoyance of the congregation, and was treated as a disturber of public worship. Three instances are mentioned, all occurring in the year 1649. The first was at Nottingham, and is thus related by Sewel, vol. i. p. 36, ed. 1811:—"He went away to the steeple-house, where the priest took for his text these words of the apostle Peter, 'We have a most (more) sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts.' And he told the people that this was the Scripture by which they were to try all doctrines, religions, and opinions. G. Fox hearing this, felt such mighty power and godly zeal working in him, that he was made to cry out, 'O! no, it is not the Scripture, but it is the Holy Spirit, by which the holy men of God gave forth the Scriptures, whereby opinions, religions, and judgments are to be tried. That was it which led into all truth and gave the knowledge thereof. For the Jews had the Scriptures, and yet resisted the Holy Ghost and rejected Christ, the bright morning-star, and persecuted him and his apostles, though they took upon them to try their doctrines by the Scriptures; but they erred in judgment and did not try them aright, because they did it without the Holy Ghost.' Thus speaking, the officers came and took him away and put him in a nasty stinking prison." The next instance was at Mansfield, and is thus related by the same author, vol. i. p. 38:—"While G. Fox was in this place, he was moved to go to the steeple-house and declare there the truth to the priest and the people; which doing, the people fell upon him and struck him down, almost smothering him, for he was cruelly beaten and bruised with their hands, Bibles, and sticks. Then they hauled him out, though hardly able to stand, and put him into the stocks, where he sat some hours; and they brought horsewhips, threatening to whip him. After some time they had him before the magistrates at a knight's house, who seeing how ill he had been used set him at liberty after much threatening. But the rude multitude stoned him out of the town." The third instance occurred at Market Bosworth, and is thus concisely stated by Sewel, vol. i. p. 39, &c.:—"Coming into the public place of worship, he (Fox) found Nathaniel Stephens preaching, who, as hath been said already, was priest of the town where G. Fox was born; here G. Fox taking occasion to speak, Stephens told the people he was mad and that they should not hear him, though he had said before to one Colonel Purfoy concerning him, that there was never such a plant bred in England. The people now being stirred up by this priest fell upon G. Fox and his friends, and stoned them out of the town." See A Refutation of Erroneous Statements, &c. by authority of the Yearly Meeting of Friends for New England, dated New Bedford, 12th month, 9th, 1811, subjoined to Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. ed. New York, 1824, vol. iv. p. 295, &c.; Neal's Hist. of Purit. ed. Toulmin, vol. iv. p. 58, 59.—Mur.

² Besides the common historians of this century see especially Gerhard Croesius (Croese), a Dutch clergyman's, Historia Quakeriana tribus Libris comprehensa, ed. ii. Amsterd. 1703, 8vo. On this however Kohlhaas [under the name of Philalethes], a doctor of physic and a Lutheran, who became a quaker, published Dilucidationes, (explanations), Amsterd. 1696, 8vo. And undoubtedly Croese's book, though neatly written, contains numerous errors. Yet the French history of the Quakers Histoire abrégée de la Naissance et du Progrès du Quakerisme, avec celle de ses Dogmes, Cologne, 1692, 12mo, is much worse. For the author does not so much state what he found to be facts, as heap together things true and false without discrimination, in order to produce a ludicrous account. See Croese's Hist. Quakeriana, lib. ii. p. 322 and 376, and Le Clerc's Bibliothèque Universelle et Hist. tome xxii. p. 53, &c. But by far the most full and authentic account, being derived from numerous credible documents and in part from the writings of Fox himself, is that given by the Quaker William Sewel's History of the Christian People called Quakers (first written in Dutch, and translated by the author into English, London, 1722, fol. and 1811 2 vols. 8vo.), translated from the English into German and printed 1742, fol. This work exhibits great research as well as fidelity, yet on points dishonourable or disadvantageous to the Quakers, he dissembles, conceals, and belchons not a little. Still, the statements of Sewel are sufficient to enable a discerning and impartial man to form a just estimate of this sect. Voltaire also has treated of the religion, the morals, and the history of these people, though rather to amuse than to enlighten the reader, in four letters written with his usual elegance, Mélanges de Littérature et de Philosophie, Œuvres, tome iv. chap. iii.—vi. p. 160, &c. [With which compare A Letter from one of the people called Quakers (Josiah Martin) to Francis de Voltaire, London, 1742.] In general, what he says is true and to be relied on, being derived from Andrew Pitt, a Quaker of London; but the witty man, to render his account more entertaining, has adorned it with poetic colouring, and added some things of his own. From these works chiefly was compiled, though not with due accuracy, the Dissertation on the Religion of the Quakers in that splendid work, Cérémonies et Coutumes Religieuses de tous les Peuples du Monde, tome iv. p. 124, &c. Among us, Meis published a small German work concerning this sect, and especially the English portion of it, Entwurf der Kirchen-Ordnung und Gebräuche der Quaker in England, 1715, 8vo. [Later works are, Gough's History of the People called Quakers, Lond. 1769, 3 vols. 8vo. Clarkson's Portraiture of Quakerism, 3 vols. 8vo, London and New York, 1806; A Summary of the History, Doctrines, and Discipline of Friends, written at the desire of the Meeting for Sufferings in London, 1800, and subjoined to Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. ed. New-York, 1824, vol. iv. p. 307-327; also Joshua Toulmin, D.D. Supplements annexed to his edition of Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 296-308, 518-552, and vol. v. p. 126-140, 245-261.—Mur.

and the laws with contempt, under the pretence of conscience and a divine impulse, and greatly disturbed both the church and the state. It is therefore not strange that many of them often suffered severe punishments for their rashness and folly.¹ Crom-

¹ See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 153, &c. [ed. 1817, p. 174, &c.] Sewel's Hist. of the Quakers, in various places. [Mr. Neal, in the passage just named, gives account of the offensive conduct of some of the first Quakers and of the punishments to which they were subjected. And Toulmin in his notes corrects the statements of Neal, and vindicates the Quakers. The story of James Nayler is there stated. This honest enthusiast, who had been an admired speaker among the Quakers, very improperly suffered some misguided individuals to style him the everlasting Son of righteousness, the prince of peace, the only-begotten Son of God, the fairest among ten thousand. He likewise allowed some of them to kiss his feet when imprisoned at Exeter, and after his release to conduct him in triumph to Bristol, one man walking bareheaded before him, another, a woman, leading his horse, and others spreading their scarfs and handkerchiefs in the way, and crying, "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hosts, Hosanna in the highest, holy, holy, is the Lord God of Israel." The magistrates of Bristol caused him to be apprehended and transmitted him to the parliament, which tried him for blasphemy. He alleged that these honours were not paid to him, but to Christ who dwelt in him, and said, "If they had it from the Lord, what had I to do to reprove them? If the Father has moved them to give these honours to Christ, I may not deny them; if they have given them to any other but to Christ, I disown them. I do abhor that any honours due to God should be given to me, as I am a creature; but it pleased the Lord to set me up as a sign of the coming of the righteous One, and what has been done to me passing through the town, I was commanded by the power of the Lord to suffer to be done to the outward man, as a sign, but I abhor any honour as a creature." Manifest as it was that the man was beside himself, and had no intention to allow divine honours to be paid to himself, he was condemned to be branded, have his tongue bored with a hot iron, sit in the pillory, be whipped through the streets of London and Bristol, and then to be imprisoned during the pleasure of parliament, and this cruel sentence was executed. But during his imprisonment he came to his senses, and very fully and penitently acknowledged his fault. The great body of Quakers at the time expressly disapproved his conduct, and they promptly ejected him from their community, but afterwards upon his repentance restored him. Such in substance is the famous case of James Nayler, which though a solitary case and disapproved at the time by the mass of the Quakers, has continued to this day to occasion great censure to be cast upon the whole sect. That the early Quakers sometimes mistook the conclusions of their own minds for suggestions of the Spirit, and that they needlessly adopted odious singularities, or did not comply so far as they ought with the customs and usages of society, nor treat the religion of others with that respect and decorum which are necessary to the peace of a community in which various religions are tolerated, many will think to be very manifest. Yet, on the other hand, there was doubtless a great want of candour and forbearance towards them. Their errors were magnified, and their indiscretions punished as high-handed crimes. One of their own writers, (Gough, Hist. of the Quakers, vol. i. p. 139, &c.) says, "A Christian exhortation to an assembly after the priest had done and the worship was over, was denominated interrupting public worship and disturbing the priest in his office; an honest testimony against sin in the streets or markets, was styled a breach of the peace; and their appearing before the magistrates covered, a contempt of authority; hence proceeded fines, imprisonments, and spoiling of goods."—Mosheim's representation of the modern Quakers as more moderate and decorous than their fathers in the days of Cromwell, seems to be in general correct. Yet the author of A Refutation of erroneous Statements relative to the Society of Quakers (in Mosheim's Eccles. Hist. vol. iv. p. 304, &c.), makes the following remarks, which are worthy of being

well, though otherwise not hostile to any sect, yet was afraid of this turbulent multitude, and at first he determined to suppress it. But when he perceived that all his promises and his threatenings could make no impression on them, he prudently refrained, and deemed it advisable merely to take care that they should not excite seditions among the people and weaken the foundations of his power.²

3. Gradually however the excessive ardour of the rising sect subsided, as it was natural to expect, and that divine light to which the Quakers made pretensions, by decrees ceased to disturb the commonwealth. In the reign of Charles II. both their religion and their discipline assumed a more definite and fixed character. In this business, Fox was assisted especially by Robert Barclay, a Scotch knight, [gentleman], George Keith, and Samuel Fisher, learned men who had connected themselves with his sect.³ For these three men digested and reduced to fixed principles, the loose inserted here. "Dr. Mosheim has, in several instances, endeavoured to impress the reader with the idea, that the ancient and modern Quakers were entirely different people, both in respect to their principles and conduct. This is the more worthy of notice, as it is an error not by any means peculiar to him, but which in a degree prevails very generally. We view the modern Quakers with our own proper vision, and through a medium cleared from the discolourations of that through which we view the ancient, and they appear to us a quiet, orderly, moral, and religious people. But in the accounts transmitted to us by their enemies, we view the ancient Quakers through a discoloured medium, a vision extremely acrimonious and tinged with bile, and they appear to us fanatic, turbulent, and riotous. If we were to imagine to ourselves the modern Quakers passing through our country, as they actually do, seeking and conversing with sober inquirers, appointing meetings for religious worship; and if at the same time we were to imagine a mob of dissolute and enraged rabble at their heels, scoffing, and beating them with sticks and stones to interrupt their meetings, without the least marks of violence or even of defensive resistance to any on their part; if we imagine some unworthy ministers and magistrates rather instigating their fury, the latter sending them to prison charged with the riots to which themselves had been accessory, the Quakers submitting to all with a patience unquerable, yet pursuing their mission with undeviating perseverance, not to be paralleled in history since the days of the first promulgators of the Christian faith, we might then perhaps view a true picture of the ancient Quakers, their principles, their doctrine, and their manners being the same."—Mur.

* Clarendon tells us in his History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, [French edition] vol. vi. p. 437, that the Quakers remained always violent enemies to Cromwell. See Sewel, ubi supra, book iii. p. 91, 113, 148, 149, &c. [ed. 1811, vol. i. p. 168, 209, 272, 275, &c.—Mur.

³ Respecting Barclay, see Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. et Crit. tome i. p. 67, &c. Respecting Keith, see Sewel, Hist. of the Quakers, p. 429, 490, 544, 560. Respecting Fisher, see the Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1750, p. 333, &c. (Robert Barclay was descended from an honourable family, but he was not a knight. For his history the Quakers refer us to the account of him by William Penn and others, his contemporaries, prefixed to the edition of his works in folio, 1693. For the life of Fisher, they refer us to William Penn's account of him, annexed to Fisher's works, fol. 1679.—Mur.

and vague discipline of Fox, who was an illiterate man.¹ Yet for a long time, these wiser and more quiet Quakers had to endure even more suffering and calamity in England than the insane and turbulent had experienced, though not so much for their religion as for their manners and customs. For as they would not address magistrates by their honorary title and pay them customary respect, as they refused the oath of allegiance to the king, and as they would not pay tithes to the clergy, they were looked upon as bad citizens and dangerous men, and were often severely punished.² Under James II. and especially after the year 1685, they began to see better days; for which they were indebted to the celebrated William Penn, who was employed by the king in state affairs of the greatest importance.³ At length, William III. who gave peace to all sects of dissenters from the reigning church, allowed these people also to enjoy public liberty and tranquillity.⁴

4. Oppressed and persecuted in their own country, the Quakers sought to propagate their sentiments among foreign nations, and to establish for themselves more secure habitations. Attempts were made in Germany, Prussia, France, Italy, Greece, Holland, and Holstein, but generally without effect. Yet the Dutch at length were prevailed upon to allow some families the liberty of residing among them, which they enjoy to the present time. Many of these people, not long after the sect arose, proceeded to America. And afterwards by a singular turn of things, the seat of its liberties and fortunes was established, as it were, in that quarter of the world. William Penn, the son of the English vice-admiral, adopted the Quaker religion in 1668, and in the year 1680 Charles II. and the parliament granted to him an extensive province in America, at that time a wilderness, in reward for the great services rendered by his father to the nation. Penn, who was a man of discernment and also eloquent, conducted a colony of his friends and associates into his new dominions, and there established a republic in form, laws, and regulations, unlike any other in the known world, yet a peaceful and happy one, and which still flourishes in great prosperity.⁵ The Quakers there are predominant, yet all persons may become citizens who acknowledge that there is but one supreme God whose providence is over all human affairs, and who pay him homage, if not by outward signs yet by uprightness of life and conduct. The province was named from its proprietor, Pennsylvania, and the principal city is called Philadelphia.

5. While Fox was still alive there were frequent dissensions and broils among the Quakers (in the years 1656, 1661, 1683, and in other years), not indeed respecting religion itself, but respecting discipline, customs, and things of minor consequence. But these contests for the most part were soon adjusted.⁶ After the death of Fox (which occurred in 1691), among others, George Keith especially, the most learned man of the whole sect, gave occasion to greater commotions. For Keith was thought by the other brethren in Pennsylvania to entertain sentiments not accordant with the truth on several points, but especially in regard to the human nature of Christ. He ¹ The Quakers consider this statement of Mosheim as being unjust to the character of George Fox. And indeed, William Penn, who certainly knew Fox's character well, and was no incompetent judge of men, in his preface to Fox's Journal, says, "He was a man that God endowed with a clear and wonderful depth, a discernment of others' spirits, and very much a master of his own.—In all things he acquitted himself like a man, a new and heavenly-minded man, a divine and a naturalist, and all of God Almighty's making. I have been surprised at his questions and answers in natural things, that while he was ignorant of useless and sophistical science, he had in him the foundation of useful and commendable knowledge, and cherished it everywhere." As to the Quaker discipline, their monthly meetings, &c. the records of the sect, they tell us, contain nothing from which it may be inferred that Barclay, Keith, and Fisher, had any share in its formation: or that it was not chiefly, if not wholly, brought into form and operation by Fox. He describes circumstantially his journeys through England to establish the monthly meetings. This was in the year 1667, the very year that Barclay joined the society, being then only 19 years old. Fisher died two years before this time, after lying in prison a year and a half. See Bevan's Refutation of some modern Misrepresentations of the Society of Friends, London, 1800, 12mo, and the Indiction of the Quakers, subjoined to Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, published at Philadelphia in 1800, and N. York, 1824.—Mur. [See especially Gurney's Observations on the Peculiarities of the Society of Friends, Lond. 1824.—R.

² See Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 313, 353, 396, 432, 510, 518, 552, 569; Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. i. p. 271; Sewel, ubi supra, passim. [The Quakers were conscientious in all these singularities; and though we may consider them as scrupulous without good reason and contrary to the example of Christ and his apostles, who paid tribute to the priests, submitted to civil oaths, and addressed magistrates by their usual titles, yet as they could not think so, they ought to have been indulged. The fact probably was, that many people of that age could not believe that they were actuated merely by scruples of conscience; and others who did suppose this might be the case, were not disposed to indulge the consciences of those who erred.—Mur.

³ See Sewel's History of the Quakers, p. 538, 546, 552, 564, 591, 605, &c.

⁴ Œuvres de M. de Voltaire, tome iv. p. 182.

⁵ The charter, the laws, and other papers relating to the establishment of this new commonwealth, were published [in Rapin's History, Penn's Works, and] not long since in the Bibliothèque Britannique, tome xv part ii. p. 310, tome xvi. part i. p. 127. Penn himself acquired a high reputation by several productions of his pen and by other things. Sewel treats of him in several places, and Burnet also, in his History of His Own Times.

⁶ See Sewel's History of the Quakers, p. 126, 132, 262, 429, 539, &c.

maintained that our Saviour possessed a twofold human nature—the one celestial and spiritual, the other terrene and corporeal.¹ This and the other inventions of Keith would perhaps have been tolerated with much moderation by a people who place all religion in an indescribable sense or instinct, if he had not strongly reprovved some strange opinions of the American brethren, and in particular, had he not opposed their turning the whole history of our Saviour into an allegory, or a symbolical representation of the duties which religion requires of man. In Europe, indeed, the Quakers dare not deny the truth of the history of Jesus Christ; but in America, where they have nothing to fear, they are said to utter what they think and to deny any Christ who exists without us. This controversy between Keith and the other Quakers, which was discussed in several general meetings of the whole sect in England and even brought before the British parliament, was at last decided in the year 1695 by the exclusion of Keith and his adherents from communion in worship. Touched with a sense of injury,² after some years Keith returned to the English church and died in its communion.³ His friends long held their separate meetings, but if report may be credited they have now become reconciled with the brethren.⁴

6. The religion of the Quakers appears at first view to be a novel thing, but it is not so in fact. For it is the ancient Mystic theology which arose in the second century, was fostered by Origen, and has been handed down to us by men of various characters and genius, now a little expanded and enlarged by the addition of consequences before not well understood. The well-meaning Fox indeed did not invent anything; but all that he taught respecting the internal word or light and its powers, he undoubtedly derived either from the books of the Mystics, a multitude of which were then circulating in England, or from the discourses of some persons initiated in the Mystic doctrines. But the doctrines which he brought forward confusedly and rudely (for he was a man of uncultivated mind and not adorned and polished with any literature or science) the sagacity of Barclay, Keith, Fisher, and Penn, embellished and reduced to such coherency, that they exhibit the appearance of a digested system or body of doctrine. The Quakers therefore may be justly pronounced the principal sect of [modern] Mystics, who have not only embraced the precepts of that occult wisdom, but have likewise seen whither those precepts lead, and have received at once all the consequences which flow from them.⁴

¹ Cérémonies et Coutumes de tous les Peuples du Monde, tome iv. p. 141, &c.; Croese's, Historia Quakeriana, lib. iii. p. 446, &c.

² Burnet's History of His Own Times, vol. ii. p. 290. The commotions about Keith are treated of by William Sewel, History of the Quakers, p. 577, 592, 603. But either he did not understand the true nature of the controversy (which might be, as he was not a man of learning) or he designedly perverts and obscures it. More light is thrown on it in the German life of Henry Bernhard Küster, published in Rahlfe's Gedachten Europa, vol. iii. p. 484. For Küster, a man of probity, then lived in America, and was an eyewitness of the transactions. (Mosheim appears to have been misinformed respecting George Keith and his controversy with the American Quakers; and therefore, with many others, he has given us Keith's false and slanderous representations as a true account. Keith was a Scotchman, born and liberally educated in the Scotch church. How and when he became a Quaker is not known. But for more than five-and-twenty years he travelled, preached, wrote, and suffered, among the Quakers of England and Scotland. During this period he was one of their most learned and efficient ministers, and was held by them in high estimation. In the year 1689, he removed to America and settled in Philadelphia, where he was made master of the principal school among the Quakers. He now attempted to direct and reform the discipline of the Society, and to assume a dictation which was offensive to his brethren. Mutual alienation took place, and Keith dealt out his censures both of men and measures with great freedom. A party adhered to him, but the great body of Quakers whom he was continually assailing, thought proper in the year 1692 to lay him under censure. Keith and his party still professed to be in communion with the English Quakers; but when the yearly meeting of Philadelphia sent an account of his case to the yearly meeting of London in the spring of the year 1694, Keith thought proper to appear there in vindication of his conduct. He asked and obtained a hearing; and the yearly meeting of London, after a full examination of the case, approved entirely of the proceedings of the American Quakers, and excluded Keith from all fellowship for his factious and unchristian conduct and his false criminations of the American brethren. A few however adhered to him in England, and he set up a separate meeting in London, and laboured much during several years to destroy that faith which he had spent so many years in defending and propagating. His misrepresentations of the views of the Quakers were abundant, and they were answered and confuted with no little success from his own former publications. Meeting with but little success in forming a new party, and gradually departing farther and farther from Quaker principles, he in the year 1700 wholly renounced Quakerism and became an Episcopal clergyman. In this capacity he visited America in the year 1702, hoping to draw many Quakers into the English church. But his former partisans in America, though not yet reconciled with the Quakers, would not follow him into the established church. Being entirely unsuccessful in America, Keith returned to England, became a parish minister, and died a few years after. See Gough's History of the Quakers, vol. iii. p. 317-350, 332-390, 442-455; Sewel's History of the Quakers, vol. ii. p. 493-495, 496, &c. 526-534, 574.—Mur.

³ See Rogers' Christian Quaker, London, 1698, 4to, and The Quakers a Divided People, London, 1708, 4to; Unschuldige Nachrichten, A.D. 1744, p. 496, &c.

⁴ Most persons think that we are to learn what the Quakers believe and teach, from Robert Barclay's Catholicism, or still better, from his Apology for the True Christian Divinity, which was published, Lond. 1676, 4to, and translated into other languages. Nor shall I much object to this opinion, if it be understood to mean that this sect is exceedingly desirous that others should judge of the nature of their religion by these books. But if any would have us believe that these books contain everything the Quakers regard as true, and that nothing more than what these contain was formerly taught among them or is now taught, he may easily be confuted from numerous publications. For Barclay as-

7. Their fundamental doctrine therefore, and that on which all their other doctrines depend, is that very ancient maxim of the Mystic school:—That there lurks in the minds of all men a portion of the divine reason or nature, or a spark of that wisdom which is in God himself. That whoever is desirous of true happiness and eternal salvation must, by turning his thoughts inward and away from external objects (or by contemplation and weakening the empire of the senses), elicit, kindle, and inflame this hidden, divine spark, which is oppressed and suffocated by the mass of the body and by the darkness of the flesh with which our souls are surrounded. That whoever shall do so will find a wonderful light rise upon sumed the office of an advocate, not that of a teacher; and of course he explains the sentiments of his sect, just as those do who undertake to defend an odious cause. In the first place, he is silent on points of Christianity of the utmost importance, concerning which it is very desirable to know the true sentiments of the Quakers; and he exhibits a really mutilated system of theology. For it is the practice of advocates to pass over the things which cannot easily be placed in an advantageous light, and to take up only such things as ingenuity and eloquence can make appear plausible and excellent. In the next place, he touches only cursorily and slightly upon several things, the full exposition of which would bring much odium on the Quakers, which is also an indication of a bad cause. Lastly, and to go no farther, the things which he cannot deny or conceal he explains in the most delicate and cautious manner, in common, ordinary phraseology, not very definite, avoiding carefully all the appropriate and almost consecrated terms adopted by the sect. Now it will not be very difficult for one who will take such a course, to give a specious appearance to any the most absurd doctrines. And it is well known that in this way the doctrine of Spinoza has been disguised and painted up by some of his disciples. There are other writers of this sect who express their sentiments much more clearly and freely; among whom, William Penn and George Whitehead, very celebrated men, deserve to be read preferably to all others. Among their other works there is one entitled, The Christian Quaker and His Divine Testimony vindicated by Scripture, Reason, and Authorities, against the injurious Attempts that have been lately made by several Adversaries, London, 1674, small folio. Penn wrote the first part and Whitehead the second. There is also extant in Sewel's History, p. 578, a Confession of Faith, which the Quakers published in 1693, in the midst of the controversy with Keith. But it is very cautiously drawn up and a great part of it is ambiguous. [Toulmin thinks that Mosheim is here uncandid and unjust towards Barclay; and that he has exposed himself to the just animadversions of Gough, in his History of the Quakers, vol. II. p. 401-406. See Toulmin's note to Neal, vol. v. p. 253, ed. Boston, 1817. Not having Barclay's Apology before me, I will pass no judgment on the justice or injustice of Mosheim's statements. But I will say that I do not understand him to charge Barclay with direct and wilful misrepresentations; but only with so far acting the advocate that his book is not the best guide to a full and correct knowledge of the sentiments of the Quakers; and consequently that it is necessary to consult other works, such as the writings of Penn and Whitehead, if we would fully and truly understand the Quaker system. Now this may be so, while still the vindication of the Quakers by the committee representing the yearly meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, A.D. 1799, may very honestly and truly say: "As to our tenets and history, we refer to Fox, Barclay, Penn, Sewel, Gough, &c. and declare that we never had, nor now have, any other doctrines to publish, and that there are no religious opinions or practices among us which have not been made known to the world."—Mur.] him, or a celestial voice break upon him out of the inmost recesses of the soul, which will instruct him in all divine truth and be the surest pledge of union with the supreme God. This natural treasure of mankind is called by various names; very often by that of a divine light, sometimes a ray of eternal wisdom, sometimes celestial Sophia, concerning whose nuptials under a female garb with man, some of this class of people speak in magnificent terms. The names best known among us are the internal Word, and Christ within us. For as they hold the sentiment of the ancient Mystics and of Origen, that Christ is the reason and wisdom of God, and suppose all men to be furnished with a particle of the divine wisdom, they are obliged to maintain that Christ or the Word of God resides, acts, and speaks, in all persons.¹

8. Whatever other singular and strange sentiments they may hold, all originated from this one principle as their prolific source. Because Christ resides in every son of Adam; therefore, I. All religion consists in man's averting his mind from external objects, weakening the empire of the senses, turning himself inward upon himself, and listening with his whole attention to what the Christ in his breast or the internal light dictates and enjoins. II. The external word, that is, the Holy Scriptures, does not enlighten and guide men to salvation; for words and syllables, being lifeless things, cannot have power to illumine the soul of man and to unite it to God. The only effect of the inspired books upon one who reads them, is to excite and stimulate him to attend to the internal word, and to seek the school of Christ teaching within him. Or, to express the same thing in other words, the Bible is a mute guide, which by signs points and directs to the living master residing in the soul. III.

¹ Yet the modern Quakers, as appears from the writings of Josiah Martin and others, are ignorant of the true sentiments of their forefathers, and perpetually confound this inherent and innate light with that light of the Holy Spirit which is shed on the minds of the pious. [This declaration of Mosheim clearly shows that he did not understand the fundamental principle of the Quakers, which is essentially different from that of the ancient Mystics. The particle of the divine nature, which the Mystics supposed to be a constituent part of man at his first creation, or a natural principle in all men, and which was sufficient to enlighten, guide, and sanctify them, provided the influences of the body or of sense could be counteracted, was quite a different thing from the internal light of the Quakers. For the latter is supposed to be a revelation made to the soul, by Christ acting through the Holy Spirit. It is therefore grace, not nature; a divine communication to fallen men, and not an original principle in their natural constitutions; and its influences and operations are moral not physical. It is therefore not strange that the Quakers should complain of this and the following sections as totally misrepresenting their fundamental principles.—Mur.]

Those who are destitute of this written word—pagans, Jews, Mohammedans, and the barbarous nations—want indeed some aid for obtaining salvation, but not the way or the discipline of salvation itself. For if they would give heed to the internal teacher, who is never silent when the man listens to him, they might abundantly learn from him whatever is necessary to be known and to be done. IV. The kingdom of Jesus Christ therefore is of vast extent, and embraces the whole human race. For all men carry Christ in their souls; and by him, though living in the greatest barbarism and totally ignorant of the Christian religion, they may become wise and happy both in this life and in that to come. They who live virtuously and restrain the cravings of lust, whether they are Jews, Mohammedans, or pagans, may become united to God through Christ residing in their souls in this world, and so be united to him for ever. V. The principal hindrance to men's perceiving and hearkening to Christ present within them, is the heavy, dark body, composed of vicious matter, with which they are enveloped. And hence all possible care must be taken that this connexion of soul and body do not blunt the mind, disturb its operations, and by means of the senses fill it with images of external things. And on this account it is not to be supposed that when the souls of men shall have escaped this prison, God will again thrust them into it; but what the Scriptures tell us of the resurrection of our bodies must either be understood figuratively or be referred to new and celestial bodies.¹

¹ These propositions all Quakers admit, or at least ought to admit if they would not entirely depart from the first principles of their system. The doctrines concerning which they disagree and dispute among themselves we here pass over, lest we should appear disposed to render the sect odious. [It is so far from being true, that "all Quakers admit these propositions," that they declare them to be mere fictions of Mosheim, or consequences which he and not they deduce from their first principle. And indeed they seem to be a philosophical creed, essentially diverse from the true belief of the Quakers. See the preceding note. According to the belief of the Quakers, the conflicting principles in sinful men are not a particle of the divine nature opposed and weighed down by the material body, but they are divine grace or the gracious operations of the Holy Spirit conflicting with the corrupt nature of fallen man. This divine grace they hold indeed, as the Arminians also do, to be universal, or to be afforded to all mankind as soon as they become moral agents. They likewise believe, with the Arminians, that the teachings and influences of this grace are sufficient, if duly improved, to lead those who have not the Scriptures to holiness and to salvation. Neither is it true that they deny the resurrection of the body, though they seem to have an idea that the future spiritual body will so differ from the present body that it cannot be called the same. Thus Henry Tuke (as quoted in Rees' Cyclopaedia, article Quakers) says: "The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is so connected with the Christian religion, that it will be also proper to say something on this subject. In explaining our belief of this doctrine, we refer to the fifteenth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corin-

9. These things show that the religion of the Quakers can conveniently dispense with a Christ without, and with all that Christians believe on the authority of the Holy Scriptures concerning his divine origin, life, merits, sufferings, and atonement. Because the whole ground of salvation lies in the Christ within. Not a few of them, therefore, as we learn from very credible authors, once fell into the absurdity of maintaining that the whole narrative in the Scriptures respecting Jesus Christ is not the history of the Son of God clothed in human nature, but the history of Christ within us decorated with poetic imagery and allegory. This opinion, if we may give credit to very respectable witnesses, is so far from having become extinct among them, that on the contrary it still prevails and is taught in America. But the Europeans, either from the force of truth or compelled by fear, maintain that the divine wisdom or reason descended into the son of the Virgin Mary, and by him instructed mankind; and that this divine man actually did and suffered what he is recorded to have done and suffered. At the same time, they express themselves very ambiguously respecting many things pertaining to Christ; in particular, respecting the fruits of his sufferings and death, their statements are so loose and meagre that it is altogether uncertain and dubious what and how great they suppose those fruits to be. Besides, they have not renounced wholly the [figurative] interpretation of the history of Christ above mentioned; for they press us hard to grant, that the things which occurred in regard to our Saviour while resident among men are signs and emblems of the things which may occur and must occur in relation to the Christ within, in order to a man's partaking of salvation. And hence they are accustomed, with the Mystics their preceptors, to talk much in lofty terms and inflated style of Christ's being born, living, dying, and rising to life, in the hearts of saints.²

thians. In this chapter (verses 40, 42, 44, 50) is clearly laid down the resurrection of a body, though not of the same body that dies. Here we rest our belief in this mystery, without desiring to pry into it beyond what is revealed to us."—Mur.

² In answer to most of the allegations in this section, the Quakers refer us triumphantly to the following extracts from their declaration or Confession of Faith, drawn up in the year 1693, and preserved by Sewel, Hist. of the Quakers, vol. II. p. 497, &c.: "We sincerely profess faith in God, by his only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, as being our only-light and life, our only way to the Father, and our only Mediator and advocate with the Father:—That God created all things, and made the worlds, by his Son, Jesus Christ, he being that powerful and living Word of God by whom all things were made; and that the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit are One, in Divine Being inseparable; one true.

10. From the same source which has been mentioned [namely, the ancient Mystic theology] has flowed their discipline and practice. They assemble indeed on the days in which other Christians generally assemble for religious purposes. But they neither observe festival days, nor use ceremonies and rites, nor suffer religion to be coupled with any positive institutions, placing it wholly in the worship of Christ hidden in the heart. Those who please teach in their assemblies, both men and women; for who may deny to the persons in whom Christ dwells and speaks, liberty to address and instruct the brethren? Prayers, hymns, and the other exercises which distinguish the public assemblies of other Christians, are unknown and discarded by them; and not without reason, since they believe with the Mystics that to pray truly is not to utter the desires of our hearts in a set form of words, but to collect the mind, recall it from all emotion and thought, and fix it wholly on a present deity. Neither do they baptize new members of their community, nor renew the remembrance of Christ's death and the benefits of it in the Lord's Supper. For they suppose both institutions to be Judaical, and to have been formerly used by the Saviour only to represent to the eye in visible imagery, by baptism, the mystical purification of the soul, and by the Holy Supper, the spiritual nourishment of it.

11. The system of morals adopted by them is beyond measure austere and forbidding. It is chiefly comprehended in these two precepts:—I. Whatever can afford us pleasure, produce agreeable emotions, or gratify the senses, must either be wholly avoided, or if by the laws of nature this is impossible, it must be so tempered and checked by reason and reflection that it may not corrupt the soul.¹ Because, as the mind living, and eternal God, blessed for ever:—Yet that this Word or Son of God, in the fulness of time, took flesh, became perfect man according to the flesh, descended and came of the seed of Abraham and David, but was miraculously conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; and also farther declared powerfully to be the Son of God, according to the Spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead:—That as man, Christ died for our sins, rose again, and was received up into glory in the heavens; he having, in his dying for all, been that one, great, universal offering and sacrifice for peace, atonement, and reconciliation between God and man; and he is the propitiation, not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world: We were reconciled by his death, but saved by his life:—That divine honour and worship is due to the Son of God; and that he is, in true faith, to be prayed unto, and the name of the Lord Jesus Christ called upon (as the primitive Christians did), because of the glorious union or oneness of the Father and the Son."—Mur.

¹ The first part of this precept (total avoidance of pleasures) the Quakers themselves say, "is no tenet of the Quakers." To the latter part of the precept they make no objection, believing it to be coincident with the apostle James's direction, "To keep himself unspotted from the world."—Mur.

ought to be always and exclusively attentive to the voice and the intimations of the teacher within, it should be separated from the intercourse and contagion of the body and corporeal things. II. It is criminal to follow the customs, fashions, and manners which are generally received in society. Hence they are easily distinguished from other people by their outward deportment and manner of life. They do not salute those they meet, never use the customary language of politeness and civility, never show respect to magistrates and to men of rank by any bodily gestures or the use of honorary titles, never defend their lives, their property, or their reputations against violence and slander, never take an oath, never seek redress in civil courts or prosecute those who injure them; on the contrary, they distinguish themselves from all their fellow-citizens by their aspect and demeanour, by their dress, which is very simple and plain, by their phraseology, their diet, and other outward things. It is however affirmed by persons of credibility that the Quakers, especially the prosperous Quaker merchants of England, have already departed considerably from these austere rules of life, and are gradually departing farther and farther; nay, that they explain and shape much more wisely the religious system of their ancestors. It is also well attested that very many of them have but an imperfect knowledge of the religion transmitted to them by their fathers.

12. This sect at its commencement had no organization and government. But afterwards the leading men perceived that their community could not subsist and escape falling into great disorder, unless it had regulations and men to superintend its affairs. Hence boards of elders were established, who discuss and regulate everything involving doubt and difficulty, and carefully watch that no one walk amiss or do anything injurious to the society. To these elders, those give in their names who contemplate marrying; to them are reported all births and deaths in the society; to them those who wish publicly to address the people exhibit their discourses, and in some places they must be written out, that the elders may see whether they will enlighten and edify.² For they do not allow, as they once did, every one at his pleasure to de-claim before the people; since the very indiscreet orations of many have brought much reproach and ridicule upon the society. There are also in the larger congregations, especially in London, certain persons whose duty it is to exhort the people, if it should so happen that no one of the assembly is disposed to instruct and exhort the brethren; lest, as heretofore often happened, for want of an orator the meeting should break up without a word said.¹ It is not indeed necessary that there should be any speaking in the Quaker assemblies. For the brethren do not come together to listen to an external teacher, but to attend to the voice of that teacher which each one carries in his own breast; or, as they express it, to commune with themselves (in semet ipsos introvertant).² But as their silent meetings afforded occasion to the enemies of the sect to carp and deride them, they have now appointed fixed speakers, to whom also they give a small compensation for their services.³ The Quakers annually hold a general convention of their whole society at London the week before Whitsunday, in which all their congregations are represented; and by this convention all important questions are examined and decided. The Quakers at this day complain of many grievances, but these all originate solely from their refusal to pay tithes.

² This duty of their elders the Quakers deny, declaring that their speakers never write their discourses, and that no such practice as that here described exists among them. Their speakers however have a kind of license or approbation, or at least when they travel abroad they carry some testimonials. And it is well known that they have standing committees to superintend all publications relating to the history and doctrines of the society.—Mur.

SUPPLEMENT

RELATING TO

THE DOCTRINES AND DISCIPLINE OF THE QUAKERS.*

I. DOCTRINE.

We agree with other professors of the Christian name in the belief of one eternal God, the Creator and Preserver of the universe; and in Jesus Christ his Son, the Messiah, and Mediator of the new covenant.⁴

When we speak of the gracious display of the love of God to mankind, in the miraculous conception, birth, life, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Saviour, we prefer the use of such terms as we find in Scripture; and contented with that knowledge which divine wisdom hath seen meet to reveal, we attempt not to explain those mysteries which remain under the veil; nevertheless we acknowledge and assert the divinity of Christ, who is the wisdom and power of God unto salvation.⁵

* Moshelm's account of the Quakers is so very faulty, that the American editions of this work have generally been accompanied with counter statements, derived from other and better authorities. In the preceding notes, many of the mistakes of Moshelm have been pointed out. But still it is believed that full justice will not be done to the principles of this sect, without allowing them to express their religious views in their own language. The following Supplement is therefore annexed, being part of a Summary of the History, Doctrine, and Discipline of Friends, written at the desire of the Yearly Meeting for Sufferings in London; first published in a small work, by Joseph Gurney Bevan, Lond. 1800, 12mo, and afterwards annexed to the fourth volume of Macclaine's Moshelm; New-York, 1824.—Mur.

¹ Here again the Quakers, through Mr. Bevan of London, deny the existence of such subsidiary speakers in their congregations.—Mur.

² Sewel, Hist. of the Quakers, p. 612.

³ Here again Moshelm was misinformed. Mr. Bevan says, "Except a few clerks of this kind (that is, who keep voluminous records, &c.) and persons who have the care of meeting-houses, none receive any stipend or gratuity for their services in our religious society."—Mur.

⁴ Heb. xii. 24.—⁵ 1 Cor. i. 24.

To Christ alone we give the title of the Word of God,⁶ and not to the Scriptures; although we highly esteem these sacred writings in subordination to the Spirit,⁷ from which they are given forth; and we hold, with the apostle Paul, that they are able to make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.⁸

We reverence those most excellent precepts which are recorded in Scripture to have been delivered by our great Lord, and we firmly believe that they are practicable and binding on every Christian, and that in the life to come every man will be rewarded according to his works.⁹ And further it is our belief that, in order to enable mankind to put in practice these sacred precepts, many of which are contradictory to the unregenerate will of man,¹⁰ every man coming into the world is endued with a measure of light, grace, or good Spirit of Christ, by which, as it is attended to, he is enabled to distinguish good from evil, and to correct the disorderly passions and corrupt propensities of his nature, which mere reason is altogether insufficient to overcome. For all that belongs to man is fallible and within the reach of temptation, but this divine grace which comes by Him who hath overcome the world¹¹ is, to those who humbly and sincerely seek it, an all-sufficient and present help in time of need. By this the snares of the enemy are detected, his allurements avoided, and deliverance is experienced through faith in its effectual operation, whereby the soul is translated out of the kingdom of darkness and from under the power of Satan, into the marvellous light and kingdom of the Son of God.

Being thus persuaded that man, without the Spirit of Christ inwardly revealed, can do nothing to the glory of God or to effect his own salvation, we think this influence especially necessary to the performance of the highest act of which the human mind is capable, even the worship of the Father of Lights and of Spirits, in spirit and in truth; therefore we consider as obstructions to pure worship all forms which divert the attention of the mind from the secret influence of this union from the Holy One.¹ Yet, although true worship is not confined to time and place, we think it incumbent on Christians to meet often together,² in testimony of their dependence on the Heavenly Father, and for a renewal of their spiritual strength; nevertheless, in the performance of worship we dare not depend for our acceptance with Him on a formal repetition of the words and experiences of others, but we believe it to be our duty to lay aside the activity of the imagination and to wait in silence to have a true sight of our condition bestowed upon us; believing even a single sigh³ arising from such a sense of our infirmities and the need we have of divine help to be more acceptable to God than any performances, however specious, which originate in the will of man.

⁶ John i. 1.—⁷ 2 Pet. i. 21.—⁸ 2 Tim. iii. 15.—⁹ Matt. xvi. 27.—¹⁰ John i. 9.—¹¹ John xvi. 33.

From what has been said respecting worship, it follows that the ministry we approve must have its origin from the same source; for that which is needful for man's own direction and for his acceptance with God⁴ must be eminently so to enable him to be helpful to others. Accordingly we believe that the renewed assistance of the light and power of Christ is indispensably necessary for all true ministry; and that this holy influence is not at our command or to be procured by study, but is the free gift of God to chosen and devoted servants. Hence arises our testimony against preaching for hire, in contradiction to Christ's positive command, "Freely ye have received, freely give;"⁵ and hence our conscientious refusal to support such ministry by tithes or other means.

As we dare not encourage any ministry but that which we believe to spring from the influence of the Holy Spirit, so neither dare we attempt to restrain this influence to persons of any condition in life or to the male sex alone; but as male and female are one in Christ, we allow such of the female sex as we believe to be endued with a right qualification for the ministry to exercise their gifts for the general edification of the church; and this liberty we esteem a peculiar mark of the gospel dispensation as foretold by the prophet Joel,⁶ and noticed by the apostle Peter.⁷

There are two ceremonies in use among most professors of the Christian name, Water-baptism and what is termed the Lord's Supper. The first of these is generally esteemed the essential means of initiation into the church of Christ, and the latter of maintaining communion with him. But as we have been convinced that nothing short of his redeeming power, inwardly revealed, can set the soul free from the thralldom of sin, by this power alone we believe salvation to be effected. We hold that as there is one Lord and one faith,⁸ so his baptism is one in nature and operation; that nothing short of it can make us living members of his mystical body; and that the baptism with water, administered by his forerunner John, belonged, as the latter confessed, to an inferior and decreasing dispensation.⁹

With respect to the other rite, we believe that communion between Christ and his church is not maintained by that nor any other external performance, but only by a real participation of his divine nature¹⁰ through faith; that this is the supper alluded to in the Revelation, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me;"¹¹ and that where the substance is attained it is unnecessary to attend to the shadow, which doth not confer grace, and concerning which opinions so different and animosities so violent have arisen.

Now, as we thus believe that the grace of God which comes by Jesus Christ is alone sufficient for salvation, we can neither admit that it is conferred on a few only, while others are left without it, nor, thus asserting its universality, can we limit its operation to a partial cleansing of the soul from sin even in this life. We entertain worthier notions both of the power and goodness of our Heavenly Father, and believe that he doth vouchsafe to assist the obedient to experience a total surrender of the natural will to the guidance of his pure unerring Spirit, through whose renewed assistance they are enabled to bring forth fruits unto holiness, and to stand perfect in their present rank.¹²

There are not many of our tenets more generally known than our testimony against oaths and against war. With respect to the former of these, we abide literally by Christ's positive injunction delivered in his sermon on the mount, "Swear not at all."¹³ From the same sacred collection of the most excellent precepts of moral and religious duty, from the example of our Lord himself¹⁴ and from the correspondent convictions of his Spirit in our hearts, we are confirmed in the belief that wars and fightings are, in their origin and effects, utterly repugnant to the Gospel, which still breathes peace and good-will to men. We also are clearly of the judgment that if the benevolence of the Gospel were generally prevalent in the minds of men, it would effectually prevent them from oppressing, much more enslaving, their brethren (of whatever colour or complexion), for whom, as for themselves, Christ died; and would even influence their conduct in their treatment of the brute creation, which would no longer groan, the victims of their avarice or of their false ideas of pleasure.

Some of our tenets have in former times, as hath been shown, subjected our friends to much suffering from government, though to the salutary purposes of government our principles are a security. They inculcate submission to the laws in all cases wherein conscience is not violated. But we hold that as Christ's kingdom is not of this world, it is not the business of the civil magistrate

¹ 1 John ii. 20, 27.—² Heb. x. 25.—³ Rom. viii. 26.
—⁴ Jer. xxiii. 30—32.—⁵ Matt. x. 8.—⁶ Joel ii. 28, 29.—
⁷ Acts ii. 16, 17.—⁸ Eph. iv. 5.

⁹ John iii. 30.—¹⁰ 2 Pet. i. 4.—¹¹ Rev. viii. 20.—
¹² Matt. v. 48.—Eph. iv. 13.—Col. iv. 12.—¹³ Matt.
v. 34.—¹⁴ Matt. v. 39, 44, &c.; chap. xxvi. 52, 53;
Luke xxii. 51; John xviii. 11.

to interfere in matters of religion, but to maintain the external peace and good order of the community. We therefore think persecution, even in the smallest degree, unwarrantable. We are careful in requiring our members not to be concerned in illicit trade, nor in any manner to defraud the revenue.

It is well known that the society, from its first appearance, has disused those names of the months and days which, having been given in honour of the heroes or false gods of the heathen, originated in their flattery or superstition; and the custom of speaking to a single person in the plural number, as having arisen also from motives of adulation. Compliments, superfluity of apparel and furniture, outward shows of rejoicing and mourning, and the observation of days and times, we esteem to be incompatible with the simplicity and sincerity of a Christian life; and public diversions, gaming, and other vain amusements of the world, we cannot but condemn. They are a waste of that time which is given us for nobler purposes, and divert the attention of the mind from the sober duties of life and from the reproofs of instruction, by which we are guided to an everlasting inheritance.

To conclude, although we have exhibited the several tenets which distinguish our religious society as objects of our belief, yet we are sensible that a true and living faith is not produced in the mind of man by his own effort, but is the free gift of God¹ in Christ Jesus, nourished and increased by the progressive operation of his Spirit in our hearts and our proportionate obedience.² Therefore, although for the preservation of the testimonies given us to bear and for the peace and good order of the society, we deem it necessary that those who are admitted into membership with us should be previously convinced of those doctrines which we esteem essential, yet we require no formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership or a qualification for the service of the church. We prefer the judging of men by their fruits and depending on the aid of Him who by his prophet hath promised to be "a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment."³ Without this, there is a danger of receiving members into outward communion, without any addition to that spiritual sheepfold whereof our blessed Lord declared himself to be both the door and the shepherd;⁴ that is, such as know his voice and follow him in the paths of obedience.

II. DISCIPLINE.

THE purposes which our discipline hath chiefly in view are the relief of the poor, the maintenance of good order, the support of the testimonies which we believe it is our duty to bear to the world, and the help and recovery of such as are overtaken in faults.

In the practice of discipline, we think it indispensable that the order recommended by Christ himself be invariably observed:⁵ "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established: and if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church."

To effect the salutary purposes of discipline, meetings were appointed at an early period of the society, which from the times of their being held were called Quarterly meetings. It was afterwards found expedient⁶ to divide the districts of those meetings, and to meet more frequently, from whence arose Monthly meetings, subordinate to those held quarterly. At length, in 1669,⁷ a yearly meeting was established to superintend, assist, and provide rules for the whole; previously to which general meetings had been occasionally held.

A Monthly meeting is usually composed of several particular congregations,⁸ situated within a convenient distance from each other. Its business is to provide for the subsistence of the poor, and for the education of their offspring; to judge of the sincerity and fitness of persons appearing to be convinced of the religious principles of the society, and desiring to be admitted into membership;⁹ to excite due attention to the discharge of religious and moral duty, and to deal with disorderly members. Monthly meetings also grant to such of their members as remove into other Monthly meetings certificates of their membership and conduct, without which they cannot gain membership in such meetings. Each Monthly meeting is required to appoint certain persons under the name of overseers, who are to take care that the rules of our discipline be put in practice; and when any case of complaint or disorderly conduct comes to their knowledge, to see that private admonition, agreeably to the Gospel rule before mentioned, be given previously to its being laid before the monthly meeting.

When a case is introduced, it is usual for a small committee to be appointed to visit the offender, to endeavour to convince him of his error, and to induce him to forsake and condemn it.¹⁰ If they succeed, the person is by minute declared to have made satisfaction for the offence; if not, he is disowned as a member of the society.¹¹

In disputes between individuals, it has long been the decided judgment of the society that its members should not sue each other at law. It therefore enjoins all to end their differences by speedy and impartial arbitration, agreeably to rules laid down. If any refuse to adopt this mode, or ⁶ Sewel, 485.—⁷ Fox, 390.

⁸ Where this is the case, it is usual for the members of each congregation to form what is called a preparative meeting, because its business is to prepare whatever may occur among themselves, to be laid before the Monthly meeting.

⁹ On application of this kind, a small committee is appointed to visit the party, and report to the Monthly meeting, which is directed by our rules not to admit any into membership without allowing a reasonable time to consider their conduct.

¹⁰ This is generally done by a written acknowledgment signed by the offender.

¹¹ This is done by what is termed a Testimony of Denial, which is a paper reciting the offence and sometimes the steps which have led to it: next, the means unavailing used to reclaim the offender; after that, a clause disowning him, to which is usually added an expression of desire for his repentance and for his being restored to membership.

¹ Eph. ii. 8.—² John vii. 17.—³ Isaiah xxviii. 6.—⁴ John x. 7, 11.—⁵ Matt. xviii. 15-17.

having adopted it, to submit to the award, it is the direction of the Yearly meeting that such be dissolved.

To Monthly meetings also belongs the allowing of marriages; for our society hath always scrupled to acknowledge the exclusive authority of the priests in the solemnization of marriage. Those who intend to marry appear together, and propose their intention to the Monthly meeting, and if not attended by their parents and guardians, produce a written certificate of their consent, signed in the presence of witnesses. The meeting then appoints a committee to inquire whether they be clear of other engagements respecting marriage, and if at a subsequent meeting, to which the parties also come and declare the continuance of their intention, no objections be reported, they have the meeting's consent to solemnize their intended marriage. This is done in a public meeting for worship, towards the close whereof the parties stand up and solemnly take each other for husband and wife. A certificate of the proceedings is then publicly read and signed by the parties, and afterwards by the relations and others as witnesses. Of such marriage the Monthly meeting keeps a record, as also of the births and burials of its members. A certificate of the date, of the name of the infant, and of its parents, signed by those present at the birth, is the subject of one of these last-mentioned records; and an order for the interment, countersigned by the gravemaker, of the other. The naming of children is without ceremony. Burials are also conducted in a simple manner. The body, followed by the relations and friends, is sometimes, previously to interment, carried to a meeting, and at the grave a pause is generally made; on both which occasions it frequently falls out that one or more persons present have something to express for the edification of those who attend, but no religious rite is considered as an essential part of burial.

Several Monthly meetings compose a Quarterly meeting. At the Quarterly meeting are produced written answers from the Monthly meetings to certain queries respecting the conduct of their members, and the meetings' care over them. The accounts thus received are digested into one, which is sent, also in the form of answers to queries, by representatives to the Yearly meeting. Appeals from the judgment of Monthly meetings are brought to the Quarterly meetings, whose business also it is to assist in any difficult case, or where remissness appears in the care of the Monthly meetings over the individuals who compose them.

The Yearly meeting has the general superintendence of the society in the country in which it is established,¹ and therefore as the accounts which it receives discover the state of inferior meetings, as particular exigencies require or as the meeting is impressed with a sense of duty, it gives forth its advice, makes such regulations as appear to be requisite or excites to the observance of those already made, and sometimes appoints committees to visit those Quarterly meetings which appear to be in need of immediate advice. Appeals from the judgment of Quarterly meetings are here finally determined, and a brotherly correspondence by epistles is maintained with other Yearly meetings.²

In this place it is proper to add, that as we believe that women may be rightly called to the work of the ministry, we also think that to them belongs a share in the support of our Christian discipline, and that some parts of it, wherein their own sex is concerned, devolve on them with peculiar propriety; accordingly they have Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly meetings of their own sex, held at the same time and in the same place with those of the men, but separately, and without the power of making rules; and it may be remarked, that during the persecutions, which in the last century occasioned the imprisonment of so many of the men, the care of the poor often fell on the women, and was by them satisfactorily administered.

In order that those who are in the situation of ministers may have the tender sympathy and counsel of those of either sex³ who, by their experience in the work of religion, are qualified for that service, the Monthly meetings are advised to select such under the denomination of elders. These, and ministers approved by their Monthly meetings,⁴ have meetings peculiar to themselves, called meetings of Ministers and Elders, in which they have an opportunity of exciting each other to a discharge of their several duties, and of extending advice to those who may appear weak, without any needless exposure. Such meetings are generally held in the compass of each Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly meeting. They are conducted by rules prescribed by the Yearly meeting, and have no authority to make any alteration or addition to them. The members of them unite with their brethren in the Meetings for discipline, and are equally accountable to the latter for their conduct.

It is to a meeting of this kind in London, called the Second Day's Morning meeting, that the revision of manuscripts concerning our principles previously to publication is entrusted by the Yearly meeting held in London; and also the granting, in the intervals of the Yearly meeting, of certificates of approbation to such ministers as are concerned to travel in the work of the ministry in foreign parts, in addition to those granted by their Monthly and Quarterly meetings. When a visit of this kind doth not extend beyond Great Britain, a certificate from the Monthly meeting of which the minister is a member is sufficient; if to Ireland the concurrence of the Quarterly meeting is also required.

² See the last note.

³ Fox, 461, 492.

¹ There are seven Yearly meetings, viz.: I. London, to which come representatives from Ireland; II. New England; III. New York; IV. Pennsylvania and New Jersey; V. Maryland; VI. Virginia; VII. the Carolinas and Georgia.

⁴ Those who believe themselves required to speak in meetings for worship are not immediately acknowledged as ministers by their Monthly meetings; but time is taken for judgment, that the meeting may be satisfied of their call and qualification. It will also sometimes happen that such as are not approved will obtrude themselves as ministers, to the grief of their brethren; but much forbearance is used towards these, before the disapprobation of the meeting is publicly testified.

Regulations of similar tendency obtain in other Yearly meetings.

The Yearly meeting of London, in the year 1675, appointed a meeting to be held in that city for the purpose of advising and assisting in cases of suffering for conscience' sake, which hath continued with great use to the society to this day. It is composed of friends under the name of correspondents chosen by the several Quarterly meetings, and who reside in or near the city. The same meetings also appoint members of their own in the country as correspondents, who are to join their brethren in London on emergency. The names of all these correspondents, previously to their being recorded as such, are submitted to the approbation of the Yearly meeting. Those of the men who are approved ministers are also members of this meeting, which is called the Meeting for Sufferings, a name arising from its original purpose, which is not yet become entirely obsolete.

The Yearly meeting has entrusted the Meeting for Sufferings with the care of printing and distributing books, and with the management of its stock;¹ and considered as a standing committee of the Yearly meeting, it hath a general care of whatever may arise, during the intervals of that meeting, affecting the society and requiring immediate attention, particularly of those circumstances which may occasion an application to government.

There is not in any of the meetings which have been mentioned any president, as we believe that Divine Wisdom alone ought to preside, nor hath any member a right to claim pre-eminence over the rest. The office of clerk, with a few exceptions, is undertaken voluntarily by some member, as is also the keeping of the records. Where these are very voluminous and require a house for their deposit (as is the case in London, where the general records of the society in Great Britain are kept), a clerk is hired to have the care of them; but except a few clerks of this kind, and persons who have the care of meeting-houses, none receive any stipend or gratuity for their services in our religious society.

Thus have we given a view of the foundation and establishment of our discipline, by which it will be seen that it is not (as hath been frequently insinuated) merely the work of modern times, but was the early care and concern of our pious predecessors. We cannot better close this short sketch of it than by observing, that if the exercise of discipline should in some instances appear to press hard upon those who, neglecting the admonitions of divine counsel in their hearts, are also unwilling to be accountable to their brethren, yet if that great, leading, and indispensable rule enjoined by our Lord be observed by those who undertake to be active in it, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,"² it will prevent the censure of the church from falling on anything but that which really obstructs the truth. Discipline will then promote in an eminent degree that love of our neighbour which is the mark of discipleship, and without which a profession of love to God and to his cause is a vain pretence. "He," said the beloved disciple, "that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also."³

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF THE MENNONITES OR ANABAPTISTS.

1. The Mennonites, after numerous trials and sufferings, at length obtained in this century the much-desired peace and tranquillity, but they obtained it very slowly and by degrees. For although they were admitted to the privileges of citizens among the Dutch in the preceding century, yet they could not prevail on the English, the Swiss, or the Germans, either by prayers or arguments, to grant them the same privileges nor to revise the laws in force against them. The enormities of the old Anabaptists were continually floating in the vision of the magistrates; and it did not seem to them possible, that men who hold that a Christian can never take an oath without committing great sin, and who think that Christ allows no place in his kingdom for magistrates and civil punishments, could fulfil the duties of good citizens. And accordingly not a few examples may be collected from this century, of Anabaptists who were put to death or suffered other punishments.⁴ At the present time, having given numerous proofs of their probity, they live in peace not only among the Dutch, but also among the English, the Germans, and the Prussians, and support themselves and families by their honest industry, partly as labouring men and artificers and partly by merchandise.

2. The more wise among them, readily perceiving that this external peace would not be very firm and durable, unless their intestine contests and their old altercations

¹ 1 John iv. 20, 21.

² The enactments of the Swiss against the Mennonites in this century are stated by Ottius, Annales Anabapt. p. 337, &c. and in some other places; and those of the year 1693, by Hottinger, Schweizerische Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. p. 1101. And that in this 18th century they have not been treated more leniently in the canton of Berne, appears from Schyn's Historia Mennonitar. cap. x. p. 289, &c. where may be seen letters of the States-General of the United Provinces interceding with that canton in their behalf. In the Palatinate they were grievously persecuted in 1694, when the letters of William III. the king of Great Britain, hushed the tempest. See Schyn, ubi supra, p. 265, &c. Some instances of Anabaptists being put to death in England are mentioned by Burnet, Hist. of His Own Times, vol. i.

³ This is an occasional voluntary contribution expended in printing books, house-rent for a clerk, and his wages for keeping records, the passage of ministers who visit their brethren beyond sea, and some incidental charges.

Matthew vii. 17.

about unimportant matters were terminated, applied themselves from time to time with great care to appease these discords. Nor were their efforts without effect. A large part of the Flandrians, the Germans, and the Frieslanders, renounced their contests in 1630 at Amsterdam, and entered into a union, each retaining however some of its peculiar sentiments. Afterwards, in 1649, the Flandrians in particular and the Germans, between whom there had formerly been much disagreement, renewed this alliance, and strengthened it with new guarantees.¹ All these Anabaptists went over to the moderate part of the sect, and softened down and improved the old institutions of Menno and his successors.

3. The whole sect of Anabaptists, therefore, forms at the present day two large communities; namely, the Refined, that is, the more strict, who are also called the old Flemings or Flandrians; and the Gross, that is, the more mild and lax, who are also commonly called Waterlanders. The reasons of these names have already been given.² Each of these communities is subdivided into several minor parties. The Refined in particular,—besides embracing the two considerable parties, of Gröningenis³ (who are so called because they hold their stated conventions at Gröningen), and the Dantzigers or Prussians (so named because they have adopted the customs and church government of the Prussians),—contains a great number of smaller and more obscure parties, which disagree on various subjects and especially in regard to discipline, customs, and rules of life, and are united in nothing but in the name and in the common opinions of the early Anabaptists. All these Refined Anabaptists are true disciples of Menno Simonis, and they retain, though not all with equal strictness, his doctrines respecting the body of Christ, the washing of strangers' feet as Christ enjoined, the excluding from the church and avoiding as pestilential not only sinners, but also those who even slightly deviate from the ancient simplicity and are stained with some appearance of sin.⁴ At the present day, some of their congregations are gradually altering, and slowly approxim-ing to more moderate sentiments and discipline.

4. All the Anabaptists have, first, Bishops or Elders, who uniformly preside in the consistory [or church session], and have the sole power of administering baptism and the Lord's Supper; secondly, Teachers who preach to the congregation; and lastly, Deacons and Deaconesses. The ministry [or church session] by which the church is governed is composed of these three orders. The more weighty affairs are proposed and discussed in assemblies of the brethren. All ecclesiastical officers are chosen by the suffrages of the brethren, and except the deacons, are ordained by prayers and the imposition of hands.

5. Among the minor parties of the more strict [or Refined] Anabaptists, that which has obtained the greatest celebrity bears the name of Uckewallists or Ockwallists, from Uke Walles, a Frieslander, its founder. This rustic and very illiterate man not only wished to have the whole ancient and severe discipline of Menno retained entire and unaltered, but also taught in the year 1637, in company with John Leus, that there is reason to hope for the salvation of Judas and the others who laid violent hands on our Saviour. To give some plausibility and importance to this error, he pretended that the period between the birth of our Saviour and the descent of the Holy Ghost, which divides as it were the Old Testament from the New, was a time of darkness and ignorance, during which the Jews were destitute of all light and divine assistance; and hence he would infer, that the sins and wickedness they committed during this period were in a great measure excusable, and could not merit severe punishment from the justice of God. Neither the Menonites nor the magistrates of Gröningen could endure this fiction; the former excommunicated him, and the latter banished him from the city. He removed, therefore, into the adjacent province of East Friesland, and collected a large number of disciples, whose descendants still remain in the territory of Gröningen, and in Friesland, Lithuania, and Prussia, and hold their meetings separately from the other Menonites.⁵ Whether they still profess that

¹ Schyn, Plenior Deductio Historiæ Mennonitarum, p. 41, 42.

² See page 691 above.—R.

³ The Gröningenis or old Flemings have gradually laid aside their ancient strictness, both in regard to church discipline and the practice of rebaptizing. At present, they think and teach just as in the general Anabaptist church. This is a note of the Dutch translator of this History.—M. r.

⁴ See Rue, Nachrichten von dem gegenwärtigen Zustande der Mennoniten, Jena, 1743, 8vo.

⁵ It is incorrect to represent the followers of Uke Walles as constituting a particular sect, bearing the name of Uckewallists or Ockewallists. He was merely a preacher among the old Flemings. He may have found some individual persons who would profess his doctrines; but there is no evidence before us that his particular opinions were embraced by any congregation whatever, and much less by the whole party of the old Flemings, or by any considerable part of it. Besides, his doctrines have been unknown among them now for many years. "I testify (writes one of their teachers), sentiment which brought so much trouble upon their master, does not appear; for they have very little intercourse with other people. But it is certain that they tread the most faithfully of all in the steps of Menno, their common preceptor, and exhibit as it were a living picture of the first age of Mennonitism. If any one joins them from other sects of Christians, they baptise him anew. Their dress is rustic, nay worse than rustic, for they will tolerate no appearance or shadow of elegance and ornament. Their beard is long, their hair uncombed, their countenance very gloomy, and their houses and furniture only such as absolute necessity demands. Whoever deviates in the least from this austerity is forthwith excommunicated, and is shunned by all as a pest. Their bishops or overseers of the church, who are different from their teachers, must be approved by all their congregations. Washing of feet they regard as a divine rite. They can the more easily keep up this discipline, as they carefully provide that not a breath of science or learning shall contaminate their pious ignorance.

6. The Gross or more moderate Anabaptists consist of the Waterlanders, Flandrians, Frisians, and Germans, who entered into the union already mentioned. They are generally called Waterlanders. They have forsaken the more rigid and singular opinions of Menno (whom however most of them respect and venerate), and have approximated to the customs and opinions of other Christians. They are divided into two communities, the Frieslanders and the Waterlanders, neither of which has any bishops, but only Elders and Deacons. Each congregation is independent, and has its own consistory composed of the Elders and Deacons. But the supreme power belongs to the people, without whose consent no business of great importance is transacted. Their elders are learned men, some of them doctors of physic, and others masters of arts. And they now support a professor at Amsterdam, who teaches both theology and the sciences.

that it is not known to me that there is now any church or congregation among the Mennonites, either here in East Friesland or anywhere else, which has received or professed these particular and absurd opinions." Werra Beknopt Omskryp, in the Preface, sec. 24, Emden, 1744, 8vo. So the Eckewallists, as they are called, or the Gröningensians and old Flemings, are no longer particular sects among the Baptists. See also note 3, p. 858, above. This likewise is a note of the Dutch translator of Moshelm.—Mur.

¹ Ottilus, Annales Anabaptist. p. 266; Schyn, Plenior Deductio Histor. Mennonit. p. 43; Jehring, Diss. de Ukoniis Waller vita et fatis, in the Biblioth. Bremensis Theol. Philol. tom. viii. p. 113, and the Preface to the History of the Mennonites (in German), p. 11, &c. and the Appendix to the same, p. 234, &c.

7. One of these communities of Waterlanders² in the year 1664, became split into two parties, which still continue, and which bear the names of Galenists and Apostoolians, from the names of their [first] teachers. Galenus Abrahams de Haan, a doctor of physic and a minister among the Mennonites at Amsterdam, a man whom even his enemies applaud for his eloquence and penetration, taught in accordance with the views of the Arminians, that the Christian religion was not so much a body of truths to be believed as of precepts to be obeyed; and he would have admission to the church and to the title and privileges of brethren be open to all persons who merely believed the books of the Old and New Testaments to be divinely inspired, and lived pure and holy lives. He adopted this principle because he himself entertained different views from the other Mennonites respecting the divine nature of Jesus Christ, and the redemption of the human race by his merits and death, and was inclined to the side of the Socinians.³ Besides others who appeared against him, Samuel Apostool, who was likewise a distinguished minister of the church at Amsterdam, very strenuously defended not only the sentiments held by most of the Mennonites in common with other Christians, respecting the divinity of our Saviour and the influences of his death, but also the well-known peculiar sentiment of this sect respecting the visible church of Christ on earth.⁴ The consequence of this contest was a schism, which some prudent and influential men still labour in vain to remove. The Galenists are equally ready with the Arminians to admit all sorts of persons into their church who call themselves Christians; and they are the only Anabaptists [in Holland] who refuse to be called Mennonites. The Apostoolians admit none to membership who do not profess to believe the doctrines contained in the public formula of their religion.¹

² This is either a mistake or a slip of the pen in Moshelm. This schism did not occur in the community of the Waterlanders but in that of the Flemings, and among them only at Amsterdam. The church of the Flemings at Amsterdam, in which were the two preachers, Galenus Abrahams de Haan and Samuel Apostool, became at this time divided. Some years afterwards the Waterlander church in the above-named city united with the Galenists. Such is the note of the Dutch translator of this work.—Mur.

³ Galenus Abrahams was accused of this by his opposers. The Court of Holland (the States-General) investigated the subject, and acquitted this minister on the 14th of Sept. 1663. See Wagenaar, Amsterdam, part ii. p. 198 and 227. Note of the Dutch translator. To the history of the Orthodox or Non-Remonstrant Mennonites belongs The Faith of the True Mennonites or Baptists, gathered from their Public Confessions, by Cornelius Ris, minister of the Mennonites at Hoorn, with an explanatory Introduction and Appendix, Hamburg, 1776, 4to (in German). This is properly a translation of the Dutch original, which was published in 1773. It exhibits many correct views of genuine Christianity, in both its theoretical and practical parts, and is free from the doctrine which is peculiar only to some of the Mennonites respecting the origin of Christ's human nature. Note of the Dutch translator.—Mur.

⁴ See respecting both [these men], Schyn's Plenior Deductio Historiae Mennonit. cap. xv. p. 318, and cap. xviii. p. 237.

¹ Commelin, Description of the City of Amsterdam (in Dutch), vol. i. p. 500, &c.; Stoupa, La Religion des Hollandais, p. 20, &c.; Benthelm's Holländischer Schul- und Kirchenstaat, part i. chap. xix. p. 830. [As this chapter of Mosheim's history embraces only the Dutch Baptists or Mennonites, it seems proper to add here a brief narrative of the English Baptists. Most of the Anabaptists mentioned in English history, prior to the reign of James I. appear to have been either Dutch and other foreign Anabaptists who endeavoured to establish themselves in England, or small companies of converts made by them in the country. Yet there were probably many individuals among the people who questioned or denied the propriety of infant baptism; and there are some intimations of attempts by such persons to hold conventicles in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth. But the first regular congregation of English Baptists appears to have originated from certain English Puritans who returned from Holland after the death of their pastor, Rev. John Smith, who died in 1610. See above, note 3, p. 697. These were General or Arminian Baptists, and may be supposed to have derived many of their opinions from the Mennonites. From this time onward churches of General Baptists were formed here and there in different parts of England. But in general they made no great figure, and do not appear to have had much connexion, or to have professed one uniform faith.—The Particular or Calvinistic Baptists trace their origin to a congregation of Independents established in London in the year 1616. This congregation having become very large, and some of them differing from the others on the subject of infant baptism, they agreed to divide. Those who disbelieved in infant baptism were regularly dismissed in 1633, and formed into a new church under Rev. John Spilbury. In 1635, several more members were dismissed to Mr. Spilbury's church. And in 1639, a new Baptist church was formed. Churches of Particular Baptists now multiplied rapidly. In 1646, there were forty-six in and about London. They published a confession of their faith in 1643, which was reprinted in 1644 and 1646, and revised in 1689 by a convention of elders and delegates from more than one hundred churches in England and Wales. Besides these, there were at that time several churches of Calvinistic Baptists who professed open communion, especially in Bedfordshire, where John Bunyan preached. There were also some Seventh-Day Baptists. Baptist churches were also planted in Ireland in the time of the civil wars; and Roger Williams established a Baptist church in Providence in 1639, which was the commencement of this denomination in America.—When Cromwell had usurped the government he dismissed the principal officers of the army, alleging among other reasons that they were all Anabaptists. Yet during his administration they had full toleration; indeed his tryers admitted a number of their preachers to become parish ministers of England. On the restoration of Charles II. in 1660, the Baptists with all other Nonconformists were exposed to great troubles and persecutions; and at the Revolution in 1688, they as well as the other dissenters obtained free toleration. Among the English Baptists of this century there were some men of education, but the greater part of their preachers were not men of learning. The Particular Baptists, at their general convention in 1689, made arrangements for the better education of young men for their pulpits; and from their provisions originated afterwards the famous Baptist Academy at Bristol. Before the erection of regular Baptist congregations, and indeed for some time after, it was very common for Baptists and others to belong to the same church and to worship and commune together. From their first rise the Baptists were assailed for holding only adult baptism, and that by immersion, and they were not backward to defend themselves. The severest conflict of the Particular Baptists was with the Quakers, in the time of William Penn. One of their writers made statements, for which the Quakers accused him

CHAPTER VI.

HISTORY OF THE SOCINIANS AND ARIANS.

1. THE Socinian community, at the commencement of this century, seemed in many respects to stand on a firm basis. For they not only enjoyed the fullest religious liberty in Transylvania and at Luzbo [in Volhinia], but they had in Poland a distinguished school at Racow, furnished with teachers eminent for learning and talents, a printing establishment, numerous congregations, and many patrons who were men of the highest rank. Elated with this prosperity, they thought proper to make great efforts to extend their church, or to obtain friends and patrons in other countries. And it may be shown by numerous proofs, that emissaries of the Polish Socinians in the beginning of this century were active in Holland, England, Germany, and Prussia, and that they endeavoured to make proselytes among the great and the learned. For while most other sects endeavour first to make friends among the common people, this sect, which exalts reason alone, has the peculiarity that it does not much seek the favour and friendship of women, the illiterate, and persons of inferior rank, but labours to recommend itself especially to persons of high rank and eminent talents.

2. Though these missions were for the most part committed to men of birth and genius, yet their results in most places did not answer the expectations of their projectors. Nowhere did there seem to be a greater prospect of success than in the university of Altorf, in the territory of Nuremberg. For here Ernest Sohner, a physician and Peripatetic philosopher, a man of great acuteness and subtlety and a professor of philosophy, who had joined the Socinians while he resided in Holland, found it the more easy to instil into the minds of his hearers the doctrines of his new brethren, of falsehood, which caused violent animosities and much mutual crimination. The Particular Baptists had also controversies among themselves. One was respecting their practice of confirmation, or imposing hands on those newly baptized. Another related to the propriety of admitting singing as a part of their public worship. The Particular Baptists scarcely differed at all from the Independents except on the mode and subjects of baptism. The General Baptists, having no bond of union among themselves, held a considerable diversity of opinions; and as they did not set forth full and explicit accounts of their faith, it is impossible to characterise them otherwise than by saying, that in general they laid little stress on doctrines and allowed very great liberty of opinion.—See Crosby's History of the Baptists; Benedict's General History of the Baptists, vol. i. chap. v.; Toulmin's Supplements to Neal's History of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 169, &c.; vol. iii. p. 543, &c.; vol. iv. p. 308, &c. 493, &c.; vol. v. p. 116, &c. 229, &c.; Bogue and Bennet's History of Dissenters, vol. i. p. 147, &c.—Mur.

because he was in high reputation for learning and genuine piety. But after his death in 1612, this new Socinian party, being deprived of their guide and head, could not manage their affairs so craftily as to elude the vigilance of the other professors in the university. Hence, the whole matter being fully exposed in 1616, this already mature and daily increasing pest was suddenly arrested and destroyed, by the zealous and dexterous severity of the Nuremberg magistrates. The foreigners who were infected with the heresy saved themselves by flight; the infected citizens of Nuremberg allowed themselves to be reclaimed, and returned to correct principles.¹

3. Neither could the Socinian sect long hold that high ground which they appeared to occupy in Poland.² The chief pillar which supported it was removed in the year 1638, by a decree of the Polish diet. For in this year some students of the school at Racow wantonly threw stones at a wooden statue of our Saviour extended on the cross, and demolished it. For this offence the papists took such severe revenge, that they procured the fatal law to be enacted at Warsaw, which commanded the school at Racow to be broken up, the instructors to be banished in disgrace, the printing establishment to be destroyed, and the Socinian church to be shut up. All this was executed forthwith and without abatement, in spite of all the efforts which the powerful patrons of the sect could put forth.³ This first calamity was the harbinger of that dire tempest which twenty years after entirely prostrated the glory and prosperity of the sect. For in a diet at Warsaw in 1658, all the Socinians dispersed throughout Poland were commanded to quit the country; and it was made a capital offence either to profess their doctrines or to harbour others who professed them. Three years were allowed the proscribed, in which to dispose of their property and settle their affairs. But soon after, the cruelty of their enemies reduced it to two years. Finally, in the year 1661, the tremendous edict was renewed; and all the Socinians who remained were most inhumanly driven from Poland, with immense loss, not merely of property, but also of the health and the lives of many persons.⁴

4. A part of the exiles took their course towards Transylvania, and nearly all these perished by diverse calamities.⁵ Others were dispersed in the provinces adjacent to Poland, Silesia, Brandenburg, and Prussia, where their posterity still remain scattered here and there. A considerable number of the more respectable families settled for a time at Creutzberg in Silesia, under the protection of the duke of Brieg.⁶ Others went to more distant countries—Holland, England, Holstein, and Denmark—to see if they could obtain a comfortable settlement for themselves and their brethren. The most active and zealous in such embassies was Stanislaus Lubieniecky, a very learned Polish knight, who rendered himself acceptable to great men by his eloquence, politeness, and sagacity. In the years 1661 and 1662 he was very near obtaining a secure residence for the Socinians at Altona from Frederick III., king of Denmark; and in 1662, at Frederickstadt from Christiann Albert, duke of Holstein; and at Mannheim from Charles Lewis, the elector Palatine. But all his efforts and expectations were frustrated by the remonstrances and entreaties of theologians; in Denmark by John Svaning, bishop of Seeland, in Holstein by John Reinboth, the general superintendent, in the Palatinate by John Lewis Fabricius [doctor and professor of theology at Heidelberg].⁷ The others who undertook such negotiations had much less success than he; nor could any nation of Europe be persuaded to allow the opponents of Christ's divinity freely to practise their worship among them.

5. Those therefore who remain of this

¹ A very full and learned history of this whole business, derived chiefly from unpublished documents and papers, was drawn up by a late divine of the university of Altorf, Gustavus George Zeltner, entitled Historia Crypto-Socinismi Altorfina quondam Academiae infestis Arcana, which was published by Gebauer, Leipzig, 1729, 3 vols. 4to. (Sohnner kept up a brisk correspondence with the Polish Socinians, who sent a number of Polish youth to Altorf with their private tutors to aid in spreading Socinian principles. It was intended not only to diffuse these principles in and around Altorf, but to communicate them also to other German universities. See Schroech's Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, vol. v. p. 628, &c.—Mur.)

² On the flourishing state of the Socinian cause, and especially of the Racovian school under the rectorship of Maxim Ruarus, see Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. i. p. 572, in his life of Ruarus, a very learned man of Holstein, who it appears had embraced Socinianism.

³ Epistola de Wiscovatii Vita, in Sand's Bibliotheca Antitrinitaria, p. 233; Zeltner's Historia Crypto-Socinismi Altorfina, vol. i. p. 299.

⁴ Lubieniecky, Historia Reform. Polonica, lib. iii. cap. xvii. xviii. p. 279, &c.; Equitis Poloni Fidei pro Unitario. in Polonia Religiosis Libertate, in Sand's Biblioth. Antitrinit. p. 267, and many others.

⁵ Some say there were 380 of these refugees, others say 500. On the borders of Hungary they were assaulted and plundered, so that when they arrived at Clausenburg in Transylvania they were almost naked. Disease now attacked them and carried them nearly all off. See Walch's Einleit. in die Rel. Streit. aus d. Ev. Luth. Kirche, vol. iv. p. 275.—Von Einrm.

⁶ Lubieniecky, Historia Reform. Polon. cap. xviii. p. 285, where there is a long Epistle of the Creutzbergers.

⁷ See Sand's Bibliotheca Antitrinit. p. 165. The Life of Lubieniecky, prefixed to his Historia Reformat. Polonica, p. 7, 8; Möller's Introductio in Historiam Cherson. Cimbrica, par. ii. p. 105; and Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 487, &c.; Heidegger's Life of Fabricius, subjoined to the works of the latter, p. 38.

unhappy people live concealed in various countries of Europe, especially in Brandenburg, Prussia, England, and Holland, and hold here and there clandestine meetings for worship; in England, however, it is said they have public religious meetings with the connivance of the magistrates.¹ Some have united themselves with the Arminians, and others with those Mennonites who are called Galenists; for neither of these sects requires its members very explicitly to declare their religious belief. It is also said that not a few of these dispersed people are members of the society who bear the name of Collegiants. Under these circumstances, they have not all been able to maintain that form of religion which their fathers transmitted to them. Accordingly, ¹ The Socinians residing in Brandenburg were accustomed a few years ago to meet at stated times at Königswald, a village near Frankfort-on-the-Oder. See Jourdain (for he is the author of the paper), Recueil de Littérature, de Philosophie, et d' Histoire, p. 44, Amsterdam, 1731, 8vo. They also published at Berlin in 1716 a German Confession of their Faith, which, with a confutation of it, is printed in Die Theologischen Hebr. Offern, part x. p. 852. [In Prussian Brandenburg they found some protection under the kindness of the electoral stadtholder, Bogislau prince von Radzivil, who retained some Socinians at his court; and perhaps they would also have obtained religious freedom under the electoral prince, Frederick William, had not the states of the duchy insisted on their expulsion. See Bock's Historia Socinianismi Prussici, p. 55, &c. and Hartknoch's Preussische Kirchenhistorie, p. 646, &c. By the indulgence of the above-named electoral prince, they obtained religious freedom in Brandenburg, particularly in New Mark, under the hope that this little company would gradually unite itself with the Protestant churches. They likewise had churches and schools at Landsberg down to the end of the seventeenth century. After that they were expelled, the protection of the Schwerin family, which they had hitherto enjoyed, now ceasing. In Holland, the book of John Völké, a Socinian, De Vera Religione, 1642, was burned; and the states of Holland, in 1663, forbade the publication of Unitarian books and all religious meetings of Socinians. Yet Andrew Wissowatius procured the famous Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum to be printed at Amsterdam, though the place is not mentioned on the title-page; and the Socinians have been allowed to reside there, but without the public exercise of their religion. Many of them likewise are concealed among the Mennonites and the other sects.—Schl. [The Socinians in England have never made any figure as a community, but have rather been dispersed among that great variety of sects which have arisen in a country where liberty displays its most glorious fruits, and at the same time exhibits its most striking inconveniences. Besides, few ecclesiastics or writers of any note have adopted the theological system now under consideration, in all its branches. The Socinian doctrine relating to the design and efficacy of the death of Christ had indeed many abettors in England during the seventeenth century, and it may be presumed without temerity that its votaries are rather increased than diminished in the present; but those divines who have abandoned the Athanasian hypothesis concerning the trinity of persons in the Godhead, have more generally gone into the Arian and Semi-arian notions of that inexpressible subject than into those of the Socinians, who deny that Jesus Christ existed before his appearance in the human nature. The famous John Biddle, after having maintained both in public and private during the reign of Charles I. and the protectorship of Cromwell, the Unitarian system, erected an independent congregation in London, which is the only British church we have heard of [in this century] in which all the peculiar doctrines of Socinianism were inculcated.—Macl.

both the learned and the unlearned, without restraint, explain variously those doctrines which distinguish them from other sects; yet they all agree in denying the divine Trinity and the divinity and atonement of our Saviour.²

6. Kindred with the Socinians are the Arians, some of whom obtained celebrity in this century as authors, such as Christopher Sand, father and son, and John Biddle;³ and likewise some of those comprehended under the general appellation of Antitrinitarians or Unitarians. For this [latter] name is applied to various sorts of persons who agree in this only, that they will not admit of any real distinction in the divine nature. The name of Arians is likewise given to all those in general who represent our Saviour to be inferior to God the Father. And as this may be done in various ways, it is manifest that this word, as now used, must have various significations; and that all those who are now called Arians do not agree with the ancient Arians, nor do they all hold one and the same sentiment.

² This is evident from many proofs, and among others from the example of Samuel Crell, the most learned man among the Socinians a few years since, who, although he sustained the office of a teacher among them, yet degenerated in many respects from the doctrines of Socinus and of the Racovian catechism; nor did he wish to be called a Socinian, but an Artemonite. See Journal Littéraire, tome xvii. part i. p. 150, and my own remarks on this man, in my Synagma Diss. ad Sanctiores Disciplinas Pertinentium, p. 352; Unschuldige Nachrichten, 1750, p. 342; Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. Crit. tome ii. part ii. p. 88, &c.

³ Of both the Sands, Arnold [Kirchen-und Ketzerhistorie, vol. ii. book xvii. chap. xiii. sec. xxv. p. 176, &c.] and others give account. Respecting Biddle, see Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. Crit. tome i. part ii. p. 288, &c. [Christopher Sandius the elder was of Creutzberg in Prussia, studied law, and filled various offices at Königsberg, but was deprived in 1668 because he would not renounce Arianism. After this he lived in retirement, and wrote only some vindications and apologies. Yet he aided his son in the composition of his works; and outliving him, published some of them after his death. The son called himself Christopher Christophori Sandius; and wrote, besides his Biblioth. Antitrinitariorum, his Nucleus Historiæ Ecclesiæ, on the four first centuries; in which he attempts to prove that the early fathers before the council of Nice held Arian sentiments, and that Athanasius was the first who broached the common belief among Christians respecting the Trinity. He also wrote Interpretationes Paradoxa quatuor Evangeliorum, de Origine Animæ, Problema Paradoxum de Spiritu Sancto, and (under the name of Herm. Cingalius) Scriptura Trinitatis Revelatrix. The son died in 1690 (aged 40), and the father in 1686.—Schl. [See also concerning the younger Sand, Rees's Cyclopædia, art. Sandius. John Biddle was born in 1612, educated at Oxford, and became master of a free school in Gloucester in 1641. Here he soon became suspected of heresy, and from the year 1644 till his death in 1655, he passed a large part of his time in various prisons and in exile. Whenever he was at liberty he wrote and preached in favour of his sentiments, which caused him to be frequently apprehended and to undergo a criminal prosecution. In the year 1651 he published two Catechisms, in which, Mr. Neal says, he maintained, 1. "That God is confined to a certain place. 2. That he has a bodily shape. 3. That he has passions. 4. That he is neither omnipotent nor unchangeable. 5. That we are not to believe three persons in the Godhead. 6. That Jesus Christ has not the nature of God.

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF SOME MINOR SECTS.

1. It will be proper here to give some account of certain sects which could not be conveniently noticed in the history of the larger communities, but which, for various reasons, should not be passed over in total silence. While the Arminian disputes in Holland were most warm, in the year 1619 arose that class of people who hold sacred conventions twice a-year at Rheinsberg in Holland, not far from Leyden, and who are well known by the name of Collegiants. The institution originated from three brothers, by the name of Koddeus or Van der Kodde—namely, John James, Hadrian, and Gisbert—obscure men in rural life, but according to report pious, well acquainted with their Bibles, and opposed to religious controversies. They were joined by one Anthony Cornelius, who was also an illiterate and obscure man. The descendants and followers of these men acquired the name of Collegiants, from the circumstance that they called their assemblies Colleges. All persons may be admitted into the society who merely account the Bible a divine book, and endeavour to live according to its precepts, whatever may be their opinions respecting God and the Christian religion. The brethren, who are considerably numerous in most of the cities and villages of Holland, Friesland, and West Friesland, assemble twice a-week, namely, on Sundays and Wednesdays; and after singing a hymn and offering a prayer, they take up some passage of the New Testament which they illustrate and explain. With the exception of females, whom they do not allow to speak in public, all persons of whatever rank or order are at liberty to bring forward their thoughts and offer them to the consideration of the brethren; and all are at liberty to oppose, modestly and soberly, whatever the brethren advance. They have printed lists of the texts of Scripture which are to be discussed at their several meetings, so that each person may examine the passages at home and come prepared to speak. Twice a-year the brethren assemble at Rheinsberg, where they have spacious buildings destined for the education of orphan children and for the reception of strangers, and there spend four days together in listening to exhortations to holiness and love and in celebrating the Lord's Supper. Here also those who wish it are baptized, but it is in the ancient manner, immersing the whole body in water. The brethren of Friesland at the present day assemble once a-year at Leeuwarden and there observe the Holy Supper, because Rheinsberg is too distant for them conveniently to go thither. In short, by the Collegiants we are to understand a very large society of persons of every sect and rank, who assume the name of Christians, but entertain different views of Christ; and which is kept together neither by rulers and teachers, nor by ecclesiastical laws, nor by a formula of faith, nor, lastly, by any set of rites, but solely by the desire of improvement in Scriptural knowledge and piety.¹

2. In such an association, which allows all its members to think as they please, and which has no formula of faith, dissensions and controversies cannot easily arise. Yet in the year 1672, there was no little dispute between John and Paul Breitenburg, merchants of Rotterdam, and Abraham Lemmermann and Francis Cuiper, merchants of Amsterdam. John Breitenburg (or Bredenburg as he is generally called), had established a peculiar sort of college in which he expounded the religion of reason and nature. This was disapproved of by Lemmermann and Cuiper, who wished to have reason excluded from any combination with religion. The dispute grew warmer as Bredenburg diverged towards the opinions of Spinoza and defended them, and yet wished to be regarded as a Christian.² Some other minor contests arose at

¹ See the Dissertation sur les Usages de ceux qu'on appelle en Hollande Collégiens et Rhinobourgeois, which is in the splendid work, Cérémonies Religieuses de tous les Peuples du Monde, tome iv. p. 323, &c. Also a book published by the Collegiants themselves, entitled, De Oorspronk, Natuur, Handelwijze en Oogmerk der zogenomde Rynburgsche Vergadering, Amsterd. 1736, &c.

² John Bredenburg and Francis Cuiper are well known to have been among the followers and the adversaries of Spinoza, but what sort of men they were has been unknown generally. Bredenburg, a Collegiant and a merchant of Rotterdam, openly taught the doctrine of Spinoza, and demonstrated its accordance with reason mathematically. At the same time, he not only professed to be a Christian, but actually explained, recommended, and defended Christianity in the meetings of the Collegiants, and declared it to be of divine origin. This man of a singular genius reconciled these two contradictory things, by maintaining that reason was opposed to religion, but yet that we ought to believe in the religion contained in the New Testament Scriptures against the most evident and the most conclusive mathematical demonstrations. He must therefore have believed in a twofold truth, theological and mathematical; and have held that to be false in theology which is true in philosophy. The best account of Bredenburg but only a divine lordship. 7. That he was not a priest while upon earth. 8. That there is no deity in the Holy Ghost." According to Dr. Toulmin, these are not formal propositions but only questions in his catechisms, to which he subjoins texts of Scripture by way of answer. Thus, the first proposition in this question: "Is not God, according to the current of the Scripture, in a certain place, namely, in heaven?" The answer consists of twenty-nine passages of Scripture, which represent God as "looking from heaven," as "our father who art in heaven," &c. See Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. iv. p. 157, &c. ed. Boston, 1817; Toulmin's Review of the Life, Character, and Writings of Mr. John Biddle; Brook's Lives of the Puritans, vol. iii. p. 411, &c.; Rees's Cyclopædia, art. Biddle.—Mur.

the same time. The result of the whole was, that the Collegiants in 1686 were split into two opposing sects, and held their conventions in separate edifices at Rheinsberg. But on the death of the authors of these discords, near the beginning of the next century, the schism began to heal, and the Collegiants returned to their former union and harmony.¹

3. John Labadie, a Frenchman, eloquent and of no contemptible genius, was first a Jesuit; being dismissed from their society he joined the Reformed, and sustained the office of a preacher with reputation in France, Switzerland, and Holland. He at length set up a new sect, which had its seat first at Middleburg in Zealand, then at Amsterdam, and afterwards in 1670 at Hervorden, a town in Westphalia, under the patronage of Elizabeth princess Palatine, the abbess of Hervorden; and being driven from that place it removed to Altona in 1672, and on the death of its founder in 1674 retired to the castle of Wiewert in West-Friesland; but it has long since become extinct. This sect was joined not only by several men of considerable learning, but also by that Minerva of the seventeenth century, the very learned lady of Utrecht, Anna Maria Schurmann. This little community did not wish to be thought to differ from the Reformed in regard to religious opinions and doctrines, so much as in manners and rules of discipline. For its law-giver proposed a rigorous and austere model of sanctity for his followers, and conceived that not only the invisible church, but also the visible, ought to be a community of sanctified persons earnestly striving after perfection in holiness. Several of his tracts are extant, which show him to have possessed a lively and ardent mind though not well disciplined and polished; and as persons of such a character are easily betrayed by their natural temperament into errors and faults, I am not sure whether those witnesses are to be wholly disregarded who charge his life and doctrine with many blemishes.²

4. Nearly at the same time, Antoinette Bourignon de la Porte, a lady of Flanders, boasted that she was inspired of God and instructed supernaturally to restore the Christian religion, which had become extinct and lost among the disputes and contentions of the different sects. This woman, who possessed a voluble tongue, feelings uncommonly ardent, and an imagination of inexhaustible fecundity, filled the provinces of Holland and also Jutland (where she spent some years) with the fame of her flights of fancy; and she persuaded some among the learned, as well as the ignorant and unlearned, to believe her declarations. After various sufferings and conflicts she died at Franeker in Friesland in the year 1680. It would require a prophet and diviner to make out from her numerous writings a compact and consistent system of theology. For that divine light which guides persons of this character never proceeds in a regular and methodical way; and it spreads a thick darkness before the minds of those who investigate truth not by feeling but by the understanding. Yet a reflecting person who is versed in church history may easily discover that this woman, who had not full command of her reason, derived a large part of her oracles from the writings of the Mystic doctors; and what she derived from these sources the extravagance of her fancy made worse than they were before. Neglecting all the details of her system, the substance of it is, that religion consists in an internal emotion or sensation of the soul, and not in either knowledge or practice.³ Among her patrons, the most is given by the learned Jew, Isaac Orobio, in his Certamen Philosophicum propaganda veritatis Divinae et Naturalis adversus Jo. Bredenburgii Principia, ex quoque quod Religio Rationis repugnat, demonstrare nititur. This book, which contains Bredenburg's demonstrations of the doctrines of Spinoza, was first published, Amsterdam, 1703, 8vo, and then, Brussels, 1731, 12mo. Bredenburg's adversary, Francis Cuiper, rendered his name famous by his Arcana Atheismi Detecta, written in opposition to Bredenburg. Cuiper was a bookseller of Amsterdam, and published among other things the Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum seu Unitariorum. Those acquainted with literary history know that Cuiper, on account of that very book above mentioned, which he wrote against Bredenburg, became suspected of Spinozism, notwithstanding he was a Collegiant, and a strenuous defender of Christianity and of the harmony of reason with religion.

¹ Besides those already named, see Rues, Nachrichten vom Zustande der Mennoniten, p. 267, &c.

² See Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. iii. p. 35, &c.; and Introd. ad Histor. Chersones. Cimbrica, par. ii. cap. v. p. 121, &c.; add Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, vol. i. part ii. book xvii. chap. xxi. p. 1186; Weismann's Historia Eccles. Sæcul. xvii. p. 927, and others. Concerning the two celebrated companions and colleagues of Labadie, Peter du Lignon and Peter Yvon, see Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 472, 1020. [Labadie exhibited through life the character of an indiscreet reformer. To lash the vices of the people and to purge the churches of their offences against purity, was his great business. But it was his misfortune always to get into difficulty. The irreligious abhorred him, and the pious were dissatisfied with him. Hence he removed from place to place, was at length excommunicated by the French churches in Holland, and set up a church of his own. But this church rendered itself so odious, that it was persecuted and driven from place to place, so long as Labadie was at the head of it. The charges against him were very numerous and weighty, and respected both his orthodoxy and his morals; but it is questionable whether, if fairly tried, he would be found to be anything more than a rash, indiscreet, enthusiastical man.—Mur.]

³ See Möller, who treats expressly and fully respecting her, in his Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 85, &c.; and in his Introd. in Histor. Chersones. Cimbrica, par. ii. p. 151, &c.; Bayle, Dictionnaire Hist. et Crit. tome i. p. 639; Arnold, Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie, vol. ii. p. 153, &c. and others.

distinguished were Christian Bartholomew de Cordt, a priest of the Oratory at Mechlin, a Jansenist, who died on the island of Nordstrand in Jutland,¹ and Peter Poiret, a man of penetrating genius and well versed in the Cartesian philosophy, who has clearly evinced by his own example that knowledge and ignorance, reason and superstition, are not so mutually repulsive that they cannot reside in the same breast, and by their united energies engender monstrous productions.²

5. Of the same or at least similar views, the same plans, and the same general character, was Jane Leade, who near the end of the century blinded not only many of the common people in England, but also some of the better informed, by her visions, her prophecies, her promises, and her doctrines, and thus gave rise to the Philadelphia Society. For she believed in general that all contentions among Christians would wholly cease, and that the church of Christ would become the only, the perfectly united, and the most beautiful church here on earth, provided all would commit their souls to the internal teacher, to be moulded, enlightened, and governed by him, neglecting all other doctrines, precepts, and opinions. And she did not hesitate to give assurance, in the name of God, that such a church as she had conceived would be established before the end of the world. And the honest woman might with more confidence give this assurance, as she fully believed that her Philadelphia Society was that very church of Christ in which alone the Holy Spirit resided and reigned. Her other discoveries, among which was the noted restoration of all things, need not be related. Leade was less fortunate than Bourignon in this respect, that she had not so eloquent and sagacious a counsellor as Poiret to plead her cause. For her principal associates, John Pordage, a physician, and Thomas Bromley, were more distinguished for piety and a contemplative turn of mind than for their power of reasoning or their eloquence. Pordage in particular even surpassed our Boehme (whom he greatly admired) in obscurity, and instead of enlightening his readers, shocks them with his uncouth phraseology.³

¹ See Jaeger, Historia Sacra et Civilis Saecul. xvii. decenn. x. p. 90, &c.; Poiret, Bibliotheca Mystica. p. 161, 174, 283, 286, and others. [Jane Leade, who died 1704, in the 81st year of her age, spent nearly her whole life in reading and recommending the works of Boehme, and in writing her own revelations and new results of divine truths. She was rich, and printed the whole at her own cost. Hence great numbers of her writings came before the public. The Philadelphia Society was established by her in 1697; the cause and reasons for its institution she published in 1698. Her writings fill eight volumes.—Pordage was first a preacher, but being deposed for his fanaticism, he afterwards became a physician. He was the most zealous promoter of the Boehmist doctrines and of the Philadelphia Society in England. His principal work was his Divine and True Metaphysics, in 3 vols. 8vo. He also wrote a Theologia Mystica, and died in 1698.—Bromley was his pupil and adherent, and wrote much on the Bible. In Holland, one Lot Fisher, a physician, was a promoter of the Philadelphia Society, and he caused all the above works to be splendidly published in Dutch.—Schä.]

¹ See concerning him, Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 149.

² Poiret systematized and explained the wild and incoherent rhapsodies of Bourignon, in a great work which he entitled, L'Economie Divine, ou Système Universel, first published in French, Amsterd. 1686, 7 vols. 8vo, and afterwards published in Latin. Respecting this celebrated Mystic philosopher, whose various writings procured him notoriety, see the Bibliotheca Bremens. Theol. Philol. tom. iii. par. i. p. 75.

A BRIEF SKETCH
OF THE ECCLIASTICAL HISTORY
OF THE
EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

1. THE ecclesiastical history of the [eighteenth] century now passing affords matter for a volume, rather than for a few pages; and it may expect, among those who come after us, an ingenuous and faithful historian of its own. But that the present summary may not be defective, and that myself and perhaps others may have a thread to guide our lectures, I will just run over the principal subjects, and in a few words state the occurrences most worthy of notice in our own age. That the size of the book may not be unnecessarily swelled, authorities will be omitted. For what man of learning is so ignorant of the state of literature as not to know, that there are innumerable works from which our dry and insipid narrative might be filled up and made interesting?

2. The Christian name has been propagated with equal zeal by papists and Protestants, in Asia, America, and Africa. I say the Christian name, not the Christian religion. For it is demonstrable that very many of those whom the Romish missionaries persuade to forsake idolatry show themselves to be Christians only in name and in certain ceremonies and outward forms, not in reality and in spirit; nor do they renounce superstition, but only exchange one species of it for another. Among the papists the Jesuits, and among the Jesuits the French, especially, are represented as explaining genuine Christianity with distinguished success to barbarous nations who knew not God. And the fact is not to be denied, provided it is allowable to call those persons Christians who have some knowledge of Christ, however imperfect it may be. At least it is true that the French gathered large congregations of such Christians in the East Indies, especially in the kingdoms of the Carnatic, of Majura and Marawar on the coast of Malabar, and in China, Tonquin, and elsewhere, and also in some provinces of America, since the time that Anthony Veri assumed the office of superintendent of the sacred missions, and by great efforts procured both men and money adequate for so great an undertaking. But these missionaries were so far from effacing the former stain upon the character of the Jesuit preachers, that they rather deepened it. For they are represented as pursuing their own honour and emolument rather than the interests of Christ, and as ingeniously corrupting very much the holy religion of our Saviour, in order to obtain the more proselytes.

3. The famous question, whether the Jesuits residing in China advocated the cause of Christ well or ill among that discerning people, who are so exceedingly attached to their ancient rites, was decided in the year 1704, by Clement XI. in a manner adverse to the Jesuits. For he declared it criminal for the new Christians to practise the rites of their ancestors, and especially those rites by which the Chinese honour their deceased ancestors and Confucius. But this severe edict was considerably mitigated in the year 1715, doubtless for the sake of appeasing the angry Jesuits. For the pontiff decreed that it is allowable for the teachers of the Chinese to designate the divine nature by the word Tien, provided they add the word Tchu to remove the ambiguity of the word Tien, and to make it appear that the Christian teachers adored the Lord of heaven (for this is the meaning of the phrase Tien-Tchu), and not heaven itself. He also allowed those rites to be practised which gave so much offence to the adversaries of the Jesuits, provided all superstition and appearance of religion were avoided, and that these rites were regarded as mere testimonies of respect for their ancestors or as marks of civil honour. The Chinese Christians, therefore, according to this decree of Clement, may keep in their houses tablets, on which are written in golden letters the names of their ancestors and of Confucius; they may lawfully honour them with lighted candles, with incense, and with tables set out with viands, fruits, and spices; nay, may address these tablets and the graves of their ancestors as supplicants, prostrating themselves to the ground. The first or more severe edict was carried to China by Charles Thomas Tournon in the year 1705, and the second or milder one by Charles Ambrose Mezzabarba, in the year 1721. But neither of them satisfied the emperor and the Jesuits. Tournon, executing the commands of his master with less prudence than the case required, was, by order of the emperor, thrown into prison, where he died in the year 1710. Mezzabarba, though much more cautious and prudent, returned without effecting his object; for the emperor could by no means be persuaded to allow any innovations to be made in the ancient customs and institutions of the country. At present, the state of Christianity in China being extremely precarious and dubious, this controversy is entirely suspended. And many considerations induce us to suppose that the pontiff and the accusers of the Jesuits throw no obstacles in the way of the Jesuits' adhering to their own regulations, rather than to those sent them from Rome. For many evils must be patiently borne in order to avoid that far greater evil, the overthrow of the Romish religion in China.¹

4. The English and the Dutch, but especially the former, made much greater efforts than before to spread the knowledge of Christianity among the nations of Asia and America. Among the efforts of this kind by Lutherans, the noblest and most successful is, the institution of Frederick IV. king of Denmark, who in the year 1706 sent out missionaries to preach Christian truth to the Indians on the coast of Malabar. This mission, the purest and best of all, not only still flourishes, being supported by the very best regulations, but through the munificence of that excellent king, Christian VI. it is daily becoming more and more brilliant. The men who labour in it, I admit, make fewer Christians than the papal missionaries, but they make far better ones—real disciples and not mere mock disciples of Jesus Christ. The Russians have bestowed labour, not in vain, for the conversion of some of the nations bordering on Siberia.

5. While the glory of Jesus Christ has been increasing in the remotest parts of our world, through the labours, the perils, and the anxious solicitude of these missionaries, great numbers in Europe have made it their business to obscure this glory and to tread it in the dust. There is no country of Europe, and almost no sect of Christians in our age, which does not nourish in its bosom persons who endeavour either to blot out all religion and all fear of God, or at least to sink the dignity and lessen the influence of Christianity. Nowhere does this pest to the human race more abound, nowhere does it more boldly come forth to the light of day, than in the free states of Holland and England. Nor is it rare to meet, especially in England, with books which impudently deride and set at nought, not only the whole religion of Christ, but also the honour, worship, and majesty of the Divine Being, and all virtue and morality. Infamous for the publication of such books are, John Toland, Anthony Collins, Matthew Tindal, Thomas Woolston (a portentous genius, who with most stupid effrontery attempted to undermine the credibility of our Saviour's miracles), Thomas Morgan, John Chubb, John Mandeville, and several others. And no country of Europe, particularly those which have abandoned the Romish communion, will be long free from writers of this character, if the booksellers continue to abuse the power they now have of rescuing from oblivion, by means of printing, every wretched and senseless production.

6. The sect of Atheists, that is, of persons who deny the existence of an infinitely wise and powerful Being, who created and upholds the visible universe according to his pleasure, is now almost extinct. For those actuated by this frenzy at the present day, omitting all disputation, agree to the doctrines of Spinoza, and consider this whole material world as an automaton, which, by means of some internal energy, originates and produces various movements, all of which are the result of necessity. The tribe of Deists, or of persons who assail the truth of all revealed religions, and especially of the Christian religion, disagree very much and are divided into various sects. The best of them—though these are bad enough—are those who endeavour to merge

¹ All these events are stated far more fully in Mosheim's most recent Eccelesiastical History of China (in German), Rostock, 1748, 8vo. In opposition to this, was published at Augsburg in 1758, 8vo, and at Innspruck, The most recent Events in China, with a solid Confutation of many unjust and erroneous statements of Mosheim, in his most recent Eccl. Hist. of China, written from Pekin, by R. P. Florianio Bahr, then rector of the Jesuits' college in China. But this refutation only makes the correctness of Mosheim's book appear the more manifest.—Schl. [Mosheim's book on China was translated into English, as stated in note 2, p. 718.—R.]

Christianity in natural religion, maintaining that Christ only republished the lost and obliterated precepts of nature or correct reason. Of this class are Tindal, Chubb, Mandeville, Morgan, and many others among the English, if indeed they really believed what their words express.¹ To the same class belongs Muralt, or whoever may be the unfortunately eloquent and ingenious author of the recent French work, entitled, What is Essential in Religion.² For according to his opinion, the whole system of religion is comprised in these three propositions—There is a God; He watches over human affairs; the soul is immortal. And to inculcate these three truths by his precepts and example was the object of Christ's mission.

7. The Romish church in this century has been governed by Clement XI. [A.D. 1700–21], Innocent XIII. [1721–24], Benedict XIII. [1724–30], Clement XII. [1730–40], Benedict XIV. [1740–58]. All these may be pronounced holy, wise, and learned men, if compared with the pontiffs of former times. The most distinguished of them for learning and erudition are Clement XI. and the present pontiff, Benedict XIV. whose former name was Prosper Lambertini. The most distinguished for piety, or rather for a show of it, was Benedict XIII. This last-named pontiff made a laudable attempt, by means of a council which he held in the Lateran palace in 1725, the acts and decrees of which have been published, to correct the greater evils in the church and to reform the very corrupt morals of the clergy of every rank; but the event did not answer his expectations. Nor will Benedict XIV. be more successful, who is now attempting the same thing, though by different means. Moreover, the modern pontiffs differ exceedingly from their predecessors, in the extent of their prerogatives and in their power and influence. For the sovereign princes and states, though they treat the pontiffs personally with high respect and honour, yet are continually depressing and humbling the court of Rome, which they wisely discriminate from the pontiff. This appears, among other things, from the contests of the pontiffs in the present age with the kings of France, Portugal, Sardinia, and Naples, in which the pontiffs have uniformly been obliged to succumb.

8. A reconciliation of the Protestants with the papists, if we except some feeble efforts of certain individuals, has not been seriously and earnestly attempted, nor indeed was it hardly possible. For those who formerly attempted this thing endeavoured principally to gain over the Protestants, by explaining away and lowering down the [most offensive] Romish doctrines; but Clement XI. deprived the pacificators of this their principal resource, by publishing that very noted decree called the Bull Unigenitus. For this Bull has shown most clearly, that on most of the points which obliged our ancestors to separate from the Romish communion, the present doctrine of the papists is precisely the same as it formerly appeared to be. This disclosure being made, it became manifest that those who had formerly offered us peace on very conciliatory terms, had only laid a trap for us by their pretended expositions of the Romish faith, and that no confidence whatever could be reposed on the promises of such men.

9. The intestine discords which greatly disquieted the Romish community in the preceding century were so far from being composed and settled in this, that they have rather acquired new strength and raged with increased animosity. The Jesuits still contend with the Dominicans and others, though with a little more decorum and more covertly. The Franciscans are at variance with the Dominicans. There is also a dispute respecting the nature and lawfulness of the Chinese rites. But it would be endless to enumerate all the contests which disturb and disquiet every part of the widely-extended Romish church, sometimes more slightly and sometimes more violently. The principal controversy now dividing the papal empire seems to be that of the Jansenists, which is carried on with various results, particularly in France and the Netherlands. The Jansenists or Augustinians, as they choose to be called, are inferior to the Jesuits in numbers, power, and influence, but are their equals in fortitude, sagacity, and erudition, and their superiors in sanctimoniousness, and that superstition which dazzles the eyes of the multitude. In France they are oppressed and persecuted, but in the Netherlands they find a ready asylum. The greatest part of the papists in the Spanish Netherlands and all those in the United Netherlands adhere to the Jansenist doctrines. The Dutch papists at this day have almost separated themselves from the

¹ For the opinions of these Deists and their refutation, see Leland's View of the Principal Deistical Writers that have appeared in England in the last and present century, 3 vols. London, 1754, 56, often reprinted since. The same able writer, who was an Irish Presbyterian minister, also wrote expressly against Tindal and Morgan.—R.

² Lettres sur la Religion essentielle à l'homme, distinguée de ce qui n'en est que l'accessoire.—Mach.

Roman pontiff, though they profess the closest adherence to the communion of the Romish church; nor are either the threatenings or the entreaties of the Romish prelate able to reduce these rebellious Batavians to subordination.

10. A very great support to the Jansenist cause, both in the preceding century and in this, was the New Testament of the very learned and pious Paschasius Quesnel, one of the Presbyters of the Oratory, which he translated into French and accompanied with notes calculated to awaken a sense of religion. For the marrow of the Jansenist doctrines is very elegantly and ingeniously wrought into these notes, so as to infuse it the more agreeably into the mind of the reader. To destroy the influence of this [as they thought] most pernicious engine, the Jesuits induced Lewis XIV. king of France, to solicit a public condemnation of the book from the Roman pontiff, Clement XI. The pontiff complied with the wishes of the king or rather of the Jesuits, and issued in the year 1713 the celebrated Bull or decree which from its first word is called Unigenitus, and in which one hundred and one propositions taken from that book are proscribed. This edict was of some advantage to the cause of the Jesuits, but it was of immense disadvantage to the whole Romish church, as the wiser men in it themselves admit. For not to mention that the Protestants learned from it that the Romish community religiously held fast her former corruptions, the subjects of the pontiff, who had no attachment to the Jansenist doctrines, and who were solicitous only to advance truth and piety, were exceedingly offended at this decree. Besides, the Jansenian schism was widened by it and rendered more bitter and violent.

11. The most violent contests were produced by this unhappy edict, especially in France. Many of the prelates and a vast number of influential, pious, and learned men, both among the clergy and the laity, appealed from it to a future general council. And especially Lewis Anthony Noailles, the archbishop of Paris, manfully opposed it, regardless of the resentments both of the pontiff and the king. Pontiffs, kings, and Jesuits laboured to subdue these strenuous defenders of the Gallic liberties and of the religion of their fathers by all sorts of punishments and indignities, and in part they did subdue them. For many became exiles and retired among their brethren in Holland; others were coerced by violence and fear to approve the decree of the pontiff; and others, being deprived of their livings, their honours, and their offices, removed to foreign countries. At length the matter was carried so far that this papal edict was declared to be a law of the land. All these measures reduced the nation to some degree of tranquillity, but they by no means purged it of enemies to the pontiff. Every part of France abounds with Appellants as they are called, who are only waiting for a convenient opportunity for renewing the old controversy which has never been properly settled.

12. Amid these calamities, the Jansenists had but two resources by which to defend themselves and their cause against so many powerful enemies, namely, the press and miracles. Accordingly, they attacked the pontiff and the Jesuits in numerous publications, many of which being written with copiousness, elegance, and solidity, have produced great effect; and as human aids proved insufficient, they called in the help of divine aid. For they persuaded the people that God had honoured the bones and ashes of certain persons, who had been distinguished for their zeal in the cause of Jansenius and who had appealed anew in their last moments to a future council, by imparting to them the power of healing the most inveterate diseases. Among those who were said to have received this glory, the most distinguished was Francis de Paris, a deacon of the church of Paris, a man of noble birth but of a gloomy temperament and excessively superstitious, and one who had voluntarily brought on his own death by abstinence from food and other self-tortures.¹ To miracles were superadded divine visions. For many persons, especially at Paris, pretended to be actuated by the Holy Spirit, and uttered prophecies, often of the most puerile character, by which however the multitude as is usual were greatly affected. But the prudence of the French court put an end to these commotions also; so that as things now are, the Jansenists have no other means of defence than their genius and their pens.

13. Of the Greek and Oriental church, very little can be said. For their ignorance, and the severe oppression under which they live, prevent their attempting any revolution or change of condition. The Russians, as already stated, under the guidance of the emperor Peter the Great, adopted better regulations for their church. Yet there still remain vast numbers in that immense empire who would be better pleased with the rude system of their ancestors; and there are some who, if they were able, would exterminate the Protestants and the followers of other religions with fire and sword. This is manifest, especially, from a work of Stephen Javorski against the heretics. The Greeks are said to meet with more indulgence from their Mohammedan masters. The Nestorians and Monophysites in Asia and Africa perseveringly refuse communion with the Romish see, notwithstanding all the promises and arguments of the papal missionaries. The pontiffs have several times contemplated a new mission to the Abyssinians, but have not yet been able to discover a way to elude the vigilance of that nation, so hostile to the Romish religion. Nor is there even a tolerable prospect that the embassy now preparing at Rome to the emperor of Abyssinia will meet with success. The Monophysites in Asia extend the limits of their church as they have opportunity; and not long since, they gained over a part of the Nestorians inhabiting the maritime coasts of India.

¹ These pretended miracles of the Abbé de Paris have been examined and exposed by Bishop Douglas in his Criterion, Oxfr. 1832, p. 152, &c. and Paley in his Evidences, prop. ii. chap. ii. sect. iii. Mosheim had previously published the result of his own examination, in a tract entitled, Inquisitio in veritatem Miraculorum Francisci de Paris saculi nostri Thaumaturgi. It is now to be found in the second volume of his Dissertationes ad Hist. Eccles. pertinentes, 1748, p. 307, &c.—R.

14. The Lutheran church celebrated, in peace and tranquillity, the secular festival of its religion in 1717, and that of the Augsburg Confession in 1730. It received no small accession a few years since by means of that multitude which abandoned the territories of Saltzburg and Berchtesgaden, in order to profess the pure religion without fear, and who emigrated, some to Prussia, others to Holland, and others to America and other countries. The Lutheran church has likewise been increased in consequence of its extension to America and Asia; nor are the Lutheran congregations small in those distant regions. In Germany, on the other hand, as appears from public documents and from numerous complaints, it has in various places been much oppressed by the adherents to the Roman pontiff, and been very unjustly deprived of a part of its privileges.

15. No change could take place in the doctrines and regulations of the Lutheran church, because the ancient confessions and canons by which the public faith and discipline were ascertained remained as formerly. But the method of teaching and inculcating these doctrines was not uniformly the same. At the commencement of the century, it seemed very generally to be the aim to restore every part of Christianity to its ancient simplicity, and to exclude all philosophical terms and reasonings. But in process of time many fell into the opinion that Christianity could by no means maintain its ground, unless it was supported by the aids of philosophy and was demonstrated mathematically. The jurists, who in the preceding century undertook to reform the system of ecclesiastical law, have prosecuted the object so vigorously in the present century, that we should have had a very different ecclesiastical constitution, if the sovereigns had deemed it for the public good to yield to their counsels and admonitions. Still we may discover here and there visible traces of the principles which men of great learning are wont to advance, not only respecting the appendages and externals of religion, but also respecting religion itself. Hence it is not strange that there should be warm disputes between them and the clergy on various points. And not only theologians, but very excellent men among the jurists themselves have fears, lest religion should at length be converted into a mere political engine for the security of civil government, if the opinions of some of these men should acquire authority.

16. The immense licentiousness of thought, and of spreading among the common people even the vilest and most senseless opinions, which began to prevail in the preceding century, has increased and become more confirmed everywhere among us in the present century. Hence there have arisen and still arise at the present time so many persons, some of them full of fanatical folly, some delirious and beside themselves, and some the fabricators of new religions, who freely divulge all their dreams, everywhere produce departures from the established rules of faith and practice, and excite discords and contentions. Besides those already named, the following are notorious:—John Tennhart, John George Gichtel, John William Ueberfeldt, John George Rosenbach, George Christopher Brendel, John Christopher Seizen, Anthony Ræmeling, and many others, who either boast of being guided by a divine impulse, or offer to the credulous multitude in different ways and with different success their fancied modifications and improvements of the church. These men have been opposed by our theologians in numerous publications, but many of them were unworthy of confutation. The greatest part have become convicted of their folly by the course of events, and by actual results rather than by arguments and reasoning. For as men of this character start up of a sudden, so for the most part they soon ruin their own cause, either by their indiscretions or by their corrupt morals and base conduct, or lastly by their disagreement among themselves.

17. Many place in this class the Herrenhutters, or those who first associated at Herrenhut in Lusatia under the illustrious count Zinzendorf, and who afterwards increasing have spread themselves through a large part of Europe, and even travelled to the Indies, to Tartary, and the utmost bounds of the earth. They tell us they are descendants of those Bohemian and Moravian brethren who, in the fifteenth century, were excited by the preaching and example of John Huss to cast off the Romish yoke. They might more correctly call themselves imitators of those brethren, for it is conceded by all that only a very small part of this new fraternity consists of Bohemians and Moravians; and it is very uncertain also whether those of them who are Bohemians by descent are the posterity of those ancient Bohemian brethren. They declare farther that they do not differ from the Lutherans in regard to doctrines, but only in their customs and regulations, in which they come near to the ancient Bohemians. But many question whether they here assert the truth, and are suspicious that these new brethren adopt the language of the Lutherans while among the Lutherans, the more readily to obtain toleration, and that in reality they are a mixture of people of various characters and sentiments. However this may be, it is at least difficult to understand why they are so zealous to extend their particular sect, if they differ from us only in their customs and mode of discipline. For whoever truly follows Jesus Christ will care little how the Christian community is constituted and regulated, because he knows that religion does not consist in external rites and regulations but in faith and love.

18. This progress of superstition among us nothing could arrest, as many supposed, except philosophy. And hence the cultivation of philosophy, which was apparently neglected towards the close of the preceding century, was not only revived but was prosecuted by many with great diligence. The general method of philosophising which I have called the Metaphysical obtained preference before all others. The superlative genius of Godfrey William von Leibnitz elucidated this philosophy with elegance, and moulded it into a better shape; but it was the very acute Christopher Wolff who perfected it, digested it into a system, and—what was entirely a new thing and never before attempted—gave it the form of a mathematical science. In this improved state, most of those who search after truth and certainty were exceedingly captivated with it, and eagerly applied it to the explanation and confirmation of the truths of revealed religion. But this gave great dissatisfaction to many good men who were anxious for the safety of the truth taught us by Christ; and hence the old conflict between philosophy and theology, piety and reason, was revived, and was urged on with great vehemence for a series of years. For many are of opinion that this metaphysical philosophy imbues the minds of young men with sentiments hostile to all religion and all worship, with arrogance also, contempt for divine revelation, excessive confidence in human reason, and other vices; and that it does not throw light and dignity around theology, but rather darkness and ignominy.

19. In proof of the correctness of this opinion respecting the tendency of this philosophy, they appeal especially to the case of Lawrence Schmidt of Schweinfurt, who is commonly called the Wertheim translator from the place where he resided. This man, who was by no means destitute of abilities and was very well versed in the philosophy in question, projected a new German translation of the Bible to serve as the foundation or basis of a new body of divinity, drawn up according to the strict rules of demonstration, which he had in contemplation. But the project was disastrous to him. For scarcely had he published a specimen of the work in a translation of the inspired books of Moses, when he was not only attacked in numerous publications, but was accused before the supreme tribunal of the Germanic empire as a capital enemy to the Christian religion and a caviller at divine truth. The chief ground of accusation was, that he had boldly construed certain passages in the books of Moses, which designated or foretold the coming of the Messiah, in such a manner as to give them a different signification. He was therefore thrown into prison and ordered to be tried for his life. But he escaped from prison and saved himself by flight.

20. The controversies and contentions of this age have been very numerous. First, what is called the Pietistic controversy has been carried on, in some places more fiercely and in others more moderately, according to the dispositions of persons and the circumstances of different parts of the country. But the controversy has gradually abated as time rolled on, and at present it seems to be reduced nearly to the single point, whether an irreligious man may have true and certain knowledge of divine things or some sort of illumination, which many regard as a contest about words rather than things. Besides this, there have been several other controversies which also produced excitement in the preceding century respecting the eternity of the torments of the damned, the final restoration of all things, Christ's [millennial] reign on the earth, and others of like character. With John Fabricius, a divine of Helmstadt, and with some others, there has been a dispute respecting the importance of the disagreement between us and the papists; for he and his associates deemed it not so great as it is commonly supposed to be, so that he believed a person might lawfully go over to the Romish church. Respecting the law of marriage, the grounds of divorce, and concubinage, there have been great disputes between certain theologians and some distinguished jurists. Minor contests which suddenly spring up and as soon die away, as they contribute little to a knowledge of the internal state of the church, need not be enumerated.

21. The Reformed church not only preserves the same aspect which was above described, but studies to make it still more her appropriate characteristic.¹ For notwithstanding the formulas of faith, by which the vigilance of their ancestors enclosed and fortified their religion, remain everywhere the same, yet in most countries no preacher is compelled to think in exact accordance with them, but is supposed to fulfil his duty if he holds up the great and primary truths of Christianity, and avoids too much familiarity with the papists and Socinians. Hence in this very ample community, at the present day, Arminians, Supralapsarians, Infralapsarians, and Universalists [i.e. believers in a universal atonement], live amicably together, and with united efforts strive to extenuate and lessen the importance of those contests which divide the Christians who have separated themselves from the Romish communion. There are indeed some, especially among the Swiss, the Germans, and the Dutch, who are greatly troubled at this moderation; who deplore bitterly the loss of the ancient purity and rigour, and occasionally wax warm and attack the despisers of their ancient discipline. But the others, who are greatly superior in numbers, respectability, and power, care little for their resentments.

¹ Moshelm still continues to speak of all those who are styled Reformed as if they were united in one church or religious community, while in fact they form a number of totally distinct communities, often differing widely in doctrine, discipline, and worship, and in several instances having no sort of communion with each other. And hence his remarks respecting them as a body are liable to much criticism.—Mur.

22. Whoever therefore duly considers the whole subject must freely acknowledge, that neither the Lutherans nor the Arminians have any longer ground for controversy with the Reformed church, but only with individual doctors of this family. For this church leaves every one at liberty to think as he pleases, on those points which were formerly the ground of its separation from the Lutherans and Arminians, and deems the fundamentals of religion safe, however those points are explained. And yet this very moderation thwarts the designs of those who would effect a union between the Lutherans and the Reformed. For those among us who are strenuous for orthodoxy complain that the Reformed open the door of salvation too wide, and that they offer communion and friendship not only to us but to all the sectarians. When therefore about twenty years ago,² certain excellent men among us (at the head of whom was Christopher Matthew Pfaff, a man on many accounts venerated and renowned), took very great pains to effect a union between us and the Reformed, the majority [of the Lutherans] so vigorously opposed the object, both by deeds and by publications, that it was soon abandoned.

23. The English church, which holds the first rank among the Reformed, is the same now that it was in the time of William III. The Episcopalians are the reigning party, and number among their adherents the sovereign, with the nobility of the realm and the greatest part of the people. But toleration is granted to the Puritans or Presbyterians, and to all the others who are included under the very comprehensive appellation of Nonconformists. Those however who are particularly acquainted with English affairs tell us that the Nonconformists diminish continually, and that this gradual diminution is ascribable to the mildness and gentleness of the bishops towards them. The Episcopalians are of two sorts. Some believe the government by bishops to be of divine institution, and they exalt and magnify immoderately the prerogatives of the church. Others are more moderate; and though they fully believe that an ecclesiastical government by bishops is more holy and more perfect than any other, and think that great care should be taken to prevent the clergy from becoming subject to the will and authority of kings and magistrates, yet they do not invidiously deny the name of a church to those communities in which there are no bishops, and they are temperate in defending the prerogatives of prelates among Christians.¹ These two parties are sometimes engaged in sharp contests, a striking example of which occurred in the present century. For the present bishop of Winchester, Benjamin Hoadley, a man eminent for talents and eloquence, greatly lowered the authority of the church, that is, of its presiding officers, and confined it within narrow limits. On the other hand, John Potter, now archbishop of Canterbury and at the head of the British clergy, and others, contended for the prerogatives and authority of the church with great eloquence and erudition. Moreover, the disposition of the established church of England towards those who dissent from it, cannot be learned from anything more exactly than from the fact that William Wake, the late archbishop of Canterbury, a few years ago was disposed to form an alliance with the French church, on terms which would secure to both most of their respective peculiarities of sentiment.²

² Thus wrote Moshelm in 1741. The precise year of Pfaff's attempt for a union was 1719.—Schl.

24. The unbounded liberty which Englishmen enjoy of publishing their opinions without restraint, and of worshipping God in the manner each one thinks right, naturally causes various sects to arise occasionally, and controversies respecting things pertaining to religion to be perpetual. But it is hardly possible for any one, who has not himself lived some time in England and formed acquaintance on the spot with the opinions, privileges, laws, and parties of that happy nation, to give a full and accurate account of these different sects and controversies. Of several of the sects not even the names reach us, and of many of them we have only an imperfect and indistinct knowledge. Of the controversies we are to a great extent unable to ascertain the true foundation and the points at issue, because we are destitute of the sources from which information can be drawn. At this present time, one George Whitefield is collecting a party, and contemplates the formation of a Christian community more perfect than all others, nor is he altogether unsuccessful. It would seem, if the man is self-consistent and does not follow the blind impulse of fancy rather than any determined rule, that he places religion altogether in holy emotions and an indescribable kind of sensation, and that he requires his followers to dismiss all reliance on reason and study as means of [religious] knowledge, and to submit their minds to be guided and instructed by a divine illumination.

25. The Dutch, down even to our times, have been occupied with the Cocceian and Cartesian controversies, though now less intensely than heretofore. And there is a prospect that these contests will wholly cease, since the Newtonian mode of philosophizing has expelled the Cartesian from the Dutch universities. Of the Røssellian disputes we have already given an account. Frederick van Leenhof in the year 1703 fell under suspicion of being a Spinozist, and was attacked by many on account of a book he published, entitled, Heaven upon Earth; in which he taught, that a Christian should always be joyful, and never mourn or be sorrowful. The same crime was charged by many upon William Deurhoff, an illiterate man, who published several tracts in the vernacular tongue, in which he speculated concerning the divine nature, as if he viewed it to be an energy pervading the whole material universe and operative in all parts of it. The most recent contests are those of James Saurin and Paul Maty. The former, a minister of the gospel at the Hague and distinguished for his genius and eloquence, if he erred at all, erred very slightly. For if we except a few inaccurate and unwary expressions, he deviated from the common doctrine only in this one point, that he thought it sometimes lawful to deceive men by our speech for the sake of accomplishing some great good.³ Most of the Reformed churches, it is to be noted, adopt the principle of Augustine, that every deception and every falsehood is sinful. The other, namely Maty, committed a much greater fault. For in order to explain the profound mystery of three persons in one God and to render it easy to be understood, he assumed that the Son and the Holy Spirit are two finite beings, created by God, and who at a certain time became united to God.⁴

¹ The learned and pious archbishop Wake, in a letter to Father Courayer, dated from Croyden House, July 9, 1794, expresses himself thus: "I bless God that I was born and have been bred in an Episcopal church, which, I am convinced, has been the government established in the Christian church from the very times of the Apostles. But I should be unwilling to affirm, that where the ministry is not episcopal there is no church, nor any true administration of the sacraments. And very many there are among us who are zealous for Episcopacy, and yet dare not go so far as to annul the ordinances of God performed by any other ministry."—Mac.

² See the account of the negotiation of archbishop Wake, and the letters which passed between him and Du Pin on the subject, in MacLaine's third Appendix to his translation of Mosheim's Institutes of Ecclesiastical History.—Mur.

³ See Saurin's Discours Historiques, Théologiques, Critiques, et Moraux, sur les événements les plus Mémemorables du Vieux et du Nouveau Testament, volume 1. of the folio edition.—Mac.

⁴ See Mosheim's Historia Critica novæ exphontionis Dogmatis de Tribus in Deo Personis, quum vir clariss.

26. In Switzerland, especially in the canton of Berne, the Formula Consensus which has been already mentioned produced very fierce disputes. In the year 1718, the magistrates of Berne required all public teachers, and particularly those of the university and church of Lausanne (in whom there was supposed to be some stain of error), to assent to this Formula and to receive it as the standard of their faith; for it had for some time been neglected, and subscription to it had not in all cases been required. But several, both of the professors and of the candidates for the sacred office, declared that they could not conscientiously subscribe, and accordingly some of them were subjected to punishment. This caused grievous contentions and complaints, to quiet which, the king of Great Britain and the States-General of Holland, as well as others, offered their kind offices. The result was, that the Formula lost much of its credit and authority. In the German [Reformed] churches, nothing very remarkable has occurred. The Palatine church, once so very flourishing, has, through the machinations of the papists, suffered a great diminution of its prosperity.

27. The Socinians dispersed over various countries of Europe, have hitherto been able nowhere¹ to obtain the liberty of forming themselves into a regular community, and of publicly setting up worship according to the views of their sect. At the head of their learned men, in our times, stood Samuel Crell, who died at an advanced age at Amsterdam. He however chose to be called an Artemonite rather than a Socinian, and he actually differed on many points from the common doctrines of the Socinians. The Arians obtained a great advocate in William Whiston, a professor [of mathematics] in the university of Cambridge, who chose rather to resign his chair than to renounce his opinions, which he defended in numerous publications. Similar to him, according to the common estimation, was Samuel Clarke, a man richly endowed with powers of genius and education, who in the year 1724 was convicted of adulterating the sound doctrine in regard to three persons in the Godhead. But no ingenuous and reasonable man will rank Dr. Clarke among the Arians, if this name is to be taken in its native and proper acceptation. For he merely defended with greater clearness and diligence, what is called the Arminian subordination, which has been and is still embraced by so many of the first men and by very learned prelates in England, and taught that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are in nature equal, but in rank unequal.² A great number of persons among the English have endeavoured in various ways to invalidate and assail the most sacred doctrine of the divine Trinity. And this induced an opulent lady, whose name was Moyer, to leave by her will a rich legacy as a premium for eight public discourses to be delivered annually by some learned man, in opposition to this species of impiety. The institution has been in operation since the year 1720, and promises to future ages a rich collection of the best productions in defence of this part of revealed religion.³

¹ Except in Transylvania.—Schl.

² Mosheim has here mistaken the true hypothesis of Dr. Clarke, or at least expressed it imperfectly; for what he says here is rather applicable to the opinion of Dr. Waterland. Dr. Clarke maintained an equality of perfections between the three Persons, but a subordination of nature in point of existence and derivation.—Mack.

³ As this legacy consisted merely of a leasehold estate, which expired in 1773 or 1774, no lectures were preached after that year. A list of the published lectures may be seen in Lowndes' British Librarian, col. 841, 842.—R.

Paulus Maty excogitavit, in his Dissert. ad Historiam Eccles. pertinentes, tom. II. p. 399-582.—Mur.

POSTSCRIPT.—It is to be hoped that the learned translator of this work which terminates so abruptly here, will be enabled to fulfil the intention, indicated in the conclusion of his Preface, of compiling a continuation of it, embracing the ecclesiastical history of the eighteenth century and first half of the nineteenth; a work which is very much wanted. Mosheim has had indeed several English continuators already; but they are very inadequate associates of this great historian, and leave the field quite unoccupied for Dr. Murdock, who, I have no doubt, will worthily and profitably occupy it. In German, there are many histories of the eighteenth century; scholars have long been expecting an addition to them from the pen of Gieseler, the first volume of whose Lehrbuch der neueren Kirchengeschichte, published in 1840, stops in the middle of the previous century. An excellent manual for this period is the third volume of the edition of Jablonaki's Institutiones Historiæ Christianæ, by Stosch and Schickedanz, 18mo; but it comes no lower down than the year 1786.—R.

INDEX.

 The letter p stands for PAGE—s for SECTION—and n for NOTE.

- ABAKA, emperor of the Tartars, sends envoys to the council of Lyons, p. 432, s. 2
- Abasgl, embrace Christianity in the 6th cent. p. 213, s. 1
- Abbas I. king of Persia, p. 784, s. 7
- Abbo of Fleury, 10th cent. p. 330, s. 5
- of St. Germain, historian, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Abbots, their origin and office, p. 148, s. 15, 182-7; and bishops made princes, p. 536, s. 9
- George, archbishop of Canterbury, p. 820, s. 19
- Abdallahman II. sultan in Spain, 9th cent. p. 296
- Abdas, bishop of Suza, 5th cent. p. 177, s. 4
- Abelard, Peter, 12th cent. p. 407, 411, s. 18; p. 419, sec. 3
- Abelites, a sect in the 7th cent. p. 81, s. 18, n. 4
- Abgarus, king of Edessa, 1st cent. p. 19, s. 7
- Abrahams, Galenus, p. 859, s. 7
- Abrams, Nicholas, p. 761, s. 31
- Abraxas a term used by Basilides, p. 78, s. 11
- Abсалom, archbishop of Lund, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 2
- of St. Victor, Paris, 13th century, p. 467, n.
- Abulpharajus, Gregory, Jacobite patriarch, p. 438, s. 1
- Abyssinians or Ethiopians, converted 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20; became Monophysites, p. 320, s. 1; their church, p. 631, s. 12
- missions, papal, p. 750, s. 17
- missions, protestant, p. 783, s. 6
- Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
- bishop of Berea, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
- bishop, in Armenia, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
- bishop of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 180, s. 1; n. p. 186, s. 18; p. 206
- Academics, their doctrine, p. 31, s. 21, 11; s. 12
- Academies in Roman empire, 2d cent. p. 58, s. 2
- Acca of Hexham, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3; p. 276, n.
- Accephila, a sect, 8th cent. p. 207, s. 20; 6th, p. 232, s. 10
- Achery, Luke d', p. 761, s. 31
- Achigian, Andrew, p. 783, s. 6
- Accomete, ἀκομῆται, 5th cent. p. 196, n. 5
- Acolythi, an order of clergy, p. 92, s. 5
- Acta Martyrum, what, p. 24, s. 9
- Acta Sanctorum, account of, p. 763, n.
- Acts of Uniformity, 5th cent. p. 197, s. 1
- Adalbert, errorist, 8th cent. p. 285, s. 2, n. 3
- abbot of Fleury, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- archbishop of Prague, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
- first archbishop of Magdeburg, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 9
- marquess of Tuscany, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 2
- bishop in Pomerania, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 1
- Adaldag, archbishop of Hamburg, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7
- Adam, a Scotch canon, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
- Adamites, sect in 2d cent. p. 81, s. 18; or Beghards, 15th cent. p. 553, s. 2
- Adamnanus, Irish monk, 6th cent. p. 245, s. 3
- Adarnus Magister, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
- Adelaide, empress, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 9
- Adelbold, bishop of Utrecht, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- Adelsteen, king of Norway, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
- Ademar, of Limoges, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- Adiaphoristic controversy, Lutheran, p. 594, s. 5; p. 648, s. 28
- Reformed, p. 676, s. 29
- Ado, archbishop of Vienne, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 803, s. 14
- Adolphus, John, duke of Holstein, p. 810, s. 4
- Adoptionists, 8th cent. p. 286, s. 3
- Adrevaldus or Adalbert, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Adrian, emperor in 2d cent. p. 51, s. 1; p. 56, s. 3
- a writer in 5th cent. p. 189, n.
- Ædesius, a philosopher in 4th cent. p. 126, s. 2
- Ægidius, of Tusculum, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 4
- Colonna, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
- Ælfric of Canterbury, 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
- Ælia Capitolina, Jerusalem, p. 55, s. 11
- Ælian, proconsul of Africa, 4th cent. p. 158, s. 4
- Ælnoth of Canterbury, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
- Æneas Gazeus, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
- bishop of Paris, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Sylvius, 15th cent. p. 534, s. 16.—See Plus II.
- Æon, ἄϊων, what, among Gnostics, p. 30, s. 7, n. 1; p. 78, s. 11
- Æpinus, John, p. 657, s. 46
- Ærius, a Semiarian, 4th cent. p. 151, s. 21
- Ætius, Arian, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
- Ælfmann, John, p. 792, s. 15
- Africa, missions to, p. 723, s. 18
- Agapetus, deacon at Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 223, s. 8
- bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
- pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 4
- Agathias, historian, 6th cent. p. 213, s. 1
- Agatho, bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 246, s. 2; n. p. 250
- Agilulph, Italian king, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 3
- Agnoëtis, sect in 6th cent. p. 33, s. 9, n. 7
- Agobard, bishop of Lyons, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 300, s. 14
- Agricola, Rudolph, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
- John, p. 594, s. 3
- Agrippa Castor, writer in 2d cent. p. 65, n.
- Aguirre, Joseph, p. 763, s. 32
- Aidan, bishop in England, 7th cent.
- Aids of Grace, congregations on, p. 626, s. 41; p. 767, s. 37; see Graco
- Ailly, Peter: see Alliaco
- Alfred or Ealred, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
- Aimoin of St. Germain, 9th cent. p. 303, s. 14
- French historian, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- Aistlphus, king of Lombardy, 8th cent. p. 269, s. 8
- Aiton or Halton, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
- Alain de l'Isle, or Alanus de Insulis, p. 413, n. p. 464, s. 44
- Alans, converted in 6th cent. p. 213, s. 1
- Albanensians, Cathari, 12th cent. p. 425, s. 4
- Albanus of Corduba, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Pelagius, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- Albaspinus, Gabriel, p. 763, s. 32
- Alberic of Tusculum, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 3
- of Monte Cassino, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- de Rosate, canonist, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- Albert, bishop of Livonia, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 4
- of Aix, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
- the Great, scholastic, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 8; p. 464, s. 44
- of Stade, chronicler, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
- of Padua, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
- of Strasburg, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
- Albigenses, p. 343, s. 3; p. 385, s. 2; p. 425, s. 5; p. 415, s. 24; p. 478, s. 7
- Albion, Saxon chief, 8th cent. p. 264, s. 6
- Albius, Thomas, p. 777, s. 51
- Albizi, Bartholomew, 14th cent. p. 499, s. 21; p. 513, n.
- Alcantara, Peter de, p. 778, s. 52
- Alciat, John Paul, p. 703, s. 6
- Alcimus, Ecdicius Avitus, bishop of Clermont, 8th cent. p. 190, n.
- Alcuin, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3; p. 275, s. 18

- Aldenburg, a bishopric, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 5
 Aldhelm, English bishop, 7th cent. p. 249, s. 6
 Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 — Severus, emperor, 3d cent. p. 85, s. 2
 — bishop of Alexandria, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — bishop of Heropolis, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — of Lycopolis, a philosopher, 4th cent. p. 216, s. 2
 — II. pope, 11th cent. p. 357, s. 7; p. 374, n.
 — III. pope, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 10; p. 413, n.
 — IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 447, s. 12; p. 468 n.
 — V. pope, 15th cent. p. 528, s. 2
 — VI. pope, 15th cent. p. 535, s. 18
 — VII. pope, p. 738, s. 1
 — VIII. pope, p. 739, s. 1
 — Hales, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 8; p. 465, s. 44
 — Neckam, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — de St. Elpidio, archbishop, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — de Villa Dei, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6
 Alexandria, patriarchate of, p. 128, s. 3
 Alexius Comnenus, Greek emperor, 11th cent. p. 347, s. 5; p. 385, s. 1
 —, bishop of Constantinople, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 —, Aristenus of Constantinople, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 Alfred, king of England, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 4
 Alger of Cluny, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 All Saints, festival, 7th cent. p. 253, n. 1; 9th cent. p. 318, s. 2
 All Souls, festival, 10th cent. p. 342, s. 2
 Allatius, Leo, p. 764, s. 32
 Allegorists, 9th cent. p. 308, s. 10; 11th, p. 376, s. 5; 13th, p. 514, s. 3; 15th, p. 549, s. 8
 Allaco, Peter de, 15th cent. p. 550, s. 9
 Almain, James, of Paris, 16th cent. p. 546, n.
 Al Mamum, or Abu Gaafar Abdallah, 9th cent. p. 291, s. 3
 Alphanus, archbishop of Salerno, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
 Alphonso, king of Castile, 11th cent. p. 383, s. 1
 — I. duke of Portugal, 12th cent. p. 405, s. 14
 — IX. king of Leon, 13th cent. p. 439, s. 2
 — X. king of Leon, 13th cent. p. 439, s. 2
 — VI. king of Naples, 16th cent. p. 525, s. 1
 Altenburg, conference, p. 653, s. 37
 Alto, Scottish saint, 8th cent. p. 263, n. 3
 Altorf Socinianism, p. 860, s. 2
 Amalaricus, 9th cent. p. 298, s. 12, p. 304 n.
 Amalric of Bena, 13th cent. p. 482, s. 12
 Amboyna, Dutch missions in, p. 723, s. 17
 Ambrose, bishop of Milan, 4th cent. p. 138, s. 10, n. 3
 — Authpert, 8th cent. p. 276, s. 18
 — of Camalduli, 15th cent. p. 526, s. 4; p. 539, s. 24
 Aneadeus of Lausanne, 13th cent. p. 413, n.
 America, conversions there, 15th cent. p. 522, s. 2 — missions, p. 601, s. 1; p. 724, s. 19
 Ames, William, p. 681, s. 37
 Ammianus Marcellinus, 4th cent. p. 12, s. 18
 Ammonius Saccas, a philosopher, 2nd cent. p. 50, s. 7, n. 5
 — a Christian writer, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 Amphiloehius of Iconium, 4th cent. p. 136, s. 9, n. 2
 Amrou, Saracen conqueror of Egypt, p. 255, s. 3
 Amsdorf, Nicholas, p. 649, s. 29
 Amulo or Amularius of Lyons, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Amusements, improper, p. 803, s. 31
 Amyraut, Moses, p. 745, n. 2
 Anabaptists, p. 591, s. 10; p. 645, s. 22; p. 699, s. 3; p. 707, s. 10; p. 829, s. 22
 — or Mennonites, history of, 16th cent. p. 684; 17th cent. p. 857
 Anacletus II. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 7
 Anania, John de, canonist, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Anastasia, a martyr in the 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Anastasius, a presbyter of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 200, s. 6
 — Sinaita, three of this name, p. 224, s. 8
 — emperor, 6th cent. p. 236, s. 5
 — Apocriarius, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 — Monophysite patriarch of Antioch, p. 255, s. 4
 — Syrian, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — Bibliothecarius, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 805, n.
 Anatolius, bishop of Laodicea, 8d cent. p. 98, n.
 Ancestors, worship of in China, p. 720, s. 14
 Ancharanus, Peter, 15th cent. p. 541, n.
 Anchialus, Michael, bishop of Constantinople, 12th cent. p. 397, s. 2
 Anchorites, or Anachorites, p. 148, s. 15
 Andradius, Ja. Paya, p. 517, s. 21
 Andrae, James, p. 653, s. 37
 — John Valentine, p. 792, s. 15
 Andreas, bishop of Samosata, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — bishop in Cappadocia, 5th cent. p. 187, n.
 — bishop of Crete, 7th cent. p. 248, s. 5
 — John, 14th cent. p. 488, s. 5
 — Anthony, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 — de Petra, 15th cent. p. 534, n.
 — Cardinal, a reformer, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Andrew, the apostle, p. 21, n.
 — king of Hungary, 13th cent. p. 433, s. 4
 — English monk, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 Andronicus Camaterus, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22
 Angelomus of Luxeuil, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 Angelus de Clavasio, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Anglerius, Peter Martyr, 16th cent. p. 546, n.
 Anglo-Saxons, converted, 6th cent. p. 213, s. 2; 7th cent. p. 240, s. 2
 Anglus, Thomas, p. 777, s. 51
 Anhalt princes join the Reformed, p. 675, s. 26
 Anna, wife of Wladimir, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 5
 — Comnena, 12th cent. p. 396, n. 7
 Annats, 14th cent. p. 493, s. 6; 15th, p. 533, s. 12
 Annunciation, feast, 6th cent. p. 235, s. 4
 Anomoeans, sect, in the 4th cent. p. 166, s. 16
 Ansegius, historian, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, 11th cent. p. 353, s. 7; p. 373, s. 31 — of Liege, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
 — of Lucca: see pope Alexander II.
 — of Havelburg, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 — of Laon, 12th cent. p. 411, s. 23
 Ansgarius, apostle of Denmark, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 1
 Antherius, bishop of Bethlehem, p. 714, s. 3
 Anthony, monk, Egypt, 4th cent. p. 137, n.; p. 147, s. 13
 — St. order of, 11th cent. p. 371, s. 25
 — of Padua, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — de Balcho, or de Vereellis, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Anthropomorphites, 5th cent. p. 207, s. 20; 10th, cent. p. 343, s. 4
 Antidico-Marianites, sect, 4th cent. p. 172, s. 25
 Antinomians, Lutheran, p. 647, s. 26
 — English, p. 829, s. 123
 Antioch, patriarchate of, p. 128, s. 3; p. 180, s. 2; p. 628, s. 4
 Antiochus, monk of Saba, 7th cent. p. 247, s. 5
 Antipædobaptists, English, p. 696, s. 23
 Antitrinitarians, a. 862, s. 6
 Antonines, emperors, their character, p. 51, s. 1
 Antoninus, Marcus, emperor, p. 51, s. 1; p. 52, s. 4
 — Pius, emperor, 2d cent. p. 51, s. 1
 Antonius Melissa, Greek, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — Andreas, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 38
 — de Butrio, jurist, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — of Florence, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24
 Antony, Paul, p. 801, s. 27
 Aphonius, writer in the 7th cent. p. 250 n.
 Apocrypha, of the New Testament, p. 36, s. 16
 Apollinarian heresy, 4th cent. p. 167, s. 17
 Apollinaris, bishop of Hieropolis, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
 — of Antioch, senior and junior, 4th cent. p. 136, s. 9, n. 5; p. 167, s. 17
 Apollonius, Tyaneus, 1st cent. p. 89, s. 9 — a Greek writer, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
 Apologies of Christians, p. 56, p. 68
 — of Justin Martyr, p. 57, s. 6
 — for the Augsburg Confession, p. 588, s. 3
 Apostles, p. 18, s. 5, n. 3; p. 20; p. 21, s. 6, n. 2; p. 26, s. 15
 — Apostoll, 13th cent. p. 483, s. 14
 — Apostles' Creed, p. 40, s. 4, n. 2; p. 66, s. 1
 — Apostolic canons and constitutions, p. 37, s. 19; p. 103, s. 11
 — fathers, p. 39, s. 20
 — clerks, monks, 14th cent. p. 506, s. 38
 — Apostolic, sect, 12th cent. p. 431, s. 15
 — Apostool, Samuel, p. 859, s. 7
 — Appeals to councils, origin of, p. 561, s. 9
 — Appellants, p. 869, s. 11; see Jansenists
 — Applan, Greek writer, 2d cent. p. 66, n.

- Aquilinus, Bernardine, 15th cent. p. 845, n.
 Arabians, converted in 2d cent. p. 82, s. 3; in 3d cent. p. 86, s. 6; in 5th cent. p. 174, s. 3; and Arabic learning in 9th cent. p. 291, s. 3; in 10th. p. 330, s. 3, p. 332, s. 8; in 11th, p. 351, s. 2, p. 352, s. 4; in 12th, p. 490, s. 9; in 13th, p. 436, s. 10, p. 441, s. 6; in 14th, p. 487, s. 4
 Arabians, writer in 2d cent. p. 66, n.
 Arator, a poet of 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9
 Arcadius, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
 Archbishops, p. 63, s. 3; p. 91, s. 1; p. 123, s. 3
 Archdeacons, Archpresbyters, origin of, p. 131, s. 8
 Archelaus, son of Herod, p. 13, s. 2
 ——— bishop of Carraha, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
 Arcimbold, Jo. Angelus, p. 567, n. 4; p. 583, n. 3
 Ardo, abbot of Aniane, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Arcthas, archbishop in Cappadocia, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 Aretinus, Leonard Brunus, 15th cent. p. 841, n.
 Arevalo, Roderic Sinclus de, 16th cent. p. 543, n.
 Arians, origin of, in 4th cent. p. 160, s. 9. Sects of, p. 166, &c. retire among the Goths, in 5th cent. p. 198, s. 4.—State of, in 6th cent. p. 235, s. 3; in 7th cent. p. 254, s. 2; in 8th cent. p. 284, s. 1; in 10th cent. p. 343, s. 4; in 16th cent. p. 699, s. 3; p. 704, s. 8; in 17th cent. p. 862, s. 6; p. 874, s. 27
 Ario, bishop of Freysingen, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 Arlfastus, nobleman, 11th cent. p. 385, s. 3
 Aristides, apologist, 2d cent. p. 65, n.
 Aristotelian philosophy, p. 11, s. 22; in 2d cent. p. 66, s. 2; in 3d, p. 90, s. 2; in 4th, p. 126, s. 2; in 5th, p. 178, s. 3; in 6th, p. 219, s. 3; in 7th, p. 245, s. 4; in 8th, p. 265, s. 2; in 9th, p. 291, s. 2; p. 292; s. 7, in 11th, p. 351, s. 2; in 12th, p. 397, s. 2; in 13th, p. 436, s. 2, p. 441, s. 2; in 14th, p. 487, s. 2, p. 489, s. 6; in 15th, p. 526, s. 4; in 16th, p. 563, s. 13; in 17th, p. 732, s. 30; p. 760, s. 30; p. 812, s. 6
 Aristotle, his opinion of God and the soul, p. 11, s. 22
 Arius, p. 131, s. 9; p. 151, s. 21; p. 160, s. 10; his letters, p. 161, s. 11; his death, p. 164, s. 13, n. 2
 Armagh, see of, erected in 5th cent. p. 175, s. 6
 Armand, de Bello Visu, 13th cent. p. 446, s. 43
 Armenians, converted in 4th cent. p. 124, s. 19; 16th cent. p. 632, s. 14; in 17th, p. 784, s. 7
 Arminians, p. 814, s. 8; p. 837, s. 1; p. 872, s. 22
 Arminius, James, p. 815, s. 11; p. 843
 Arnold, of Polcieters, 12th cent. p. 420, s. 11
 ——— William, inquisitor, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 4
 ——— Cistercian abbot, 13th cent. p. 478, s. 7
 ——— Cesconies, archbishop of Tarragona, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 Arnaud, Anthony, p. 624, s. 36; p. 760, s. 30; p. 78, s. 3
 ——— Jaqueline, p. 773, s. 46
 Arndt, John, p. 642, s. 12; p. 793, n. 795, s. 19; p. 808, s. 39
 Arnobius, senior, 3d cent. p. 97, s. 8
 ——— Junior, 5th cent. p. 189, s. 11
 Arnold of Brescia, 12th cent. p. 427, s. 10
 ——— Carnotensis, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 ——— of Hildesheim, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 ——— of Villa-Nova, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 9
 ——— Godfrey, p. 804, s. 32
 Arnoldists, 12th cent. p. 428, s. 10
 Arno, bishop of Slavonia, 9th cent. p. 287, n.
 Arnulph, bishop of Luxen, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 Arsenius, Autorianus, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43
 Artemon, heretic, 2d cent. p. 82, s. 21, n. 2
 Articles of Torgau, p. 582, s. 28
 ——— of Smalcald, p. 591, s. 9
 ——— Ave, of the Arminians, p. 839, s. 4
 Arts, the seven liberal, what, p. 178, s. 2
 Ascension feast, when instituted, p. 253, n. 7
 Ascetics, p. 69, s. 12; p. 147, ss. 13, 14; p. 143, s. 15, n. 2
 Ascusage, John, 7th cent. trithelist, p. 232, s. 10
 Asseburg, Lady Juliana, p. 805, s. 34
 Asserus, bishop of Sherborne, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 Asterius of Cappadocia, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 ——— of Pontus, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 Astesanus, 14th cent. p. 510, s. 37
 Astrology, 11th cent. p. 352, s. 4; 14th, p. 489, s. 8
 Asylum, right of, in churches, 7th cent. p. 254, n. 1
 Atabec, Zenghi, Tartar viceroi, 12th cent. p. 192, s. 8
 Athanasie, Gothie king, 4th cent. p. 125, s. 24
 Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20; p. 132, s. 9; p. 164, s. 13; n. 2
 ——— Junior, or Celeste, 5th cent. p. 187, n.
 ——— bishop of Antioch, 7th cent. p. 255, s. 5
 Athanasian creed, spurious, p. 132, n. 2
 Atheists, reputed, 13th cent. p. 436, s. 2; in 18th cent. p. 867, s. 6
 Athanasgoras, apologist, 2d cent. p. 56, s. 5; p. 59, s. 6
 Athingians, Paulicians, 9th cent. p. 220, n. 2
 Atonement, universality of, 9th cent. p. 318, s. 24 ——— disputes on, p. 652, s. 35; p. 817, s. 14; p. 836, s. 36
 Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 Atto of Verocelli, 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
 Aubespine, Gabriel, p. 763, s. 32
 Audens, 4th cent. reformer, p. 171, s. 23
 Audentin, writer of 4th cent. p. 146, s. 9
 Audenus, or Dado, archbishop of Rouen, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 3; p. 250, n.
 Augsburg, confession, p. 582, s. 28; p. 586, s. 1; p. 587, s. 2, n. 3; p. 639, s. 7; p. 740, s. 2
 ——— Diets of, p. 568, s. 7; p. 587, s. 2; p. 594, s. 3
 Augustine, bishop of Hippo, 4th cent. p. 139, s. 10, n. 2; p. 144, s. 4; p. 146, s. 9; p. 157, s. 1; p. 159, s. 7; p. 176, s. 2; p. 197, s. 1; p. 198, s. 2; p. 209, s. 23; p. 210, s. 25; p. 211, s. 26; p. 212, s. 27
 ——— much followed, 9th cent. p. 308, s. 10
 ——— monk, apostle of Britain, 5th cent. p. 213, s. 2; 7th cent. p. 240, s. 2
 Augustinian, canons regular, 11th cent. p. 371, s. 29
 ——— hermits, 13th cent. p. 451, s. 22
 Augustinus, Triumphus, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
 ——— Jansenius's book, p. 768, s. 39
 Augustulus, emperor, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 1
 Augustus, emperor, 1st cent. p. 7, s. 1; p. 31, s. 12
 ——— elector of Saxony, p. 653, s. 28
 ——— king of Poland, p. 749, s. 16
 Avitus, bishop of Clermont, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 Aurelian, emperor, 3d cent. p. 89, s. 7
 Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, 4th cent. p. 143, n.
 Aureolus, Peter, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 Auricular confession, established, 13th cent. p. 469, s. 2
 Ausonius, a poet, 4th cent. p. 126, s. 1
 Austrian protestants, p. 740, s. 3
 Autharis, king of Lombards, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 3
 Aubert of Corbey, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 1
 Authpert, Ambrose: see Ambrose
 'Αυτοκέφαλος, independent bishop, p. 128, n. 2; p. 180, s. 3, n. 7
 Auxilius, writer, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 Auxumites, Ethiopians, converted, p. 124, s. 20
 Ave Maria, ordained, 14th cent. p. 517, s. 2
 Aventinus, John, 16th cent. p. 847, n.
 Averroes, of Corduba, 12th cent. p. 526, s. 6
 Avignon, papal residence, in 14th cent. p. 492, s. 4; p. 495, ss. 12, 13
 BABACUS, Nestorian archbishop of Seleucia, 5th cent. p. 203, n.
 Bacon, Roger, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6
 ——— John, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 ——— Francis, Lord Verulain, p. 730, s. 25; p. 737, s. 36
 Bactrians, enlightened, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1
 Bagnollists, Cathari, 12th cent. p. 425, s. 9
 Bahnsen, Benedict, p. 809, n. 2
 Batus, Michael, p. 617, s. 21; p. 625, s. 38
 Bajazet, Turkish sultan, 14th cent. p. 485, s. 1
 Balaziansa, bishop of the Cathari, 12th cent. p. 425, s. 5
 Balderic of Arras, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
 Baldrick, archbishop of Dol, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 Baldus, Ubaldus, 14th cent. p. 448, s. 5
 Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6
 ——— archbishop of Canterbury, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 ——— Latin emperor of Constantinople, 13th cent.
 ——— Frederick, p. 792, s. 15
 Balsamon, Theodore, 12th cent. p. 410, s. 22
 Baluze, Stephen, p. 763, s. 32
 Bancroft, Richard, archbishop, p. 670, s. 18
 Bappenheim, Matthew Mareschalus de, 16th cent. p. 543, n.
 Baptism, in 1st cent. p. 44, s. 8; in 2d, p. 74, s. 13
 ——— in 3d, p. 106, s. 4; in 4th, p. 156, s. 7; in 6th, p. 234, s. 3
 Baptism of heretics, p. 104, s. 13; p. 113, s. 18; p. 169, s. 8
 Baptismal fonts, in 4th cent. p. 156, s. 7
 Baptista Salvis or de Salis, 15th cent. p. 545, n.

- Baptista Trovamala, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
Mantuanus, 16th cent. p. 546, n.
Baptists: see Anabaptists and Memnonites.
 — English, p. 696, s. 22; p. 829, s. 22, n. 2; p. 860, n. 1
 — general, p. 696, s. 23
 — particular, p. 696, s. 22
Baradaeus, Jacobus, 6th cent. p. 207, s. 20; p. 236, s. 6
Barbatus, Andrew, jurist, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
Barberini, cardinal, p. 714, n. 3
Bar-Cochebas, Jewish impostor, 2nd cent. p. 55, s. 11
Bardas, Greek emperor, 9th cent. p. 291, s. 2
Bardesanes, heretic, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
Barefooted monks, Franciscan, p. 615, s. 16
Barlaam, and Barlaamites, 14th cent. p. 517, s. 1; p. 487, n. 2; p. 507, s. 37; p. 516, s. 9; p. 518, s. 2
Barletta, Gabriel, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
Barabas St., 1st cent. p. 39, s. 2
Barnabites, order of, p. 615, s. 17
Baronius, Caesar, p. 616, s. 19; p. 752, s. 19; p. 762, s. 32
Barre, Nicholas, p. 759, s. 27
Barrow, Isaac, p. 737, s. 36
Barabas, 1st cent. p. 20, s. 3
Barsanuphius, of Gaza, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
Barsamus, bishop of Nisibis, 5th cent. p. 233, s. 11
 — Eutychean monk, 5th cent. p. 206, s. 17
Bartholomew, St. preached in Arabia, p. 21, s. 3, n. 2; p. 52
 — of Albizi, 14th cent. p. 513, n. p. 499, s. 21
 — of St. Concordia, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — bishop of Urbino, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — de Glaxvilla, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
Bartholomew's eye, massacre, p. 606, n.
Bartolus, a jurist, 14th cent. p. 488, s. 5
Baschi, Matthew de, p. 614, s. 16
Basil the Great of Cappadocia, 4th cent. p. 132, s. 9
 — of Ancyra, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — of Cilicia, 5th cent. p. 187, n.
 — of Selucia, 5th cent. p. 185, s. 10, n. 2
 — of Thessalonica, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — bishop of Ancyra, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — the Macedonian, Greek emperor, 9th cent. p. 289, s. 4; p. 300, n. 1; p. 317, s. 29
 — Achridenus, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — Monk, founder of the Bogomiles, p. 424, s. 2
 — council of, 15th cent. p. 549, s. 7
Basilides, 2nd cent. his heresy, p. 78, s. 11
 — John, Czar, p. 630, s. 9
 — emperor of Abyssinia, p. 751, s. 17
Basnage, James, p. 764, s. 32
Batavia, church there, p. 723, s. 17
Bathori, Transylvanian, family of, p. 708, s. 13
Bavaria, state of, in 8th cent. p. 260, s. 2
Bayer, Christian, p. 586, s. 1
Bayle, Peter, p. 737, s. 37
Baylonius, Pascal, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
Beaugendre, Anthony, p. 761, s. 31
Beaulieu, Lewis le Blanc de, p. 745, n. 2; p. 818, s. 16
Bebelius, Henry, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
Becan, Martin, p. 741, n. 1
Beckmann, Friedemann, p. 792, s. 15
Becker, Balth. p. 736, s. 35; p. 835, s. 35
Becket, Thomas à, archbishop of Canterbury, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 12
Beda, Venerabilis, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3; p. 275, s. 18, n.
Bedingfield, colonel, p. 723, n. 1
Begging monks: see Mendicants
Boguards, Beguine and Begutte, 13th cent. p. 387, s. 3; p. 459, s. 39; p. 461, s. 40; p. 462, s. 41; p. 480, s. 9; 14th cent. p. 494, s. 9; p. 500, s. 22, &c.; p. 504, s. 31; p. 605, s. 33, &c.; p. 518, s. 3; in 15th cent. p. 536, s. 20, &c.; p. 545, s. 7; p. 552, s. 2
Behm, John and Michael, p. 799, s. 24
Believers and catechumens, p. 33, s. 7
Bellarmin, Robert, p. 622, s. 29; p. 762, s. 32
Bellator, writer in 6th cent. p. 230, s. 3
Belna, John de, 14th cent. p. 502, s. 27
Bembo, Cardinal, p. 603, s. 5
Bona, Amalric de, 13th cent. p. 482, s. 12
Benedict, St. of Nursia, 6th cent. p. 221, s. 6; p. 226, s. 9
 — bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 — of Aiane, reformer of monasteries, 9th cent. p. 297, s. 11; p. 304, n.
 — III. pope, 9th cent. p. 294, s. 4; p. 305, n.
 — IV. pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
Benedict, V. pope, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 5
 — VI. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 6
 — VII. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 6
 — VIII. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 — IX. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 — X. pope, 11th cent. p. 357, s. 5
 — XI. pope, 14th cent. p. 492, s. 4
 — XII. pope, 14th cent. p. 494, s. 10; p. 512, n.
 — XIII. pope, 14th cent. p. 496, s. 16; p. 527, s. 2
 — XIV. pope, p. 868, s. 7
Benedictine monks, p. 222; s. 6; their rule, p. 221, s. 6, n. 4
Benetus, Cyprian, 16th cent. p. 547, n.
Benin, Catholic Mission to, p. 724, s. 18
Bennet, Gervas, p. 845, s. 1
Benno, cardinal, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
Benra, Nicolaus de, archbishop of Peking, 14th cent. p. 484, s. 2
Berengarius of Tours, and his controversy, 11th cent. p. 376, s. 6; p. 380, s. 13, &c.
Bereogous of Treves, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
Berne, Canton, p. 665, s. 13; p. 874, s. 26
Bernard Delitost, 14th cent. p. 501, s. 24
 — Guido, inquisitor, 14th cent. p. 611, n.
 — or Bernhard, St. 12th cent. p. 392, s. 9; p. 407, s. 16; p. 410, s. 23; p. 418, s. 6; p. 420, s. 10; p. 423, s. 19; p. 431, s. 15
Bernardines of La Trappe, p. 758, s. 26
 — monks, 12th cent. p. 407, s. 16
Berno, abbot and writer, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
Bernoulli, James and John, p. 731, s. 26
Bertha, patroness of Augustine, 7th cent. p. 213, s. 2
Bertharius, a poet, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 303, s. 14
Berthold of Constance, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
 — bishop of Livonia, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 4
 — of Calabria, founder of the Carmelites, 12th cent. p. 408, s. 21
Bertius, Peter, p. 749, s. 16
Bertram: see Ratramn
Bertrand de Turro, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
Berulle, John or Peter de, p. 758, s. 27
Beryllus of Rostra, 3d cent. p. 111, s. 14
Besold, Christopher, p. 780, s. 16
Bessarion, cardinal, 15th cent. p. 526, s. 5; p. 531, s. 14; p. 538, s. 23
Bethlehemites, order of, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 19
Beton, cardinal, p. 668, n. 1
Beza, Theodore, p. 663, s. 11
Bezpopofschins, Russian sect, p. 782, n. 6
Bibliauer, Theodore, p. 683, s. 44
Biblical divines, 13th cent. p. 471, s. 7; 14th, p. 514, s. 4
 — colleges at Halle, p. 790, s. 11
Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum, p. 709, n. 1
Biddle, John, p. 862, n. 1
Biel, Gabriel, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24
Biographies of saints, 9th cent. p. 307, s. 5
Bishops, origin and history of, in 1st cent. p. 33, s. 8, in 2d, p. 63; in 3d, p. 91; in 4th, p. 127, s. 1; in 5th, p. 179, s. 1; in 6th, p. 217, s. 2; in 7th, p. 246, s. 3; in 8th, p. 266, s. 4; p. 267, s. 1; in 9th, p. 294, s. 2; in 10th, p. 335, s. 9; 12th, p. 417, s. 3; see Clergy.
 — in Great Britain, p. 180, n. 7 — catholic, p. 561, s. 10; p. 584, s. 32; p. 613, s. 14; p. 670, s. 19; p. 756, s. 23
 — English, p. 176
 — Scottish, p. 823, n.
Bizoehi, who, 13th cent. p. 460, s. 40
Blackio, Thomas, p. 777, s. 51
Blanc, Lewis de: see Beaulieu
Blandrata, George, p. 708, s. 13
Blastares, Matthew, p. 507, s. 37
Blesdyck, Nicholas, p. 697, s. 24
Blondell, David, p. 817, s. 14
Blondus, Flavius, historian, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
Blood of Christ, whether divine, 15th cent. p. 551, s. 14
Bloody statue of Henry VIII, p. 592, n. 3
Blount, Charles, p. 728, s. 22
Blum, Henry Julius, p. 750, s. 16
Boamund, a crusader, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6
Bobbio, monastery established 6th cent. p. 221, n. 3
Bobolenus, monk and writer, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
Bockholt, or Bockold, John, p. 591, s. 10; p. 688, s. 7
Bodin, John, p. 693, s. 5
Body of Christ, origin of, p. 694, s. 18; ubiquity of, see Ubiquity

Boetius, John George, p. 806, s. 35
Boëthius, a Christian philosopher, 6th cent. p. 228, s. 9; p. 218, s. 3
Boetius, Henry, p. 807, s. 38
Bogermann, John, p. 842, s. 7
Bogomiles, a sect, 12th cent. p. 424, s. 2
Bogoris, king of Bulgaria, 9th cent. p. 288, n. 4
Bogemla, reformation in, p. 885, s. 34; p. 673, &c.
Bohemians, converted, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 3 brethren, p. 673, s. 24
Bohemian war, 15th cent. p. 740, s. 3
Böhme, Jacob, p. 733, s. 30; p. 808, s. 40
Boisneburg, John Christian von, p. 749, s. 16
Boleslaus of Bohemia, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 4
 king of Poland, 11th cent. p. 345, s. 2
Bolland, John, a Jesuit, p. 763, s. 32
Bologna, university, when founded, p. 397, s. 3
Bolsec, Jerome, p. 682, s. 41
Bona, John, cardinal, p. 763, s. 32
Bonacarsus of Milan, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
Bonagratia of Bergamo, 14th cent. p. 502, s. 29; p. 503, s. 30
Bonaventura, general of the Franciscans, 13th cent. p. 465, s. 44
 — Brocardus, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — Baduarius, 14th cent. p. 613, n.
Bonfinius, Antonius, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
Bonfrere, James, a Jesuit, p. 763, s. 32
Beniface
 I. bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 II. — 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 III. — 7th cent. p. 245, s. 1
 IV. — 7th cent. p. 249, n.
 V. — 7th cent. p. 249, n.
 VII. antipope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 6
 VIII. pope, 13th cent. p. 444, s. 3; p. 449, s. 17; p. 469, n.; p. 474, s. 3; p. 491, s. 2; p. 493, s. 7
 IX. pope, p. 527, s. 2
 — (Winifred), apostle of Germany, 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3 and s. 4
Boni Homines or Bos Homos, Paulicians, p. 385, s. 2
Bonosus, heretic, 4th cent. p. 172, n. 1
Bons Valets or Garyons, Boghards, 13th cent. p. 462, s. 42
Borromeo, Charles, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
Boetius, Donatus, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
Bossuet, James Benigne, p. 745, s. 12; p. 746, s. 13; p. 749, s. 15; p. 764, s. 32; p. 775, n. 3; p. 776, s. 50
Bostra, council at, p. 111, s. 14
Boulainvilliers, count, p. 730, s. 24
Bourbon, Anne Geneviève de, p. 771, s. 44
Bourignon de la Porte, Antoinette, p. 864, s. 4
Bousardus, Gaufrid, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
Bouwenson, Leonard, Mennonite, p. 691, s. 10
Boyle, Robert, p. 723, n. 1; p. 726, s. 21; p. 731, s. 26; p. 737, s. 36
Boyle lectures, p. 726, s. 21
Bradwardine, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, 14th cent. p. 448, s. 5
Brahe, Ticho, p. 731, s. 26
Brahmins, p. 715, s. 7
Brandenburg, a bishopric in 10th cent. p. 327, s. 9; embraced reformed doctrines, p. 785, s. 2; received Socinians, p. 862, s. 5
Brandollinus, 15th cent. p. 542, n.
Braulio, bishop of Saragossa, 7th cent. p. 215, s. 3; p. 250, n.
Breckling, Frederick, p. 809, s. 43
Bredenbug: see Breitenburg
Breitenburg, John and Paul, p. 863, s. 2
Bremen joins the reformed, p. 665, s. 14
Brendel, George Christopher, p. 870, s. 16
Brentius, John, p. 657, s. 46
Brethren of the Free Spirit, sect, 11th cent. p. 387, s. 3; 13th cent. p. 480, s. 9; 15th cent. p. 552, s. 2
 — of the Holy Trinity, monks, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 20
 — of the Sack, monks, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 19
 — of Alexius, monks, 14th cent. p. 506, s. 36
 — of the community, laxer Franciscans, 14th cent. p. 500, s. 24 — of the observation, stricter Franciscans, 14th cent. p. 505, s. 34
 — the white, sect, 15th cent. p. 553, s. 3
Brigitta, St. a visionary, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
Britain, reformation in, p. 586, s. 34; p. 591, s. 11; p. 596, s. 9; see England, Scotland

Britons, state of, in first two centuries, p. 31, s. 13; p. 52, s. 4, n. 4; in 8d, p. 87, s. 7; in 5th, p. 176, s. 8; in 6th, p. 213, s. 2; in 7th, p. 244, s. 2; p. 252, s. 5; in 8th, p. 266, s. 3; in 13th, p. 445, s. 8
Brocardus, Bonaventura, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
Bromley, Thomas, p. 865, n. 3
Brown, George, archbishop of Dublin, p. 598, s. 11
 — Robert, p. 672, s. 21; p. 824, s. 21
Brownists, p. 672, s. 21; p. 823, s. 51
Brullifer, Stephen, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24
Bruno or Boniface, missionary, 11th cent. p. 345, s. 2
 — Leonard, 15th cent. p. 526, s. 4
 — abbot of Monte Cassino, 11th cent. p. 373, s. 31
 — bishop of Würzburg, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
Bruno, founder of Carthusians, 11th cent. p. 370, s. 27; p. 373, s. 31
 — Jordano, p. 603, s. 5
Bucer, Martin, p. 660, s. 5
Budicani, a Socinian sect, p. 711, s. 22
Budiculus, Simon, a Socinian, p. 711, s. 22
Bugenagius, John, p. 583, s. 31
Bulgaranus, count, 7th cent. p. 249, n.
Bulgarians converted, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 3; became Paulicians, p. 321, s. 4; see Paulicians
Bull against Jansenius, p. 770, s. 48 — against Luther, p. 572, s. 12
 — Unigenitus, p. 868, s. 8
Bullinger, Henry, p. 680, s. 35
Bulodes, Hungarian proselyte, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
Buraburg, a bishopric, 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3
Burch, John, reforms monasteries, 15th cent. p. 535, n. 5
Burchard of Würzburg, 8th cent. p. 261, n. 2
 — bishop of Worms, 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
Burgo, Aug. Gibbon de, p. 746, s. 13
Burgundians converted, 5th cent. p. 174, s. 4
Burgundy, James of, p. 682, s. 41
Buridan, John, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 7
Burlensis, Bostonus, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
Burley, Walter, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 6; p. 509, n. 9
Burri or Borrius, Jos. Fran. p. 777, s. 51
Buscher, Statius, p. 796, s. 21
Bustia, Bernardine de, p. 545, n.
CÆCILIAN, bishop of Carthage, 4th cent. p. 157, s. 2
Cesar Borgia, son of Alexander VI. p. 535, s. 18
Cæsarius Julian, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
Cæsarius of Constantinople, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — of Arles, 6th cent. p. 225, s. 9; p. 245, s. 2
 — a monk, 13th cent. p. 455, s. 31; p. 467, n.
Cæsenas, Michael, Franciscan general, 14th cent. p. 503, s. 30
Cajanus or Galanus, bishop of Alexandria, in 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8
Cajetan, Thomas, cardinal, p. 568, s. 6
Cainites, sect, in 2d cent. p. 81, s. 18
Caius, presbyter, Rome, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
Calixtines of Bohemia, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 5 — controversies, p. 796, &c.
Calixtus, I. pope, 12th cent. p. 402, s. 5; p. 413, n.
 II. antipope, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 11
 III. pope, 15th cent. p. 534, s. 16
 — George, p. 747, s. 14; p. 783, s. 17; p. 792, s. 15; p. 794, s. 18; p. 795, s. 19; p. 796, s. 21
 — Frederick Ulric, p. 793, n.
Callistus, bishop of Constantinople, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
Calo of Poitiers, 12th cent. p. 420, s. 11
Calovius, Abraham, p. 792, s. 15; p. 793, n. p. 794, s. 17; p. 796, s. 21; p. 797, s. 32
Calumnies against the Christians, p. 24, s. 8; p. 53, s. 7; p. 56, s. 4; p. 115, s. 3
Calvin, John, p. 658, s. 36, &c.; p. 660, s. 6; p. 661, s. 7; p. 663, s. 11; p. 664, s. 12; p. 665, ss. 13, 14; p. 666, s. 16; p. 679, s. 34, &c.; p. 680, ss. 35, 36, &c.; p. 700, s. 4
Camaldulensians, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24
Camadull, Ambrose de, 15th cent. p. 539, s. 24
Camaterus, Andronicus, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22
 — John, bishop of Constantinople, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
Cambalu or Peking, an archbishopric, 14th cent. p. 484, s. 2
Camerarius, Joachim, p. 641, s. 9
Cameron, John, p. 817, s. 14
Campanella, Thomas, p. 604, s. 8
Campanus, John, p. 700, s. 3
Campegius, Laurentius, p. 576, s. 19

M m m

- Canales, John, monk, 15th cent. p. 544. n.
 Candidus, Greek writer, 2nd cent. p. 66, n.
 ——— Arian writer, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 ——— historian, 5th cent. p. 187, n.
 Candlemas, feast, 6th cent. p. 235, s. 4.
 Canon of the N. Testament, when settled, p. 36, s. 16
 ——— of the Mass, what, p. 234, n. 1
 ——— law, p. 328, s. 6; p. 443, s. 10; p. 488, s. 5
 Canons, of the Apostles: see Apostolic canons ——— of Nice, p. 130, n. 1; p. 163, n. 1
 ——— of Sardica, 130, n. 3
 ——— of Chalcedon, p. 179, s. 1
 ——— order of, in 8th cent. p. 272, s. 14; in 9th, p.
 298, s. 12; 11th, p. 371, s. 29; 12th, p. 407, s. 18
 ——— regular, p. 614, s. 15; some orders abolished,
 p. 756, n. 4
 Canonization, in 9th cent. p. 306, s. 4; 10th, p. 340, s. 4;
 12th, p. 405, s. 13; 17th, p. 778, s. 52
 Cantacuzenus, John, Greek emperor, 14th cent. p. 484,
 s. 1; p. 508, s. 37
 Cantor, Agidius, 15th cent. p. 555, s. 3
 Canus, Melchior, p. 617, s. 21
 Canute, John, Danish bishop, p. 811, s. 1
 Capgrave, John, 15th cent. p. 514, n.
 Capistranus, John, 15th cent. p. 540, s. 24
 Capnio, (Reuchlin) John, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 3
 Cappel, Lewis, p. 818, s. 15
 Caprocius, bishop of Carthage, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 ——— John, 15th cent. p. 512, s. 24
 Capuchins, monks, p. 618, s. 16; p. 724, s. 18
 Caputli, sect, 12th cent. p. 431, s. 15
 Caracalla, emperor, 3rd cent. p. 85, s. 2
 Caraculius, Robert, 15th cent. p. 445, n.
 Caranza, Bartholomew, p. 617, s. 21
 Carbas, leader of the Paulicians, 9th cent. p. 321,
 s. 4
 Cardanus, Jerome, p. 604, s. 8
 Cardinals, p. 358, s. 7, n. 1; p. 405, s. 13; p. 532, s. 12;
 p. 606, ss. 1, 2
 Carinthia, 8th and 9th century, p. 287, n. 1
 Cario, John, p. 640, s. 9
 Carit, enlightened, 10th cent. p. 324, s. 1
 Carlerius, Agidius, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Carloman, 8th cent. p. 257, s. 1
 ——— King of Italy, 9th cent. p. 296, s. 6
 Carlstadt, Andrew, p. 569, s. 9; p. 574, s. 17
 Carmelites, 12th cent. p. 408, s. 21; p. 451, s. 22
 Carnatic, mission to, p. 716, n. 3
 Carpoerates, a Gnostic, 2nd cent. p. 79, s. 14
 Carpozov, John Benedict, p. 793, n.
 Carrès, René Des, p. 731, s. 26; p. 734, ss. 31, 32; p.
 760, s. 11; p. 832, s. 29; p. 833, s. 30
 Cartesian philosophy, p. 729, s. 24, &c.
 Carthusians, monks, 11th cent. p. 370, s. 27
 Cases of conscience, treated of, 14th cent. p. 513, s. 7
 Cashgar, enlightened, 11th cent. p. 345, s. 1
 Cassander, George, p. 617, s. 21
 Cassianus, John, 5th cent. p. 187, s. 11; p. 211, s. 26
 Cassiodorus Senator, 6th cent. p. 228, s. 9; p. 230, s. 3
 Castalio, Sebastian, p. 682, s. 40
 Castor, Agrippa, 2nd cent. p. 65, n.
 Casuists, Romish, p. 765, s. 34
 Catechism, Luther's, p. 637, s. 2
 ——— the Heidelberg, p. 665, s. 14
 Catechumens, p. 33, s. 7; p. 40, s. 6; p. 156, s. 8
 Catene Patrum, what, p. 230, s. 4; in 9th cent. p. 308,
 s. 8
 Cathal, enlightened, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1; 12th, p. 391,
 s. 7
 Cathari, sect in 3rd cent. p. 113, s. 18; 11th, p. 385, s. 2;
 12th, p. 425, s. 4; 13th, p. 475, s. 2; 14th, p. 518,
 s. 3; 15th, p. 553, s. 1
 Catharinus, Ambrose, p. 617, s. 11
 Catharine of Sens, 14th cent. p. 495, s. 13
 Catharina, St. 14th cent. p. 495, s. 13; p. 513, n.
 ——— Bononiensis, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Cathedrals, English, disliked, p. 670, s. 19
 Cathedral and monastic schools, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 4; 9th, p. 292, s. 4; 10th, p. 330, s. 4; 11th, p. 332,
 s. 3; 12th, p. 397, s. 3
 Catholic church, state of, before Luther, p. 558, &c.
 ——— in 16th cent. p. 605, &c.; in 17th cent. p.
 738, &c.
 Cattenburg, Andrew Van, p. 843, s. 9
 Caussin, Nicholas, p. 702, s. 32
 Cecus Asculanus, 14th cent. p. 490, s. 8
 Cedrenus, George, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2
 Celibacy of the clergy, in 3rd cent. p. 93, s. 6; 4th, p.
 163, s. 12; 9th, p. 293, s. 1, n. 7; 11th, p. 362, s. 12;
 p. 561, s. 10; p. 614, s. 15; p. 619, n. 2; p. 746, n. 8
 Cellani, Peter, inquisitor, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 3
 Cellites, monks, 14th cent. p. 506, s. 36
 Cellot, Lewis, p. 762, s. 32
 Celsus, opposed Christianity, 3d cent. p. 57, s. 8
 Cets, their state in 1st cent. p. 31, s. 13
 Ceno, Charles le, p. 819, s. 18
 Century, I. External Hist. p. 7; Internal, p. 28
 ——— II. ——— p. 51; ——— p. 58
 ——— III. ——— p. 85; ——— p. 90
 ——— IV. ——— p. 114; ——— p. 126
 ——— V. ——— p. 173; ——— p. 177
 ——— VI. ——— p. 213; ——— p. 217
 ——— VII. ——— p. 239; ——— p. 244
 ——— VIII. ——— p. 260; ——— p. 265
 ——— IX. ——— p. 287; ——— p. 291
 ——— X. ——— p. 324; ——— p. 329
 ——— XI. ——— p. 345; ——— p. 351
 ——— XII. ——— p. 389; ——— p. 396
 ——— XIII. ——— p. 432; ——— p. 438
 ——— XIV. ——— p. 484; ——— p. 486
 ——— XV. ——— p. 523; ——— p. 524
 Centuriators, the Magdeburg, p. 616, n. 4
 Ceolfrid, English monk, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 Cerdo, heretic, 2nd cent. p. 77, s. 7
 Ceremonies and rites, history of, in 1st cent. p. 42, 43, 44; in 2nd, p. 71; in 3rd, p. 105; in 4th, p. 153; in 5th, p. 196; in 6th, p. 234; in 7th, p. 253; in 8th, p.
 284; in 9th, p. 318; in 10th, p. 341; in 11th, p. 383; in 12th, p. 423; in 13th, p. 474; in 14th, p. 516; in 15th, p. 552; popish, p. 563, s. 16; English episcopal,
 p. 595, s. 9; p. 670, s. 19; p. 671, s. 20; p. 821, s. 20;
 p. 830, s. 24
 Cerinthus, heretic, 1st cent. p. 47, s. 9; p. 49, s. 16
 Cerularius, Michael, bishop of Constantinople, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30
 Ceylon, Dutch missions to, p. 723, s. 17
 Chalcedon, councils of, 5th cent. p. 179, s. 4; p. 180,
 s. 2; p. 205, s. 15
 Chalcidius, philosopher, in 5th cent. p. 123, s. 18; p.
 216, s. 2
 Chaldaic Christians, p. 203, n. 1: see Nestorians
 Cham-Hi, emperor of China, p. 718, s. 10
 Chamsi, or Solares, oriental sect, p. 635, s. 19
 Chancery, papal, regulated, p. 492, s. 6; p. 533, s. 12
 Chapters, the three, what, p. 232, s. 10
 Charenton, decrees of, p. 787, s. 4
 Charitable conference in Poland, p. 745, s. 12
 Charlemagne, emperor, 8th cent. p. 263, s. 3; p. 265,
 s. 2; p. 266, s. 4; p. 267, s. 1; p. 270, s. 9; p. 271, s.
 11, n. 2; p. 274, s. 18; p. 278, ss. 13, 14; p. 283, s.
 14; p. 286, s. 3; p. 287, s. 1; p. 290, s. 3; p. 308, s.
 8; p. 316, n. 3
 Charles Martel, 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3; p. 265, s. 2
 ——— the Bald, emperor, 9th cent. p. 290, s. 3; p.
 292, s. 4; p. 294, s. 3; p. 295, s. 6; p. 302, s. 14; p.
 309, s. 12; p. 312, s. 19; p. 314, s. 23
 ——— the Fat, king of France, 9th cent. p. 290, s. 3;
 p. 295, s. 6
 ——— the Simple, king of France, 10th cent. p. 325,
 s. 3
 ——— IV. German emperor, 14th cent. p. 495, s. 11
 ——— V. emperor, p. 573, s. 15, &c.; p. 579, s. 22.
 p. 586, s. 1, &c.; p. 590, s. 7; p. 592, s. 11; p. 594, s.
 3, &c.; p. 595, s. 6
 ——— I. of England, p. 744, s. 10; p. 821, s. 20
 ——— II. of England, p. 744, s. 10; p. 826, n.
 Charron, Peter, p. 603, s. 5
 Chaste Brethren and Sisters, or Apostolic, 12th cent.
 p. 431, s. 15
 Chempnitz, Martin, p. 616, s. 19; p. 640, s. 9; p. 654, s. 39
 Cherbury, Edward Herbert of, p. 728, s. 23
 Chiercy, council of, 9th cent. p. 314, s. 22
 Childeric, king of France, 8th cent. p. 269, s. 7
 Chiericato, Francis, papal legate, 16th cent. p. 575,
 s. 18
 Chiliasts, Millenarians, p. 103, n. 5
 Chillingworth, William, p. 830, s. 24
 China, enlightened by Nestorians, 7th cent. p. 239, s. 1;
 Christians there in 8th, p. 260, s. 2; in 12th, p.
 438, s. 1; in 14th, p. 484, s. 2; in 15th, p. 524, s. 1; missions to, p. 602, s. 3; p. 717, s. 9; p. 866, s. 3
 Chorepiscopi, p. 25, s. 13
 Chorooses, king of Persia, 6th cent. p. 217, s. 2; p. 218,
 s. 5

- Christ, the history of, p. 17, s. 2; revered by Pagans, p. 18, s. 7; compared with philosophers, p. 89, s. 9; disputes concerning his body in 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8; how both the offerer and the offering, p. 422, s. 15
Christian era, p. 17, n. 4; called the Dionysian era, p. 226, n. 5
Christian, II. king of Denmark, p. 583, s. 30
 III. king of Denmark, p. 583, s. 31
 VI. king of Denmark, p. 867, s. 4
 William of Brandenburg, p. 749, s. 16
Christianity, its nature, p. 39; causes and history of its progress in the 1st cent. p. 19; in 2d, p. 51; in 3d, p. 85; in 4th, p. 114; in 5th, p. 173; in 6th, p. 213, in 7th, p. 239; in 8th, p. 260; in 9th, p. 287; in 10th, p. 324; in 11th, p. 345; in 12th, p. 389; in 13th, p. 432; in 14th, p. 484; in 15th, p. 522
Christians, their character in the early ages, pp. 20, 41, 47, 61, 92, 124, 194, 213
Christina, queen of Sweden, p. 742, s. 6; p. 749, s. 16
Christmas, origin in 4th cent. p. 155, s. 6
Chrysostom, pope, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 2
Chrobates, or Croatiens converted, 7th cent. p. 239, n. 3
Chrodegang, bishop of Metz, 8th cent. p. 272, s. 14; p. 298, s. 12
Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
Chronicon Alexandrinum, p. 248, n. 3
Chrysolaras, Manuel, 14th cent. p. 486, s. 1
Chrysostom, John, of Constantinople, p. 130, s. 7; p. 133, s. 9, n. 3; p. 195, s. 15
Chubb, John, delst. p. 867, s. 5
Church, its organization and government, 1st cent. p. 33; 2d, p. 62; 3d, p. 92; 4th, p. 127; 5th, p. 179; 6th, p. 219; 7th, p. 245; 8th, p. 267; 9th, p. 293; 10th, p. 332; 11th, p. 355; 12th, p. 400; 13th, p. 443; 14th, p. 490; 15th, p. 527
Church government, Armenian, p. 632, s. 14
 Calvinistic baptist, p. 696, s. 22
 Dutch reformed, p. 676, s. 20
 English episcopal, p. 669, &c. n.; p. 831, s. 26
 French protestant, p. 665, s. 15
 Georgian, p. 630, s. 10
 Greek, p. 627
 Independent, p. 672, s. 21
 Lutheran, p. 638, s. 4; p. 792, s. 14; p. 870, s. 15
 Mennonite, p. 858, s. 4
 Monophysite or Jacobite, p. 631, s. 11
 Nestorian, p. 633, s. 15
 Presbyterian, p. 664, s. 12; p. 832, s. 27; p. 825, s. 22; n.
 Quaker, p. 852, s. 12; p. 853
 Romish, p. 558, &c. p. 605, &c. p. 752, &c.
 Russian, p. 630, s. 9; p. 782, s. 5
 Schwenckfeldian, p. 646, s. 24
 Scotch, p. 825, n. p. 668, n.
 Swiss, p. 662, s. 10
Churches (buildings), history of, p. 43, s. 5; p. 73, s. 8; p. 105, s. 2; p. 154, s. 2; p. 234, s. 4; p. 254, s. 2; p. 384, s. 3
Chytraeus, David, p. 640, s. 9
Cimbrians, heard the gospel in 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3
Circumcelliones, sect in 4th cent. p. 158, s. 5; n. 4
Circumcised, the Passagini, 12th cent. p. 430, s. 14
Cirta, plate &c. belonging to the church of, p. 105, n.
Cisterciens, monks, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 25; 12th, p. 407, s. 17
Civil law, p. 398, s. 6; p. 443, s. 10
Clarendon, constitutions of, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 12
Clariss, Isidorus, p. 620, s. 26
Clarke, Samuel, p. 874, s. 27
Claude, John, p. 745, s. 12; p. 781, s. 3
Claudius, emperor, 3d cent. p. 88, s. 7 of Turin, 9th cent. p. 301, s. 14
 an Arian, p. 700, s. 3
 Mamertus, poet, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
Clausenbourg, seat of Socinians, p. 712, s. 23
Clemangia, Nicolaus de, 15th cent. p. 540, s. 24
Clemens Romanus, 1st cent. p. 37, s. 18
 Alexandrinus, 2d cent. p. 59, s. 6; p. 64, s. 5
Clement, a Scot, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3; p. 285, s. 2
 II. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 III. antipope, 11th cent. p. 366, s. 18
 III. pope, 12th cent. p. 406, s. 14; p. 413, n.
 IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 447, s. 12; p. 468, n.
 V. pope, 14th cent. p. 442, s. 16; p. 474, s. 2; p. 492, s. 4; p. 510, n.; p. 519, s. 6; p. 520, s. 9
 VI. pope, 14th cent. p. 494, s. 11
Clement, VII. pope, 14th cent. p. 455, s. 14
 VIII. pope, p. 529, s. 4
 IX. pope, p. 739, s. 1
 X. pope, p. 739, s. 1
 XI. pope, p. 739, s. 1
 XII. pope, p. 868, s. 7
Clementina, spurious, p. 37, s. 19
Clerc, John le, p. 843, s. 30
Clergy, character and state of, in 1st cent. p. 33; in 2d, p. 63; in 3d, p. 92; in 4th, p. 127; in 5th, p. 182; in 6th, p. 220; in 7th, p. 246; in 8th, p. 267; in 9th, p. 293; in 10th, p. 332; in 11th, p. 355; in 12th, p. 400, 406; in 13th, p. 443; in 14th, p. 490; in 15th, p. 527; popish, p. 561, p. 609, p. 756; Lutheran, 17th cent. p. 791, p. 799
Clerks, apostolical: see Jesuats regular, new orders, p. 615, s. 17
 Theatins, p. 615, s. 17 of St. Paul, or Barnabites, p. 615, s. 17 of St. Majoll or of Somasqu, p. 615, s. 17 of common life, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 22
Cloisters, subjected to the pope, in 11th cent. p. 368, s. 21
Clodis, king of the Salii, converted, 5th cent. p. 174, s. 5
Cluniacensians, monks, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 10; 11th, p. 368, s. 23; 12th, p. 406, s. 15
Coblar, Tartar emperor, 13th cent. p. 432, s. 2
Cocceius, John, p. 813, s. 7; p. 832, s. 29
Cochiu China, missions to, p. 716, s.
Cochleus, John, p. 017, s. 21
Codde, Peter, p. 772, s. 44
Codinus, George, 15th cent. p. 538, s. 23
Coletine, bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 6, n. 3; p. 189, n.
 II. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 8; p. 413, n.
 III. pope, 12th cent. p. 406, s. 14; p. 413, n.
 V. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 16
 Eremites, 13th cent. p. 458, s. 28
Cœlestines, order of, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 16
Cœlestius, the Polagian, 5th cent. p. 208, s. 23
Cœnolobus, what, p. 149, s. 15; p. 369, s. 24
Cogitoux, an Irish monk, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
Cointe, Charles le, p. 762, s. 31
Colerouchan, Tartar king, p. 391, s. 7
Colchians, state of, p. 630, s. 10
Collatius, Peter Apollonius, 15th cent. p. 516, n.
Collegia pietatis, p. 799, s. 26
Collegiants, sect, p. 862, s. 5
College de Propaganda, p. 713, s. 4
Collins, Anthony, p. 867, s. 5
Collyridians, sect in 4th cent. p. 172, s. 25
Cologne, heretics there, 14th cent. p. 518, s. 4
Columba, monk of Iona, 6th cent. p. 214, n. 1
Columbanus, an Irish monk and missionary in 6th cent. p. 214, s. 2; p. 221, s. 5; p. 227, s. 9; p. 240, s. 3
Combat, judicial, 9th cent. p. 319, s. 3; 11th cent. p. 383, s. 1
Combe, Francis de la, p. 776, s. 49
Combesis, Francis, p. 762, s. 32
Comforted, the more perfect Cathari, p. 426, s. 6
Commentators, the principal in 2d cent. p. 67, s. 4; in 3d, p. 100, s. 5; in 4th, p. 144, s. 4; in 5th, p. 191, s. 3; in 6th, p. 230, s. 3; in 7th, p. 251, s. 2: see Theology exegetic.
Commodianus, a poet, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
Commodus, emperor, 2d cent. p. 51, s. 1; p. 57, s. 7
Community of goods in primitive church, p. 20, s. 5
Communa, Anna, Greek historian, 12th cent. p. 396, n. 7
Conclave, Romish, p. 606, s. 1
Concordat, the German, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 6
 the French, 15th cent. p. 560, s. 7
Concubinage of the clergy, in 3d cent. p. 93, s. 6; in the 10th, p. 336, s. 10; in the 11th, p. 362, s. 12
Confederated, the lower class of Cathari, p. 426, s. 6
Conferences, Hampton court, p. 820, s. 19 with popists at Ratisbon, Newburg, Rheinfels, and Thorn, p. 745, s. 12
 Lutheran and Reformed, at Leipsic, p. 787, s. 796, n.
Confessions, private to priests, 5th cent. p. 107, s. 3; 13th, p. 469, s. 2 of faith, Armenian, p. 838, s. 2
 the Augsburg: see Augsburg
 Belgic, p. 672, s. 22
 English, xxxix articles, p. 896, s. 9; n. 2; p. 826, n.
 General baptist, p. 687, s. 23

- Confessions, of Greek church, p. 628, s. 6 of Independents, Savoy, p. 822, s. 21 of Lutheran church, p. 637, s. 2
 Mennonite, p. 691, s. 11
 Particular baptist, p. 696, s. 22
 Presbyterian, Westminster, p. 826, n.
 Quaker, p. 852, s. 11
 Tetrapolitan, p. 588, n.
 of Zwingli, p. 588, n.
Confessors, who, p. 24, s. 19
 Confirmation, rite of, p. 44, s. 8; p. 106, s. 4
 Conformists, English, p. 669, s. 17
 Conformities with Christ, in St. Francis, p. 499, s. 21
 Confucius, worship of, p. 720, s. 14; p. 866, s. 3
 Congal, Irish monk, 6th cent. p. 221, n. 2
 Congo, king of, converted, 15th cent. p. 522, s. 2
 Congregationalists, p. 822, s. 21: see Independents Congregations, at Rome, p. 606, s. 2 of Propaganda, p. 713, s. 1 of priests for foreign missions, p. 714, s. 3 of the holy sepulchre, p. 714, s. 3 on the council of Trent, p. 618, s. 22 de Auxillis gratie, p. 626, s. 41; p. 767, s. 37
Conon, of Tarsus, his sect, 6th cent. p. 238, s. 10; p. 248, n.
Conrad III. German emperor, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 9 duke of Masovia, 13th cent. p. 435, s. 9 of Lichtenau, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5 of Marburg, inquisitor, 13th cent. p. 467 n.; p. 478, s. 6
Conscience, cases of, treated, 14th cent. p. 515, s. 7
 Consecration of churches, 2d cent. p. 72, s. 3; 3d, p. 105, s. 2; 4th, p. 154, s. 2
 Consociation of churches, p. 35, s. 14
 Consensus repetitus, Lutheran, p. 797, s. 22 of Sendomir, p. 673, s. 23
 Constance, council of, 16th cent. p. 528, s. 3
 Constans I. emperor, 4th cent. p. 119, s. 1; p. 159, s. 6
 II. emperor, 7th cent. p. 257, s. 8
 Constantine I. or the Great, p. 116, s. 5; gives liberty to Christians, p. 116, s. 6; his conversion, p. 116, s. 7; abolishes Paganism, p. 117, s. 7; sees a luminous cross, p. 118, s. 9; his regulations for the church, p. 119, s. 10; p. 127; his letter to Arius and Alexander, p. 161, s. 11; abolition of sacrifices by, p. 117, n. forged donation of, p. 271, n.
 II. emperor, 4th cent. p. 119, s. 2
 IV. Pogonatus, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 2
 pope, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 Copronymus, Greek emperor, 8th cent. p. 264, s. 1; p. 282, s. 12 or Cyril, missionary, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 3
 Porphyrogenitus, 10th cent. p. 329, s. 1
 Monomachus, 11th cent. p. 378, s. 13
 Harrenopolus, Greek writer, 12th cent.
 p. 409, s. 22
 Manasses, 12th cent. p. 396, n. 7
 Melitenota, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43
Constantinople, patriarchate of, p. 128, s. 3; p. 627, s. 2; p. 781, s. 3; the patriarch's contest with the Roman pontiff in the 4th cent. p. 130, s. 7; in 5th cent. p. 179, s. 1; &c. in 6th, p. 219, s. 1; in 7th, p. 245, s. 1; taken by the Turks, A. D. 1453, p. 524, s. 2
 Constantinopolitan councils, general, A. D. 381, p. 130, s. 7; A. D. 553, p. 231, s. 9, n. 1; A. D. 680, p. 257, s. 8, n. 3; A. D. 692, or in Trullo, p. 259, s. 12; A. D. 754, p. 282, s. 12; A. D. 842, p. 310, s. 15; A. D. 861, p. 316, s. 27; A. D. 869, p. 317, s. 29; A. D. 879, p. 317, s. 31
 Constantius, Chlorus, p. 114, s. 1; p. 115, s. 3
 I. emperor, 4th cent. p. 119, s. 11
 a Greek in Slam, p. 717, s. 8
Constitutions of Clarendon, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 12 of Apostles: see Apostolic canons
Consubstantiation, 11th cent. p. 379, s. 13; doctrine of, p. 674, s. 12; p. 676, s. 29; divides the Reformers, p. 581, s. 27; p. 588, n. see Sacramentarian controversy
Contra-Remonstrants, p. 838, s. 1
Controversies among Christians; in 1st cent. p. 41, p. 42; in 2d, p. 68; in 3d, p. 103; in 4th, p. 149; in 5th, p. 195; in 6th, p. 281; in 7th, p. 353; in 8th, p. 264; in 9th, p. 310; in 10th, p. 341; in 11th, p. 378; in 12th, p. 421; in 13th, p. 473; in 14th, p. 496, p. 502; in 15th, p. 548, s. 552 in the Romish church, in 16th cent. p. 622, s. 30; in 17th, p. 767, s. 37; in 18th, p. 868, s. 9 Controversies in Lutheran church, in 16th cent. p. 645, s. 20; in 17th, p. 795, s. 20; in 18th, p. 871, s. 23 in Reformed churches, in 16th cent. p. 659, s. 4; p. 667, s. 16, &c. in 17th, p. 814, s. 10; p. 831, s. 26; in 18th, p. 873, s. 24
 Conventual brethren, the laxer Franciscans, p. 505, s. 34; p. 756, s. 24
 Converted brethren, the lay Grandmontains, p. 307, s. 26
 Convocation, English, p. 677, s. 31
 Cooper, Anthony Ashly, p. 727, s. 22
 Coornhart, Theodore Volckh, p. 814, n. 5
 Copiatze, what their office, p. 92, s. 5
 Copts, state of, p. 631, s. 12; missions to, p. 608, s. 6; p. 783, s. 6
 Corbinian, bishop of Freysingen, 8th cent. p. 262, s. 5
 Cordt, Christian Bartholomew de, p. 865, s. 4
 Cornelius, bishop of Rome, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
 Corporation act, p. 831, s. 25
 Corruptioles, sect, in 6th cent. p. 237, s. 9
 Cortesius, Paul, 15th cent. p. 557, s. 10
 Corvey, school of, p. 266, n. 4
 Corvinus, John, p. 807, s. 37
 Cosmas, Indicopleustes, 6th cent. p. 219, s. 5 of Jerusalem, 8th cent. p. 273, s. 17
 Cosmo de Medicis, 15th cent. p. 526, s. 4
 Coteller, John, Baptist, p. 764, s. 32
 Councils, none in 1st cent. p. 35, s. 14, n. 5; originated in 2d cent. p. 63; at first provincial general or oecumenical, p. 127, s. 1 the first, A. D. 325, at Nice, p. 161, s. 11 the second, A. D. 381, at Constantinople, p. 130, s. 7 the third, A. D. 431, at Ephesus, p. 200, s. 8, n. 4 the fourth, A. D. 451, at Chalcedon, p. 205, s. 15 the fifth, A. D. 553, at Constantinople, p. 281, s. 9 the sixth, A. D. 680, at Constantinople, p. 257, s. 9 the seventh, A. D. 691, in Trullo, p. 259, s. 12 other principal councils were, A. D. 754, at Constantinople, p. 282, s. 12; A. D. 782, at Nice, p. 282, s. 13; A. D. 794, at Frankfort, p. 283, s. 14; A. D. 842, at Constantinople, p. 310, s. 15; A. D. 861, at Constantinople, p. 316, s. 27; A. D. 869, at Constantinople, p. 317, s. 29; A. D. 879, at Constantinople, p. 310, s. 15; A. D. 1095, at Placentia, p. 347, s. 5; A. D. 1098, at Clermont, p. 347, s. 5; A. D. 1215, in the Lateran, p. 449, s. 18; A. D. 1245, at Lyons, p. 447, s. 11; A. D. 1274, at Lyons, p. 448, s. 13; A. D. 1311, at Vienne, p. 518, s. 4; A. D. 1409, at Pisa, p. 528, s. 2; A. D. 1414, at Constance, p. 528, s. 3; A. D. 1431, at Basil, p. 532, s. 11; and A. D. 1438, at Ferrara and Florence, p. 533, s. 13 of Pisa and Milan, A. D. 1511, p. 560, n. 4 the Lateran, A. D. 1512, p. 560, n. 4; A. D. 1725, p. 868, s. 7 of Trent, A. D. 1546, p. 593, s. 14, &c.
 their power in 8th cent. p. 273, s. 16; in 9th, p. 311, s. 16, n. 2; in 10th, p. 528, s. 4; p. 532, s. 10; their powers at a later period, p. 561, s. 9
 general, demanded, p. 575, s. 13; p. 580, s. 23; p. 590, s. 8; p. 592, s. 13
Covenants of God, theory of, p. 834, s. 32
Court, Romish, p. 606, s. 2; p. 868, s. 7 of High Commission, p. 670, n. 2
 Cranmer, Thomas, archbishop, p. 683, s. 44
 Crantz, Albert, of Rostoch, 16th cent. p. 547, n.
 Crassus, Damianus, 15th cent. p. 547, n.
 Crautwald, Valentine, p. 646, s. 23
 Creatioles, a sect in 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8
 Creed, Apostles', p. 40, s. 4
 Nicene, p. 161, s. 11; p. 162, n. 1
 Crell, Nicholas, p. 656, s. 43
 Samuel, p. 862, n. 2
 Crescens, opposed Christianity, 2d cent. p. 58, s. 8
 Cresconius, bishop in Africa, 7th cent. p. 249, s. 6
 Croatians, enlightened, 9th cent. p. 288, n. 4
 Cromwell, Oliver, p. 744, s. 10; p. 825, s. 22
 Crozier, the lituus of augurs, p. 153, s. 1, n. 4
 Cross, sign of the, p. 106, s. 5; p. 143, n. 1
 Cruciger, Caspar, p. 657, s. 46
 Crusades in 10th cent. p. 328, s. 10; in 11th, p. 346, s. 4; in 12th, p. 392, s. 9; p. 393, s. 11; in 13th, p. 433, s. 3; in 14th, p. 484, s. 1
 Crypto-Calvinists, p. 652, s. 37
 Cudworth, Ralph, p. 735, s. 33; p. 814, s. 9
 Culper, Francis, p. 863, s. 2
 Cumberland, Richard, p. 814, s. 9

- Cummanus, Irish monk, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 Cummenus Albus, Irish monk, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 Cup, denied to the laity, 15th cent. p. 531, s. 8; p. 549, s. 3
 Curcellanus, Stephen, p. 843, s. 9
 Cursus Academicus, in 15th cent. p. 439, s. 4
 Curtius, Sebastian, p. 787, s. 5
 Cusanus, Nicolaus, 15th cent. p. 540, s. 24
 Cuthbert, English monk, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 Cyclus Paschalis, of Dionysius Exiguus, p. 226, n. 5
 Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, 3d cent. p. 88, s. 6; p. 90, s. 11; p. 92, n. 1; p. 95, s. 8; p. 102, s. 8
 — Gallic monk, 6th cent. p. 22, n.
 Cyran, St. abbot of; see Hauranne
 Cyriacus of Ancona, 15th cent. p. 526, s. 3
 Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, 4th cent. p. 133, s. 9
 — bishop of Alexandria, 5th cent. p. 183, s. 10, n. 3; p. 200, s. 7; p. 198, s. 4, n. 7
 — monk, of Palestine, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — missionary, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 3
 — Lucaris, of Constantinople, p. 780, s. 2
 — Contarl, of Berreha, p. 780, s. 2
 Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, 7th cent. p. 249, n.
 Czechowicz, Martin, p. 712, s. 24
 D'ACHERY, Luke, p. 761, s. 31; p. 763, s. 32
 Dado or Audenus of Rouen, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 3; p. 250, n.
 Dallamites, heard the gospel, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1
 Daillé, John, p. 817, s. 14
 Dalmatians, enlightened, 9th cent. p. 289, s. 4
 Damsascenus, John, 8th cent. p. 265, s. 2; p. 274, s. 17
 Damsclus, a philosopher, 6th cent. p. 179, s. 5; p. 216, s. 2
 Damasus I. bishop of Rome, 4th cent. p. 129, s. 5; p. 141, s. 10, n. 2
 — II. pope, 11th cent. p. 355, s. 4
 Dambrowka, daughter of the duke of Bohemia, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 4
 Damianus and Damianists, 6th cent. p. 238, s. 10
 Daners, a sect, 14th cent. p. 520, s. 8
 Danes, converted, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 2; 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7; incline to the reformed, p. 675, s. 26; p. 810, s. 1
 Dannhauer, John Conrad, p. 792, s. 15
 Daniel, bishop of Winchester, 8th cent. p. 262, n. 2
 — Gabriel, p. 765, n. 1
 Danish East India missions, p. 867, s. 4
 Dante, Alighieri, 14th cent. p. 488, s. 4
 Dantzigers, Mennonites, p. 858, s. 3
 Darnly, Lord Henry, p. 668, n.
 Daughters of charity, p. 758, s. 27; p. 712, s. 23
 David, metropolitan of China, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1
 — successor to Prester John, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 7; p. 395, s. 3
 — Dinant, 13th cent. p. 482, s. 12
 — de Augusta, monk, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — George or Jorris, p. 697, s. 24
 — or Davides, Francis, p. 708, n. 3
 Deaconesses, their office, p. 34, s. 10
 Deacons, in 1st cent. p. 34, s. 10; in 2d, p. 62, s. 1; in 3d, p. 92, s. 5; in 4th, p. 131, s. 8; in 5th, p. 182, s. 7
 Decius, emperor, 3d cent. persecutor, p. 86, s. 7; p. 87, s. 3 — Philip of Pisa, 16th cent. p. 547, n.
 Decrees of God: see Predestination, also, p. 422, s. 18
 Decretal epistles, forged in 9th cent. p. 296, s. 8
 — of Gregory IX., p. 448, s. 10
 Decretum of Gratian, 12th cent. p. 399, s. 6
 Degrees academic, 18th cent. p. 439, s. 4
 Delists, in 16th cent. p. 603, s. 5, n. 1; in 17th, p. 726, s. 21; p. 828, s. 22; in 18th, p. 867, s. 6
 Delites, the Fagan, p. 8, s. 9
 Delitiosi, Bernhard, 14th cent. p. 501, s. 24
 Demas, mentioned by Paul, p. 45, s. 1
 Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, 3d cent. p. 104, s. 14
 — Cydonius, 15th cent. p. 508, n.
 — Chrysolorus, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 Demiurge of oriental philosophy, p. 30, s. 9
 Demoniacs, in 4th cent. p. 145, s. 8
 Denk, John or Hans, p. 687, n. 1
 Denmark, reformation in, p. 583, s. 30
 Deoduin or Theoduin, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
 Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, 6th cent. p. 217, n. 6
 — bishop of Cahors, 7th cent. p. 249, s. 6
 — king of Lombards, 8th cent. p. 370, s. 9
 Dearthoff, William, p. 873, s. 25
 Devay, Matthew, p. 674, s. 25
 Desius, John, Jesuit, p. 746, s. 13
 Diaconi, among the Cathari, p. 426, s. 6
 Diadochus, bishop in Illyricum, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 Dialectics, cultivated, in 11th cent. p. 353, s. 6; in 12th, p. 399, s. 8; in 13th, p. 471, s. 7; in 14th, p. 489, s. 7; in 15th, p. 527, s. 7
 Dictates of Hildebrand, p. 359, s. 9, n. 3
 Didymus of Alexandria, 4th cent. p. 135, s. 10
 Dieu, John de, canonised, p. 778, s. 62
 Dinus Mugellanus, jurist, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 Dioceses episcopal, origin of, p. 35, s. 13
 Diocletian, emperor, 4th cent. persecutor, p. 114, s. 1; p. 115, s. 4
 Diodorus or Theodorus, bishop of Tarsus, 4th cent. p. 135, n. 3
 Diognetus, letter to, p. 39, n.
 Dion Cassius, historian, 3d cent. p. 90, s. 1
 Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, 2d cent. p. 66, n.; p. 102, s. 8 — or Denys, bishop of Paris, 3d cent. p. 86, s. 7
 — the Great, bishop of Alexandria, 3d cent. p. 95, s. 7, n. 2; p. 102, s. 8
 — bishop of Rome, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
 — Arcopagita, p. 147, s. 12
 — Exiguus, 6th cent. p. 226, s. 9
 — a Ryckel, 15th cent. p. 542, s. 24
 Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, 5th cent. p. 204, s. 14; p. 205, s. 15
 Diotrefes, 1st cent. p. 45, s. 1
 Dippel, John Conrad, p. 805, s. 33
 Discolcati: see Barefooted
 Disciples, the seventy of Christ, p. 18, s. 5
 Disputations, public, p. 754, s. 12
 Dissenters, English: see Puritans, Nonconformists, Independents, &c.
 Diversions, lawfulness of, p. 803, s. 31
 Docetæ, Gnostic sect, described, p. 77, s. 7
 — sect in 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8
 Doctrine, secret, of early Christians, p. 41, s. 8
 — twofold, or twofold rule of life, p. 69, s. 11; p. 146, s. 10; p. 231, s. 8
 Dodwell, Henry, p. 832, s. 26
 Dolet, Stephen, p. 603, s. 5
 Dominic, St. 13th cent. p. 451, s. 24
 Dominicanas, monks, 13th cent. p. 451, s. 22; 14th, p. 497, s. 18; 16th, p. 552, s. 12; p. 626, s. 41; p. 767, s. 37; p. 868, s. 9
 Domitian, emperor, 1st cent. persecutor, p. 23, s. 5; p. 27, s. 15
 Domitilla, Flavia, martyr, 1st cent. p. 27, s. 15
 Donations to the clergy and monks, p. 208, s. 4; p. 327, s. 9; p. 350, s. 10 — to the popes, p. 268, s. 5; p. 350, s. 10; p. 361, s. 11; p. 444, s. 5
 Donatists, sect of, its history, 4th cent. p. 157; 5th, p. 197; 6th, p. 235
 Donatus, a Donatist bishop, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 — deacon of Metz, 6th cent. p. 277, n.
 — Bossius, chronicler, 16th cent. p. 546, n.
 Dorotheus, pseudo, 4th cent. p. 136, n. 6
 — bishop of Martianeople, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — abbot, 7th cent. p. 247, s. 5
 Dorschhaus, John George, p. 792, s. 15
 Dort, synod of, p. 815, s. 11; p. 841, s. 6
 Dositheus, heretic, 1st cent. p. 47, s. 10
 Drabiz, Nicholas, p. 809, s. 41
 Dracontius, poet, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 2; p. 189, s. 11
 Dreyer, Christian, p. 799, s. 24
 Druids, p. 31, s. 13; their powers and rights transferred to the clergy, p. 269, s. 6
 Druses of Mount Lebanon, p. 438, n. 4
 — sect of, p. 634, s. 19
 Druthmar, Christian, 8th cent. p. 301, s. 14
 Ducas of Constantinople, an historian, 15th cent. p. 539, n.
 Ducenarius, what, p. 112, n. 1
 Dudycz, Andrew, p. 705, s. 9
 Dulcinus (Dolcino) of Novara, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 14
 Dungal, a Scot, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3
 — monk of Paris, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Dünkenspuhl, Nicolaus de, p. 536, s. 19; p. 543, n.
 Duns Scotus, John, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37
 Dunstan, English writer, 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
 Duraeus or Dury, John, p. 788, s. 6
 Durand, monk of Normandy, 11th cent. p. 378, n.

Durand, de St. Porcain, 14th cent. p. 500, s. 37
 Dutch, reformation of, p. 586, s. 24; p. 604, s. 6, &c.
 — church, 16th cent. p. 672, s. 22; in 17th, p. 832,
 s. 28
 Dynamius, a writer of 6th cent. p. 229, n. .
 EDMER, English monk, 12th cent. p. 413, n.
 Earnulph, bishop of Rochester, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 East Anglia, converted, 7th cent. p. 240, s. 2
 East Saxons converted, 7th cent. p. 240, s. 2
 Easter, disputes about it in 2d cent. p. 73, s. 9; in 4th,
 p. 163, s. 12; in 7th, p. 253, s. 6; sermons and laughter, p. 563, n. 3
 Ebbu, archbishop of Rheims, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Ebed-Jesu, Nestorian archbishop, 9th cent. p. 324, n. 1
 Eberald, a count, 9th cent. p. 313, s. 22
 Eberard, of Ratibon, annalist, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 Ecionites, sect, 2d cent. p. 50, s. 17; p. 75, s. 3
 — so called, 11th cent. p. 383, s. 19
 Ecbert, abbot of St. Florin, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 Ecdard or Aycard, Henry, 14th cent. p. 619, s. 5
 Ecclesiastical history cultivated, p. 616, s. 19; p. 640,
 s. 9; p. 731, s. 27
 Echellensis, Abraham, p. 779, s. 2
 Eck, John, p. 568, s. 5; p. 417, s. 21
 Eclectic philosophy, p. 12, s. 25; p. 59, s. 7
 — philosophers, p. 737, s. 37; p. 790, s. 11
 Economical method of disputing, p. 56, s. 4; p. 102,
 s. 10
 Pethesis of Heraclius, 7th cent. p. 256, s. 7
 Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, 13th cent.
 p. 468, n.
 Edward VI. of England, p. 596, s. 9
 Egbert, archbishop of York, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3
 Eginhard, secretary to Charlemagne, 9th cent. p. 276,
 s. 18; p. 292, s. 6; p. 300, s. 14
 Eichstadt, a bishopric in 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3
 Eleesaites, sect, 2d cent. p. 76, s. 5
 Elder son, among the Cathari, what, p. 426, s. 6
 Election, doctrine of: see Grace
 Elias, archbishop of Crete, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — II. and III. Nestorian patriarchs of Mosul, p.
 784, s. 8
 Eligius, or Eloi, bishop, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 2; p. 249,
 s. 6; controversy respecting his sermon, p. 251, n.
 Eliot, John, p. 725, s. 20
 Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, 8th cent. p. 280, s. 8
 Elizabeth, queen of England, p. 596, s. 9; p. 669, s. 17
 — abbess of Hervorden, p. 864, s. 3
 — of Schönaugen, 12th cent. p. 414, n.; p. 414,
 s. 2
 Elmacin, George, Arabic historian, 13th cent. p. 438,
 s. 1
 Elpidius Rusticus, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 Elxai, heretic, 2d cent. p. 76, s. 5
 Emanuel II. Palaeologus, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
 Empire, Roman, state of, at Christ's birth, p. 7, s. 2;
 favourable to the propagation of Christianity, p. 7, s. 4;
 its civil and ecclesiastical divisions and provinces in 4th cent. p. 128, s. 3
 Emser, Jerome, p. 617, s. 21
 Encratites, sect, in 2d cent. p. 77, s. 9; in 4th cent.
 p. 157, s. 1
 Engelbert, monk, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
 Engelhusius, Theodoric, 16th cent. p. 543, n.
 England, when first converted, p. 52, s. 4, n. 4; reformation in, p. 586, s. 34; p. 591, s. 11; p. 596, s. 9
 — church of, in 16th cent. pp. 596, 608, &c.; in 17th cent. pp. 744, 813, 819, 872
 Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, 6th cent. p. 178, s. 2; p. 219,
 s. 2; p. 226, s. 9
 Kon, an enthusiast, 12th cent. p. 431, s. 16
 Ephesine general council, A.D. 431, p. 202, s. 10
 — council of robbers, A.D. 449, p. 204, s. 14
 Ephraim Syrus, 4th cent. p. 135, s. 9, n. 1
 — patriarch of Antioch, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 Episcopius, Simon, p. 840, s. 6
 Epictetus, Stoic philosopher, 2d cent. p. 58, s. 3
 Epictureans, p. 11, s. 21; p. 8, s. 12; p. 58, s. 3
 Epiphanius, bishop in Cyprus, 4th cent. p. 133, s. 9; p.
 134, n. 1
 — bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p.
 224, n.
 — Scholasticus, ecclesiastical historian, 6th
 cent. p. 238, n.
 Epiphany, day of, fixed in 4th cent. p. 155, s. 5
 Episcopacy: see bishops

Epistles: see Decretal epistles
 Erasmus, Desiderius, p. 559, s. 3
 Erchembert or Herembert, historian, 9th cent. p. 308, n.
 Eremites or Hermits, in 3d cent. p. 100, s. 3; in 4th, p.
 148, s. 15; in 6th, p. 193, s. 11
 — brethren of St. William, 13th cent. p. 450,
 s. 19
 Erfurth, a bishopric in 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3
 Eric IX. king of Sweden, 12th cent. p. 359, s. 3
 Ernest, Justinian, p. 732, s. 17
 — landgrave of Hesse, p. 745, s. 12; p. 749, s. 16
 — Duke of Saxe Gotha, p. 783, s. 6; p. 797, n.
 Ertang, the gospel of the Manicheans, p. 108, s. 9
 Esalas, of Cyprus, writer, 15th cent. p. 539, n.
 Essenes, Jewish sect, p. 14, s. 7; p. 15, s. 9
 Espencaeus, Claud, p. 417, s. 21
 Essential truths of Christianity, pp. 788, 798, 807, 830, 853, 859, 866, 872
 Estius, William, p. 763, s. 32
 Ethelbert, king of Kent, 6th cent. p. 213, s. 2
 — or Ethelwold, English historian, 10th cent.
 p. 331, s. 5
 Etherius, bishop of Axuma, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 Ethiopians, converted, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20
 Evagrius, archdeacon of Constantinople, 4th cent. p.
 137, n.
 — a Gallic presbyter, 6th cent. p. 192, s. 7
 — Scholasticus, ecclesiastical historian, 6th
 cent. p. 224, s. 8
 Evangelists, who so called, p. 32, s. 2
 Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, 5th cent. p. 187, s. 11; p.
 193, s. 10
 Euchites or Messalians, 4th cent. p. 171, s. 24; 12th
 cent. p. 424, s. 1
 Eudocia, empress and writer, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 Eudoxia, empress, opposed Chrysostom, p. 195, s. 15
 Eudoxius, bishop of Constantinople, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Everlasting gospel of Joachim, 13th cent. p. 454, s. 28
 Eugene II. pope, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 — III. pope, 12th cent. p. 294, n. 9; p. 392, s. 9;
 p. 403, s. 8; p. 414, n.
 — IV. pope, 15th cent. p. 532, s. 11
 Eugenius, archbishop of Toledo, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 Euygypius, monk of Italy, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
 — monk of Africa, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 Eulogius, presbyter of Antioch, 6th cent. p. 223, s. 8
 — of Corduba, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Eunapius, pagan philosopher, 4th cent. p. 123, s. 17
 Eunomius and Eunomians, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Evodius, bishop in Africa, 5th cent. p. 189, n. 4
 Eusebians, a party in 4th cent. p. 166, s. 16
 Eusebius Pamphilus, bishop of Caesarea, 4th cent. p. 123,
 s. 17; p. 131, s. 9; p. 153, s. 23; works of his recently discovered, p. 132, n.
 — bishop of Nicomedia, Arian, 4th cent. p. 137, n.; p. 161, s. 11
 — bishop of Emessa, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — of Vercelli, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 — of Doryleum, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — of Thessalonica, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 Eustathians, sect in 4th cent. p. 150, s. 19
 Eustathius of Antioch, 4th cent. p. 135, s. 9; p. 136,
 n. 5
 — of Armenia, 4th cent. p. 150, s. 19
 — of Sebaste, 4th cent. p. 152, n. 1
 — of Syria, 5th cent. p. 187, n.
 — Latin writer, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 — of Thessalonica, 12th cent. p. 396, s. 1; p.
 409, s. 22
 Eustratius of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — expositor of Aristotle, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22
 Euthalius, deacon in Egypt, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 Eutharius, archbishop of Tyane, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 Euthymius, bishop of Constantinople, 10th cent. p. 341,
 s. 7
 — Zigabenus, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22
 Eutropius, bishop of Valencia, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 Eutychea, heretic, 5th cent. p. 186, n.; p. 204, s. 14, n. 4
 Eutychiada, sect, 5th cent. p. 204, s. 13: see Monophylites
 Eutychiuss, bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — bishop of Alexandria, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 12
 Euzolus, Arian, bishop of Antioch, 4th cent. p. 151, n. 1
 Ewald, two English missionaries, 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3
 Exarchs, ecclesiastical, p. 128, s. 3
 Excommunication, in 1st and 2d cent. p. 41, s. 10; p.
 71, s. 17; in 3d, p. 88, s. 4; p. 113, s. 18; in 4th, p. 161,

- s. 11; in 5th, p. 182, n. 3; by priests, why dreaded by the Latins, 8th cent. p. 269, n. 1; Mennonites, p. 693, s. 18
Exemption of monasteries from bishops, 11th cent. p. 368, n. 2 — of the clergy from civil laws, 12th cent. p. 406, n. 4
Exorcism before baptism, 3d cent. p. 106, s. 4, n. 5
Exorcists, in 3d cent. p. 92, s. 5
Expectatives, papal, 14th cent. p. 492, s. 6; p. 533, s. 12
Exposition of scriptures see Theology exegetic
Expropriation of Franciscans, p. 455, s. 31; p. 502, s. 29
Exucontians, Arians, 4th cent. p. 166, s. 16
- Faber, John, bishop of Vienna, p. 617, s. 21
 — Tanaguil, p. 747, s. 14
Fabridius, John, p. 872, s. 20
 — John Lewis, p. 861, s. 4
Faculties, in universities, 13th cent. p. 439, s. 4
Facundus, African bishop, 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9
Fagius, Paul, p. 657, s. 46
Familists, p. 698
Family of love, p. 698, s. 25
Fanatics among the Greeks, 12th cent. p. 423, s. 1
Farrell, William, p. 683, s. 44
Farnovius, Stanislaus, p. 712, s. 24
Fastidius, Priscus, Briton, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
Fasting, in 1st cent. p. 44, s. 10; in 2d, p. 83, s. 23; in 3d, p. 106, s. 5; in 4th, p. 156, s. 6; in 5th, p. 196, s. 2; number of, in 9th cent. p. 319, n. 3; on Saturdays begun in 10th cent. p. 342, s. 3
Fathers, apostolic, p. 38, s. 20; of the Oratory, p. 616, s. 18; p. 758, s. 27; p. 766, s. 36; of the Christian doctrine, p. 615, s. 17; of Somaquino, p. 615, s. 17
Father, how greater than Christ, disputed, 12th cent. p. 422, s. 16
Faustinus, a Luciferian, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
Faustus, a Manichean, 4th cent. p. 143, n.
 — bishop of Riez, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — disciple of St. Benedict, p. 249, n.
Felgenhauer, Paul, p. 808, s. 40
Felicitas, a martyr, 3d cent. p. 87, s. 1
Felix, bishop of Aptunga, 4th cent. p. 157, s. 3
 — I. bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — III. bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 207, s. 21
 — IV. bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — V. pope, 15th cent. p. 533, s. 13
 — of Urygel, heretic, 8th cent. p. 286, s. 3
 — English monk, 8th cent. p. 275, n.
 — de Valois, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 20
Fendón, Francis Salignac de, p. 764, s. 32
Ferdinand, King of Castile and Leon, 13th cent. p. 351, s. 2; p. 436, s. 10
 — King of Spain, 15th cent. p. 436, s. 10
 — I. and II. emperors, p. 590, s. 6; p. 741, s. 5
Fernandus, Charles of Paris, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
Ferrara, council of, 15th cent. p. 533, s. 13
Ferrarius, Vincent, 15th cent. p. 542, s. 24
Festivals, in 1st cent. p. 43, s. 4; in 2d, p. 73, s. 9; in 4th, p. 155, s. 5; in 6th, p. 235, s. 4; in 7th, p. 253, s. 2; in 9th, p. 318, s. 2; in 10th, p. 342, s. 2; in 14th, p. 597, s. 2; in 15th, p. 552, s. 2
Feuardent, Francis, p. 762, s. 32
Fèvre, James le, p. 584, n. 2
Fictius, Marsilius, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
Fide, Hieronymus a Sancta, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
Fifth-monarchy men, p. 826, s. 22
Fileas, John, p. 764, s. 32
Fins, converted, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 3
Finnus, Hadrianus of Ferrara, 16th cent. p. 547, n.
Firmilian of Cappadocia, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
Fire philosophy, p. 604, s. 8; p. 641, s. 12; p. 732, s. 30; p. 790, s. 10; p. 808, s. 40
First fruits or Annats, 14th cent. p. 492, s. 6
Fisher, Samuel, a Quaker, p. 847, s. 3
Five points, Arminian, p. 839, s. 4; p. 843, s. 10
Flacius, Matthias, p. 657, s. 46
Flagellants, in 13th cent. p. 470, s. 3; in 14th, p. 520, s. 7; in 15th, p. 555, s. 5
Flandrians, p. 691, s. 11; p. 858, s. 2
Flavia Domitilla, martyr, 1st cent. p. 27, s. 15
Flavianus, bishop of Antioch, 4th cent. p. 138, n.
 — bishop of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 186, n.; p. 204, s. 14
Flavius Clemens, a martyr, 1st cent. p. 27, s. 15
Flemings, p. 691, s. 11; p. 858, s. 3
Fleming, Robert, of Lincoln, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
- Flodoard, historian, 10th cent. p. 331, s. 5
Florence, council of, 15th cent. p. 533, s. 13
Florentinus, Bravonius, English monk, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
Florinians, sect, 2d cent. p. 81, s. 18
Florus, Paul Cyrus, a poet, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — biographer of Saints, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 — Drepanius or Magister of Lyons, 6th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 301, s. 14
Fludd, Robert, p. 604, s. 12
Foliot, Gilbert, bishop of London, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
Folmar, monk, of Franconia, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
Fonterraud, order of, 12th cent. p. 407, s. 19
Forbes, William, p. 747, s. 14
Forer, Lawrence, jurist, p. 740, s. 2
Formalists, sect of philosophers, p. 400, s. 9
Formosa, Dutch missions to, p. 722, n. 2
Formosus, pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
Formula of Concord, p. 654, s. 39; p. 661, s. 8
 — Consensus, p. 837, s. 37; p. 874, s. 26
Fortunatianus, bishop of Aquileia, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9
Fossemburn, Lewis de, p. 615, n. 1
Fösteland, island of, p. 240, s. 3
Fox, George, p. 698, n. 3; p. 845, s. 1
France, reformation in, p. 584, s. 33; p. 665, s. 15; p. 814, s. 9; p. 811, s. 2
Francis St. 13th cent. p. 462, s. 25
 — de Esculo, 14th cent. p. 603, s. 30
 — I. King of France, p. 560, s. 7; p. 584, s. 33
 — de Paris, p. 773, s. 45; p. 869, s. 12
Franciscans, (Fratres Minores) Minorites, p. 451, s. 22; p. 497, s. 18
Frank, Augustus Hermann, p. 800, s. 27
Franken, Christian, p. 712, s. 23
Frankenberg, Abraham von, p. 808, s. 40
Franco, monk of Laon, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
Franconians, enlightened, in 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3
Frankfort, council of, 8th cent. p. 810, s. 14
Franks, in Gaul, converted, 5th cent. p. 174, s. 5
Fratricelli, sect, in 13th cent. p. 452, s. 28; in 14th, p. 500, s. 22; in 15th, p. 537, s. 24
Frauds pious, in 1st cent. p. 36, s. 17; in 2d, p. 70, s. 15; in 3d, p. 103, s. 11; in 4th, p. 144, s. 3; in 5th, p. 193, s. 11; 8th, p. 244, s. 8; 15th, p. 561, s. 8
Freculphus of Lisieux, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 301, s. 14
Fredegarius, a French historian, 7th cent. p. 249, s. 6
 — Scholasticus, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
Frederic, archdeacon of Rome, 11th cent. p. 378, s. 10
 — I. Barbarossa, German emperor, 12th cent. p. 264, s. 7; p. 393, s. 11; p. 403, s. 9
 — II. German emperor, 13th cent. p. 434, s. 5; p. 437, s. 3; p. 478, s. 6
 — the Wise, elector of Saxony, p. 530, s. 6; p. 565, s. 1
 — king of Denmark, p. 583, s. 31
 — III. king of Denmark, p. 861, s. 4
 — IV. king of Denmark, p. 867, s. 4
 — III. elector Palatine, p. 665, s. 14
 — V. elector Palatine and king of Bohemia, p. 740, s. 3
 — Augustus of Saxony, and king of Poland, p. 749, s. 16
 — William of Brandenburg, p. 787, s. 5
 — John, duke of Brunswick, p. 749, s. 16
Frederickstadt, Arminian colony, p. 842, s. 8
Free will: see Grace
French nation resist the popes, p. 569, s. 6; p. 753, s. 21
Frequent communion, p. 624, s. 35
Freysingen, a bishopric in 8th cent. p. 262, n. 5
Friends: see Quakers
Frieslanders, converted in 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3; p. 260, s. 2; sect, p. 691, s. 11; p. 858, s. 2
Frllich, Eva Maria, p. 809, s. 41
Fromm, Andrew, p. 750, s. 16
Fronto, assails Christians, 2d cent. p. 57, n. 9
Frontarius, bishop of Toul, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
Fructuosus, archbishop of Braga, 7th cent. p. 247, s. 4
Frumentius, converts the Abyssinians, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20
Fulbert of Chartres, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 31
Fulcherus Carnotensis, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
Fulcun, historian, 10th cent. p. 330, s. 5
Fulda, monastery and school, 8th cent. p. 961, s. 3
Fulgentius of Ruspe, Africa, 6th cent. p. 226, s. 9
 — Ferrandus, 6th cent. p. 226, s. 9

Fulginius, Paulutius, 14th cent. p. 505, s. 34
 Fullo, Peter, 5th cent. p. 206, s. 17

GAGNEUS, John, p. 620, s. 26

Gajanus, or Galanus, or Cajanus, bishop of Antioch, 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8

Galanus, Clement, p. 780, s. 2

Galatinus, Peter, converted Jew, 16th cent. p. 543, n.

Gale, Theophilus, p. 735, s. 33

Galenists, sect, p. 859, s. 7; p. 862, s. 5

Galerius Maximin, 4th cent. persecutes, p. 115, s. 4
 Galfred or Arthur, bishop of St. Asaph, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

— or Gaultier, Vinesauf, English poet, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

Galileo Galilei, p. 731, s. 26; p. 760, s. 36

Gall St. 7th cent. his life, p. 240, s. 3

— school there, 8th cent. p. 266, n. 4; a protestant city, p. 581, n. 1

Gallo church, liberties of, p. 560, n. 4; p. 753, s. 21, n. 4

Gallienus, emperor, 3rd cent. p. 86, s. 3; p. 83, s. 7

Gallius, Peter, p. 582, s. 29

Gallon, Anthony, p. 763, s. 32

Gallus, emperor, 3d cent. persecutes, p. 88, s. 5

— German monk, 14th cent. p. 513, n

Gamallel, Jewish patriarch, 5th cent. p. 177, s. 4

Garnet, Henry, Jesuit, p. 744, s. 10

Garnier, Julian, p. 761, s. 31

Garriso, Anthony, p. 818, n. 1

Gassendi, Peter, p. 731, s. 26; p. 734, s. 31; p. 760, s. 30; p. 790, s. 11; p. 813, s. 6

Gaston, founder of the order of St. Anthony, 11th cent. p. 371, s. 28

Gaudanus, Cornelius Aurelius, p. 561, n. 3

Gaudentius of Brescia, 4th cent. p. 143, n.

Gaufarius or Benedict of Monte Cassino, p. 374, n.

Gaulfrid, chronicler, 12th cent. p. 41, n.

Gauls, state of, in 1st cent. p. 31, s. 13; converted in 2d cent. p. 53, s. 5; in 3d, p. 86, s. 7; in 4th, p. 125, s. 22; in 5th, p. 174, s. 5; 7th, p. 246, s. 2

Gauvillo, writer, 11th cent. p. 354, s. 2

Gazari, converted, 9th cent. p. 283, s. 2

— or Paulicians, 11th cent. p. 385, s. 2

Gebhard, archbishop of Cologne, p. 639, s. 7

Geller, John, a preacher, 15th cent. p. 546, n.

Gelas, heard the gospel, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1

Gelasius I. bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 190, n.

— of Cyzicus, 5th cent. p. 185, s. 10, n. 4

— II. pope, 12th cent. p. 402, s. 5; p. 414, n.

Geneva, p. 663, s. 11; p. 814, s. 10; p. 837, s. 37

Genghisian, Tartar emperor, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 7; p. 395, s. 3

Gennadius of Marseilles, 5th cent. p. 190, n.

Genesio, Vandal king in Africa, an Arian, persecutes, p. 198, s. 4

Gentilis, Valentine, p. 702, s. 6

George, bishop of Laodicea, 4th cent. p. 137, n.

— monk of Galatia, 7th cent. p. 248, n.

— bishop of Alexandria, 7th cent. p. 248, n.

— Syncellus, of Constantinople, 8th cent. p. 274, s. 17

Hamartolus, 9th cent. p. 299, n.

— archbishop of Nicomedia, 9th cent. p. 300, n.

— of Coreyra, 12th cent. p. 410, n.

— Acropolita, historian, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 1; p. 463, s. 43

— Pachymeres, p. 463, s. 43

— Metochita, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43

— of Cyprus, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43

— Moschamper, 13th cent. p. 464, n.

— Lecapenus, 14th cent. p. 508, n.

— Codinus, Curopalates, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23

— Gemistius Plato, a Platonist, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23

— or Gregory, Hermonymus or Charitonymus, 15th cent. p. 538, n.

— Phranza, historian, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23

— or Scholarius, bishop of Constantinople, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23

— of Brandenburg, p. 581, n. 1

Georgians, converted in 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20; p. 630

Gerbert: see Sylvester II. pope

Gerhard, bishop of Arras, 11th cent. p. 387, s. 4

— Sagarellus, founder of the sect of Apostles, p. 483, s. 14

Gerhard, author of the Introduction to the everlasting gospel, 13th cent. p. 456, s. 34

Gerhard, Odonis, monk, 14th cent. p. 511, n.

— Magnus or Groot, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

— of Zutphen, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

— John, p. 792, s. 15

— John Ernest, p. 792, s. 15

Germanus, (St. Germain) of Paris, 6th cent. p. 229, n.

— I. bishop of Constantinople, 8th cent. p. 273, s. 17; p. 281, s. 11

— II. bishop of Constantinople, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43

Germany, state of, in 1st cent. p. 31, s. 13; 2d, p. 52, s. 4; 3d, p. 87, s. 7; 5th, p. 174, s. 4; 6th, p. 214, s. 2; 7th, p. 240, s. 3; 8th, p. 261, s. 3; 9th, p. 327, s. 9

Gerson, John Charlier de, 15th cent. p. 539, s. 24; p. 551, s. 9

Gertrude, nun and writer, 13th cent. p. 468, n.

Gervais of Tilbury, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5

Gervasius of Canterbury, 13th cent. p. 467, n.

Geyer, Martin, p. 792, s. 15

Geysa, Duke of Hungary, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6

Gichtel, John George, p. 808, s. 40; p. 876, s. 16

Gilfthell, John Lewis, p. 808, s. 40

Gifts, extraordinary: see Miracles

Gilbert de la Porrée, 12th cent. p. 412, s. 23; p. 420, s. 11

— Folioth, bishop of London, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

— or Gislebert of Castillon, or Crispin, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

— or Gilbert of Paris, 13th cent. p. 468, n.

Gildas the Wise, Briton, of 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9

Gille or Gillebert, Irish bishop, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

Giraldus, Sylvestre, Cambrensis, English historian, 13th cent. p. 467, n.

Gisela, daughter of Charles the Simple, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 3

Glaber, Radulphus, historian, 11th cent. p. 374, n.

Glassius, Solomon, p. 792, s. 15

Glossa Ordinaria, composed, 9th cent. p. 308, s. 14

Glycas, Michael, 12th cent. p. 396, s. 1; p. 409, s. 22

Gnostics, in 1st cent. p. 46, s. 3; 2d, p. 77; 3d, p. 107, s. 1; 4th, p. 169, s. 21

— Τῶς, what, p. 29, s. 4

Gobelinus Persona, 15th cent. p. 544, n.

— John, of Rome, 15th cent. p. 545, n.

God, whether he wills and effects, or only permits, evil, p. 422, s. 18

— of Mohammed, his character, 12th cent. p. 422, s. 17

Godeau, Anthony, p. 764, s. 32

Godefridus, chronicler, 13th cent. p. 468, n.

Godehard, bishop of Hildesheim, 11th cent. p. 374, n.

Godfathers or sponsors, 2d cent. p. 74, s. 13, n. 7

Godescalc, a canon of Liege, 8th cent. p. 277, n.

Godeschalk, a monk of Orbais, 9th cent. p. 302, s. 14; p. 313, s. 22

Godfrey of Bouillon, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6

— of St. Omer, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 14

— of Vendome, 12th cent. p. 411, s. 23

— of Viterbo, 12th cent. p. 414, n.

Gomarus, Francis, p. 815, s. 11

Gonesius, Peter, p. 703, s. 6; p. 712, s. 24

Good Works, dispute on, p. 640, s. 29

Gorcomius, Henry, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24

Gordianus, Benedictine monk, 6th cent. p. 229, n.

Gormon, king of Denmark, 10th century, p. 326

— s. 7

Gospel, Society for the propagation of, p. 722, s. 17; p. 726, s. 20

Goths, conversion of, p. 86, s. 6; p. 124, s. 21; p. 171, s. 23

Goulart, Simon, p. 842, s. 8

Gotselin or Goscolin, 11th cent. p. 375, n.

Gozbert, abbot, 11th cent. p. 374, n.

Grace, contests about, in 5th cent. p. 208, s. 23; in 6th, p. 235, s. 2; in 7th, p. 254, s. 2; in 9th, p. 313, s. 22; in 10th, p. 339, s. 2; in 16th, p. 569, s. 9; p. 623, s. 34; p. 647, s. 24; p. 675, s. 27; in 17th, p. 767, s. 37; p. 777, s. 61; p. 806, s. 35; p. 814, s. 10; p. 829, s. 23; p. 839, s. 4; p. 850, s. 8

Grandimontains, monks, 11th cent. p. 370, s. 26

Granianus, proconsul, Asia, 2d cent. p. 56, s. 3

Gras, Louise le, p. 759, s. 27

Gratian, 3d cent. preached in Gaul, p. 86, s. 7

— emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15

— the canonist, 12th cent. p. 398, s. 6; p. 412, s. 23

Gravamina, the Centum, p. 578, s. 18

Grauer, Albrecht, p. 792, s. 18

Grebel, Conrad, fanatic, p. 687, s. 5
 Greeks and Latins at variance, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 1;
 8th, p. 271, s. 12; 9th, p. 316, s. 27; 10th, p. 341, s. 7;
 11th, p. 378, s. 9; 12th, p. 421, s. 14; 13th, p. 473, s. 13;
 14th, p. 516, s. 9; 15th, p. 533, s. 12
 — church, state and history of in 16th cent. p. 627;
 in 17th, p. 778; in 18th, p. 869, s. 13; opposed to the Romish church, p. 178, s. 1
 — literature among the Latins, in 14th cent. p. 487, s. 4; in 15th, p. 524, s. 3
 Greenland, enlightened, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
 Gregentius, archbishop in Arabia, 6th cent. p. 192, s. 7; p. 225, n.
 Gregorius, writer, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 Gregory Thaumaturgus, 3d cent. p. 95, s. 7, n. 1
 — Illuminator, Armenia, 4th cent. p. 134, s. 19
 — of Nazianzus, 4th cent. p. 134, s. 9, n. 2
 — of Nyssa, 4th cent. p. 134, s. 9, n. 2
 — bishop of Tours, 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9 — or George, Elides, 7th cent. p. 248, s. 5
 [George] Pachymeres, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 1
 — Abulpharagius, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 1
 — Palamas, monk and bishop, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37
 — of Rimini, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 — Acindynus, 14th cent. p. 507, s. 37
 — Melissenus, of Constantinople, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — Trapezuntinus, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23
 — or George, Hieronymus or Charitonimus, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — the Abyssinian, p. 783, s. 6
 — I. or the Great, bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 217, s. 2; p. 219, s. 1; p. 224, s. 9; p. 230, s. 2
 — II. pope, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — III. pope, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — IV. pope, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 — V. pope, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 7
 — VI. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 — VII. (Hildebrand), pope, 11th cent. p. 336, s. 10; p. 357, s. 6; p. 374, s. 31
 — VIII. pope, 12th cent. p. 402, s. 5; p. 406, s. 14; p. 414, n.
 — IX. pope, 13th cent. p. 446, s. 10; p. 467, n.
 — X. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 13; p. 468, n.
 — XI. pope, 14th cent. p. 495, s. 13
 — XII. pope, 15th cent. p. 256, s. 2
 — XIII. pope, p. 613, s. 13
 — XIV. pope, p. 613, s. 13
 — XV. pope, p. 734, s. 1
 Gretzer, James, p. 782, s. 32
 Grevinchovius, Nicholas, p. 842, s. 8
 Grevius, Philip, of Paris, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — John, p. 843, s. 8
 Greuloch, Joachim, p. 809, s. 41
 Gribaldus, Matthew, p. 703, s. 6
 Gröningenists, Mennonites, p. 858, s. 5
 Groot, Gerhard, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 Gross Mennonites, p. 858, s. 3
 Grossius, John, Carmelite, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Grotius, Hugo, p. 732, s. 29; p. 747, s. 14; p. 813, s. 7; p. 838, s. 3; p. 839, s. 6
 Gruet, James, p. 682, s. 39
 Gruytrodius, James, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Gualbert, John, founder of monks of Vallombrosa, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24
 Gualdo of Corbey, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
 Gualter or Walter of St. Victor, 12th cent. p. 418, s. 6
 Guasquinus, Robert, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Gusterius or Galerius, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 Guelph, duke of Bavaria, 11th cent. p. 861, s. 11
 Guericke, canon of Tours, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 Guilbert or Gilbert of Nogent, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 Guido, Balduus, jurist, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — French monk and writer, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
 — bishop of Perpignan, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — Juvenalis, 13th cent. p. 535, s. 19
 — Guigo or Guido, monk, 12th cent. p. 414; n.
 — Guise, family of, p. 666, s. 15
 Guitmund, archbishop of Aversa, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
 Gullelmus, librarian at Rome, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — de Baldensel, traveller, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 Gunther, Ligurinus, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5
 Gustavus Vasa, p. 582, s. 29
 — Adolphus, p. 742, s. 6
 Guthebold, missionary, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8

Guy, king of Jerusalem, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 10
 Guyon, Jane Maria Bouvieres de la, p. 776, s. 50
 Gyula or Gylas, duke of Hungary, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
 HABERKORN, Peter, p. 745, s. 12
 Hackspahn, Theodore, p. 792, s. 15
 Haco, king of Norway, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
 Hadrian I. pope, 8th cent. p. 270, s. 9; p. 277, n.
 — II. pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — IV. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 9; p. 414, n.
 — V. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 14
 — VI. pope, 16th cent. p. 575, s. 18
 Heathen: see Pagan
 Hagen, Adolsteen, king of Norway, p. 327, s. 8
 Hager, Balthazar, p. 740, s. 2
 Hainricus, German annalist, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 Hailton or Alton, Armenian, 14th cent. p. 503, n.
 Hales, Henry de, 14th cent. p. 503, s. 30
 Hales, John, p. 830, s. 24; p. 841, n.
 Hailtardus, bishop of Cambrai, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Halle, university, p. 790, s. 11; p. 801, n.
 Hallowan heretics, 13th cent. p. 475, s. 2
 Hallelujah, burial of, 15th cent. p. 554, n. 2
 Hamburg, an archbishopric, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 2
 Hamel, a Jesuit, p. 625, s. 39
 Hamilton, Patrick, p. 586, n. 1
 Hämmerlein or Malleolus, Felix, p. 554, n. 5
 — Thomas: see Kempis
 Hampton Court Conference, p. 820, n. 2
 Hanau, church of, p. 675, s. 26
 Harald Klack, king of Jutland, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 1
 — Graufeldt, king of Norway, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
 — Blatand, Gormon's son, p. 326, s. 7
 Hardenberg, Albert, p. 665, s. 14
 Harduin, John, p. 761, s. 31
 Harphius, Henry, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24
 Hartmutus or Hartmann of St. Gall, 9th cent. p. 306, n.
 Hattem, Pontianus van, p. 836, s. 36
 Hattemists, p. 836, &c.
 Hatto, bishop of Basil, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Havelburg, a bishopric, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 9
 Hauranne, John de Verger de, abbot of St. Cyran, p. 768, s. 40; 772, n. 3
 Haymo of Halberstadt, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 302, s. 14
 Hebrew, studied, in 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6; in 14th, p. 487, s. 4
 Heddius, English musician, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 Hederick, Thomas, p. 740, s. 2
 Hegesippus, Ecclesiastical Historian, 2d cent. p. 65, n.
 Heldegger, John Henry, p. 837, s. 37
 Heidelberg catechism, p. 666, s. 14
 Heilbron, a Protestant city, p. 581, n. 1
 Heilbronn, James, p. 745, s. 12
 Helmberg, Gregory de, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
 Heinlus, John, p. 787, s. 5
 Helena, mother of Constantine, 4th cent. p. 143, n. 1
 Helinandus, a chronicler, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 Hellogabalus, emperor, 3d cent. p. 85, s. 2
 Helladius, bishop of Tarsus, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — Alexander, p. 779, n. 1
 Hellwig, Christian, p. 750, s. 16
 Helmold, a chronicler, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 Helmont, John Baptist, p. 733, s. 30
 Helmetadrian controversy, p. 795, s. 20
 Helvetians converted in 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3
 Hemming, Nicholas, p. 676, s. 26; p. 811, s. 1
 Hemmingford, Walter, historian, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Henrichus, John, p. 787, s. 5; p. 799, s. 24
 Henozicon, an edict of Zeno, 5th cent. p. 207, s. 20
 Henricians, sect, 12th cent. p. 426, s. 8
 Henry II. German emperor, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 — III. German emperor, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 4
 — IV. German emperor, 11th and 12th cent. p. 359, s. 8; p. 401, s. 2
 — V. German emperor, 12th cent. p. 361, s. 11; p. 401, s. 2
 — archbishop of Upsal, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 3 — of Huntingdon, historian, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
 — the Lion, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 5
 — founder of the Henricians, 12th cent. p. 424, s. 6
 — de Segusio, cardinal, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 Raspe, of Thuringia, 12th cent. p. 437, s. 3
 — of Ghent, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — Suso or Amandus of Constance, a mystic, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
 — de Urimaria or Trimaria, 14th cent. p. 512, n.

- Henry Knighton, English chronicler, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
- I. archbishop of Cologne, 14th cent. p. 518, s. 4
- VIII. king of England, p. 586, n. 1; p. 591, s. 11; p. 596, s. 9
- III. king of France, p. 666, s. 15; p. 667, n.
- IV. king of France, p. 666, s. 15; p. 667, n.; p. 752, s. 19
- Henschenius, Godfrey, p. 763, s. 32
- Heraclian of Chalcedon, 6th cent. p. 235, s. 1
- Heraclidas, monk of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
- Heraclitus, Greek writer, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
- Heraclius, emperor, 7th cent. p. 255, s. 4
- Heraclianus of Chalcedon, 6th cent. p. 235, s. 1
- Horard, archbishop of Tours, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Herbert, Edward of Cherbury, p. 727, s. 22
- a detector of Paucicians, 11th cent. p. 335, s. 3
- Herembert or Erchembert, historian, 9th cent. p. 303, n.
- Herosius, what, p. 4, s. 11; in 1st cent. pp. 45, 46, &c.; 2d, p. 75; 3d, p. 107; 4th, p. 157; 5th, p. 197; 6th, p. 235; 7th, p. 254; 8th, p. 284; 9th, p. 320; 10th, p. 342; 11th, p. 384; p. 12th, p. 423; 13th, p. 475; 14th, p. 517; 15th, p. 554
- Heric, a monk, 9th cent. p. 304, s. 14
- Heriger of Laubes, 10th cent. p. 339, n.
- Hermann, converted Jew and writer, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
- Hermannus Contractus, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- de Lerbeck, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
- Hermias, Shepherd of, p. 39, s. 21
- Hermes, ancient pagan philosopher, p. 60, s. 8; p. 70, n. 3
- Hermits or Eremites see Eremites
- Harnogones of 2d cent. p. 83, s. 22
- Harnolius, Barbarus, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 5; p. 547, n.
- Haro, Platonic philosopher, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 5
- Herod the Great, p. 13, s. 1
- Herrenhuters, p. 871, s. 17
- Herrull, invader Italy, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 1; p. 213, s. 1
- converted, 6th cent. p. 213, s. 1
- Herveus Natalis, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
- Herveus of Dol, p. 414, n.
- Heschusius, Tilemann, p. 657, s. 46
- Hesso-Cassel, adopts reformed doctrines, p. 785, s. 1
- Hessians, converted, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 2
- Hesychasts, Greek monks, 14th cent. p. 517, s. 1
- Hesychius of Egypt, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
- bishop of Jerusalem, 7th cent. p. 247, s. 5
- Hettius or Hetto, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
- Hetzer, Lewis, p. 647, s. 5; p. 699, s. 3
- Hervellus, John, p. 731, s. 26
- Hexapla of Origen, p. 100, s. 4
- Heyling, Peter, p. 783, s. 6
- Hierarchy, its origin, p. 62; see more under, Church, government of
- Hiorax and Hieracites, 3d cent. p. 110, s. 11
- Hierocles, philosopher, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 17
- Hieronymus, a S. Pide, 15th cent. p. 514, n.
- Hierotheus, missionary, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
- Higden, Ranulph, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- High church, English, p. 830, s. 24; p. 831, s. 26; p. 872, s. 23; p. 873, s. 24
- Hilarion, Syrian monk, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
- Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, 4th cent. p. 137, s. 10
- bishop of Arles, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
- of Rome, Luciferian, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
- bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
- Hildebert of Le Mans, 11th cent. p. 374, s. 31
- Hildebrand: see Gregory VII. pope
- Joachim, p. 792, s. 15
- Hildegard, 12th cent. p. 414, n. p. 417, s. 2
- Hildenissen, Gullelmus de, 15th cent. p. 554, s. 4
- Hilduin, 9th cent. p. 300, s. 14
- Hilnmar, archbishop of Rheims, 9th cent. p. 294, s. 6; 302, s. 14
- bishop of Laon, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Hindoo literature, p. 28, s. 3, n. 5
- Hippolytus of 3d cent. p. 94, s. 7; p. 102, s. 7
- Hirsauian monks, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24
- History, ecclesiastical, what, p. 3, s. 1; external and internal, pp. 3, 4; how to be treated, p. 4; dangers to be avoided, pp. 5, 6; its uses, p. 6
- Hoadley, Benjamin, p. 873, s. 23
- Hobbes, Thomas, p. 727, s. 22; p. 814, s. 9
- Hoburg, Christian, p. 809, s. 43
- Hochstraten, James, of Cologne, 16th cent. p. 568, s. 5
- H. dy, Humphrey, p. 832, n. 1
- Hoe, Matthias, p. 740, s. 2; p. 741, n. 1; p. 792, s. 16; p. 787, s. 4
- Hoffman, John, 15th cent. p. 528, s. 6
- Hoffmann, rector at Leipsic, p. 528, s. 6; p. 642, s. 13
- Daniel, p. 790, s. 10
- Melchior, p. 687, s. 5
- Hollness in images, contested, 11th cent. p. 379, s. 12
- Holstenius, Lucas, p. 750, s. 16; p. 763, s. 32; p. 779, s. 2
- Holy synod of Russia, p. 782, s. 5
- Homiliarium of Charlemagne, p. 279, s. 5
- Honorius, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
- of Autun, 12th cent. p. 412, s. 23
- I. bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 250, n; he was not infallible, p. 250, n. 2
- II. antipope, 11th cent. p. 403, s. 7
- II. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 7; p. 414, n.
- III. pope, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 9; p. 467, n.
- IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 15
- Hoogerbeets, Rombout, p. 838, s. 3; p. 830, s. 5
- Höpfner, Henry, p. 787, s. 4
- Horie, Russian heresiarch, p. 782, n.
- Hormidas, bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
- Horne, Andrew, 14th cent. p. 488, n. 4
- Hornelius, Conrad, p. 796, s. 21
- Hosius of Corduba, 4th cent. p. 135, n. 4; p. 158, s. 4
- Stanislaus, p. 617, s. 21
- Hospinian, Rudolph, p. 683, s. 44
- Houppeland, William, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
- Hubald or Hugbald, 10th cent. p. 341, s. 6
- Huber, Samuel, p. 687, s. 44
- Ulrich, p. 835, s. 33
- Hubmeyer, Balthazar, p. 687, s. 5
- Huet, Peter Daniel, p. 764, s. 32; p. 737, s. 37
- Hugh Capet, king of France, 11th cent. p. 352, s. 3
- Hugo of Limoges, 11th cent. p. 383, s. 19
- abbot of Cluny, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- of Tours, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- archbishop of Lyons, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
- do Britolio, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
- of St. Flavinius, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- Abbot of Fleury, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- do Paganis, founder of the Knights Templars, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 14
- of St. Victor, 12th cent. p. 411, s. 23
- Etherianus, 12th cent. p. 414, n.
- a S. Caro, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
- Pratenius, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
- Huguenots: see France, reformation in
- Hulderic or Udalric, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
- Hülsemann, John, p. 792, s. 15; p. 796, s. 21
- Humbert, cardinal, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 31; p. 378, s. 10
- de Romanis, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
- Humiliati, monks, 13th cent. p. 449, s. 19
- Huneric, Arian king of the Vandals in Africa, 5th cent. persecutes, p. 198, s. 4
- Hungarians converted, 9th, 10th, and 11th cent. p. 326, s. 6
- Hungary, reformation in, p. 535, s. 31, n. 2; p. 674, s. 25; p. 743, s. 8
- Hunnius, Egidius, p. 792, s. 15
- Nicholas, p. 792, s. 15
- Helfredius Ulric, p. 750, s. 16
- Huns, in 6th cent. p. 216, s. 3
- of Pannonia, converted in 8th cent. p. 265, s. 6
- Huss, John, 15th cent. p. 528, s. 5; p. 529, n. 3; p. 544, n.
- Hussinetz, Nicolaus de, p. 550, s. 3
- Hussites, and Hussite war, 15th cent. p. 547, s. 3
- Hutter, Leonard, p. 792, s. 15
- Hyle, van, of the Manicheans, p. 108, s. 3
- Hypatia, female philosopher, 4th cent. p. 126, s. 2, n. 8
- Hypolytus of Thebes, 10th cent. p. 337, n.
- Hypothetical Universalists, p. 817, s. 14
- Hyrcanians heard the gospel, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1
- JABALAH, Nestorian, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1
- Jacobites or Monophysites, p. 530, s. 10; see Monophysites
- or Monothelites, p. 475, s. 1
- monks, 13th cent. p. 449, s. 19
- or Jacobins, the Dominicans, p. 482, n. 2
- Jacobus Baradeus, restorer of the Monophysites, in 6th cent. p. 207, s. 20; p. 286, s. 6
- or James de Vitry, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5

- Jacobus I. king of Arragon, 13th cent. p. 436, s. 10
 — de Voragine, 13th cent. p. 441, n. 2; p. 464, s. 44
 — de Benedictis, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 — bishop of Lausanne, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — de Marchia, 15th cent. p. 552, s. 14
 — of Brixen, 15th cent. p. 552, s. 14
 — Magni, monk, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — de Paradiso, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 — Piccolominiæus, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 — Perezius, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
Jacobellus de Misa, 15th cent. p. 530, s. 8
Jagello of Lithuania, 14th cent. p. 484, s. 3
Jamblichus, Platonic philosopher, 4th cent. p. 126, s. 2, n. 5
James, son of Zebedee, martyr, p. 21, n.
 — the Just, or the Less, martyr, p. 21, n.
 — bishop of Nisibis, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — bishop of Edessa, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 4
 — I. king of England, p. 634, n.; p. 744, s. 10; p. 787, s. 4; p. 819, s. 19; p. 825, n. 2
 — II. king of England, p. 744, s. 10; p. 826, n.; p. 831, s. 26
Jansenius, Cornelius, p. 768, s. 20; p. 770, s. 42
Jansenists, p. 753, s. 26; p. 766, s. 36; p. 769, s. 41; p. 770, s. 42, &c.; p. 869, s. 12
Japan missions, p. 602, s. 3; p. 721, s. 15
Jasidians, an oriental sect, p. 634, s. 18
Java, Dutch missions to, p. 723, s. 17
Javorski, Stephen, p. 782, s. 5; p. 870, s. 13
Ibas, bishop of Edessa, 5th cent. p. 186, n.; p. 232, s. 10
Iberians, converted, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 20
Iceland, converted, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
Idacius, Clarus, a Spanish bishop, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
Idatius, or Hydatius, Spanish bishop, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
Jeremie, Peter, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
Jerome, or Hieronymus, monk and learned father, 4th cent. p. 139, s. 10, n. 1; p. 144, s. 4; p. 153, s. 24; p. 195, s. 14
 — of Prague, 15th cent. p. 531, s. 7
Jerusalem, first church there, p. 20, s. 5; demolished by the Romans, A.D. 70, p. 23, s. 3; rebuilt, and called Elia Capitolina, in 2d cent. p. 55, s. 11; captured by the Saracens, 7th cent. p. 248, n. 9; patriarchate of, p. 128, n. 2; p. 627, s. 3; kingdom of set up, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 7; terminated in 13th cent. p. 435, s. 8; council of, p. 781, s. 3
Jesujabas, a Nestorian patriarch, 7th cent. p. 239, s. 1; p. 254, s. 3
Jesse, bishop of Amiens, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
Jesuates, monks, 14th cent. p. 566, s. 35
Jesuits, p. 601, s. 2; p. 610, s. 10; p. 621, s. 23; p. 622, s. 30; p. 714, s. 3, &c.; p. 724, s. 19; p. 746, s. 13; p. 750, s. 17; p. 752, s. 18, &c.; p. 753, s. 21, n. 4; p. 759, s. 28; p. 761, s. 31; p. 764, s. 33; p. 767, s. 37; p. 768, s. 40; p. 770, s. 43; p. 866, s. 2
Jetzer, John, story of, p. 562, n. 3
Jews, civil and religious state of, at Christ's birth, p. 13, s. 1; notices of, 1st cent. pp. 23, 31; 2d, pp. 55, 75; 3d, p. 90; 4th, p. 121; 5th, p. 174, n. 3; 6th, p. 215; 7th, p. 241, s. 5; 11th, p. 348, n. 1; 12th, p. 394, s. 15; 13th, p. 433, n. 5; 14th, p. 485, s. 3; 15th, p. 522, s. 1
Iconoclasti, Iconoduli, and Iconomachi, who, p. 281, s. 11
Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, 2d cent. p. 38, s. 20; p. 55, s. 2; Syriac epistles of, p. 38, n.
 — of Constantinople, 9th cent. p. 299, n.; p. 316, s. 28
 — name of the Jacobite patriarchs, p. 783, s. 6
Ignorance, holy, p. 624, s. 37
Iejas, emperor of Japan, p. 722, n.
Ildefonsus, of Toledo, 7th cent. p. 248, s. 6
Image worship, in 4th cent. p. 143, s. 2; in 5th, p. 191, s. 2; 6th, p. 230, s. 2; 7th, p. 250, s. 1; 8th, p. 272, s. 12; p. 280, s. 9; 9th, p. 310, s. 14; 10th, p. 339, s. 3
Immaculate conception of Mary, debated, p. 422, s. 19; p. 515, s. 5; p. 553, s. 2; p. 562, n. 3; p. 774, n. 2; feast of, 15th cent. p. 553, s. 2
Imola, John de, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 — Alexander de, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
Impanation, what, p. 664, s. 12
Impostors, the three, a spurious book, p. 437, s. 3, n. 3
Imputation, doctrine of, p. 817, s. 15; p. 837, n. 4
Incense in worship, 3d cent. p. 105, s. 2
Independence of primitive churches, p. 85, s. 14; p. 62, s. 3
Independents, English, p. 672, s. 21; p. 814, s. 9; p. 822, s. 21, n. 3; p. 823, n.
 — American, p. 725, s. 20; p. 824, n. 4
Index, expurgatory, p. 609, s. 9
India, missions to, p. 602, s. 3; p. 715, s. 7; of the West, America, p. 724, s. 19
Indians, (Arabs) converted by Pantæsen, p. 51, s. 3
Indifferent things, what to be so accounted, p. 803, s. 31
Indulgences, 12th cent. p. 417, s. 3; 13th, p. 453, s. 20; 14th, p. 492, s. 6; 15th, p. 554, s. 2, n. 1; 16th, p. 561, s. 8; p. 564, s. 17; p. 566, s. 3
Infallibility of popes, p. 622, s. 32; p. 770, s. 43
Infralapsarians, p. 815, s. 10; p. 872, s. 21
Ingulphus, abbot of Croyland, p. 375, n.
Innocent I. bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 — II. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 7; p. 415, n.
 — III. pope, 12th and 13th cent. p. 406, s. 14; p. 410, s. 23; p. 433, s. 3; p. 445, s. 6; p. 469, s. 2
 — IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 11; p. 468, n.
 — V. pope, 13th cent. p. 463, n.
 — VI. pope, 14th cent. p. 495, s. 12
 — VII. pope, 15th cent. p. 520, s. 2
 — VIII. pope, 15th cent. p. 534, s. 17
 — IX. pope, p. 613, s. 13
 — X. pope, p. 738, s. 1; p. 752, n. 4
 — XI. pope, p. 739, s. 1; p. 754, s. 22
 — XII. pope, p. 739, s. 1
 — XIII. pope, p. 868, s. 7
Inquisition, its origin, 13th cent. p. 451, s. 24, p. 476, s. 3; its modes of trial, p. 477, s. 5, n. 2; in 14th cent. p. 518, s. 3; in 15th, p. 554, s. 2; p. 599, s. 12; p. 600, s. 13; p. 601, s. 2; p. 609, s. 9
Insubatati, Waldensians, 12th cent. p. 428, s. 11
Intention, rightly directed, p. 623, s. 35; p. 745, s. 34
Interim of Augsburg, p. 594, s. 4; p. 649, s. 29
 — of Leipzig, p. 648, s. 23
Intermediate state, controversy, 14th cent. p. 494, s. 9
Interpreters of Scripture: see Commentators
Investiture, right of, 11th cent. p. 364, s. 14, n. 2; p. 368, s. 21; 12th, p. 401, s. 3
Joachim, abbot of Flora, 12th cent. p. 456, s. 33; p. 483, s. 15
Joanna, popess, 9th cent. p. 294, s. 4; p. 295, n. 2
Joel, chronologist, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 1
Johannelinus, John, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
Johannes or Jansen, Erasmus, p. 709, s. 14; p. 712, n. 5
Johannite christians, p. 633, s. 17
John, the Baptist, p. 18, s. 3; his festival instituted, p. 235, s. 4
 — the apostle, martyr under Domitian, p. 27, s. 15
 — Adolphus, duke of Holstein, p. 210, s. 1
 — Ægeates, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — Algrin, cardinal, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — Anagnosta, Greek historian, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — Argyropulus, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — Ascunage, 6th cent. p. 238, s. 10
 — bishop of Jerusalem, 4th cent. p. 138, n.
 — Balbus, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6
 — Bassolis, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — Becan of Utrecht, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Beccus or Vecchus, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43
 — Beletius, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Bromiard, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — Brompton, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Burgundio, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Calderinus, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — bishop of Antioch, 5th cent. p. 186, n.; p. 202, s. 10
 — the Faster, bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 219, s. 1; p. 223, s. 8
 — bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 — of Scythopolis, 6th cent. p. 231, s. 6
 — monk, of Spain, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — archbishop of Dara, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — archbishop of Thessalonica, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — de Burgo, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — Camenillo, 10th cent. p. 337, n.
 — Camerterus, bishop of Constantinople, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — Cananus, Greek historian, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — Canonius, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — Capistranus, 15th cent. p. 540, s. 24
 — of Capua, 10th cent. p. 530, s. 5
 — Carpathius, 8th cent. p. 280, s. 7
 — Christian, of Boisenburg, p. 749, s. 16
 — Chrysostom: see Chrysostom
 — Cinnamus, 12th cent. p. 396, s. 1

- John Climacus, Sinaita, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — bishop of Constantinople, 9th cent. p. 276, n.
 — Cyparissiota, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
 — de Monte Corvino, bishop in China, 13th cent. p. 432, s. 2
 — Damasceus, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 2; see Damasceus
 — Darenis, Syriac writer, 8th cent. p. 280, s. 7
 — deacon of Rome, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — metropolitan of Euchaita, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 — Eugenius, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — of Fribourg, 14th cent. p. 610, n.
 — de St. Geminiano, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — Frederick, of Saxony, p. 590, s. 7
 — Frederick, of Brunswick, p. 749, s. 16
 — George, of Saxony, p. 740, s. 2; p. 741, s. 4
 — George IV. of Saxony, p. 800, n.
 — Guallensis or Wallis, 13th cent. p. 463, n.
 — de Hexam, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Honsenius, 14th cent. p. 612, n.
 — of Jandunum, 14th cent. p. 503, s. 30
 — of Jerusalem, St. Knights of, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 13
 — Jacobite patriarch, 15th cent. p. 534, n.
 — Lackland, king of England, 13th cent. p. 415, s. 8
 — de Lugio, 13th cent. p. 425, s. 5
 — archbishop of Lyons, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — of Naples, 14th cent. p. 571, n.
 — Malala, historian, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — Maro, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — Moschus, monk of Palestine, 7th cent. p. 218, n.
 — Nolder, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24
 — of Paris, 13th cent. p. 467, s. 44
 — of Parina, 13th cent. p. 455, s. 32
 — Peckham, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
 — Philoponus, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 2
 — Phocas, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — de Polliaco, 14th cent. p. 497, s. 18
 — Prester or Presbyter: see Presbyter John — Pungens Asinum, 13th cent. p. 473, s. 14
 — of Salisbury, 12th cent. p. 413, s. 23
 — archbishop of Salisbury, 8th cent. p. 261, n. 2
 — Scholasticus, bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — Sootus Erigena, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 303, s. 14
 — Scylitzes, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2
 — Seneca, a jurist, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — Sigismund, of Brandenburg, p. 785, s. 2
 — Sophista, a nominalist, p. 354, s. 9
 — Tambacus, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — Tzimisces, Greek emperor, 10th cent. p. 313, s. 2
 — Xiphilinus, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 — Zonaras, Greek historian, 12th cent. p. 396, s. 1;
 p. 409, s. 22
 — elector of Saxony, p. 579, s. 22; p. 581, s. 23; p. 590, s. 7
 — of Braganza, king of Portugal, p. 753, s. 20
 — de S. Cruce, p. 615, s. 16
 — of Leon, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
 — II. bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — IV. bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 250, n.; p. 256, s. 7
 — VII. pope, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
 — VIII. pope, 9th cent. p. 295, s. 5; p. 305, n.
 — IX. pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — X. pope, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 3
 — XI. pope, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 4
 — XII. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 4
 — XIII. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 6
 — XIV. pope, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 7
 — XV. pope, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 7
 — XVI. pope, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 7
 — XIX. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 — XXI. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 14; p. 468, n.
 — XXII. pope, 14th cent. p. 492, s. 6
 — XXIII. pope, 15th cent. p. 528, s. 3
 — Iona, Hil or I-colum-kill, 6th cent. p. 214, n. 1
 — Jonas, an Irish monk, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 3; p. 250, n.
 — — bishop of Orleans, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 — — Justin, p. 643, s. 15
 — Jordan, bishop of Limoges, contest about St. Martial, 11th cent. p. 383, s. 19 — — Dominican general, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — Joris or George, David, p. 697, s. 24
 — Jornandes or Jordanes, historian, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — Joseph of Thessalonica, 9th cent. p. 293, n.
 — — Alshaher Biltabib, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
 — Joseph Briennius, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23
 — — bishop of Constantinople, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — — bishop of Modon, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — Jovian, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
 — Jovinian, Italian monk and reformer, 4th cent. p. 152, s. 22 — Ireland, reformation in, p. 598, s. 11; p. 599, n.
 — Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, 2d cent. p. 49, s. 15; p. 53, s. 5; p. 63, s. 5
 — — count and bishop of Tyre, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — — Christopher, p. 651, s. 33
 — Irene, express of Constantinople, 8th cent. p. 270, s. 10; p. 282, s. 13, n. 3
 — Irish nation, converted in 5th cent. p. 175, s. 6
 — — the first scholastics, 8th cent. p. 266, s. 3
 — — presbyterians, account of, in 17th cent. p. 823, n.
 — Isaac, a converted Jew, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — — bishop of Nineva, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — — bishop of Langres, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — — patriarch in Armenia, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — — Argyrus, 14th cent. p. 508, n.
 — — Isbranli, Russian sect. p. 781, s. 4
 — Isenburch, church of, p. 675, s. 26
 — Isidorus Hispalensis, 6th cent. p. 179, s. 5; p. 184, s. 10, n. 1
 — — of Gaza, a philosopher, p. 127, s. 2; p. 28, s. 4
 — — of Corduba, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 — — of Pelusium, 5th cent. p. 192, s. 5
 — — of Seville, 6th cent. p. 218, s. 2; p. 228, s. 9
 — — Pacensis (of Badajoz), 5th cent. p. 227, n.
 — — Ruthensis, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 — — Clarius, p. 620, s. 26
 — Isny, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1
 — Isychius or Heasychius, bishop of Jerusalem, 7th cent. p. 247, s. 5
 — Italy, reformation in, p. 599, s. 13
 — Jubilee Romish, 13th cent. p. 474, s. 3; 15th, p. 516, s. 1; p. 535, s. 17
 — Judas, a writer of 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 — Judicium Del, or Ordeal, 9th cent. p. 319, s. 3, n. 3; p. 363, s. 1
 — Judgment-day, expected in the 10th cent. p. 339, s. 3
 — Julia Mammæa, 3d cent. p. 89, s. 2
 — Julian, emperor, 4th cent. p. 120, s. 12, n. 3; p. 123, s. 17
 — — a Pelagian bishop and writer, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 — — bishop of Ilicarnassus, 6th cent. p. 224, n. p. 237, s. 8
 — — Pomerius, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — — Pomerius, bishop of Toledo, 7th cent. p. 219, s. 6
 — — a Spanish count, 8th cent. p. 265, s. 2
 — Juliana, lady Rosamond, p. 805, s. 34
 — Julius Africanus, 3d cent. p. 93, s. 7; p. 94, n. 1
 — — Firmicus Maternus, poet, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 — — I. bishop of Rome, 4th cent. p. 112, n.
 — — II. pope, p. 559, s. 4
 — — III. pope, p. 612, s. 13
 — — Henry, duke of Brunswick, p. 612, s. 13; p. 656, s. 42
 — Junilius, bishop in Africa, 6th cent. p. 229, n. p. 230, s. 3
 — Junius, Robert, p. 723, n. 3
 — Ivo of Chartres, 11th cent. p. 371, s. 29; p. 373, s. 31
 — Jurieu, Peter, p. 819, s. 18
 — Justification, contest on, in 1st cent. p. 42, s. 12; in 16th, p. 652, s. 35
 — Justin Martyr, 2d cent. p. 63, s. 5, n. 2
 — — bishop in Sicily, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 — Justinian I. emperor, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 3; p. 229, n.
 — — Lawrence, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24
 — — Benedict, p. 620, s. 26
 — Justus, a Spanish bishop, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — Juvenal, bishop of Ælia (Jerusalem) 5th cent. p. 180, s. 2
 — Juvenius, Christian poet, 4th cent. p. 141, s. 10, n. 3
 — KABBALA, Jewish, p. 16, s. 13; p. 31, s. 10
 — Kalifs, Mohammed's successors, p. 244, s. 6
 — Kardargus, Nestorian, 8th cent. p. 260, n. 1
 — Kelth, George, p. 847, s. 3; p. 848, s. 5
 — Kempis, Thomas à, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24
 — Kempton, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1
 — Kenchan or Coiremchan, 12th cent. p. 391, s. 7
 — Kent, kingdom of, converted, 7th cent. p. 213, s. 2
 — Kepler, John, p. 731, s. 26
 — Killian, Irish missionary, p. 240, s. 106
 — — Kneeling in prayer, 3d cent. p. 36, s. 5
 — Knights of faith and charity, 13th cent. p. 460, s. 19
 — Knorr, Christian, p. 733, s. 30

- Knox, John, p. 598, s. 10; p. 666, s. 16; p. 668, n.
 Knutzen, Matthew, p. 728, s. 23
 Kober, Tobias, p. 804, s. 40
 Koddeus or van der Kodde, John, James, Hadrian, and Gisbert, p. 863, s. 1
 Koran, its origin and preservation, p. 242, s. 2, n. 2
 Kortholt, Christian, p. 792, s. 15
 Kotter, Christopher, p. 809, s. 41
 Kuhlmann, Quirin, p. 733, s. 30; p. 803, s. 40
 Kunrath, Henry, p. 642, s. 12
- LABADIE, John, p. 864, s. 3, n. 2
 Labadists, sect, p. 864, s. 3
 Labarum, sacred standard of Constantine, p. 119, n. 5
 Labat, John Baptist, p. 724, n. 5
 Labbe, Philip, p. 761, s. 31
 Lactantius, writer of 4th cent. p. 138, s. 10, n. 2
 Laderchius, James, p. 616, s. 18
 Lalme, Jesuit general, p. 612, n. 3
 Lambecius, Peter, p. 750, s. 10
 Lambert, bishop of Arras, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
 — of Aschaffenburg, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
 Lami, Bernhard, p. 760, s. 30; p. 763, s. 32
 Lancelot, Claude, p. 762, s. 31
 Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, 11th cent. p. 353,
 s. 7; p. 373, s. 31
 Langham, Simon, of Canterbury, 14th cent. p. 497, s. 19
 Langres, council of, 9th cent. p. 315, s. 23
 Langton, Stephen, of Canterbury, 13th cent. p. 445, s. 8
 Laonicus Chalcondylas, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 Lapide, Cornelius, s. p. 763, s. 32
 Lapsed Christians, p. 88, s. 3
 Lasco, John, s. p. 673, n. 4
 Lateran council, in 12th cent. p. 405, s. 13, 13th, p. 469,
 s. 2
 Laternmann, John, p. 797, n.; p. 799, s. 24
 Latitudinarians, English, p. 830, s. 24
 Latteburys, John, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Lavater, Lewis, p. 683, s. 44
 Laud, William, p. 744, s. 10; p. 821, s. 20; p. 822, n. 1
 Launol, John, p. 763, s. 32; p. 753, s. 21
 Laura of monks, what, p. 232, n. 1
 Laurentius, a martyr, 3d cent. p. 88, s. 6
 — bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 220, s. 4
 — bishop of Novara, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
- Law: see Canon and Civil Law
 Leade, Jane, p. 865, s. 5
 Legder, archbishop of Seville, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 Learning, state of, in 1st cent. p. 28, &c.; 2d, p. 58;
 3d, p. 90; 4th, p. 126; 5th, p. 177; 6th, p. 217; 7th,
 p. 244; 8th, p. 265; 9th, p. 291; 10th, p. 329; 11th, p. 351;
 12th, p. 396; 13th, p. 438; 14th, p. 486; 15th, p. 524
 Lebwin, missionary, 8th cent. p. 263, s. 5
 Lectors or readers, p. 92, s. 5
 Leenhof, Frederick van, p. 873, s. 25
 Legates, papal, p. 444, s. 4
 Legion, thundering, in 2d cent. p. 54, s. 9
 Leibnitz, Godfrey William von, p. 731, s. 26; p. 736, s.
 35; p. 791, s. 11; p. 871, s. 18
 Leidradus of Lyons, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 Leipsic university, founded in 15th cent. p. 530, s. 6
 — dispute, p. 569, s. 9
 — conference, p. 787, s. 4
 Lemmermann, Abraham, p. 863, s. 2
 Lent, in 4th cent. p. 156, s. 6
 Leo of Aridia, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 — bishop of Chalcedon, 11th cent. p. 379, s. 12
 — the grammarian, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2
 — the Wise, a bishop, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — Marcianus, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — I. the Great, bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 179, s. 1;
 p. 185, s. 11; p. 187, n. 1
 — II. bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 — III. the Isaurian, 8th cent. p. 264, s. 1; p. 277, n.
 — IV. emperor, 9th cent. p. 270, s. 10; p. 282, s. 13
 — V. the Armenian, emperor, 9th cent. p. 310, s. 14
 — VI. the philosopher, emperor, 9th cent. p. 300, n.
 p. 316, s. 32
 — III. pope, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 — IV. pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 — V. pope, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 2
 — VII. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 4
 — VIII. pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 5
 — IX. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 4; p. 374, n.
 — IX. king of France, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 7
 — X. pope, p. 560, s. 71; p. 666, s. 8; p. 568, s. 6; p.
 672, s. 12; p. 576, s. 18; p. 603, s. 5, n.
- Leo XI. pope, p. 738, s. 1
 Leonidas, father of Origen, 3d cent. p. 87, s. 1
 Leonists, Waldensian, p. 428, s. 11
 Leontinus Pilatus, 14th cent. p. 487, s. 4
 Leontius, Arian bishop of Antioch, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — of Byzantium, 6th cent. p. 223, s. 8
 — of Neapolis, Cyprus, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 Lesly, Norman, p. 668, n.
 Less, Leonard, p. 625, s. 39
 Leszynsky, Casimir, p. 728, s. 23
 Leutard, a reformer, 10th cent. p. 313, s. 3
 Leutherie of Sens, 11th cent. p. 379, s. 13
 Lewis of Bavaria, 13th cent. p. 433, s. 4
 — of Bavaria, emperor, 14th cent. p. 493, s. 8; p.
 504, s. 31
 — the Meek, emperor, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 1
 — VII. king of France, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 9
 — VIII. king of France, 13th cent. p. 475, s. 8
 — IX. or St. Lewis, king of France, 13th cent. p.
 478, s. 6; p. 479, s. 8
 — XII. king of France, p. 559, s. 5
 — XIII. king of France, p. 811, s. 17
 — XIV. king of France, p. 751, s. 12; p. 753, s. 21;
 p. 760, s. 29; p. 775, n. 2; p. 811, s. 4; p. 869, s. 10
 Libanotis, converted, 5th cent. p. 174, s. 3
 Libanius, sophist, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 16; p. 123, s. 17;
 n. 4
 Libellateli, what, p. 88, s. 3
 Liberatus of Carthage, 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9
 — general of the Coelestine Eremites, 13th cent.
 p. 458, s. 38
 Liberius, bishop of Rome, 4th cent. p. 142, n. p. 165,
 s. 14
 Libertines, spiritual, p. 681, s. 38
 — of Geneva, p. 682, s. 39
 Licinianus, bishop in Spain, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 Licinius, emperor, 4th cent. p. 116, s. 6
 Light of the glory of God, disputes on, 14th cent. p. 517,
 s. 1
 Lignon, Peter du, p. 864, n. 2
 Limborch, Philip, p. 843, s. 9
 Lindau, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1
 Lindwood, William, English bishop, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Lisol, a Paulician, 11th cent. p. 385, s. 3
 Litanies to the saints, 6th cent. p. 234, s. 3, n. 3
 Literature and learning in 16th cent. p. 551, s. 3; p. 563,
 s. 13; p. 563, s. 14; p. 611, s. 10; p. 679, s. 31; p. 693, s.
 19; p. 711, s. 20; in 17th cent. p. 730, s. 25; p. 760, s.
 29; p. 789, s. 9; p. 812, s. 6
 Lithuanians, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2; p. 436, s. 9
 Liturgies, p. 44, s. 6; p. 106, s. 5; p. 154, s. 3; p. 234, s. 3
 Livonians, converted, 12th cent. p. 300, s. 4
 Locke, John, p. 766, s. 31
 Lohards, 13th cent. p. 462, s. 42; p. 499, s. 20; p. 500,
 s. 36, n. 2
 Lombard, Peter, 12th cent. p. 412, s. 23
 Lombards, occupy Italy, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 3; become Christians, p. 254, s. 2
 Loquis, Martin, 15th cent. p. 548, s. 6
 Lord's prayer, use of, p. 106, n. 11
 Lord's supper, in 1st cent. p. 20, s. 5; p. 32, s. 1; 2d,
 p. 74, s. 12; 3d, p. 105, s. 3; 4th, p. 156, s. 8; 6th, p.
 234, s. 3; 8th, p. 284, s. 1; 9th, p. 312, s. 19; 11th, p.
 379, s. 13; 13th, p. 473, s. 14
 Lothair, emperor, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 4; p. 302, s. 14
 Love feasts, ayazari, p. 20, s. 5; p. 33, s. 7; p. 41, s. 7; p.
 196, s. 3
 Louvigni, Borniere de, p. 776, s. 49
 Low church, English, p. 831, s. 26; p. 832, s. 27; p.
 872, s. 23
 Loyola, Ignatius, canonized, p. 778, s. 52; p. 610, s. 10
 Lubec, a bishopric, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 5
 Lubieniezky, Stanislaus, p. 861, s. 4
 Lubin, Elth, p. 792, s. 15
 Lucaris, Cyril, p. 780, s. 2
 Lucas Chrysoberges, bishop of Constantinople, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 — bishop of Tuy, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — a Spinozist, p. 780, s. 24
 Lucian of Antioch, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
 Lucifer of Cagliari, 4th cent. p. 142, n.; p. 150, s. 20
 Luciferians, sect, 4th cent. p. 142, n.; p. 150, s. 20
 Lucius, king of England, 2d cent. p. 52, s. 4
 — II. pope, 12th cent. p. 403, s. 5; p. 415, n.
 — III. pope, 12th cent. p. 406, s. 14; p. 415, n.
 Ludger of Mameggen, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Ludolf, Job, p. 783, s. 6

Moralists and morals: see Theology practical Morality of the fathers, p. 68, s. 10

— see Religion, state of

Moravians, converted, 9th cent. p. 288, s. 3; 16th, p. 673, s. 24; 18th, p. 871, s. 17

Morgan, Thomas, p. 867, s. 5

Morin, John, p. 762, s. 31, p. 763, s. 31; p. 772, s. 2

Morus, Thomas, 14th cent. p. 811, n.

Mosarabic or Gothic liturgy, p. 383, s. 1

Moschus, John, a monk, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 3

Moses, a Jewish fanatic of Crete, 4th cent. p. 174, s. 3, n. 3

— Barcephas, 9th cent. p. 299, s. 13

Moshelm, his life and character, p. xxi.

Moulin, Peter du, p. 787, s. 4

Moyer, lady, p. 874, s. 27

Mueller, Henry, p. 592, s. 15

— John, p. 592, s. 15

Munster, a seat of Anabaptists, p. 591, s. 10; p. 688, s. 7

Munster, Thomas, p. 578, s. 21; p. 690, s. 4

Muralt, detestable writer, p. 668, s. 6

Musæus, Peter, p. 787, s. 5; p. 792, s. 15

— John, p. 792, s. 15; p. 799, s. 25

Musanus, a writer of 2d cent. p. 66, n.

Musculus, Wolfgang, p. 683, s. 44

Mussatus, Albertinus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.

Mutianus Scholasticus, 6th cent. p. 229, n.

Mysteries, the Pagan, p. 9, s. 12; copied by Christians, p. 72, s. 5

Mystic Theology: see Theology

Mystics, in 2d cent. p. 61, s. 12; 3d, p. 99, s. 2; p. 103, s. 11; 4th, p. 145, s. 5; 5th, p. 193, s. 11; 6th, p. 230, s. 5; 7th, p. 252, s. 4, 11th, p. 378, s. 8; p. 387, s. 4; 12th, p. 420, s. 9; 15th, p. 513, s. 24; p. 552, s. 11; 16th, p. 563, s. 16; p. 621, s. 27; 17th, p. 776, s. 35; p. 775, s. 48; p. 849, s. 6; p. 850, s. 7

NAGEL, Paul, p. 809, s. 42

Nantes, edict of, p. 867, n.; p. 812, s. 4

Naples, reformation in, p. 600, s. 13

Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, 3d cent. p. 97, n.

Narsius, John, p. 843, s. 8

Nassau, joins the reformed, p. 675, s. 26

Natalis or de Natalibus, Peter, 15th cent. p. 544, n.

— Alexander, p. 753, s. 21; p. 762, s. 32

National covenant, Scotch, p. 826, n.

Nations, state of, at Christ's birth, p. 8

Nauclerus, John, 15th cent. p. 548, n.

Navacratius of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 299, n.

Navel-souls, ὁυδαίουψυχοι, 14th cent. p. 517, s. 1

Naumburg, a bishopric, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 9

Nayler, James, p. 847, n. 1

Nazareans, sect in 2d cent. p. 50, s. 17; p. 75, s. 2

Nebrissenensis, Julius Antonius, 15th cent. p. 547, n.

Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, 4th cent. p. 130, s. 7; p. 137, n.

Neercesed, John, p. 772, s. 44

Neoncius, bishop of Emessa, 4th cent. p. 137, n.

Nennius, a British monk, 7th cent. p. 249, n.

Neophytus, 12th cent. p. 396, n. 7

Nepos, bishop in Egypt, 3d cent. p. 103, s. 12

Nert, Philip, p. 616, s. 18; canonized, p. 778, s. 52

Nero, emperor, 1st cent. persecutes, p. 23, s. 5; p. 25, s. 13

Nessel, Daniel, p. 750, s. 16

Nestor, father of Russian history, p. 397, n. 1

Nestorianus, a chronographer, 5th cent. p. 186, n.

Nestorians, what, p. 201, s. 9, n. 2; history of, in 5th cent. p. 199, s. 5; 6th, p. 236, s. 4; 7th, p. 254, s. 3; 8th, p. 284, s. 1; 9th, p. 320, s. 1; 10th, p. 342, s. 1; 11th, p. 384, s. 1; 13th, p. 432, s. 1; p. 475, s. 1; 14th, p. 488, s. 2; 15th, p. 523, s. 1; 16th, p. 609, s. 7, &c.; p. 633, s. 15, &c.; p. 636, s. 23, &c.; 17th, p. 784, s. 8, &c.; 18th, p. 870, s. 13

Nestorius, heresiarch, 5th cent. p. 199, s. 5; p. 200, s. 8

Netherlands, reformation in, p. 566, s. 34, n. 3; p. 599, s. 12

Netter, Thomas, 15th cent. p. 544, n.

Neuser, Adam, p. 709, s. 14

Newburg, dispute at, p. 745, s. 12

Newton, Sir Isaac, p. 731, s. 26; p. 737, s. 36

Nicomas of Romacia, 5th cent. p. 192, s. 6

Nice, council of, 4th cent. p. 161, s. 11; second council of, 8th cent. p. 282, s. 13

Nicephorus, Bryennius, historian, 12th cent. p. 396, s. i — Blēmmla, historian, 13th cent. p. 438, s. i

— p. 463, s. 43

Nicephorus, Cartophylax, 9th cent. p. 399, n.

— Callistus, 14th cent. p. 486, s. 1; p. 507, s. 37

— bishop of Constantinople, 9th cent. p. 298, s. 13

— Greek emperor, 9th cent. p. 301, s. 14

— Gregoras, 14th cent. p. 486, s. 1; p. 508, s. 37

Nicetas, Acominatus or Choniates, Greek historian, 13th cent. p. 438, s. 1; p. 463, s. 43

— David, Greek bishop, 9th cent. p. 299, s. 13

— Byzantinus, 12th cent. p. 410, n.

— Maronita, 13th cent. p. 464, n.

— Pectoratus, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30

— Seidus, 12th cent. p. 410, n.

— Serronius, 11th cent. p. 372, n.

Nicetius, archbishop of Treves, 6th cent. p. 229, n.

Nicias, a writer of 7th cent. p. 283, s. 6

Nicodemus, Eth. monk, 15th cent. p. 538, n.

Nicolas, Henry, p. 639, s. 25

Nicolaitans, sect in 1st cent. p. 49, s. 15

Nicolan de Bentra, archbishop of Peking, 14th cent. p. 434, s. 2

— Cabasilas, 14th cent. p. 487, s. 2

— of Cusa, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24

— of Clairvaux, 12th cent. p. 415, n.

— de Clemangis, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24

— bishop of Constantinople, 9th cent. p. 300, n.

— bishop of Constantinople, 11th cent. p. 372, n.

— Dionysii, 16th cent. p. 548, n.

— Dünkenspühl, 15th cent. p. 535, s. 19; p. 542, n.

— Eymericus, 14th cent. p. 512, n.

— de Gorham, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

— Hanapus, 13th cent. p. 468, n.

— Hydruntinus, 13th cent. p. 464, n.

— Oresmius, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 6; p. 512, n.

— de Mazen, 15th cent. p. 535, s. 19

— Simonis, 15th cent. p. 544, n.

— I. pope, 9th cent. p. 297, s. 9; p. 305, n.

— II. pope, 11th cent. p. 357, s. 5; p. 374, n.

— III. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 14

— IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 15; p. 468, n.

— V. 15th cent. p. 524, s. 1; p. 533, s. 15

Nicole, Peter, p. 748, s. 15; p. 760, s. 30; p. 762, s. 31

Nicon, Armenian, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 12

Nieder, John, 15th cent. p. 515, s. 7; p. 541, s. 24

Niem, Theodor de, 15th cent. p. 544, n.

Nihusius, Barthold, p. 748, s. 15; p. 760, s. 16

Nikon, Russian patriarch, p. 781, n. 5

Nilus of Constantinople, writer, 5th cent. p. 184, s. 10; p. 185, n. 1; p. 193, s. 10

— Cabasilas, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37

— Danyla, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37

— Doxopatrius, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30

— archbishop of Rhodes, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37

Nine Rocks, a book, 13th cent. p. 481, n. 3

Ninian, English bishop, 5th cent. p. 214, n. 1

Nithardus, historian, 9th cent. p. 304, n.

Noailles, Lewis Anthony de, p. 869, s. 11

Nobill, Robert de, p. 715, s. 7

Noëtus, and Notiana, 3d cent. p. 110, s. 12

Nogaret, William, 14th cent. p. 491, s. 2

Noll, Henry, p. 733, s. 30

Nonninalists, 10th cent. p. 331, s. 6; 11th, p. 354, s. 9; 12th, p. 400, s. 9; 13th, p. 471, s. 6; 14th, p. 489, s. 7; 15th, p. 526, s. 7; 16th, p. 563, s. 13

Nonconformists, p. 669, s. 17; p. 830, s. 25; p. 872, s. 23

Nonjurors, p. 831, s. 26, n. 6; p. 832, s. 27

Nonnosus, writer, 6th cent. p. 225, n.

Nonnus, Egyptian poet, 5th cent. p. 186, n.

— monk of Palestine, 6th cent. p. 232, n. 1

Norbert, Præmonstratensis, 12th cent. p. 408, s. 20

Nordlingen city, protested, p. 581, n. 1

Noris, Henry, p. 763, s. 31

Normans, persecute, 9th cent. p. 290, s. 2; 10th, p. 328, s. 2; invade Italy, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3

Norwegians, converted, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 3

Notarii, among Paulicians, p. 321, s. 5

Nothingus of Verona, 9th cent. p. 313, s. 22

Notker, historian, 10th cent. p. 331, s. 5

— Balbulus, 10th cent. p. 341, s. 5

Novatian or Novatus, 3d cent. p. 98, n.; his sect, p. 112, s. 17

Novatus of Carthage, 3d cent. p. 113, s. 17

Nuns, in 12th cent. p. 408, s. 19, n. 2

Nuremberg, diet of, p. 575, s. 18
 ——— peace of, p. 590, s. 7
 ——— city, protested, p. 581, n. 1

OBLATIONS, in 1st cent. p. 35, s. 12; p. 44, s. 7; 2d, p. 73, s. 8
 Occam, William, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 7; p. 503, s. 30
 Ochino, Bernardino, p. 600, s. 13; p. 603, s. 5; p. 683, s. 42; p. 704, n.
 Oda, a nun, 10th cent. p. 325, n. 3
 Odilo, St. 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
 ——— of Beauvais, 9th cent. p. 317, s. 30
 ——— bishop of Cambrai, 11th cent. p. 353, s. 7; p. 415, n.
 ——— of Cambrai, 12th cent. p. 415, n.; p. 421, s. 13
 ——— of Cluny, 10th cent. p. 336, s. 11
 Odoacer, king of the Heruli, conquered Italy, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 1
 Oecolampadius, John, p. 653, s. 4; p. 683, s. 44
 Œcumenical, or general councils: see Councils
 Œcumenical, or universal bishop, p. 219, s. 1; p. 246, s. 2
 Œcumenus of Tricca, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 12
 Offering of Christ, dispute, 12th cent. p. 422, s. 15
 Officium divinum, what, p. 318, s. 1
 Olaf, St. king of Norway, p. 327, s. 8
 ——— Petri, p. 582, s. 29
 Olbert of Laubes, 10th cent. p. 338, s. 13
 Oldenbarnevelt, John van, p. 848, s. 3; p. 839, s. 5
 Olearius, John, p. 792, s. 15
 Oliva, Peter John, 13th cent. p. 457, s. 36; p. 500, s. 23
 Olympia Maldachini, p. 738, s. 1
 Olympiodorus, a Platonic philosopher, 4th cent. p. 127, s. 2; p. 178, s. 5
 ——— a historian, 5th cent. p. 177, s. 5
 ——— a commentator, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 ——— of Alexandria, p. 337, s. 12
 Omar, kalif, captured Jerusalem, 7th cent. p. 247, n. 9; p. 254, s. 3
 Onocrotus, of like essence, p. 166, s. 16
 Onocrotus, of the same essence, p. 161, s. 11
 Ophilius, Mauritius de Fortu Fildæus, archbishop of Tuam, 15th cent. p. 547, n.
 Ophites, sect of, 2d cent. p. 81, s. 19
 Opposers of religion, or Daists, 16th cent. p. 602, s. 5, &c.; 17th, p. 726, s. 21, &c.; p. 829, s. 23; 18th, p. 867, s. 5, &c.
 Optatus of Milevi, 4th cent. p. 140, s. 10, n. 1
 Oracles, the pagan, p. 10, s. 15
 Oratory of the holy Jesus, fathers of, p. 758, s. 27
 Orbelli, Nicolaus de, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Ordeal, trial by, 9th cent. p. 319, s. 3, n. 3; 11th, p. 383, s. 1
 Order, what, among monks, p. 336, s. 11
 Orderic, Vitalis, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 Oresles, monk, in Egypt, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Oresme, Nicholas, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 6
 Oriental church, p. 627, s. 1; see Greek Church ——— literature, p. 732, s. 18
 Orientius, Orontius, Oresius, bishop of Aux, 5th cent. p. 192, s. 7; p. 228, n.
 ——— bishop of Eliberis, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
 Origen of Alexandria, 3d cent. p. 57, s. 8; p. 61, s. 12; p. 86, s. 5; p. 93, s. 7; p. 152, n. 3
 Origenists, p. 152, s. 23; p. 195, s. 15; p. 231, s. 9
 Orkney islands, converted, 10th cent. p. 327, s. 8
 Orosius, Paul, historian, 5th cent. p. 187, s. 11; p. 209, s. 24
 Orthodoxy, feast of, 9th cent. p. 311, s. 15
 Oslander, Andrew, p. 643, s. 15; p. 651, s. 35; p. 652, n. 1; p. 657, s. 46; p. 792, s. 15
 ——— Lucas, p. 792, s. 15; p. 806, s. 26; p. 808, s. 39
 ——— John Adam, p. 792, s. 15
 Ostiari, their office, 3d cent. p. 92, s. 5
 Ostorodt, Christopher, p. 709, s. 14
 Ostrogoths, 5th cent. invade Italy, p. 173, s. 1
 Osvaldus, Felbartus, 10th cent. p. 548, n.
 Othmar of St. Gall, 8th cent. p. 263, n. 3
 Otho the Great, emperor, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7
 ——— III. emperor, 10th cent. p. 335, s. 7
 ——— of Frisingen, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 ——— Bishop of Bamberg, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 1
 Owerre, Capuchin mission to, p. 724, s. 18
 Oxford university, 9th cent. p. 292, n. 5

PACHOMIUS, Egyptian monk, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Pacianus, bishop of Barcelona, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Paccia, Maria Magdalena de, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
 Paganism, its character, p. 8, s. 6; remains of, in 4th cent. p. 119, s. 10; p. 122, s. 16; 5th, p. 191, s. 2; 6th, p. 195, s. 14; 7th, p. 241, s. 1

 Pajon, Claude, p. 818, s. 17
 Palæologus, Michael, Greek emperor, 13th cent. p. 433, s. 3; p. 448, s. 15; p. 473, s. 13
 ——— John, 15th cent. p. 516, s. 9; p. 532, s. 13
 ——— James, p. 712, s. 23
 Palamas, Gregory, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37; p. 518, s. 2
 Palatinate church, p. 812, s. 5; p. 874, s. 26
 Palestine, provinces of, p. 128, n. 1; p. 180, s. 2
 Pall of archbishops, p. 607, n. 3
 Palladius, monk, 4th cent. p. 136, s. 9, n. 3; p. 184, s. 10, n. 3
 ——— missionary to Ireland, p. 175, s. 6
 Pallavicini, Sfortza, p. 614, n.; p. 763, s. 32
 Pamellus, James, p. 617, s. 21
 Pamphylus, the Martyr, 3d cent. p. 98, n.; p. 136
 Panagioti, a Greek, p. 629, s. 6
 Pandects of Justinian, discovered in 12th cent. p. 398, s. 5
 Panormitanus, Anthony, p. 526, s. 3
 Pantænus of Egypt, 2d cent. p. 51, s. 3; p. 66, n.
 Pantheism of Ammonius Saccas, p. 60, s. 9
 Pantheists, 13th cent. p. 482, s. 12; 15th, p. 525, s. 6; p. 729, s. 24, n.
 Papal power in 3d cent. p. 91, s. 2; 4th, p. 129, s. 5; 5th, p. 179, s. 1; 6th, p. 219, s. 1; 7th, p. 245, s. 1; 8th, p. 268, s. 6; 9th, p. 294, s. 3; 10th, p. 335, s. 8; 11th, p. 355, s. 2; 12th, p. 401, s. 2; 13th, p. 443, s. 2; 14th, p. 491, s. 1; 15th, p. 526, s. 1; p. 531, s. 10; 16th, p. 559, s. 4; p. 606, s. 2; p. 613, s. 13; p. 624, s. 32; 17th, p. 752, s. 18; p. 754, s. 22; p. 755, n. 2; 18th, p. 868, s. 7
 Papebroch, Daniel, p. 763, s. 32
 Paphnutius, monk in Egypt, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, 2d cent. p. 63, n.
 Papin, Isaac, p. 819, s. 18
 Paracelsus, Theophrastus, p. 603, s. 5, n. 1; p. 605, s. 8
 Paraclete of Montanus, p. 83, s. 24; of the Manichæans, p. 109, s. 6
 Paraguay, mission to, p. 724, s. 19
 Pargulius, bishop of Leon, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Paris university, in 12th cent. p. 266, s. 4; p. 397, s. 3; 13th, p. 493, s. 3; 15th, p. 53, s. 3; 16th, p. 563, s. 14
 ——— Francis de, p. 869, s. 12
 Parma, John de, 13th cent. p. 455, s. 32; p. 473, s. 13
 Parthenius, patriarch of Constantinople, p. 780, s. 2
 Particularists, p. 816, s. 12, n. 1
 Parturition of St. Mary, controversy, 9th cent. p. 316, s. 27
 Pasagini or Pasagil, sect, 12th cent. p. 430, s. 14
 Pascal, Blaise, p. 760, s. 30; p. 762, s. 31
 Paschal I. pope, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 ——— II. pope, 11th cent. p. 368, s. 20; p. 375, n.; p. 401, s. 2
 ——— III. pope, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 10
 Paschasius of Rome, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
 ——— Radbert of Corbey, 9th cent. p. 302, s. 14
 Passau, a bishopric, 8th cent. p. 261, n.
 ——— treaty of, p. 696, s. 8
 Passive obedience to kings, p. 832, s. 27
 Patarini or Paterini, 11th cent. p. 363, s. 13; p. 385, s. 2
 Paterius, commentator, 7th cent. p. 245, n.
 Patriarchs, origin of, p. 63, s. 3; p. 128, s. 3; p. 180, s. 2
 Patricius (St. Patrick), apostle of Ireland, 5th cent. p. 175, s. 6, n. 3; p. 189, n.
 Patrpassians, sect in 2d cent. p. 82, s. 20; p. 110, s. 12
 Patronage, right of, its origin, 4th cent. p. 154, s. 2
 Paul, the apostle, p. 20, s. 4; his martyrdom, p. 25, s. 13
 ——— the hermit, in Egypt, 3d cent. p. 100, s. 3
 ——— of Samosata, 3d cent. p. 112, s. 15, n. 2
 ——— bishop of Emessa, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 ——— a Monophysite, 7th cent. p. 255, s. 4
 ——— father of the Paulicians, 6th cent. p. 320, s. 2
 ——— Diaconus, 8th cent. p. 276, s. 19
 ——— Anglicus, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 ——— Carthæna a S. Maria, converted Jew, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 ——— I. pope, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 ——— II. pope, 15th cent. p. 534, s. 17
 ——— III. pope, p. 591, s. 9; p. 612, s. 13; p. 616, s. 17
 ——— IV. pope, p. 612, s. 13; p. 616, s. 17
 ——— V. pope, p. 738, s. 1; p. 752, s. 19; p. 767, s. 36
 Paulicians, sect, 7th cent. p. 254, s. 1; 9th, p. 320, s. 2; their creed, p. 322, s. 6; their alleged Manichæism, p. 322, n.
 Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, 4th cent. p. 180, s. 20

- Paulinus, of Nola, p. 140, s. 10, n. 2
 — Petricordius, a poet, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — of Aquileia, 8th cent. p. 275, s. 18
 Paululus Fulginas, 14th cent. p. 505, s. 34
 Pavo (Peacock) Reginald, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Peace of Augsburg, p. 896, s. 8, &c.
 — of Westphalia, p. 742, s. 21
 Peasants, war of, p. 578, s. 7
 Peking, an archbishopric in 14th cent. p. 484, s. 2
 Pelagius, the heretic, 5th cent. p. 20, s. 23
 — I. bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — II. bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 Pelagians, in 5th cent. p. 208; 6th, p. 235; 7th, p. 254
 Pellican, Conrad, p. 683, s. 44
 Penance, in 1st cent. p. 41, s. 10; 2d, p. 71, s. 16; 4th, p. 149, s. 17; 5th, p. 196, s. 3; 7th, p. 252, s. 5; 12th, p. 418, s. 4; 13th, p. 470, s. 3
 Penitence, Jesuit idea of, p. 764, s. 33; p. 765, s. 34
 — Jansenist, p. 773, s. 45
 Penn, William, p. 848, s. 4
 Pennsylvania, p. 726, s. 30; p. 848, s. 4
 People, rights of, in primitive church, p. 33, s. 6; in 2d cent. p. 62, s. 2; 3d, p. 91, s. 1; 4th, p. 137, s. 1; 11th, p. 357, s. 6
 Pepin, king of France, p. 269, s. 7
 Perezius, James, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Peripatetics: see Aristotelians
 Perkins, William, p. 681, s. 37
 Perpetua, martyr, 3d cent. p. 87, s. 1
 Perierce, Bonaventure des, p. 608, s. 5
 Perron, James David, p. 763, s. 32
 Persecutions, whether just ten, p. 23, s. 4; those in 1st cent. p. 23; 2d, p. 55; 3d, p. 87, &c.; 4th, p. 114; p. 119; p. 153; 5th, p. 173; p. 176; 6th, p. 235; 7th, p. 241; 8th, p. 244; 9th, p. 290; 10th, p. 328; 11th, p. 350; 12th, p. 395; 13th, p. 436; 14th, p. 485; 15th, p. 523; 16th, 584, s. 33; p. 586, n. 1; p. 592, s. 12, n. 3; p. 596, s. 9, &c.; p. 602, s. 5; p. 669, s. 17; 17th, p. 721, s. 16, &c.; p. 742, s. 8, &c.; p. 743, n. 1; p. 811, s. 2, &c.; p. 825, s. 22, &c.; p. 830, s. 25; p. 842, s. 8; p. 857, s. 1; p. 861, s. 3
 Persia, persecutions there, p. 126, s. 24; p. 177, s. 4
 — the five articles of, p. 826, n.
 Petavius, Dionysius, p. 762, s. 32; p. 761, s. 31
 Peter, the apostle, his martyrdom, p. 21, n. 3; p. 25
 — de Abano, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 9
 — de Alliac, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 38
 — bishop of Alexandria, 4th cent. p. 131, s. 9
 — Alfonus, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — bishop of Antioch, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 — archbishop of Amalfi, 11th cent. p. 378, s. 10
 — of Aragon, 13th cent. p. 448, s. 15
 — Aureolus, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 — Bertrand, jurist, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — of Blois, 12th cent. p. 413, s. 23
 — Bruys, 12th cent. p. 426, s. 7
 — Berchorius, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Cantor, 12th cent. p. 418, s. 6; p. 420, s. 9
 — de Castranovo, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 3
 — Cellani, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 4
 — Cellensis, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 — Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna, 5th cent. p. 188, s. 11
 — de Columbanio, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Comestor, 12th cent. p. 413, s. 23
 — Damianus, 11th cent. p. 373, s. 31
 — of Dresden, 14th cent. p. 531, s. 8
 — of Dulburg, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — an English knight, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 — Fullo, bishop of Antioch, 5th cent. p. 206, s. 17; p. 213, s. 1, n. 4
 — Grossolanus, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Herentallus, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — the Hermit, 11th cent. p. 347, s. 4
 — John Oliva, 13th cent. p. 457, s. 36
 — Lombard, 12th cent.; see Lombard
 — the Maronite patriarch, p. 782, n. 2
 — Maurice of Cluny, 12th cent. p. 407, s. 17; p. 415, n.
 — Moggus, bishop of Alexandria, 5th cent. p. 205, s. 18
 — de Monte Cassino, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — Paludanus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 — a deacon of Rome, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
 — the Great, of Russia, p. 782, s. 4, &c.
 — Siculus, 9th cent. p. 209, s. 13
 — de Vineis, 13th cent. p. 437, s. 3; p. 467, n.
 Peter, Valdensis or Waldus, from whom the Waldensians, 12th cent. p. 428, s. 11, n. 5
 Petersen, John William, p. 805, s. 34
 Petilianus, a Donatist writer, 4th cent. p. 143, n.
 Petit, John, 15th cent. p. 532, s. 9
 Petrarca, Francis, 14th cent. p. 488, s. 4
 Petrobrusians, sect. 12th cent. p. 426, s. 7; 13th, p. 478, s. 2; 16th, p. 685, n. 2
 Petrucci, Peter Matthew, p. 776, s. 49
 Peucer, Casper, p. 653, s. 38
 Peyre, Isaac la, p. 777, s. 51
 Pezel's catechism, Calvinistic, p. 653, s. 38
 Pfaff, Christopher Matthew, p. 872, s. 22
 Pfeffercorn, John, p. 662, n. 2
 Pfeiffer, John Philip, p. 750, s. 16
 — Augustus, p. 792, s. 15
 Pfug, Julius, p. 594, s. 3
 Phantasmata, sect, 6th cent. p. 237, s. 8
 Pharisees, Jewish sect, p. 14, s. 7
 Philadelphian society, p. 865, s. 5
 Philastrius, bishop of Brescia, 4th cent. p. 141, s. 10, n. 1
 Philistus, mentioned by St. Paul, p. 45, s. 1
 Philip, emperor, 3d cent. whether a Christian, p. 86, s. 3 — of Sida, 5th cent. p. 185, n.; p. 192, s. 7
 — a friend of Jerome, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — Augustus, king of France, 12th cent. p. 303, s. 12; p. 478, s. 7
 — the Fair, king of France, 14th cent. p. 491, s. 2
 — of Eichstadt, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 — Greivus, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
 — Herveng, 12th cent. p. 407, s. 18; p. 415, n.
 — de Leidia, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — de Monte Calerio, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Ribotus, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
 — Solitarius, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22
 — of Tarentum, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 — of Tripoli, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 7
 — de Valois, king of France, 14th cent. p. 484, s. 1
 — landgrave of Hesse, p. 581, s. 27; p. 593, s. 2; p. 595, s. 7; p. 559, s. 4
 — II. King of Spain, p. 559, s. 12
 Philippius, Bardanes, Greek emperor, 8th cent. p. 280, s. 9
 Philo, the Jew, 1st cent. p. 12, s. 25
 — of Carpathus, 5th cent. p. 191, s. 3
 Philology cultivated in 16th cent. p. 604, s. 7
 Philosophical truth opposed to theological, in 13th cent. p. 471, s. 8; 15th, p. 526, s. 6
 — sin, p. 623, s. 25; p. 765, s. 34
 Philosophy, state of, in 1st cent. pp. 11, 28; 2d, p. 58; 3d, p. 90; 4th, p. 126; 5th, p. 177; 6th, p. 217; 7th, p. 250; 8th, p. 265; 9th, p. 291; 10th, p. 331; 11th, p. 353, s. 6; 12th, p. 397; 13th, p. 439, s. 3; p. 441, s. 7, &c.; 14th, p. 487, s. 2; p. 489, s. 6, &c.; 15th, p. 526, s. 4, &c.; 16th, p. 563, s. 13; p. 604, s. 8; p. 617, s. 20, &c.; p. 641, s. 10, &c.; p. 679, s. 34; 17th, p. 730, s. 25, &c.; p. 760, s. 30, &c.; p. 789, s. 10, &c.; p. 812, s. 6, &c.; p. 832, s. 25, &c.; 18th, p. 870, s. 16, &c.; p. 871, s. 18, &c.
 — oriental, pp. 11, 29, 46; its influence on theology, pp. 29, 55, 59, 61, 67, 69, 77, 105, 144, &c.
 Philostorgius, ecclesiastical historian, 5th cent. p. 185, n.; p. 192, s. 7
 Philostratus, a philosopher, 3d cent. p. 89, s. 9
 Philotheus, Achillanus, p. 513, n.
 — bishop of Constantinople, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37
 Philoxenus or Xenalas, bishop of Mabug, or Hierapolis, in 5th cent. p. 206, s. 17; p. 230, s. 3; p. 237, s. 8; 6th, p. 206, s. 17; p. 207, s. 22; p. 230, s. 3
 Phocas, emperor, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 1
 — John, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 Phoeadius, bishop in France, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Photius, bishop of Sirmium, 4th cent. p. 168, s. 19
 Photius, bishop of Constantinople, 9th cent. p. 298, s. 12
 Phranza, George, 15th cent. p. 537, s. 23
 Phundaltes, the Bogomiles, p. 424, s. 2, n. 3
 Physical depravity, asserted, p. 651, s. 33
 Piarists, monks, p. 759, s. 27
 Picards or Piccards, sect, p. 550, s. 7; p. 554, s. 2
 Picens, Nicolaus, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Piccolinæus, James, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 Pictet, Benedict, p. 814, s. 9
 Picta, converted in 4th cent. p. 214, n. 1
 Picius, John Francis, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 5; p. 547, n.
 Plerius of Alexandria, 3d cent. p. 98, n.

- Pietists, whence the name, p. 801, s. 27
 Pietistic controversies, p. 794, s. 17; p. 799, s. 26, &c.; p. 871, s. 20
 Pighi, Albert, p. 617, s. 21
 Pilgrimages, in 4th cent. p. 143, s. 2; 5th, p. 191, s. 2; 8th, p. 277, s. 2, n. 3
 Planchdorf, Peter de, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Pin, Lewis Ellies du, p. 753, s. 21; p. 764, s. 32
 Pincovians, sect, p. 705, s. 8; p. 707, n.
 Pirkheimer, p. 562, n. 1
 Pirmin, St. 8th cent. p. 262, s. 5
 Pisa, council of, 16th cent. p. 560, s. 6
 Piscator, John, p. 680, s. 36; p. 816, s. 13
 Placides, Gregory or George, 7th cent. p. 248, s. 5
 Plus II. (Æneas Sylvius), pope, 15th cent. p. 533, s. 16; p. 546, n.
 ——— III. pope, p. 559, s. 4
 ——— IV. pope, p. 812, s. 13
 ——— V. pope, p. 812, s. 13
 Placemus, Joshua, p. 817, s. 15
 Placette, John la, p. 814, s. 9
 Placidus, Benedictine monk, 5th cent. p. 223, s. 7
 Platina, Bartholomew, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
 Plato and Platonic philosophy, p. 12, s. 24; 2d cent. p. 58, s. 4; p. 70, s. 15; 3d, p. 89, s. 8; 4th, p. 126, s. 2; 5th, p. 178, s. 3; 6th, p. 218, s. 4; 7th, p. 245, s. 4; 8th, p. 265, s. 2; 12th, p. 397, s. 2; 13th, p. 438, s. 1; 14th, p. 487, s. 2; 15th, p. 552, s. 11; 17th, p. 735, s. 33
 Pleroma of the Gnostics, p. 30, s. 7
 Pletho, Gemistius, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 4
 Plym, the younger, p. 55, s. 1
 Plotinus, a philosopher, 3d cent. p. 91, s. 5; p. 107, s. 1
 Plutarch of Charonea, a philosopher, 2d cent. p. 90, s. 3
 ——— a philosopher, 3d cent. p. 90, s. 3
 ——— Nestoril, philosopher, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 5
 Plymouth, Massachusetts, missions, p. 725, s. 20
 Pneumatomachi, sect, 4th cent. p. 169, s. 20, n. 1
 Podonipte, Mennonite sect, p. 695, s. 18
 Poggio, John Francis, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 4; p. 542, n.
 Poiret, Peter, p. 865, s. 4
 Poland, reformation of, p. 586, s. 34, n. 2; p. 673, s. 23; p. 704, s. 8; p. 743, s. 8; p. 861, s. 4
 Polo, Reginald, p. 617, s. 21
 Polemic theology: see Theology polemic
 Poles, converted, 10th cent. p. 323, s. 4
 Politiano, Angelo, p. 603, s. 5
 Pöllenburg, Arnold, p. 843, s. 9
 Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, 2d cent. p. 38, s. 21; p. 57, s. 6
 Polychronius, bishop of Apamea, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, 2d cent. p. 74, s. 11
 Pomeranians, converted, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 1
 Pomerius, Julianus, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 Pomponatius, Peter, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 6; p. 603, s. 5
 Pongilupus, Hermann, 13th cent. p. 459, n. 3
 Poniatowski, Christina, p. 809, s. 41
 Pontanus, John Jovian, 15th cent. p. 548, n.
 Pontianus, Francisca de, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
 Pontiffs: see Roman pontiffs
 Pontius, deacon of Carthage, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 ——— or Paulinus of Nola, p. 188, s. 11
 Poor men of Lyons, Waldensians, p. 428, s. 11
 Popery: see Papal power
 Popofschins, Russian sect, p. 782, n. 6
 Poppe, priest of Harald, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7
 Porchetus Salvaticus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Pordage, John, p. 865, s. 5
 Porphyry, a philosopher, 3d cent. p. 89, s. 8
 Port-Royal, convent, p. 762, s. 31; p. 758, s. 26; p. 766, s. 36; p. 768, s. 4; p. 773, s. 46; p. 773, s. 2
 Portugal, contest with the pope, p. 753, s. 2
 Positive Theology, what, p. 419, s. 8
 Possevin, Anthony, p. 762, s. 32; p. 740, s. 2; p. 762, s. 32
 Possidontus or Psidius, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 Possin, Peter, p. 761, s. 31; p. 762, s. 32
 Potamiena, martyr, 3d cent. p. 87, s. 1
 Potamon, a philosopher, 2d cent. p. 12, s. 25
 Potinus, missionary to Gaul, 2d cent. p. 53, s. 5
 Potho of Prum, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
 Potter, John, archbishop of Canterbury, p. 873, s. 23
 Poverty of Christ and his apostles, controversy, 14th cent. p. 502, s. 28, &c.
 Powder-plot, p. 744, s. 10
 Preadamites, p. 777, s. 51
 Premonstratensians, 12th cent. p. 408, s. 20
 Prætorius, Stephen, p. 808, s. 39
 ——— Matthew, p. 745, s. 13; p. 750, s. 16
 Pragmatic Sanction, p. 560, s. 7
 Praxas, a confessor and Monarchian, 2d cent. p. 82, s. 20
 Prayers, hours of, in 3d cent. p. 106, s. 5
 Preaching, mode of, in 1st cent. p. 44, s. 6; 3d, p. 105, s. 2; 4th, p. 154, s. 4; 7th, p. 244, s. 8; p. 278, s. 5; 15th, p. 849, s. 1
 ——— friars: see Dominicans
 ——— before Luther, p. 563, s. 16
 Predestinarian controversy, 5th cent. p. 210, s. 25; 9th, p. 313, s. 22; 12th, p. 428, s. 18; 17th, p. 777, s. 15, n. 3; p. 786, s. 2; p. 814, s. 10; p. 815, s. 12; p. 816, s. 13; p. 817, s. 14; p. 829, s. 23; p. 838, s. 2; p. 844, s. 12
 Presbyter John, 10th cent. p. 324, s. 2; p. 391, s. 7, n. 2
 Presbyters, p. 33; p. 63; p. 92; p. 131; p. 151; p. 182
 Presbyterians, p. 814, s. 5; p. 820, s. 19; p. 821, s. 20; p. 822, s. 21; p. 825, s. 22; Scotch, p. 825, n.; English, p. 827, n.; Irish, p. 829, n.; in 18th cent. p. 872, s. 23
 Prescription against errors, in 2d cent. p. 68, s. 8; 3d, p. 102, s. 10
 Price of sin, what, p. 268, s. 3, n. 1
 Prierias, Sylvester, p. 568, s. 5
 Priesthood, Jewish, limited, 2d cent. p. 63, s. 4; p. 72, s. 4 ——— for foreign missions, p. 713, s. 1; p. 714, s. 4; p. 716, s. 8
 ——— of the missions, p. 758, s. 27, &c.
 Primasius of Adrumetum, 6th cent. p. 227, s. 9
 Printing discovered, 15th cent. p. 524, s. 1
 Priscilla and Priscillianists, 2d cent. p. 83, s. 24
 Priscillian, 4th cent. p. 169, s. 21
 Proba, Anicia Franconia, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Probabilism, moral, p. 766, s. 35; p. 765, s. 34
 Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 ——— a philosopher, 5th cent. p. 179, s. 5; p. 216, s. 2
 Procopius of Gaza, 5th cent. p. 223, s. 8
 ——— of Cæsarea, historian, 6th cent. p. 215, s. 1
 Prophets of the New Testament, p. 34, s. 9
 ——— in 17th cent. p. 809, s. 42
 Prosper of Aquitaine, 5th cent. p. 188, s. 11
 Protestants, rise of, p. 581, s. 25; p. 593, s. 1, &c.
 ——— reconciled to popery, p. 749, s. 16
 Provincial letters, Pascal's, p. 765, s. 34, n. 1
 Provisions, papal, 14th cent. p. 492, s. 6; p. 495, s. 11; p. 532, s. 12
 Prudentius, a poet, 4th cent. p. 105, s. 3; p. 141, s. 10, n. 5 ——— of Troyes, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 Prum, monastery and school of, p. 266, n. 4
 Prussians, converted, 11th cent. p. 346, s. 2; 13th, p. 435, s. 9
 Psalms of David, used in 4th cent. p. 154, s. 4
 Psathyrians, party in 4th cent. p. 166, s. 16
 Psellus, Michael, 9th cent. p. 800, n.
 ——— Michael, junior, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2; p. 372, s. 30
 Ptolomæus, Gnostic heresiarch, 2d cent. p. 80, s. 17
 Ptolemy of Torcello, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 Publicani, Paulicians, p. 385, s. 2
 Puffendorf, Samuel, p. 790, s. 11
 Pulleyn or Fullus, Robert, p. 415, n.
 Punishment, future, its nature, p. 837, s. 36
 Purgatory, in 2d cent. p. 67, s. 3; 3d, p. 109, s. 8; 4th, p. 143, s. 1; 5th, p. 191, s. 2; 6th, p. 230, s. 2; 7th, p. 250, s. 1; 10th, p. 242, s. 2; 12th, p. 418, s. 4
 Turitans, p. 597, s. 9, n. 2; p. 669, s. 17, &c.; p. 683, s. 43; p. 725, s. 20; p. 821, s. 20; p. 827, n.; p. 872, s. 23
 Puy, Raymond du, founder of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 13
 Pyrrhus, bishop of Constantinople, 7th cent. p. 256, s. 7
 QUADRAGESIMAL or Lent fast, 4th cent. p. 156, s. 6
 Quadratus, bishop of Athens, 2d cent. p. 65, n.
 Quadrivium, what, p. 178, n. 2; p. 266, s. 6; p. 353, s. 5; p. 398, s. 4
 Quakers, p. 829, s. 22; p. 849, &c.
 Quesnel, Paschasius, p. 766, s. 35; p. 869, s. 10
 Quietists, p. 517, s. 1; p. 775, s. 48; p. 776, ss. 49, 50
 Quinisextum consilium, 7th cent. p. 253, s. 1; p. 239, s. 12
 Quinquecentulans, p. 844, n. 4
 RABANUS, Maurus, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 300, s. 14
 Rabelais, Francis, p. 603, s. 5
 Racovian catechism, p. 708, s. 12; p. 710, s. 19
 Racow or Racovia, seat of Unitarians, p. 708, s. 9; p. 708, s. 12; p. 860, s. 1; p. 861, s. 3
 Radbert, Paschasius: see Paschasius

- Radbod, king of Friesland, 7th cent. p. 241, s. 3; p. 280, s. 2
- Radinus, Thomas, 16th cent. p. 547, n.
- Radulphus de Diceto, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- Niger of Beauvais, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- de Rivo, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
- Ramsay, Chevalier Andrew Michael, p. 777, n. 1
- Ramus, Peter, and Ramlets, p. 604, s. 8; p. 641, s. 11; p. 790, s. 10
- Rance, Armand John Bouthillier de, p. 758, s. 26
- Ranler, inquisitor, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 3
- Ranzovius, Christopher, p. 749, s. 15
- Rasa, Procopius, 15th cent. p. 548, s. 4
- Raskolniks, Russian schismatics, p. 781, n.
- Ratherius of Verona, 10th cent. p. 331, s. 5
- Rathmann, Herman, p. 806, s. 37, &c.
- Ratibon, diet, p. 593, s. 13; disputation, p. 745, s. 12
- Ratramn or Bertram of Corbey, 9th cent. p. 302, s. 14
- Ratzburg, a bishopric, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 5
- Raulin, John, 15th cent. p. 546, n.
- Raymund de Ageles, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
- earl of Toulouse, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6
- VI. and VII. earls of Toulouse, 14th cent. p. 476, s. 3; p. 478, s. 7
- Gaufrid, 13th cent. p. 458, s. 37
- Jordan, 14th cent. p. 513, n.
- Martini, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6; p. 466, s. 44
- of Pennafort, p. 443, s. 10; p. 467, n.; canonized, p. 778, s. 52
- du Puy, founder of the order of St. John, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 13
- Raynald, Odoric, p. 616, s. 18
- Raynard, Theophilus, p. 763, s. 32
- Raynerius of Vercelli, 13th cent. p. 483, s. 14
- of Pisa, 14th cent. p. 510, s. 37
- Realists, p. 354, s. 8; p. 400, s. 9; p. 489, s. 7; p. 526, s. 7; p. 563, s. 13
- Recognitions of Clement, p. 37, s. 19
- Recollets, Franciscan monks, p. 615, s. 16
- Reconciliation of Protestants with Papists, p. 744, s. 11, &c.; p. 817, s. 15; p. 869, s. 12; p. 873, s. 23
- of Lutherans and Reformed, p. 786, s. 3, &c.; p. 872, s. 22
- Refined Mennonites, p. 858, s. 3
- Reformation of religion desired, p. 531, s. 10
- history of the, chap. i. p. 558; chap. ii. p. 565 to A.D. 1530; chap. iii. to A.D. 1546, p. 586; chap. iv. to A.D. 1555, p. 593, &c.; in Germany, recent works on, p. 588, n.
- Reformed church, history of, the 16th cent. p. 658, &c.; 17th, p. 810, &c.; 18th, p. 872, s. 21
- symbolical books of, p. 676, n.
- monks, p. 756, s. 24
- Regale, right of, p. 754, s. 22; p. 755, s. 22
- Regalia of the clergy, 8th cent. p. 269, s. 4
- Regino of Prum, 9th cent. p. 304, s. 14
- Regius, Urban, p. 657, s. 46
- Regner, Lodbrock of Jutland, p. 287, s. 1
- Regular clergy, p. 763, s. 32; see Monks
- Reichard, George, p. 809, s. 41
- Reichenau, 8th cent. p. 263, n. 1
- Reimerius Saccho: see Saccho
- Reinboth, John, p. 807, s. 38; p. 861, s. 14
- Reimerus Reineccius, p. 640, s. 9
- Relics, venerated, in 4th cent. p. 143, s. 1; 5th, p. 191; s. 2; 6th, p. 230, s. 2; 7th, p. 250, s. 1; 8th, p. 277, s. 2, 9th, p. 307, s. 6; p. 819, s. 2; 10th, p. 339, s. 1; 11th, p. 350, s. 10; 12th, p. 417, s. 2
- Religion, state of, in the world, pp. 7, 8; among Christians, 1st cent. p. 39; 2d, p. 66; 3d, p. 99; 4th, p. 143; 5th, p. 190; 6th, p. 229; 7th, p. 250; 8th, p. 278; 9th, p. 306; 10th, p. 339; 11th, p. 375; 12th, p. 416; 13th, p. 469; 14th, p. 514; 15th, p. 549; 16th, pp. 563, 601, 627; 17th, p. 764, &c.; p. 772
- Remigius, archbishop of Rheims, 5th cent. p. 190, n. p. 213, s. 2
- of Lyons, 9th cent. p. 303, s. 14
- of St. Germain in Auxerre, 9th cent. p. 303, n. 3
- Remonstrants, p. 837: see Arminians
- Reservations, papal, p. 492, s. 6; p. 495, s. 12; p. 531, s. 12
- ecclesiastical, p. 639, s. 7
- mental, p. 765, s. 34
- Restitution, edict, p. 741, s. 5
- Restoration of all things, p. 805, s. 34; p. 865, s. 5; p. 872, s. 20
- Reuchlin, John, p. 548, n.
- Reutlingen, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1
- Revenue, papal, 14th cent. p. 560, s. 8; p. 607, s. 4
- Rheinbergers, Collegiants, p. 863, s. 1
- Rheticus, bishop of Autun, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
- Rhodes, Alexander de, p. 716, s. 8
- Rhodon, a writer, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
- Ricci, Matthew, p. 602, s. 3; p. 719, s. 12
- Rich, Edmund, 13th cent. p. 668, n.
- Richard of Arnagh, 14th cent. p. 497, s. 18
- Buriensis, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- of Cornwall, 13th cent. p. 434, s. 6
- Hampolus, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- of Hauston, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- I. king of England, 12th cent. p. 393, s. 12
- Middleton, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
- of St. Victor, 12th cent. p. 412, s. 23
- Richellen, John Armand, p. 763, s. 32; p. 745, s. 13; p. 748, s. 15; p. 811, s. 23
- Richer, Edmund, p. 621, s. 26; p. 753, s. 21
- Rigordus, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5
- Rigorists, p. 772, s. 45
- Rites: see Ceremonies
- Rivet, Andrew, p. 817, s. 14; p. 833, s. 30
- Riviers, John, p. 644, s. 18
- Robert of Arbriscles, 12th cent. p. 408, s. 19
- Capito or Grossetête, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6; p. 465, s. 44
- earl of Flanders, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6
- duke of Normandy, 11th cent. p. 348, s. 6
- king of France, 11th cent. p. 352, s. 3
- Guescard, 11th cent. p. 346, s. 3
- Holkat, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- de Monto, 13th cent. p. 467, n.
- de St. Marino, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5
- Pullen, of Rochester, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- Retenals, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- of Rhelms, 12th cent. p. 415, n.
- founder of the Cistercians, p. 369, s. 25
- de Sorbonne, 13th cent. p. 439, s. 3; p. 468, n.
- Kilwarney, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
- Robinson, John, Independent, p. 824, s. 21
- Rochester, John Willmot, earl of, p. 727, s. 22
- Roderic, king of Spain, 8th cent. p. 265, s. 2
- Ximenius, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5
- Roderich, Christopher, p. 608, s. 6
- Rodulphus Ardens, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
- of St. Trudo, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
- Roël, Hermann Alexander, p. 834, s. 33; p. 873, s. 25
- Rogation Sunday, &c. p. 196, s. 2
- Roger Bacon, 13th cent. p. 441, s. 6; p. 466, s. 44
- of Conway, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
- duke of Sicily, 11th cent. p. 346, s. 3, n. 3
- de Hoveden, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
- Rollo, Norman prince, 10th cent. p. 324, s. 3
- Roman pontiffs, p. 63, s. 3; p. 91, s. 2; p. 129, s. 6; p. 268, s. 6; p. 273, s. 16; p. 294, s. 3; p. 296, s. 7; p. 333, s. 2; p. 355, s. 2; p. 360, s. 10; p. 401, s. 2; p. 417, s. 4; p. 443, s. 2; p. 469, s. 2; p. 559, s. 4; p. 612, s. 13; p. 739, s. 1; p. 868, s. 7
- Rümeling, Anthony, p. 870, s. 16
- Romuald of Camalduli, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24
- Rosary of St. Mary, 10th cent. p. 342, s. 3
- Roscellin, nominalist, 11th cent. p. 354, s. 9; p. 387, s. 5
- Rose, an American nun, canonized, p. 758, s. 52
- Rosercrucians, p. 732, s. 30; p. 808, s. 40
- Rosellus, Antonius de, p. 544, n.
- Rosenbach, John George, p. 870, s. 16
- Roskolskika, Russian sect, p. 781, s. 4
- Rost, George, p. 808, s. 39
- Roswitha, nun, 10th cent. p. 339, n.
- Roxas, Christopher de, p. 746, s. 13
- Royal societies, London and Paris, p. 731, s. 26
- Rudolph, duke of Swabia, 11th cent. p. 366, s. 16
- Rue, Charles de la, p. 761, s. 31
- Rufinus of Aquileia, 4th cent. p. 140, s. 10, n. 3; p. 153, s. 24
- Rugen, island of, 12th cent. p. 389, s. 2
- Ruggieri, Cosmo, p. 728, s. 23
- Ruinart, Theodore, p. 761, s. 31
- Ruling elders, 1st cent. p. 33, s. 8
- Rupert of Duyt, 12th cent. p. 407, s. 18; p. 411, s. 23
- Ruricius, senior, bishop of Limoges, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
- Russians, converted, 9th cent. p. 289, s. 4; 10th, p. 325, s. 5; p. 345, s. 1; 16th, p. 630, s. 9; p. 635, s. 21; 17th, p. 781, s. 4; 18th, p. 869, s. 13
- Rusticus, deacon at Rome, 6th cent. p. 190, n.; p. 229, n.

- Ruysbroëck, John, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
 Ryckel, Dionysius, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24
 Rys, Hans de, p. 591, n. 3
- SABAS, a Syrian monk, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 Sabbatati, Waldenses, 12th cent. p. 428, s. 11
 Sabellicus, Marc. Ant. Coc. 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Sabellius of Africa, 3d cent. p. 111, s. 13, n. 1
 — Christians of St. John, p. 633, s. 17
 Sabinus, bishop of Horsaels, 5th cent. p. 196, n.
 Sabunde, Raymund, 15th cent. p. 543, n.
 Saccho, Reimerius or Rayner, inquisitor, 13th cent.
 p. 468, n.
 Sacramentarian controversy, p. 576, s. 20, &c.; p. 581,
 s. 27; p. 588, n.; p. 646, s. 24; p. 653, s. 38; p. 659, s.
 4; p. 662, s. 10; p. 864, s. 12, n. 2; p. 676, s. 29
 Sacred classics of Apollinaris, p. 136, n. 5
 Saoy, Isaac de, p. 766, n. 2; p. 774, n. 2
 Sadducees, a Jewish sect, p. 14, s. 7
 Sadolet, James, p. 817, s. 21
 Sagarellus, Gerhard, 13th cent. p. 483, s. 14
 Saints, worshipped in 5th cent. p. 191, s. 2; 6th, p.
 220, s. 3; p. 230, s. 2; p. 234, s. 4; 7th, p. 250, s. 1;
 9th, p. 307, s. 6; 10th, p. 340, s. 4; 12th, p. 417, s. 2
 Salaheddin (Saladin), p. 393, s. 10
 Sales, Francis de, canonized, p. 773, s. 46; p. 778, s. 52
 Salonus, bishop of Lyons, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 Saltzburg, a bishopric, 8th cent. p. 261, n.
 Saltzburgers, p. 789, s. 8; p. 870, s. 14
 Salvaticus, Porchetus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Salvian, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 2; p. 188, s. 11; p. 193, s. 10
 Samaritans, nation of, p. 17, s. 17
 Samogitæ, enlightened, 15th cent. p. 522, s. 2
 Samonas of Gaza, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 Samosateans: see Paul of Samosata
 Samson, Bernardin, p. 571, s. 11
 Samuel, Jew, 11th cent. p. 372, n.
 Sanches, Francis, p. 737, s. 37
 Sancerroft, William, archbishop, p. 831, s. 26
 Sanchez, king of Aragon, 11th cent. p. 383, s. 1
 Sand, Christopher, p. 862, s. 6
 Sandeus, Felinus, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Sanutus, Marinus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Sapor II. king of Persia, 4th cent. persecutes, p. 126,
 s. 24
 Sarabaites, vagrant monks, p. 148, s. 15
 Saracens, their conquests, 7th cent. p. 243, s. 5, n. 4; 8th, p. 265, s. 1; p. 265, s. 2; 9th, p. 289, s. 1; 10th,
 p. 328, s. 1; 11th, p. 346, s. 2; 13th, p. 436, s. 10;
 14th, p. 485, s. 4; expelled from Spain, p. 743, s. 9
 Sarcarius, Erasmus, p. 657, s. 46
 Sardica, council, its 4th canon, p. 130, s. 6
 Sardinia, queen of Hungary, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
 Sarpi, Paul, p. 613, s. 5; p. 752, s. 19; p. 763, s. 32
 Sasan, his power disputed, p. 835, s. 35
 Satisfaction of Christ, p. 816, s. 13
 Saturninus of Antioch, heretic, p. 76, s. 6
 Saurin, James, p. 873, s. 25
 Savoranola, Jerome, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24
 Saxo, Grammaticus, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 — Ludolphus, 14th cent. p. 511, n.; p. 514, s. 2
 Saxons converted, 8th cent. p. 263, s. 6
 Saxony, visitation of churches in, p. 518, n. 2
 Scacchi, Fortunatus, p. 763, s. 32
 Scapular of the Carmelites, p. 454, s. 29
 Schade, John Casper, p. 801, s. 27
 Schall, John Adam, missionary, p. 718, s. 10
 Scharf, John, p. 796, s. 21
 Schenk, James, p. 647, n. 3
 Schertzer, John Adam, p. 792, s. 15
 Schisms: see Heresies and Controversies
 Schaden, Nicholas, p. 554, s. 5
 Schmidt, Sebastian, p. 792, s. 15; p. 794, s. 17
 — Lawrence, p. 871, s. 19
 — Conrad, 15th cent. p. 554, s. 5
 Scholastic theology, its origin, p. 99, s. 1; p. 145, s. 9; its nature, p. 231, s. 6
 Schomann, George, p. 706, n. 2; p. 707, n. 1
 Schomer, Justus Christopher, p. 792, s. 15; p. 794,
 s. 17
 Schönefeld, Henry, inquisitor, 15th cent. p. 554, s. 4
 Schools, Christian, in 1st cent. p. 40, s. 7; 2d, p. 59; 3d,
 p. 91; 4th, pp. 120, 127; 5th, p. 177, s. 1; 6th, p. 217,
 s. 1; 7th, p. 245, s. 2; 8th, p. 266, s. 4; 9th, p. 292, s. 4;
 10th, p. 330, s. 4; 11th, p. 352, s. 4; 12th, p. 397, s. 3;
 13th, p. 439, s. 2; 14th, p. 487, s. 3; 15th, p. 525, s. 1;
 16th, p. 563, s. 13
 Schools, brethren and sisters of the Christian, p. 758,
 s. 27
 Schurmann, Anna Maria, p. 864, s. 3
 Schwencckfeld, Caspar, p. 646, s. 23
 Schwerin, bishopric, 12th cent. p. 890, s. 5
 Schwestriones, sect, 13th cent. p. 480, s. 9
 Science, p. 616, s. 19; p. 760, s. 25, &c.; p. 802, s. 29;
see Learning
 Sciopius, Casper, p. 740, s. 2; p. 749, s. 16
 Scotists, 14th cent. p. 515, s. 5
 Scotland, state of, in 3d cent. p. 87, s. 7; 6th, p. 214, s.
 2, n. 1; reformation in, p. 586, n. 1; p. 598, s. 10; p. 666,
 s. 16, &c.
 Scotus, John Erigena, 9th cent. p. 292, n. 5; p. 293, s.
 6; p. 303, s. 14; p. 309, s. 10; p. 311, s. 17; p. 318, s. 20;
 p. 314, s. 23; p. 318, s. 1
 — John Duns, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37; p. 515, s. 5;
 p. 516, s. 10; p. 518, s. 4
 Scriptures, how regarded in 1st cent. p. 39, s. 2; 2d, p.
 67, s. 4; 4th, p. 144, s. 4; 16th, p. 618, s. 22; p. 630, s.
 25; p. 637, s. 2; p. 675, s. 28; p. 706, s. 10; p. 709, s. 15,
 &c.; 17th, p. 834, s. 33; p. 851, s. 9; 18th, p. 871, s. 19
 Scultetus, Abraham, p. 741, n. 1
 Scythians, enlightened, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1
 Scylitzes, John, 11th cent. p. 351, s. 2
 Sects: see Heresies
 Secular clergy, p. 763, s. 32; see Clergy
 Secundians, Gnostic sect, p. 80, s. 17
 Sedullus, a Scotch poet, 5th cent. p. 189, n.; p. 304, n.
 — a Scot, 9th cent. p. 304, n. p. 308, s. 8
 Seguenot, Claude, p. 763, s. 32
 Suidellus, Martin, p. 810, s. 44
 Seidenbecher, George Lawrence, p. 810, s. 43
 Seizen, John Christopher, p. 870, s. 16
 Seinecker, Nicholas, p. 657, s. 16
 Semiarians, in 4th cent. p. 406, s. 16
 Semi-Judaizers, p. 712, s. 23; p. 810, s. 44
 Seminaries de Propaganda, p. 738, s. 1, &c.
 Semipelagians, in 5th cent. p. 211, s. 26, n. 2; 6th, p.
 235, s. 1; 7th, p. 254, s. 2
 Semi-universalists, p. 813, s. 12
 Sandomir, convention of, p. 674, s. 24
 Senensis, Bernardine, mystic, 15th cent. p. 541, s. 24; p.
 550, s. 11
 — Sixtus, p. 617, s. 21
 Sententiarum, who, p. 419, s. 6
 — Baccalauri, p. 621, n. 2
 Separates, Paulicians, p. 320, n. 2
 Septuagint, how regarded in 2d cent. p. 57, s. 5; 4th, p.
 144, s. 4
 Serapion, bishop of Antioch, 2d cent. p. 66, s. 1
 — bishop of Thmuis, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 — Armenian patriarch, p. 608, s. 6
 Sergius, patriarch of the Monophysites, p. 218, s. 15
 — bishop of Constantinople, 7th cent. p. 28, n.
 — a Paulician, 9th cent. p. 322, s. 5
 — II. pope, 9th cent. p. 304, n.
 — III. pope, 10th cent. p. 333, s. 2
 — IV. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 Serrarius, Nicholas, p. 762, s. 31
 Servants of the ever-blessed Virgin, 13th cent. p. 418,
 s. 20
 Servetus, Michael, p. 700, s. 4; works respecting his trial, p. 702, n.
 Sethites, a sect in 2d cent. p. 81, s. 13
 Sextus, Greek writer, 2d cent. p. 66, n.
 Severianus, bishop of Gabala, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 Severinus, Peter, p. 642, s. 12
 Severus, emperor, in 2d cent. p. 57, s. 7
 — Alexander, emperor, 3d cent. p. 85, s. 2
 — Sulpicius, ecclesiastical historian, 4th cent. p.
 141, s. 10, n. 4
 — bishop of Minorca, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 — bishop of Antioch, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 Sfondrati, Celestine, p. 755, n. 3; p. 763, s. 32; p. 778,
 s. 51
 Shaftsbury, Earl of, p. 727, s. 22
 Sharroch, English writer, p. 814, s. 9
 Shepherd, Thomas, p. 725, s. 20
 Shites, a Mohammedan sect, p. 244, s. 6
 Siam, missions to, p. 716, s. 8
 Sibylline oracles, 2d cent. p. 70, s. 15
 Sicilian monarchy, what, p. 346, s. 3
 Sidonius, Apollinaris, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 2, p. 188, s. 11
 — Michael, p. 594, s. 3
 Sienienius, John, p. 705, s. 9
 Sienno, James, p. 709, s. 12

- Sigfrid, chronicler, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Sigan, monument of, China, p. 239, s. 1
 Sigebert, Gemblacensis, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 Sigfrid of Mantz, 11th cent. p. 375, n.
 Sigismund, emperor, 15th cent. p. 550, s. 4
 John, elector of Brandenburg, p. 785, s. 2
 Simeon, bishop of Jerusalem, 2d cent. p. 55, s. 2
 Stylites, senior, 5th cent. p. 174, s. 3; p. 194, s. 12
 Stylites, junior, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 of Durham, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 junior, of Constantinople, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30
 Magister or Metaphrastes, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 12
 Magister or Logotheta, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
 of Thessalonica, 15th cent. p. 533, s. 23; p. 553, s. 7
 Simon Magus, p. 49
 Fidatus, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 a Greek writer, 13th cent. p. 464, n.
 of Montfort, 13th cent. p. 479, s. 7
 Richard, p. 762, s. 21
 Simoneta, Boniface, 15th cent. p. 547, n.
 Simony, p. 336, s. 10; p. 862, s. 12, &c.
 Simplicius, bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 a philosopher, 6th cent. p. 216, s. 2
 Sins, philosophical, p. 623, s. 35; p. 765, s. 34
 Siriclus, bishop of Rome, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Sirmond, James, p. 761, s. 31
 Sisebutus, Gothic king in Spain, 7th cent. p. 249, n.
 Sisinus of Constantinople, 10th cent. p. 338, n.
 Sisters of the Free Spirit: see Brudheren.
 Six articles of Henry VIII, p. 592, n. 3
 Sixtus II, bishop of Rome, 3d cent. p. 88, s. 6; p. 98, n.
 Sixtus III, bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 IV, pope, 15th cent. p. 534, s. 18
 V, pope, p. 613, s. 13
 Senensis, p. 617, s. 21
 Sceptics, p. 737, s. 37; p. 833, s. 30
 Sionians, converted in 12th cent. p. 380, s. 2
 Smalcald, league of, p. 589, s. 6 articles of, p. 591, s. 9
 war of, p. 593, s. 1, &c.
 Smalcius, Valentinus, p. 710, n. 1
 Smaragdus, 8th cent. p. 304, n.
 Smyth, John, a general Baptist, p. 697, n. 3; p. 860, n. 1
 Socinus, Julius, p. 699, s. 1; p. 703, s. 7, &c.; p. 708, n. 1
 Faustus, p. 699, s. 1; p. 707, s. 11; p. 712, s. 23
 Socinus, a history of, in 16th cent. p. 699, &c.; 17th, p. 860, &c.; 18th, p. 874, s. 27
 Socra, ecclesiastical historian, 6th cent. p. 186, n.
 Socrata, enlightened, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1
 Sober, Ernest, p. 860, s. 2
 Soerius, Philip, 12th cent. p. 409, s. 22; p. 421, s. 12
 Soman of Constance, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 Somaquo, fathers of, p. 615, s. 17
 Sommer, John, p. 712, s. 23
 Son of God, opinion of Roel, p. 834, s. 33
 Sonnites, Mohammedan sect, p. 244, s. 6
 Sophronius, monk of Palestine, 4th cent. p. 138, n.
 bishop of Jerusalem, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 3; p. 247, s. 5
 Sorbonne founded, 13th cent. p. 439, s. 3
 Sozomen, ecclesiastical historian, 5th cent. p. 186, n.
 Space, Cartesian idea of, p. 833, s. 30
 Spain, occupied by Saracens, 8th cent. p. 265, s. 2; 9th, p. 289, s. 1; 11th, p. 350, s. 2; 14th, p. 485, s. 4; 15th, p. 522, s. 1 reformation in, 585, s. 34, n. 1; p. 599, s. 13
 expulsion of Moors from, p. 743, s. 9
 Spangenberg, Cyriac, p. 657, s. 46; p. 651, s. 33
 Spanheim, Frederick, p. 817, s. 14; p. 832, s. 28
 Spener, Philip James, p. 792, s. 15; p. 794, s. 18; p. 799, s. 26, &c.
 Sperber, Julius, p. 733, s. 30
 Spillsbury, John, p. 860, n. 1
 Spina, Alphonsus de, 15th cent. p. 543, s. 24
 Spinoza, Benedict, p. 728, s. 24, &c.; p. 736, s. 35; p. 867, s. 6
 Spire, diets of, p. 579, s. 23; p. 581, s. 25; p. 593, s. 14
 Spirit, Holy, his procession controverted, 8th cent. p. 283, s. 15; 9th, p. 311, s. 18 his miraculous gifts, a controversy, 9th cent. p. 316, n. 3 Spirituals, a party of Franciscans, p. 455, s. 31; p. 500, s. 22 in France, p. 681, s. 38
 Sprenger, James, 15th cent. p. 548, n.
 Spurious Gospels, Acts, Epistles, &c. p. 36, s. 17, n. 6
 Stancarus, Francis, p. 652, s. 36
 Stations among Romanists, what, p. 234, s. 3; n. 4
 Statorius, Peter, p. 704, n. 2
 Stedingers, heretics, 13th cent. p. 475, n. 3
 Stella, John, 16th cent. p. 544, n.
 Stenonius, Nicholas, p. 750, s. 16 of Augsburg, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 Harding, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 of Hungary, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 6
 Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, 13th cent. p. 445, s. 8; p. 464, s. 43 of Liege, 10th cent. p. 341, s. 6 of Orleans, 12th cent. p. 305, n.
 of Thiers, 11th cent. p. 370, s. 36 of Tournay, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 I. bishop of Rome, 3d cent. p. 98, n.; p. 104, s. 13
 II, pope, 8th cent. p. 269, s. 7; p. 277, n.
 III, pope, 8th cent. p. 277, n.
 V, pope, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 VII, pope, 10th cent. p. 305, n.; p. 333, s. 3
 VIII, pope, 10th cent. p. 334, s. 4
 IX, pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 5; p. 374, n.
 Starcoraniam, what, p. 313, s. 21, n. 2
 Stero, Henry, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 Sterward or Staroverst, p. 781, n. 5
 Stiefel, Esalas, p. 809, s. 42
 Stigmata of St. Francis, p. 499, s. 21; p. 517, s. 2
 Stock, Simon, 13th cent. p. 454, s. 29
 Stoic philosophy, 14th cent. p. 487, s. 2
 Storck, Nicholas, p. 686, s. 4
 Strabo, Walafrid, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 302, s. 14
 Strasburg, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1
 Strigelius, Victorin, p. 657, s. 46; p. 633, s. 15; p. 650, s. 30; p. 651, s. 32; p. 651, s. 33
 Strigolniks, sect, p. 781, n. 6
 Stubner, Mark, p. 686, s. 4
 Sturmus of Fulda, 8th cent. p. 263, n. 3
 Stylanus, Mapa, 9th cent. p. 800, n.
 Stylites or pillar saints, 5th cent. p. 194, s. 12
 Subchal-Jesu, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1, n. 1
 Sub-deacons, their office, p. 92, s. 5
 Substitution, p. 830, n. 6
 Sudbury, Simon, 14th cent. p. 498, s. 20
 Sueno of Denmark, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7
 Suidas, 10th cent. p. 337, s. 12
 Sulaka, John, Nestorian, p. 609, s. 7; p. 633, s. 16
 Sulpitius, Severus, ecclesiastical historian, 4th cent. p. 141, s. 16, n. 6
 Summa theologica, what, p. 377, s. 6; p. 472, s. 10
 Sunday, observance of, p. 43, s. 4; p. 78, s. 8; p. 155, s. 5
 Suneceum, Paulician clergy, p. 321, s. 5
 Superstition, increase of, in 3d cent. p. 105, s. 1; 4th, p. 143, s. 2; 5th, p. 191, s. 2; 6th, p. 229, s. 1; 7th, p. 250, s. 1; 8th, p. 277, s. 2; 9th, p. 306, s. 2; 10th, p. 339, s. 3; 11th, p. 375, s. 1; 12th, p. 417, s. 2; 13th, p. 474, s. 2
 Supplications, public, 4th cent. p. 144, s. 3
 Supralapsarians, p. 815, s. 10; p. 815, s. 11; p. 816, s. 12, n. 1; p. 872, s. 21
 Surinam, Dutch mission to, p. 726, s. 20
 Surlis, Lawrence, p. 617, s. 21
 Susneus, emperor of Abyssinia, p. 760, s. 17
 Suso, Henry, 13th cent. p. 491, n. 3; p. 515, s. 6
 Sweden, reformation of, p. 582, s. 29, &c.
 Swedes, enlightened, 9th cent. p. 287, s. 2
 Switzerland, reformation in, p. 571, s. 11, n. 1
 Swiss churches, p. 837, s. 37, &c.; p. 845, s. 13; p. 874, s. 26 reformers, recent biographies of, p. 572, n.
 Sword-bearers, knights, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 4
 Syagrius, writer, 5th cent. p. 193, s. 7
 Sylvester II, pope, 10th cent. p. 328, s. 10; p. 335, s. 7
 III, pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 3
 Sguropulus, 15th cent. p. 538, n.
 Symbolical books, Lutheran, p. 637, s. 2; p. 793, s. 16
 Symmachus, translator of Old Testament, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 190, n.
 Synagogues, Jewish, p. 16, s. 16
 Synoculus, what, p. 274, s. 17, n. 1
 Syncretistic controversy, p. 795, s. 20, &c.

Synergistic controversy, p. 650, s. 30, &c.
Synesius, bishop in Cyrene, 5th cent. p. 127, s. 2; p. 185, n.
Synod: see Council of Dort, p. 815, s. 11; p. 815, s. 12; p. 841, s. 6, &c.
 — Holy, of Russia, p. 782, s. 5
 — national, of France, p. 666, n. 2
Syrianus, a philosopher, 5th cent. p. 179, s. 5
Syriscus, bishop of Barcelona, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
Szegedin, Stephen, p. 674, s. 25; p. 683, s. 44
Taborites of Bohemia, 15th cent. p. 550, s. 6
Tajo, or Tago, bishop of Saragossa, 7th cent. p. 215, s. 2; p. 252, s. 3
Takla, John, bishop of Alexandria, 5th cent. p. 205, s. 16
Tamerlane or Timur Beg, p. 485, s. 1
Tangut, missions to, &c. p. 345, s. 1; p. 523, s. 1
Tanner, Adam, p. 740, s. 2
Tanquelin or Tanquelm, 12th cent. p. 427, s. 9
Tarasius of Constantinople, 8th cent. p. 276, n.
Tarnovius, John, p. 792, s. 15; p. 807, s. 38
 — Paul, p. 792, s. 15
Tartars, enlightened by Nestorians, 7th cent. p. 239, s. 1; 8th, p. 260, s. 1; 9th, p. 324, s. 1; 11th, p. 345, s. 1; 12th, p. 391, s. 7; 13th, p. 432, s. 2; 14th, p. 484, s. 2; 15th, p. 524, s. 1, n.
Tatian and his sect, 2d cent. p. 56, s. 5; p. 65, s. 5; p. 66, n.; his harmony of the gospels, p. 67, n. 2; p. 67, s. 4; p. 77
Tauler, John, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 37
Taurellus, Nicholas, p. 603, s. 5; p. 604, n.
Taxa cancellaria apostolica, p. 561, n. 1
Telesius, Bernhard, p. 604, s. 8
Telling, William, p. 681, s. 37
Templars, order of, 12th cent. p. 394, s. 14; p. 520, s. 10
 — suppressed, p. 493, s. 7
Temples, dedicated to saints; 6th cent. p. 234, s. 4
Tennhart, John, p. 870, s. 16
Terminists, the Nominalists, p. 526, s. 7
Tertiari, who, p. 460, s. 40
Tertullian, 2d cent. p. 57, s. 7; p. 65, s. 5; p. 68, s. 7; p. 84, s. 24; p. 102, s. 10
Test act, p. 831, s. 25
Testament, New, translations of, p. 53, s. 6; p. 86, s. 5; p. 230, s. 3; p. 257, s. 3
Tetzl, John, p. 566, s. 3; p. 567, s. 4; p. 568, s. 5
Teutonic knights, p. 394, s. 15; p. 435, s. 9
Thalassius, a monk, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
Theatin, monks, p. 615, s. 17
Theganus, historian, 9th cent. p. 292, s. 6; p. 304, n.
Themistius, a philosopher, 4th cent. p. 123, s. 18
 — and Themistians, 6th cent. p. 237, s. 9
 — Calonymus, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
Theobald V. of Campania, 13th cent. p. 434, s. 6
 — Stampensis, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
Theodora, empress, 9th cent. p. 268, s. 2; p. 310, s. 15
 — of Rome, 10th cent. p. 353, s. 3
Theodoret, bishop of Cyprus, 5th cent. p. 183, s. 10, n. 4; p. 192, s. 7
Theodorico, king of the Ostrogoths, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 1
 — of St. Trudo, 12th cent. p. 416, n.
 — de Apollida, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
Theodorus Abucara, p. 259, s. 13
 — Balsamon, 12th cent. p. 410, s. 22
 — Graptus, 9th cent. p. 299, s. 13
 — of Iconium, 6th cent. p. 228, n.
 — Lascaris, 13th cent. p. 463, s. 43
 — Lector, ecclesiastical historian, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 — Motechita, 14th cent. p. 486, s. 1
 — of Mopsuestia, 4th cent. p. 137, n.; p. 184, s. 10, n. 4; p. 192, s. 5
 — of Pharan, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — of Raithu, 7th cent. p. 248, s. 5
 — I. bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 — Studites, 9th cent. p. 299, s. 13
 — of Tarsus, archbishop of Canterbury, 7th cent. p. 245, s. 2; p. 242, s. 5
Theodosius, the Great, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
 — II. emperor, 5th cent. p. 173, s. 2
 — bishop of Alexandria, 6th cent. p. 237, s. 9
Theodotus of Rome, 2d cent. p. 82, s. 21
 — of Ancyra, 5th cent. p. 185, s. 10, n. 3
Theodul or Decodul, 11th cent. p. 374, n.
Theodulphus, 8th cent. p. 276, s. 18

Theognostus of Alexandria, 3d cent. p. 98, n.
Theology, biblical, in 16th cent. p. 563; p. 604; p. 620; p. 643; p. 680; 17th, p. 766; p. 794; p. 812; p. 833
 — didactic in 1st cent. p. 40; 2d, p. 68; 3d, p. 99; 4th, p. 143; 5th, p. 190; 6th, p. 230; 7th, p. 261; 8th, p. 277; 9th, p. 308; 10th, p. 341; 11th, p. 376; 12th, p. 418; 13th, p. 470; 14th, p. 515; 15th, p. 552; 16th, p. 563; p. 604; p. 618, &c.; p. 643; p. 680; p. 717; 17th, p. 764, &c.; p. 766; p. 796; p. 803; p. 814; 18th, p. 870
 — exagetic, in 1st cent. p. 89; 2d, p. 67, s. 5; 3d, p. 100; 4th, p. 144; 5th, p. 191; 6th, p. 229; 7th, p. 250; 8th, p. 278; 9th, p. 308; 10th, p. 341; 11th, p. 376; 12th, p. 418; 13th, p. 470; 14th, p. 514; 15th, p. 551
 — polemic, in 1st cent. p. 42; 2d, p. 68; 3d, p. 102; 4th, p. 145; 5th, p. 192; 6th, p. 231; 7th, p. 252; 8th, p. 280; 9th, p. 309; 10th, p. 341; 11th, p. 378; 12th, p. 421; 13th, p. 473; 14th, p. 516; 15th, p. 552; 16th, p. 563; p. 621; p. 622, &c.; p. 644; p. 667; 17th, p. 767; p. 781; p. 795; p. 803, &c.; p. 814
 — positive, scholastic and mystic, p. 229; p. 279; p. 293; p. 309; p. 421; p. 472; p. 515; p. 552 — practical in 1st cent. p. 40; 2d, p. 68; 3d, p. 101; 4th, p. 145; 5th, p. 193; 6th, p. 231; 7th, p. 252; 8th, p. 280; 9th, p. 309; 10th, p. 341; 11th, p. 378; 12th, p. 421; 13th, p. 472; 14th, p. 514; 15th, p. 552; 16th, p. 605; p. 621; p. 644, &c.; p. 681, &c.; p. 710; 17th, p. 732; p. 765; p. 766; p. 802, &c.; p. 814, &c.
Theonas, bishop, in 4th cent. p. 142, n.
Theopaschites, sect, 5th cent. p. 206, s. 18
Theophanes of Byzantium, 6th cent. p. 225, n.
 — Cerameus, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30
 — historian, 8th cent. p. 274, s. 17
 — of Nice, 9th cent. p. 259, n.
 — of Nice, 14th cent. p. 508, s. 37
Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, 2d cent. p. 64, s. 5; p. 68, s. 7
 — bishop of Alexandria, 5th cent. p. 138, n.; p. 153, s. 25; p. 184, s. 10, n. 3
 — bishop of the Goths, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 21
 — Maronite, 8th cent. p. 285, n. 1
 — Greek emperor, 9th cent. p. 310, s. 15
Theophrastus, philosopher, 5th cent. p. 159, s. 5
Theophylact, Simocatta, 7th cent. p. 248, n.
 — of Constantinople, 10th cent. p. 382, s. 1
 — of Bulgaria, 11th cent. p. 372, s. 30
Theorianus, 12th cent. p. 410, n.
Theosophists, p. 605, s. 8; p. 641, s. 12, &c.; p. 782, s. 30
Therapoutæ, a Jewish sect, p. 15, s. 10; p. 74, s. 14
Theresa St. p. 615, s. 16; p. 778, s. 52
Theurgy, what, p. 61, s. 10
Thienens, Cajetan, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
Thiers, John Baptist, p. 764, s. 32
Thirty years' war, p. 740, s. 3, &c.
Thomas, the apostle, p. 21, n. 2; visited India, and some say China, p. 239, n. 2
 — Aquinas, 13th cent. p. 442, s. 8; p. 466, s. 38
 — a Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 12
 — of Brabant, 14th cent. p. 515, s. 7
 — Bradwardine, 14th cent. p. 488, s. 5; p. 509, s. 38
 — Cantipratensis, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44
 — Christiana, India, p. 609, s. 7; p. 784, s. 8
 — of Heraclea, 7th cent. p. 251, s. 2
 — of India, 8th cent. p. 250, n. 1
 — Jorsius, 14th cent. p. 510, n.
 — of Strasburg, 14th cent. p. 509, s. 87
 — Stubbs, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Walleis, 14th cent. p. 512, n.
 — Wicko, Wicelus, 13th cent. p. 469, n.
Thomasius, king of Bosnia, 15th cent. p. 564, s. 1
Thomasius, Christian, p. 790, s. 11, n. 4; p. 792, s. 14; p. 801, n.
Thomassin, Lewis, p. 762, s. 31; p. 763, s. 32
Thomists, 14th cent. p. 518, s. 5
Thorn, conference of, p. 745, s. 12; p. 787, s. 5; p. 797, n.
Thought, the essence of Spirit, p. 823, s. 30
Thundering legion, 2d cent. p. 54, s. 9
Thuriflicatores, who, p. 88, s. 3
Thuringians, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 2
Tiberius, emperor, 1st cent. p. 21, s. 7

- Tibrica, seat of Paulicians, p. 321, s. 4
 Tichonius of Africa, 4th cent. p. 143, n.
 Tillemont, Sebastian le Nain de, p. 762, s. 81
 Timothy, companion of St. Paul, p. 21, n. 2
 — III. bishop of Alexandria, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 — bishop of Constantinople, 6th cent. p. 224, n.
 — a writer of the 7th cent. p. 253, s. 6
 Nestorian, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 1
 Timur Beg: see Tamerlane
 Tindal, William, p. 586, n. 1
 — Matthew, p. 865, s. 5
 Tithes, p. 63, n. 1; p. 72, s. 4
 Titelmann, Francis, p. 620, s. 26
 Titull, what, p. 154, s. 2, n. 3
 Titus, companion of St. Paul, p. 21, n. 3 — of Bostra, 4th cent. p. 187, n.
 Toland, John, p. 728, s. 22; p. 867, s. 5
 Toleration, among Pagans, p. 8, s. 8; p. 23, s. 6; in 16th cent. p. 588, s. 3, &c.; p. 596, s. 8, n. 1; p. 665, s. 15, &c.; 17th, p. 825, n. 1; p. 826, n. 1; p. 827, n.; p. 828, n.; p. 830, s. 25; p. 843, s. 10, &c.; p. 857, s. 1, &c.; p. 860, n.; p. 873, s. 24
 — act of, p. 631, s. 25, n. 2
 Tomitanus, Bernardin, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Tongues, gift of, p. 19, n. 3
 Tonquin, missions to, p. 716, s. 8
 Torgau, articles of, p. 582, s. 28
 — convention of, p. 654, s. 39
 Tostatus, Alphonsus, 15th cent. p. 539, s. 24
 Torice, ecclesiastical, p. 830, s. 24
 Toul, council of, 9th cent. p. 315, s. 23
 Tournon, cardinal, p. 585, n.; p. 666, s. 3
 Tradition, p. 618, s. 22; p. 620, s. 25
 Traitors, who, p. 115, s. 2
 Trajan, emperor, 2d cent. p. 51, s. 1
 Transubstantiation, 9th cent. p. 312, s. 19; 10th, p. 339, n. 2; 11th, p. 379, s. 13; 12th, p. 422, s. 18; 13th, p. 469, s. 2; 16th, p. 576, s. 20; in Greek church, p. 781, s. 3
 Transylvania, p. 674, s. 25; p. 708, s. 12, &c.; p. 860, s. 1; p. 874, s. 27
 Trappe, de la, p. 620, s. 26
 Treasury, papal, p. 560, s. 8; p. 607, s. 4, n. 3
 Trent, council of, p. 593, s. 14; p. 595, s. 5; p. 613, s. 14; p. 618, s. 23; historians of the, p. 613, n.
 Tribonianus, a jurist, 6th cent. p. 215, s. 1
 Trinity, disputes on, in 2d cent. p. 82, s. 20; 3d, p. 110, s. 12; 4th, p. 190, s. 9; 5th, p. 206, s. 18; 6th, p. 233, s. 12; 13th, p. 483, s. 15; 17th, p. 797, n.; p. 798, s. 23
 Triphilus of Cyprus, 4th cent. p. 137, n.
 Trithelists, in 6th cent. p. 238, s. 10
 Trithemius, John, 15th cent. p. 525, s. 3; p. 547, n.
 Trivium, what, p. 178, n. 2; p. 266, s. 5; p. 353, s. 5; p. 398, s. 4
 Triune God, a controversy, 9th cent. p. 316, s. 25
 Trivet, Nicholas, 14th cent. p. 511, n.
 Tryphon, Greek writer, 3d cent. p. 97, n.
 Tryers, the thirty, under Cromwell, p. 128, n.
 Tubingen, divines, p. 629, s. 7
 Tudescus Nicolaus, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 Turkestan, enlightened, 11th cent. p. 345, s. 1
 Turks in 8th cent. p. 265, s. 1; 10th, p. 328, s. 1; 11th, p. 350, s. 1; 12th, p. 395, s. 3; 14th, p. 485, s. 1
 Turlupins, sect, 13th cent. p. 480, s. 9
 Turrecremata, John de, p. 543, s. 24
 Turrianus, Francis, p. 617, s. 21
 — Augustine, p. 796, n. 2
 Tychicus, enthusiast, 12th cent. p. 423, s. 1
 Typus, edict of emperor Constant, 7th cent. p. 256, s. 7
 Tyra, mother or Harald, 10th cent. p. 326, s. 7
 Tyrannicide advocated, 15th cent. p. 831, s. 9
 Tzetsch, Theodora von, p. 808, s. 40
 UBERATUS de Casalis, p. 502, s. 27; p. 511, n.
 Ubiquity of Christ's body, p. 656, s. 42; p. 662, s. 10, &c.; p. 806, s. 36
 Udalrich or Ulrich, of Augsburg, p. 340, s. 4
 — of Strasburg, 13th cent. p. 468, n.
 Ueberfeld, John William, p. 870, s. 16
 Uke Wallis and Ukwallists, p. 858, s. 5
 Ullas, or Ulphilas, bishop of the Goths, 4th cent. p. 124, s. 21
 — of Angers, 12th cent. p. 397, s. 3
 — of London, Richard, 15th cent. p. 544, n.
 — of Canterbury, protested, p. 581, n. 1
 — extreme, 3d cent. p. 44, s. 9
 Ungchan, Presbyter John, 12th cent. p. 391, s. 7
 Uniformity, act of, p. 669, s. 17; p. 828, n.; p. 830, s. 25
 Unigenitus, bull, p. 868, s. 8
 Unity of human souls, 9th cent. p. 316, n. 3
 Unitarians, p. 699, s. 2; p. 707, s. 11, &c.; p. 862, s. 5; see Socinians, Arians
 United brethren, in England, p. 825, n. 1
 — Greeks, who, p. 635, s. 21, &c.
 Universalists, who, p. 816, s. 12; p. 817, s. 14; p. 872, s. 21
 Universals: see Realists and Nominalists
 Universities, protestant, p. 640, s. 8; see Schools
 University of Paris, p. 439, s. 3; p. 524, s. 3
 — of Prague, 15th cent. p. 528, s. 6
 Unleavened bread, in the eucharist, p. 379, s. 11
 Uranus, Nestorian philosopher, 6th cent. p. 218, s. 5
 Urban II. pope, 11th cent. p. 346, s. 4; p. 367, s. 20; p. 375, n.; p. 416, n.
 — III. pope, 12th cent. p. 406, s. 14
 — IV. pope, 13th cent. p. 447, s. 12; p. 463, n.
 — V. pope, 14th cent. p. 455, s. 12
 — VI. pope, 14th cent. p. 455, s. 14
 — VIII. pope, p. 738, s. 1; p. 753, s. 20
 Ursinus, deacon of Rome, 4th cent. p. 129, s. 5
 Ursinus, Zacharias, p. 683, s. 44
 Ursulines, nuns, p. 616, s. 18
 Usuardus, martyrologist, 9th cent. p. 305, n.
 Utino, Leonard de, 15th cent. p. 545, n.
 VALENCE, council of, 9th cent. p. 315, s. 23
 Valens, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
 Valentinian, emperor, 4th cent. p. 122, s. 15
 Valentinus, and his sect, 2d cent. p. 80
 Valerian, emperor, 3d cent. p. 84, s. 5
 — bishop in 5th cent. p. 189, n.
 Valerius, Magnus, p. 749, n. 6
 — Spanish monk, 7th cent. p. 250, n.
 Valla, Laurentius, 15th cent. p. 545, n.; p. 550, s. 8
 Vallischolares, canons, 13th cent. p. 451, s. 19
 Vallombrosians, monks, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24
 Valois, Felix de, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 20
 Vandals, when converted, p. 165, n. 7; persecute in Africa, 5th cent. p. 198, s. 3
 Vanini, Julius Cæsar, p. 728, s. 23, &c.
 Varanes, king of Persia, 3d cent. p. 107, s. 2
 Vararanes, king of Persia, 5th cent. p. 177, s. 4
 Vargas, Alphonsus, 14th cent. p. 572, n.
 Vatablus, Francis, p. 617, s. 21
 Vayer, Francis de la Mothe le, p. 737, s. 37
 Veda of the Indians, p. 28, s. 3, n. 5
 Venetian Unitarians, p. 703, s. 7
 Venetians resist the popes, p. 752, s. 19
 Veri, Anthony, p. 866, s. 2
 Veron, Francis, p. 748, s. 15
 Vernacular liturgies, 6th cent. p. 234, s. 3; 11th, p. 394, s. 2
 Verschoor, James, p. 836, s. 36
 Vesalia, John de, 15th cent. p. 542, n. 1
 Vetteria, Anna, p. 809, s. 41
 Vicelin of Hamein, 12th cent. p. 390, s. 5
 Victor I. bishop of Rome, 2d cent. p. 66, n.; p. 74, s. 11
 — II. pope, 11th cent. p. 356, s. 5
 — III. pope, 11th cent. p. 367, s. 19; p. 375, n.
 — IV. pope, 12th cent. p. 404, s. 10
 — of Antioch, 5th cent. p. 185, n.
 — or Victorinus, a poet, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — Vicensis, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 — bishop of Tunis, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — of Capua, 6th cent. p. 229, n.
 — Richard de St.: see Richard Victorinus of Petau, 3d cent. p. 98, n.; p. 102, s. 9
 — Fabius Marcus, 4th cent. p. 142, n.
 Victorius or Victorinus of Gaul, 5th cent. p. 190, n.
 Vigerus, Marcus, 16th cent. p. 549, n.
 Vigilantius, a reformer, 5th cent. p. 195, s. 14
 Vigilius of Tapsus, 5th cent. p. 188, s. 11
 — bishop of Rome, 6th cent. p. 229, n.; p. 233, s. 10
 Villes or Vives, John Baptist, p. 713, s. 2
 Villa Mora, Thomas de, canonized, p. 778, s. 52
 Vincent of Beauvais, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5
 — de Paul, p. 759, s. 27
 Vincentius of Lerins, 5th cent. p. 178, s. 2; p. 188, s. 11
 Viret, Peter, p. 683, s. 44
 Virgilius, 8th cent. p. 263, n. 3
 Virgins of Love, p. 759, s. 27
 Visconti, Joseph, p. 764, s. 32

Visitation of churches, Saxon, p. 580, n. 2; English, p. 597, n.

Vitalianus, bishop of Rome, 7th cent. p. 350, n.

Vitalis, a Furno, 14th cent. p. 511, n.

Vitellius, a Donatist writer, 4th cent. p. 143, n.

Vitringa, Campeius, p. 835, s. 34

Vitaldus, John Ludovicus, 16th cent. p. 546, n.

Vives, John Ludovicus, p. 846, n.

Voonius of Africa, 5th cent. p. 192, s. 7

Voet, Gisbert, p. 813, s. 7; p. 832, s. 28; p. 833, s. 29

Voldovius, Andrew, p. 709, s. 14

Völkel, John, p. 862, n.

Volusianus, emperor, 3d cent. p. 88, s. 5

Volusius, Adolphus Godfrey, p. 746, s. 13

Vorlongus, William, 15th cent. p. 545, n.

Vorstius, Conrad, p. 842, s. 8

Vries, Gerhard de, p. 835, s. 33

Vulgate Bible, what, p. 144, s. 4; p. 498, s. 19; p. 620, s. 25

WADDRAM or Goddamus, Adam, 14th cent. p. 511, n.

Wahl, Adrian van der, p. 842, s. 8

Wake, William, archbishop, p. 873, s. 23, n. 1

Walafrid Strabo: see Strabo

Waldemar I. king of Denmark, p. 389, s. 2

Waldensians, p. 946, s. 2; p. 428, s. 11; p. 475, s. 2; p. 554, s. 2; p. 584, s. 33, n. 2; p. 674, s. 25; p. 685, s. 2, n. 2; p. 743, s. 8; p. 812, s. 5

Waldus, Peter, 12th cent. p. 428, s. 11

Walenburg, Peter and Adrian von, p. 748, n. 3

Wallis, John, 13th cent. p. 468, n.

— John, 17th cent. p. 737, s. 36

Walsingham, Thomas, 15th cent. p. 545, n.

Walter, a Beghard, 14th cent. p. 519, s. 5

— Hurley, 14th cent. p. 489, s. 4

— Mapes, 13th cent. p. 450, s. 5

— of St. Victor: see Gualter

Walther, Balthazar, p. 808, s. 40

— Michael, p. 792, s. 15

— Marcus, p. 843, s. 8

Wandsworth, first Presbyterian church in England, p. 827, n.

Wansleben, John Michael, p. 783, s. 6

War of the Peasants, p. 578, s. 21, &c.

— of Smalcald, p. 593, s. 1, &c.

Water, cold, ordeal by, p. 319, n. 4

Waterlanders, p. 691, s. 11; p. 695, s. 19; p. 858, s. 2; p. 859, s. 6

Wayen, John van der, p. 835, s. 33

Weavers, brethren, p. 462, s. 42

Weigel, Valerius, p. 642, s. 12

— Valentine, p. 808, s. 39

Weissenburg, in Transylvania, p. 708, n. 3

— city, protested, p. 581, n. 1

Weller, Jerome, p. 657, s. 46

— James, p. 792, s. 15; p. 796, s. 21

Wendelbert of Prum, 9th cent. p. 305 n.

Werdnhausen, John Angelus von, p. 808, s. 40

Werenfels, Peter, p. 837, n. 3

Wernerus, Rollwinck de Laer, p. 845, n.

Wessel, John, 15th cent. p. 540, s. 24

— Gisbert, p. 835, s. 33

West Indies, missions to, p. 724, s. 19

Westminster, Assembly, p. 827, n.

— Catechisms and Confession, p. 828, n.

Westphal, Joachim, p. 657, s. 46

Westphalia, peace of, p. 742, s. 7

Wetstein, John James, p. 843, s. 9

Whicheot, Benjamin, p. 735, s. 33

Whiston, William, p. 874, s. 27

— Thomas, p. 777, s. 51

White Brethren, sect, 15th cent. p. 554, s. 3

Whitefield, George, p. 873, s. 24

Wickliffe, John, 14th cent. p. 497, s. 19; p. 530, s. 6

Wickliffes, p. 498, s. 20; p. 548, s. 2

Wideland, Saxon chief, 8th cent. p. 264, s. 6

Wigand, John, p. 657, s. 46

Wilfrid, bishop of York, 7th cent. p. 246, n. 3

Wilhelmina, fanatic, 13th cent. p. 482, s. 13

William, Alvernus, 13th cent. p. s. 4

— Arnald, 13th cent. p. 476, s. 4

— of Auxerre, 13th cent. p. 412, s. 23; p. 467, n.

— of St. Amour, 13th cent. p. 454, s. 28; p. 466, s. 44

— the Briton, or Armoricus, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 5

— of Champeaux, 12th cent.

William, Christian, marquis of Brandenburg, p. 749, s. 16

— the Conqueror, 11th cent. p. 852, s. 3

— de Courtenay, 14th cent. p. 498, s. 20

— Durand, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44

— of Hirschau, 11th cent. p. 369, s. 24

— III. king of England, p. 744, s. 10; p. 831, s. 26

— VI. landgrave of Hesse, p. 787, s. 5

— Major, 13th cent. p. 469, n.

— of Malmesbury, 12th cent. p. 416, n.

— Mardagot, 14th cent. p. 810, n.

— of Nangis, 13th cent. p. 440, s. 8; p. 510, n.

— Neubrigensis, 12th cent. p. 416, n.

— of Nogent, 12th cent. p. 418, s. 6

— of Paris, 13th cent. p. 465, s. 44; n.; p. 510, n.

— Perald, 13th cent. p. 466, s. 44

— prince of Orange, p. 599, s. 12; p. 690, s. 21

— of Rheims, 12th cent. p. 473, s. 23

— de Selignac, 13th cent. p. 467, n.

— Thorn, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

— of Tyro, 12th cent. p. 416, n.

— Wodford, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

— Wolfgang, count Palatine, p. 749, s. 16

Willelmus of Metz, 11th cent. p. 375, n.

Williams, Roger, p. 860, n.

Willibald of Eichstadt, 8th cent. p. 277, n.

Willibrand, of Oldenburg, 13th cent. p. 467, n.

Willibrord, English missionary, 7th cent. p. 240, s. 3

— of Utrecht, 8th cent. p. 261, n.

Wilmot, John, earl of Rochester, p. 727, s. 22

Wimphelingius, James, 15th cent. p. 548, n.

Windsholm, city, protested, p. 581, n. 1

Winifrid or Boniface, apostle of Germany, 8th cent. p. 260, s. 2; p. 261, s. 4

Wissowatius, Andrew, p. 862, n. 1

Wittkind, historian, 10th cent. p. 330, s. 5

Witnesses of the truth, 11th cent. p. 376, s. 2; 12th, p. 426, s. 7; 13th, p. 475, s. 2; 14th, p. 497, s. 18; 15th, p. 547, s. 2

Wittenberg, p. 565, s. 2; p. 573, s. 14; p. 574, s. 17, &c.

Wlodimir, duke of Russia, 10th cent. p. 325, s. 5

Wolf, Christopher, p. 871, s. 18

Wolfhardus of Eichstadt, 9th cent. p. 305, n.

Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt, protest, p. 581, n. 1

Woolston, Thomas, p. 867, s. 5

Works, good, controversy on, p. 649, s. 29

World, state of, when Christ came, p. 7, s. 1

Worms, diets of, p. 356, s. 4; p. 402, s. 6; p. 573, s. 15; p. 592, s. 13

— Conference of, p. 591, s. 13

Worship, in 1st cent. p. 42; 2d, p. 73; 3d, p. 103; 4th, p. 143, s. 2; p. 153, s. 1; p. 154, s. 8; 5th, p. 196, s. 2; 6th, p. 234, s. 3; 7th, p. 253, s. 1; see Ceremonies for succeeding centuries

— public, Greek, p. 630, s. 8; p. 631, s. 10; p. 632, s. 14 — Romish, p. 563, s. 16; p. 627, s. 42; p. 778, s. 52

— Lutheran, p. 638, s. 3

— Reformed, p. 659, s. 3

— English, p. 663, s. 17, n. 2; p. 670, s. 18; p. 671, s. 19

— Quaker, p. 851, s. 9; p. 854

Writers, Greek and Oriental, 1st cent. p. 31; 2d, p. 103; 3d, p. 93; 4th, p. 131; 5th, p. 193; 6th, p. 223; 7th, p. 247; 8th, p. 273; 9th, p. 298; 10th, p. 329, s. 337; 11th, p. 372; 12th, p. 409; 13th, p. 463; 14th, p. 507; 15th, p. 536

— Latin, 1st cent. p. 31; 2d, p. 65; 3d, p. 396; 4th, p. 137; 5th, p. 195; 6th, p. 224; 7th, p. 248; 8th, p. 274; 9th, p. 300; 10th, p. 350, s. 338; 11th, p. 372; 12th, p. 410; 13th, p. 464; 14th, p. 506; 15th, p. 538

— Roman Catholic, in 16th cent. p. 617, s. 21

— in 17th, pp. 762, 763, 764, s. 82

— Lutheran, in 16th cent. p. 657, s. 46; in 17th, p. 792, s. 15

— Reformed, in 16th cent. p. 683, s. 44; in 17th, p. 812, s. 6; pp. 812, 813, n. 5

Wulstalcus, eremite of Troves, 5th cent. p. 194, s. 12

Würzburg, a bishopric, 8th cent. p. 261, s. 3

XAVIER, St. Francis, p. 601, s. 3

Xenolas: see Philoxenus

Ximenes, Francis, 15th cent. p. 522, s. 1; p. 548, n.

Ximenes, Franciscus, 14th cent. p. 514, n.

Xiphillin, George, 12th cent. p. 410, n.

— John, 11th cent. p. 372, n.

YOUNGSEN, among the Cathari, p. 426, s. 6
Yvon, Peter, p. 864, n. 2

ZABARELLA, Francis, 14th cent. p. 514, n.

Zaccagni, Lawrence Alexander, p. 764, s. 32.

Zacharias, ecclesiastical historian, 5th cent. p. 187, n.;
p. 228, n.

——— Anthony Maria, p. 618, s. 17

——— archbishop of Mitylene, 6th cent. p. 225, n.

——— pope, 8th cent. p. 277, n.

——— of Chrysopolis, 12th cent. p. 416, n.

Zacharias, fictitious author, 5th cent. p. 190, n.

Zamora, Alphonsus, 16th cent. p. 548, n.

Zanchius, Jerome, p. 661, s. 7

Zelts, a bishopric, 10th cent. p. 327, n. 7

Zelatores, Franciscans, 13th cent. p. 455, s. 31

Zenghi, Atabec, 12th cent. p. 392, s. 8

Zeno, bishop of Verona, 4th cent. p. 142, n.

——— emperor, 5th cent. p. 206, s. 19

Zimmermann, John James, p. 898, s. 40

Zingha, Anna, p. 724, s. 18

Zinzendorf, count, p. 871, s. 17

Ziska, John, 15th cent. p. 550, s. 3

Zonaras, John, 12th cent. p. 396, s. 1; p. 403, s. 22

Zosimus, pagan historian, 5th cent. p. 177, s. 3; p. 210,
s. 24

——— bishop of Rome, 5th cent. p. 189, n.

Zutphen, Gerhard of, 14th cent. p. 513, n.

Zwingli, Ulrich, p. 571, s. 11, n. 1; p. 683, s. 44; p. 577, n.; p. 581, s. 27; p. 588, n.; p. 646, s. 23, &c.; p. 659,
s. 3, &c.; p. 679, s. 34

THE END.

